Archbishop Whately, in his preface to the Elements of Rhetoric, says, "It has been declared, by the highest legal authorities, that 'Christianity is part of the law of the land,' and, consequently, any one who impugns it is liable to prosecution. What is the precise meaning of the above legal maxim I do not profess to determine, having never met with any one who could explain it to me; but evidently the mere circumstance that we have religion by law established does not of itself imply the illegality of arguing against that religion." It seems difficult, says an accomplished writer (Townsend, St. Tr. vol. ii. p. 389), to render more intelligible a maxim which has perplexed so learned a critic. Christianity was pronounced to be part of the common law, in contradistinction to the ecclesiastical law, for the purpose of proving that the temporal courts, as well as the courts spiritual, had jurisdiction over offences against it. Blasphemies against God and religion are properly cognizable by the law of the land, as they disturb the foundations on which the peace and good order of society rest, root up the principle of positive laws and penal restraints, and remove the chief sanction for truth, without which no question of property could be decided and no criminal brought to justice. Christianity is part of the common law, as its root and branch, its majesty and pillar—as much a component part of that law as the government and maintenance of social order. The inference of the learned archbishop seems scarcely accurate, that all who impugn this part of the law must be prosecuted. It does not follow, because Christianity is part of the law of England, that every one who impugns it is liable to prosecution. The manner of and motives for the assault are the true tests and criteria. Scoffing, flippant, railing comments, not serious arguments, are considered offences at common law, and justly punished, because they shock the pious no less than deprave the ignorant and young. The meaning of Chief Justice Hale cannot be expressed more plainly than in his own words. An information was exhibited against one Taylor, for uttering blasphemous expressions too horrible to repeat. Hale, C. J., observed that "such kind of wicked, blasphemous words were not only an offence to God and religion, but a crime against the laws, state, and government, and therefore punishable in the court of King's Bench. For, to say religion is a cheat, is to subvert all those obligations whereby civil society is preserved; that Christianity is part of the laws of England, and to reproach the Christian religion is to speak in subversion of the law." Ventr. 293. To remove all possibility of further doubt, the English commissioners on criminal law, in their sixth report, p. 83 (1841), have thus clearly explained their sense of the celebrated passage: "The meaning of the expression used by Lord Hale, that 'Christianity was parcel of the laws of England,' though often cited in subsequent cases, has, we think, been much misunderstood. It appears to us that the expression can only mean either that, as a great part of the securities of our legal system consist of judicial and official oaths sworn upon the Gospels, Christianity is closely interwoven with our municipal law, or that the laws of England, like all municipal laws of a Christian country, must, upon principles of general jurisprudence, be subservient to the positive rules of Christianity. In this sense, Christianity may justly be said to be incorporated with the law of England, so as to form parcel of it; and it was probably in this sense that Lord Hale intended the expression should be understood. At all events, in whatever sense the expression is to be understood, it does not appear to us to supply any reason in favor of the rule that arguments may not be used against it; for it is not criminal to speak or write either against the common law of England, generally, or against particular portions of it, provided it be not done in such a manner as to endanger the public peace by exciting forcible resistance; so that the statement that Christianity is parcel of the law of England, which has been so often urged in justification of laws against blasphemy, however true it may be as a general proposition, certainly furnishes no additional argument for the propriety of such laws." If blasphemy mean a railing accusation, then it is, and ought to be, forbidden; Heard, Lib. & Sl. § 338. See 2 How. 127, 197; 11 S. & R. 394; 8 Johns. 200; 10 Ark. 250; 2 Harr. Del. 553, 569; 21 Am. L. Reg. 201, 333, 537; 24 id. 217. See Cooley, Const. Lim.

CHRISTIAN NAME. The baptismal name distinct from the surname. It has been said from the bench that a Christian name may consist of a single letter. Wharton. See NAME.

CHURCH. A society of persons who profess the Christian religion. 7 Halst. 206, 214; 10 Pick. 193; 3 Pa. 282; 31 id. 9.

The place where such persons regularly assemble for worship. 3 Tex. 288.

The term church includes the chancel, aisles, and body of the church. Hamm. N. P. 204; 3 Tex. 288. By the English law, the terms church or chapel, and church-yard, are expressly recognized as in themselves correct and technical descriptions of the building and place, even in criminal proceedings; 8 B. & C. 25; 1 Salk. 256; 11 Co. 25 b; 2 Esp. 5, 28.

Burglary may be committed in a church, at common law; 3 Cox, Cr. Cas. 581. The church of England is not deemed a corporation aggregate; but the church in any particular place is so considered, for the purposes at least of receiving a gift of lands; 9 Cra. 292; 2 Conn. 287; 3 Vt. 400; 2 Rich. Eq. 192. See 9 Mass. 44; 11 Pick. 495; 1 Me. 288; 4 Ia. 252; 3 Tex. 288; 2 Md. Ch. Dec. 143.

As to the right of succession to glebe lands, see 9 Cra. 43, 292; 9 Wheat. 468; or other church property, see 18 N. Y. 395. As to the power of a church to make by-laws, etc., under local statutes, see 5 S. & R. 510; 3 Pa. 282; 4 Des. 578; 30 Vt. 595; 5 Cush. 412. Acquiescence in and use of a constitution for over 50 years makes it valid and binding on the society; 156 Pa. 119; 98 Mich. 279.

Controversies in the civil courts concerning property rights of religious societies are generally to be decided by a reference to one or more of three propositions:—

(1st.) Was the property or fund, which is in question, devoted, by the express terms of the gift, grant, or sale, by which it was acquired, to the support of any specific religious doctrine or belief, or was it acquired for the general use of the society for religious purposes, with no other limitation?

(2d.) Is the society which owned it of strictly congregational or independent form of church government, owing no submission to any organization outside the congregation?

(3d.) Or is it one of a number of such societies, united to form a more general body of churches, with ecclesiastical control in the general association over the members and societies of which it is composed?

In the first class of cases, the court will, when necessary to protect the trust to which the property has been devoted, inquire into the religious faith or practice of the parties claiming its use or control, and will see that it shall not be diverted from that trust.

If the property was acquired in the ordinary way of purchase, or gift, for the use of a religious society, the court will inquire who constitute that society, or its legitimate successors, and award to them the use of the property.

In case of the independent order of the congregation, this is to be determined by the majority of the society, or by such organization of the society as, by its own rules, constitute its government.

In the class of cases in which property has been acquired in the same way by a society which constitutes a subordinate part of a general religious organization with established tribunals for ecclesiastical government, these tribunals must decide all questions of faith, discipline, rule, custom, or ecclesiastical government.

In such cases where the right of property in the civil court is dependent on the question of doctrine, discipline, ecclesiastical law, rule, or custom, or church government, and that has been decided by the highest tribunal within the organization to which it has been carried, the civil court will accept that decision as conclusive, and be governed by it in its application to the case before it; Watson v. Jones, 13 Wall. 680; s. c. 11 Am. L. Reg. 430; with a full note by Judge Redfield. See 6 Ohio Cir. Ct. R. 80; 146 Ill. 399.

See a learned and full article on the law of church corporations; 12 Am. L. Reg. n. s. 201, 329, 537. See also 15 id. 264; 92 Ill. 463; 88 Pa. 60, 503; 89 id. 97; 103 U. S. 330; 81 Wis. 374; 13 Lawy. Rep. Ann. 198; Kynett, Rel. Corp.

Where it is apparent from the charter of a church that it is in full connection with a synodical body, and not independent of it as a congregation, those who secede, whether a majority or not, lose all right and privilege to the corporate property, and those who remain hold them; 10 Paige 627. Where property is devoted under a trust to a particular religious faith or form of church government, those who adhere, however small in numbers, are entitled to its use, as against those who abandon the doctrines of church government; 1 Speer, Eq. 87; 41 Pa. 9; 4 N. J. 653; 1 Kern. 243; 6 Ohio 363; 98 Mass. 65; 7 Paige 281; 3 Meriv. 264; 91 Tenn. 303.

CHURCH RATE. A tribute by which the expenses of the church are to be defrayed. They are to be laid by the parishioners, in England, and may be recovered before two justices, or in the ecclesiastical court. Wharton, Dict.

CHURCH-WARDEN. An officer whose duty it is to take care of or guard the church.

They are taken to be a kind of corporation in favor of the church for some purposes: they may have, in that name, property in goods and chattels, and bring actions for them for the use and benefit of the church, but may not waste the church property, and are liable to be called to account; 3 Steph. Com. 90; 1 Bla. Com. 394; Cowel.

These officers are created in some ecclesiastical corporations by the charter, and their rights and duties are definitely explained. In England, it is said, their principal duties are to take care of the church or building, the utensils and furniture, the church-yard, certain matters of good order concerning the church and church-yard, the endowments of the church; Bacon, Abr. By the common law, the capacity of church-wardens to hold property for the church is limited to personal property; 9 Cra. 43.

CHURL. See CEORL.

CINQUE PORTS. The five ports of England which lie towards France.

These ports, on account of their importance as defences to the kingdom, early had certain privileges granted them, and in recompense were bound to furnish a certain number of ships and men to serve on the king's summons once in each year. "The service that the barons of the Cinque Ports acknowledge to owe; upon the king's summons, if it shall happen, to attend with their ships fifteen days at their own cost and charges, and so long as the king pleases, at his own charge;" Cowel, Quinque Portus. The Cinque Ports, under the ordinance of Henry III. in 1220, were Hastings, Dover, Sandwich, Hythe and Romney, and Winchelsea and Rye; 1 Social England 412. The two latter are sometimes reckoned ports of Sandwich; and the other of the Cinque Ports have ports appended to them in like manner. The Cinque Ports had a Lord Warden, who had a peculiar jurisdiction, sending out writs in his own name. This office is still maintained, and in August, 1895, the Marquis of Salisbury, then Prime Minister, was inducted into the office with much ceremony.

The first admiralty jurisdiction in somewhat modern form appears to have been committed to the Lord Warden and Bailiffs of the Cinque Ports. The constitution of these ports into a confederacy for the supply and maintenance of the navy was due to Edward the Confessor. Edward I. confirmed their charter. The last charter was in 1668. Their courts had civil, criminal, equity, and admiralty jurisdiction and were not subject to the courts at Westminster. See the charters in Jeakes' Charters of the Cinque Ports. See Inderwick's The King's Peace.

The jurisdiction was abolished by 18 & 19 Vict. c. 48; 20 & 21 Vict. c. 1. The representatives in parliament and the inhabitants of the Cinque Ports were each termed barons; Brande; Cowel; Termes de la Ley

CIPHER. See TELEGRAPH.

CIRCAR. In Hindu Law. Head of affairs; the state or government; a grand division of a province; a headman. A name used by Europeans in Bengal to denote the Hindu writer and accountant employed by themselves or in the public offices. Wharton; Black, L. Dict.

CIRCUIT. A division of the country, appointed for a particular judge to visit for the trial of causes or for the administration of justice. See 3 Bla. Com. 58.

Courts are held in each of these circuits, at stated periods, by judges assigned for that purpose; 3 Steph. Com. 321. The United States are divided into nine circuits; 1 Kent 301.

The term is often applied, perhaps, to the periodical journeys of the judges through their various circuits. The judges, or, in England, commissioners of assize nisi prius, are said to make their circuit; 3 Bla. Com. 57. The custom is of ancient origin. In A. D. 1170, justices in eyre were appointed, with delegated powers from the aula regis, being held members of that court, and directed to make the circuit of the kingdom once in seven years. See Inderwick, The King's Peace 60.

The custom is still retained in some of the states, as well as in England, as, for example, in Massachusetts, where the judges sit in succession in the various counties of the state, and the full bench of the supreme court, by the arrangement of law terms, makes a complete circuit of the state once in each year. See, generally, 3 Steph. Com. 221 et seq.; 1 Kent 301.

CIRCUIT COURTS. In American Law. Courts whose jurisdiction extends over several counties or districts, and of which terms are held in the various counties or districts to which their jurisdiction extends.

The term is applied distinctively to a class of the federal courts of the United States, of which terms are held in two or more places successively in the various circuits into which the whole country is divided for this purpose; see 1 Kent 301; Courts of the United States; and, in some of the states, to courts of general jurisdiction of which terms are held in the various counties or districts of the state. Such courts sit in some instances as courts of nisi prius, in others, either at nisi prius or in banc. They may have an equity as well as a common-law jurisdiction, and may be both civil and criminal courts. The systems of the various states are widely different in these respects; and reference must be had to the articles on the different states for an explanation of the system adopted in each. The term is unknown in the classification of English courts, and conveys a different idea in the various states in which it is adopted as the designation of a court or class of courts, although the constitution of such courts, in many instances, is quite analogous to that of the English courts of assize and nisi prius.

CIRCUIT COURT OF APPEALS. See COURTS OF THE UNITED STATES.

CIRCUITY OF ACTION. Indirectly obtaining, by means of a subsequent action, a result which may be reached in an action already pending.

This is particularly obnoxious to the law, as tending to multiply suits; 4 Cow. 682.

CIRCUMDUCTION. In Scotch Law. A closing of the period for lodging papers, or doing any other act required in a cause. Paterson, Comp.

CIRCUMSTANCES. The particulars which accompany an act. The surroundings at the commission of an act.

The facts proved are either possible or impossible, ordinary and probable or extraordinary and improbable, recent or ancient; they may have happened near us, or afar off; they are public or private, permanent or transitory, clear and simple or complicated; they are always accompanied by circumstances which more or less influence the mind in forming a judgment. And in some instances these circumstances assume the character of irresistible evidence: where, for example, a woman was found dead in a room, with every mark of having met with a violent death, the presence of another person at the scene of action was made manifest by the bloody mark of a left hand visible on her left arm; 14 How. St. Tr. 1324; Groenl. Ev. 13 a. These points ought to be carefully examined, in order to form a correct opinion. The first question ought to be, is the fact possible? If so, are there any circumstances which render it impossible? If the facts are impossible, the witness ought not to be credited. If, for example, a man should swear that he saw the deceased shoot himself with his own pistol, and, upon an examination of the ball which killed him, it should be found too large to enter into the pistol, the witness ought not to be credited; 1 Stark. Ev. 505; or if one should swear that another had been guilty of an impossible crime.

CIRCUMSTANTIAL EVIDENCE. See EVIDENCE.

CIRCUMSTANTIBUS. See TALES.

CIRCUMVENTION. In Scotch Law. Any act of fraud whereby a person is reduced to a deed by decret. Tech. Dict. It has the same sense in the civil law. Dig. 50. 17. 49. 155; id. 12. 6. 6. 2; id. 41. 2. 34.

CITACION. In Spanish Law. The order of a legal tribunal directing an individual against whom a suit has been instituted to appear and defend it within a given time. It is synonymous with the term emplazamiento in the old Spanish law, and the in jus vocatio of the Roman law.

CITATIO AD REASSUMENDAM CAUSAM. In Civil Law. The name of a citation, which issued when a party died pending a suit, against the heir of the defendant, or, when the plaintiff died, for the heir of the plaintiff. Our bill of revivor is probably borrowed from this proceeding.

CITATION (Lat. citare, to call, to summon). In Practice. A writ issued out of a court of competent jurisdiction, commanding a person therein named to appear on a day named and do something therein mentioned, or show cause why he should not. Proctor, Pract.

The act by which a person is so summoned or cited.

In the ecclesiastical law, the citation is the beginning and foundation of the whole cause, and is said to have six requisites, namely: the insertion of the name of the judge, of the promover, of the impugnant, of the cause of suit, of the place, and of the time of appearance; to which may be added the affixing the seal of the court, and the name of the register or his deputy. 1 Brown, Civ. Law 453, 454; Ayliffe, Parerg. xliii. 175; Hall, Adm. Pr. 5; Merlin, Rép.

The process issued in courts of probate and admiralty courts. It is usually the original process in any proceeding where used, and is in that respect analogous to the writ of capias or summons at law, and the subpoena in chancery.

In Scotch Practice. The calling of a party to an action done by an officer of the court under a proper warrant.

The service of a writ or bill of summons. Paterson, Comp.

CITATION OF AUTHORITIES. The production of or reference to the text of acts of legislatures, treatises, or cases of similar nature decided by the courts, in order to support propositions advanced.

As the knowledge of the law is to a great degree a knowledge of precedents, it follows that there must be necessarily a frequent reference to these preceding decisions to obtain support for propositions advanced as being statements of what the law is. Constant reference to the law as it is enacted is, of course, necessary. References to the works of legal writers are also desirable for elucidation and explanation of doubtful points of law.

In the United States, the laws of the general government are generally cited by their date: as, Act of Sept. 24, 1789, § 35; or, Act of 1819, c. 170; or by reference to the statutes, as 24 Stat. L. 505; or by the section of the Revised Statutes of 1878, or its supplements. The same practice prevails in Pennsylvania, and in most of the other states, when the date of the statute is important. Otherwise, in most of the states, reference is made to the revised code of laws or the official publication of the laws: as, Va. Rev. Code, c. 26; N. Y. Rev. Stat. 8th ed. 400. Books of reports and text-books are generally cited by the number of the volume and page: as, 2 Washburn, R. P. 350; 4 Pa. 60. Sometimes, however, the paragraphs are numbered, and reference is made to the paragraphs: as, Story, Bailm. § 494; Gould, Pl. c. 5, § 80.

The civilians on the continent of Europe, in referring to the Institutes, Code, and Pandects or Digest, usually give the number, not of the book, but of the law, and the first word of the title to which it belongs: and, as there are more than a thousand of these, it is no easy task for one not thoroughly acquainted with those collections to find the place to which reference is made. The American writers generally follow the natural mode of reference, by putting down the name of the collection, and then the number of the book, title, law, and section. For example, Inst. 4. 15. 2. signifies Institutes, book 4, title 15, and section 2; Dig. 41. 9. 1. 3. means Digest, book 41, title 9, law 1, section 3; Dig. pro dote, or ff pro dote, signifies section 3, law 1, of the book and title of the Digest or Pandects entitled pro dote. It is proper to remark that Dig. and ff are equivalent: the former signifies Digest, and the latter—which is a careless mode of writing the Greek letter π , the first letter of the word $\pi\alpha\nu\delta\epsilon\kappa\tau\alpha$ —signifies Pandects; and the Digest and Pandects are different names for one and the same thing. The Code is cited in the same way. The Novels are cited by their number, with that of the chapter and paragraph: for example, Nov. 185. 2. 4. for Novella Justiniani 185, capite 2, paragrapho 4. Novels are also quoted by the Collation, the title, chapter, and paragraph, as follows: In Authentico, Collatione 1, titulo 1, cap. 281. The Authentics are quoted by their first words, after which is set down the title of the Code under which they are placed: for example, Authentica, cum testator. Codice ad legem fascidiam. See Mackeldey, Civ. Law § 65; Domat, Civ. Law, Cush. ed. Index.

The system of citations in the present and the last editions of this work differs somewhat from that adopted in the earlier editions, in order that such citation might occupy as little space as possible. The briefest possible citation, that will avoid ambiguity, has been adopted in this work; the table of abbreviations (see ABBREVIATIONS) gives the full name of the book or volume of reports referred to.

Statutes of the various states will be cited by giving the number of the volume (where there are more volumes than one), the name of the state (using the common geographical abbreviation), the designation of the code, and the page where the statute or provision in consideration is found: thus, 1 N. Y. Rev. Stat. 4th ed. 63. To this it is desirable to add, when regard for space allows, the chapter and section of the statute referred to. In some cases the system of citing state statutes adopted in Stimson's Am. Stat. Law is resorted to, and the statutes of a state are referred to by the name of the state, the year, the page or chapter and section by number, omitting the letters c., p. and s. or §: thus, R. I. 1893, 65. 12., meaning Rhode Island Laws, 1893, chap. 65, § 12.

United States statutes, and statutes of the states not included in the codified collection of the state, are cited as statutes of the year in which they were enacted, or by the proper section of the Revised Statutes.

English statutes are referred to by indicating the year of the reign in which they were enacted, the chapter and section: thus, 17 & 18 Vict. c. 96, § 2.

Text-books are referred to by giving the number of the volume (where there are more volumes than one), and the name of the author, with an abbreviation of the title of the work sufficiently extended to distinguish it from other works by the same author, and to indicate the class of subjects of which it treats: thus, 2 Story, Const.

Where an edition is referred to which has been prepared by other persons than the authors, or where an edition subsequent to the first is referred to, this fact is sometimes indicated, and the page, section, or paragraph of the edition cited is given: thus, Angell & A. Corp., Lothrop ed. 96; Smith, Lead. Cas., 5th Hare & W. ed. 173. The various editions of Blackstone's Commentaries, however, have the editor's name preceding the title of the book: thus Sharswood, Bla. Com.; Coleridge, Bla. Com.; wherever the reference is to a note by the editor cited; otherwise the reference is merely to Blackstone.

Reports of the Federal courts of the United States, and of the English, Irish, and Scotch courts, are cited by the names of the reporters: thus, 3 Cra. 96; 5 East 241; or, in later reports, the official method of citation is used. In a few instances, common usage has given a distinctive name to a series; and wherever this is the case such name has been adopted; as, Term; C. B.; Exch.

The reports of the state courts are cited by the name of the state, wherever a series of such reports has been recognized as existing: thus, 5 Ill. 63; 21 Pa. 96; and the same rule applies to citations of the reports of provincial courts: thus, 6 Low. C. 167. The later volumes of reports of the supreme court of the United States are cited by their serial number: thus, 161 U. S.

Otherwise, the reporter's name is used; thus, 5 Rawle 23, or an abbreviation of it; as 11 Pick. 23. This rule extends also to the provincial reports; and the principle is applied to the decisions of Scotch and Irish cases, except in later cases, when the official method is adopted.

Where the same reporter reports decisions in courts both of law and equity, an additional abbreviation, usually to equity reports and sometimes to law reports, indicates which series is meant: thus, 3 Fred. Eq. 87; 14 N. J. L. 42.

For a list of abbreviations as used in this book, and as commonly used in legal books, see ABBREVIATIONS.

CITE. To summon; to command the presence of a person; to notify a person of legal proceedings against him and require his appearance thereto. Black, L. Dict.

CITIZEN. In English Law. An inhabitant of a city. 1 Rolle, Abr. 138. The representative of a city, in parliament. 1 Bla. Com. 174.

In American Law. One who, under the constitution and laws of the United States, has a right to vote for representatives in congress, and other public officers, and who is qualified to fill offices in the gift of the people.

All persons born or naturalized in the United States, and subject to the jurisdiction thereof, are citizens of the United States and of the state wherein they reside; XIV. Amendment, U. S. Const.

One of the sovereign people. A constituent member of the sovereignty, synonymous with the people. 19 How. 404.

A member of the civil state entitled to all its privileges. Cooley, Const. Lim. 77. See 92 U. S. 542; 21 Wall. 162; Web. Cit. 48.

Citizens are either native-born or naturalized. Native citizens may fill any office; naturalized citizens may be elected or appointed to any office under the constitution of the United States, except the offices of president and vice-president.

Neither Chinese nor Japanese can become citizens; 5 Sawy. 155; 21 Fed. Rep. 905; 62 id. 126; 71 id. 274; U. S. Stat. L. 22; unless born within this country, of resident parents not engaged in the diplomatic service; 10 Sawy. 353. The constitution of the United States (art. 4, s. 2) provides that "the citizens of each state shall be entitled to all the privileges and immunities of citizens in the several states." These are privileges which in their nature are fundamental; which belong of right to the citizens of all free states, and which have, at all times, been enjoyed by the citizens of the several states; 4 Wash. C. C. 380. The supreme court will not define these, but will decide each case as it arises; 12 Wall. 418; 94 U. S. 39; 18 How. 591; see 37 N. J. 106; 55 Ill. 185; 16 Wall. 36, 130; 8 id. 168; 18 id. 129; 92 U. S. 542. The term citizen in the constitution applies only to natural persons; 8 Wall. 168; 1 Wood 85; 48 Ill. 172; 13 Pet. 519.

Where a foreigner takes the oath declaring his intention of becoming a citizen of the United States, his minor sons thereby acquire an inchoate status as citizens, and if they attain majority before their father completes his naturalization, they are capable of becoming citizens by other means than the direct application provided for by the naturalization laws; 143 U. S. 135; but the illegitimate minor children of a naturalized citizen do not become citizens at the time he is naturalized; Lynch, Nat. and Cit. 16.

Free persons of color, born in the United States, were always entitled to be regarded as citizens; 1 Abb. U. S. 28; but see 19 How. 393. Negroes born within the United States are citizens; 2 Bond 389; Chase's Dec. 157 (but not before the 14th Amendment; 19 How. 393; 10 Bush 681); but the child of a member of one of the Indian tribes within the United States is not a citizen, though born in the United States; 2 Sawy. 118; 1 Dill. 444; and although the parents have given up their tribal relations they cannot become citizens until they are first naturalized; 112 U. S. 103. The fact that an unnaturalized person of foreign birth is enabled by a state statute to vote and hold office does not make him a citizen; 4 Dill. 425.

The age of the person does not affect his citizenship, though it may his political rights; 1 Abb. L. Dict. 224; nor the sex; ibid.; 21 Wall. 162; 92 U. S. 214; 1 McArthur 169; the right to vote and the right to hold office are not necessary constituents of citizenship; 21 Wall. 162; 43 Cal. 43.

All natives are not citizens of the United States; the descendants of the aborigines are not entitled to the rights of citizens; see supra; also 112 U. S. 103. Anterior to the adoption of the constitution of the United States, each state had the right to make citizens of such persons as it pleased.

A citizen of the United States residing in any of the states of the Union is a citizen of that state; 6 Pet. 761; Paine 594; 6 Rob. 33; 12 Blatch. 320; 1 Brock. 391; 1 Paige, Ch. 183.

The child of American parents born in a foreign country, on board an American ship of which his father was the captain, is a citizen of the United States; 5 Blatch. 18; and so is a child born abroad whose father was at the time a citizen of the United States residing abroad; 13 Op. Att.-Gen. 91; 45 Ia. 99. See 58 Me. 353; and so if both parents are citizens and reside abroad but have not renounced their citizenship; 50 Fed. Rep. 310.

A person may be a citizen for commercial purposes and not for political purposes; 7 Md. 209.

All persons who deserted the naval or military service of the United States, and did not return there to within sixty days after the issuance of the proclamation of the president, dated March 11, 1865, are deemed to have voluntarily relinquished and forfeited their rights of citizenship, and shall forever be incapable of holding any office of trust or profit under the United States, or of exercising any rights of citizenship thereof; U. S. Rev. Stat. § 1996.

As to citizenship as acquired by naturalization, see ALLEGIANCE; NATURALIZATION; ALIEN.

Citizenship, not residence, confers the right to sue in the Federal courts; 63 Fed. Rep. 873. See Reno. Non-Residents, c. vii. Corporations are citizens of the state by which they are created, irrespective of the citizenship of their members; 8 Wall. 168; 106 U. S. 118. If two corporations created by different states, are consolidated each still retains its own citizenship for purposes of suit; 136 U. S. 356; 66 Fed. Rep. 655. See Reno. Non-Residents, § 104.

There is an indisputable legal presumption that a state corporation, when sued or suing in a circuit court of the United States, is composed of citizens of the state which created it. A railroad company organized under the laws of one state and authorized by its own state, may accept authority from another state to extend its railroad into such state and to control railroads therein. Such corporations may be treated by each of the states as domestic corporations. The presumption that a corporation is composed of citizens of the state which created it accompanies it when it does business in another state, and it may sue or be sued in the Federal courts in such other state as a citizen of the state of its original creation; 161 U. S. 545.

CITY. In England. An incorporated town or borough which is or has been the see of a bishop. Co. Litt. 108; 1 Bla. Com. 114; Cowel.

Although the first definition here given is sanctioned by such high authority, it is questionable if it is essential to its character as a city, even in England, that it has been at any time a see; and it certainly retains its character of a city after it has lost its ecclesiastical character; 1 Steph. Com. 115; 1 Bla. Com. 114; and in the United States it is clearly unnecessary that it should ever have possessed this character. Originally, this word did not signify a town, but a portion of mankind who lived under the same government—what the Romans called civitas, and the Greeks πολις; whence the word politeia civitas seu reipublicæ status et adminis-

CIVIL. In contradistinction to barbarous or savage, indicates a state of society reduced to order and regular government: thus, we speak of civil life, civil society, civil government, and civil liberty. In contradistinction to criminal, to indicate the private rights and remedies of men, as members of the community, in contrast to those which are public and relate to the government: thus, we speak of civil process and criminal process, civil jurisdiction and criminal jurisdiction.

It is also used in contradistinction to military or ecclesiastical, to natural or foreign; thus, we speak of a civil station, as opposed to a military or an ecclesiastical station; a civil death, as opposed to a natural death; a civil war, as opposed to a foreign war; Story, Const. § 789; 1 Bla. Com. 6, 125, 251; Montesquieu, Sp. of Laws, b. 1, c. 3; Rutherford, Inst. b. 2, c. 2; id. c. 3; id. c. 8, p. 359; Heineccius, Elem. Jurisp. Nat. b. 2, ch. 6.

CIVIL ACTION. In Practice.

IN THE CIVIL LAW.—A personal action which is instituted to compel payment, or the doing some other thing which is purely civil. Pothier, Introd. Gen. aux Cont. 110.

AT COMMON LAW.—An action which has for its object the recovery of private or civil rights or compensation for their infraction. See ACTION.

CIVIL COMMOTION. An insurrection of the people for general purposes, though it may not amount to rebellion where there is an usurped power. 2 Marsh. 793.

In the printed proposals which are considered as making a part of the contract of insurance against fire, it is declared that the insurance company will not make good any loss happening by any civil commotion.

CIVIL DAMAGE ACTS. Acts passed in many of the United States which provide an action for damages against a vender of intoxicating liquors, on behalf of the wife or family of a person who has sustained injuries by reason of his intoxication. Such an act, even if it allows an action against the owner on the property where the liquor was sold, without evidence that he authorized the sale, is constitutional; 74 N. Y. 509. See also 54 N. H. 117; 130 Mass. 158; 33 Wis. 570; 48 Vt. 628. Where the owner of a building had no knowledge as to how his premises were used, he is nevertheless liable where his agent rents it for the sale of intoxicating liquors; 131 N. Y. 536. See 72 Ill. 133. The act in New York creates a new right of action, viz., for injury to the "means of support;" it is not necessary that the injury should be one remediable at common law; 74 N. Y. 526. Injury to means of support is not necessarily deprivation of the bare necessities of life, but any substantial subtraction from the maintenance suitable to the man's business and condition in life; 48 Ill. App. 369. The Indiana act is constitutional, even though the liquor-seller was licensed; 57 Ind. 171. So in 41 Mich. 475. If the death of the husband can be traced to an intervening cause, the liquor-seller is not liable; 84 Ill. 195; s. c. 25 Am. Rep. 446; 54 Ind. 559. Damages for injuries resulting in death cannot be recovered; 35 Ohio St. 859; s. c. 35 Am. Rep. 598, 601; contra, 9 Neb. 304; 4 Hun 733; 87 N. Y. 493; 106 Ill. 263; 54 N. H. 117; 46 Ia. 195; but see 5 Hun 530; 8 id. 128; 146 Pa. 610. In some states exemplary damages can be recovered; 50 Ia. 34; 67 Me. 517; 33 Ohio St. 444; contra, 6 Neb. 304; 48 Ia. 588. The fact that the wife had bought liquor from the defendant under compulsion, or in order to keep her husband at home, does not defeat her right; ibid. See, generally, 20 Alb. L. J. 204; 48 Ill. App. 369.

CIVIL DEATH. That change of state of a person which is considered in the law as equivalent to death. See DEATH.

CIVIL LAW. This term is generally used to designate the Roman jurisprudence, jus civile Romanorum.

In its most extensive sense, the term Roman Law comprises all those legal rules and principles which were in force among the Romans, without reference to the time when they were adopted. But in a more restricted sense we understand by it the law compiled under the auspices of the Emperor Justinian, and which are still in force in many of the states of modern Europe, and to which all refer as authority or written reason.

The ancient leges curiatae are said to have been collected in the time of Tarquin, the last of the kings, by a pontifex maximus of the name of Sextus or Publius Papinius. This collection is known under the title of Jus Civile Papinianum; its existing fragments are few, and those of an apocryphal character. Mackeldey § 21.

After a fierce and uninterrupted struggle between the patricians and plebeians, the latter extorted from the former the celebrated law of the Twelve Tables, in the year 300 of Rome. This law, framed by the decemvirs and adopted in the comitia centuriata, acquired great authority, and constituted the foundation of all the public and private laws of the Romans, subsequently, until the time of Justinian. It is called Lex Decemviralis. Id. From this period the sources of the jus scriptum consisted in the leges, the plebiscita, the senatus consulta, and the constitutions of the emperors, constitutiones principum; and the jus non scriptum was found partly in the mores majorum, the consuetudo, and the res judicata, or auctoritas rerum perpetua similiter judicatorum. The edicts of the magistrates, or jus honorarium, also formed a part of the unwritten law; but by far the most prolific source of the jus non scriptum consisted in the opinions and writings of the lawyers—responsa prudentium.

The few fragments of the twelve tables that have come down to us are stamped with the harsh features of their aristocratic origin. But the jus honorarium established by the praetors and other magistrates, as well as that part of the customary law which was built up by the opinions and writings of the prudentes, are founded essentially on principles of natural justice.

Many collections of the imperial constitutions had been made before the advent of Justinian to the throne. He was the first after Theodosius who ordered a new compilation to be made. For this purpose he appointed a committee of ten lawyers, with very extensive powers; at their head was the ex-quaestor sacri palatii, Johannes, and among them the afterwards well-known Tribonian. His instructions were to select, in the most laconic form, all that was still of value in the existing collections, as well as in the later constitutions; to omit all obsolete matter; to introduce such alterations as were required by the times; and to divide the highest or the lowest departments of the government, with the exception of officers of the army and navy. Rawle, Const. 213; 1 Story, Const. § 790.

The term occurs in the constitution of the United States, art. 2, sec. 4, which provides that the president, vice-president, and civil officers of the United States shall be removed from office on impeachment for, and conviction of, treason, bribery, or other high crimes and misdemeanors. It has been decided that a senator of the United States is not a civil officer within the meaning of this clause of the constitution. Senate Journals, 10th January, 1799; 4 Tucker, Bla. Com. App. 57, 58; Rawle, Const. 213; Sergeant, Const. Law 376; Story, Const. § 791.

CIVIL REMEDY. In Practice. The remedy which the party injured by the commission of a tortious act has by action against the party committing it, as distinguished from the proceeding by indictment, by which the wrong-doer is made to expiate the injury done to society.

In cases of treason, felony, and some other of the graver offences, this private remedy is suspended, on grounds of public policy, until after the prosecution of the wrong-doer for the public wrong; 4 Bla. Com. 333; 12 East 409; 35 Ala. 184; 1 N. H. 239. The law is otherwise in Massachusetts, except, perhaps, in case of felonies punishable with death; 15 Mass. 333; North Carolina, 1 Tayl. 58; Ohio, 4 Ohio 377; South Carolina, 3 Brev. 302; Mississippi, 30 Miss. 492; Tennessee, 6 Humph. 433; Maine, 23 Me. 381; and Virginia. At common law, in cases of homicide the civil remedy is merged in the public punishment; 1 Chit. Pr. 10. See INJURIES; MERGER; Bish. Cr. L. § 267.

CIVIL RIGHTS. A term applied to certain rights secured to citizens of the United States by the 13th and 14th Amendments to the constitution, and by various acts of congress made in pursuance thereof.

The act of April 9, 1866, provided that all persons born in the United States, and not subject to any foreign power, excluding Indians not taxed, are citizens of the United States; that such citizens of every race and color shall have the same right in every state and territory to make and enforce contracts, to sue, be parties, give evidence, etc., and to the full and equal benefit of all laws and proceedings for the security of person and property, as is enjoyed by white citizens, and be subject to like punishment, etc., and none other. This act is constitutional; 1 Abb. U. S. 28; 1 Am. L. T. 7; and must be liberally construed; 1 Abb. U. S. 28.

It is substantially replaced by the 14th Amendment which provides that no state shall make or enforce any law which shall abridge the privileges or immunities of citizens of the United States; or deprive any person of life, liberty, or property, without due process of law; or deny to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the laws.

This provision applies to white as well as colored persons, and is intended to protect them against the action both of their own state and of other states in which they may happen to be. It renders void an act of a state legislature which gives to a few persons the sole right to carry on stock-yards near New Orleans; 16 Wall. 36. A statute of West Virginia provided that juries should be composed of "white male citizens," etc. Held, that the object of this amendment was to prevent any discrimination between whites and blacks, and this statute was therefore invalid; 99 U. S. 303. But where a statute of Virginia did not in terms exclude negroes from juries, but entrusted the selection of jurymen to the county judge, who habitually excluded negroes in his selection, it was held that his conduct was a gross violation of the act of congress of March, 1878, which prohibits such discrimination, but that it was not such a denial of the rights of negroes as is contemplated by the statutes for the removal of such causes to the federal courts; a mixed jury in any particular case is not provided for in the act; but it is the right of every colored man that in the selection of jurymen to pass upon his life, etc., negroes shall not be, by law, excluded on account of their race; 100 U. S. 313; 17 Alb. L. J. 111. See 45 La. Ann. 903.

The provision of the act of March 1, 1875, that no person possessing all other qualifications required by law shall be disqualified from jury service in any state on account of race, color, or previous condition of servitude, and imposing a penalty upon any officer who shall not comply with its provisions, is constitutional; 100 U. S. 339.

Where equally good public schools are provided for white and colored children, a provision that the two races shall attend different schools is not contrary to the 14th Amendment; 3 Woods 177; 70 Miss. 477; (but an act establishing a uniform system of common schools for colored children and excluding them from any share in the common school-fund was held to be a violation of the 14th Amendment of the constitution of the United States; 83 Ky. 49.) So of the separation of white and black persons in public conveyances, when appropriate, though distinct, quarters are provided for each; 9 Cent. L. J. 206; 114 Mo. 88; 45 La. Ann. 80; 109 U. S. 3; 62 Fed. Rep. 46; so with the rules of a theatre reserving certain sections for whites, while allowing black persons to occupy others; 111 Mo. 303; but to require colored persons to occupy particular seats in a theatre was held to be a violation of the Act, Ill. June 10, 1885, declaring the right of colored persons to "full and equal enjoyment of the accommodations" of theatres, etc.; 30 Ill. App.; aff. 128 Ill. 287. These amendments were designed to secure rights of a civil and political nature only, but not social or domestic rights; a state law forbidding marriages between whites and blacks does not contravene these provisions; 59 Ala. 57; 3 Woods 367; 3 Hughes 9; 30 Gratt. 808. A state law punishing more severely adultery between a white and a negro is valid; 58 Ala. 190; 106 U. S. 583. So is one de-whole into appropriate titles. Within fourteen months the committee had finished their labors. Justinian confirmed this new code, which consisted of twelve books, by a special ordinance, and prohibited the use of the older collections of rescripts and edicts. This code of Justinian, which is now called Codex vetus, has been entirely lost.

After the completion of this code, Justinian, in 530, ordered Tribonian, who was now invested with the dignity of quæstor sacri palatii, and sixteen other jurists, to select all the most valuable passages from the writings of the old jurists which were regarded as authoritative, and to arrange them, according to their subjects, under suitable heads. These commissioners also enjoyed very extensive powers; they had the privilege, at their discretion, to abbreviate, to add, and to make such other alterations as they might consider adapted to the times; and they were especially ordered to remove all the contradictions of the old jurists, to avoid all repetitions, and to omit all that had become entirely obsolete. The natural consequence of this was, that the extracts did not always truly represent the originals, but were often interpolated and amended in conformity with the existing law. Alterations, modifications, and additions of this kind are now usually called emblemata Triboniani. This great work is called the Pandects, or Digest, and was completed by the commissioners in three years. Within that short space of time, they had extracted from the writings of no less than thirty-nine jurists all that they considered valuable for the purpose of this compilation. It was divided into fifty books, and was entitled Digesta sive Pandectæ juris enucleati ex omni vetere jure collecti. The Pandects were published on the 16th of December, 533, but they did not go into operation until the 30th of that month. In confirming the Pandects, Justinian prohibited further reference to the old jurists; and, in order to prevent legal science from becoming again so diffuse, indefinite, and uncertain as it had previously been, he forbade the writing of commentaries upon the new compilation, and permitted only the making of literal translations into Greek.

In preparing the Pandects, the compilers met very frequently with controversies in the writings of the jurists. Such questions, to the number of thirty-four, had been already determined by Justinian before the commencement of the collection of the Pandects, and before its completion the decisions of this kind were increased to fifty, and were known as the fifty decisions of Justinian. These decisions were at first collected separately, and afterward embodied in the new code.

For the purpose of facilitating the study of the law, Justinian ordered Tribonian, with the assistance of Theophilus and Dorotheus, to prepare a brief system of law under the title of Institutes, which should contain the elements of legal science. This work was founded on, and to a great extent copied from, the commentaries of Gaius, which, after having been lost for many centuries, were discovered by the great historian Niebuhr, in 1816, in a palimpsest, or re-written manuscript, of some of the homilies of St. Jerome, in the Chapter Library of Verona. What had become obsolete in the commentaries was omitted in the Institutes, and references were made to the new constitutions of Justinian so far as they had been issued at the time. Justinian published his Institutes on the 21st November, 533, and they obtained the force of law at the same time with the Pandects, December 30, 533. Theophilus, one of the editors, delivered lectures on the Institutes in the Greek language, and from these lectures originated the valuable commentaries known under the Latin title, Theophili Antecessoris Paraphrasis Græca Institutionum Cæsarearum. The Institutes consist of four books, each of which contains several titles.

After the publication of the Pandects and the Institutes, Justinian ordered a revision of the Code, which had been promulgated in the year 529. This became necessary on account of the great number of new constitutions which he had issued, and of the fifty decisions not included in the Old Code, and by which the law had been altered, amended, or modified. He therefore directed Tribonian, with the assistance of Dorotheus, Menna, Constantinus, and Johannes, to revise the Old Code and to incorporate the new constitutions into it. This revision was completed in the same year; and the new edition of the Code, Codex repetitæ prælectionis, was confirmed on the 16th November, 534, and the Old Code abolished. The Code contains twelve books subdivided into appropriate titles.

During the interval between the publication of the Codex repetitæ prælectionis, in 535, to the end of his reign, in 565, Justinian issued, at different times, a great number of new constitutions, by which the law on many subjects was entirely changed. The greater part of these constitutions were written in Greek, in obscure and pompous language, and published under the name of Novellæ Constitutiones, which are known to us as the Novels of Justinian. Soon after his death, a collection of one hundred and sixty-eight Novels was made, one hundred and fifty-four of which had been issued by Justinian, and the others by his successors.

Justinian's collections were, in ancient times, always copied separately, and afterwards they were printed in the same way. When taken together, they were indeed called, at an early period, the Corpus Juris Civilis; but this was not introduced as the regular title comprehending the whole body; each volume had its own title until Dionysius Gothofredus gave this general title in the second edition of his glossed Corpus Juris Civilis, in 1604. Since that time this title has been used in all the editions of Justinian's collections.

It is generally believed that the laws of Justinian were entirely lost and forgotten in the Western Empire from the middle of the eighth century until the alleged discovery of a copy of the Pandects at the storming and pillage of Amalfi, in 1135. This is one of those popular errors which had been handed down from generation to generation without question or inquiry, but which has now been completely exploded by the learned discussion, supported by conclusive evidence, of Savigny, in his History of the Roman Law during the Middle Ages. Indeed, several years before the sack of Amalfi the celebrated Irnerius delivered lectures on the Pandects in the University of Bologna. The pretended discovery of a copy of the Digest at Amalfi, and its being given by Lothaire II. to his allies the Pisans as a reward for their services, is an absurd fable. No doubt, during the five or six centuries when the human intellect was in a complete state of torpor, the study of the Roman Law, like that of every other branch of knowledge, was neglected; but on the first dawn of the revival of learning the science of Roman jurisprudence was one of the first to attract the attention of mankind; and it was taught with such brilliant success as to immortalize the name of Irnerius, its great professor.

Even at the present time the Roman Law, as a complete system, exercises dominion in every state in Europe except England. The countrymen of Lycurgus and Solon are governed by it, and in the vast empire of Russia it furnishes the rule of civil conduct. In America, it is the foundation of the law of Louisiana, Canada, Mexico, and all the republics of South America. Its influence in the formation of the common law of England cannot be denied by the impartial inquirer. The more thoroughly this subject is investigated, the larger is ascertained to be the indebtedness of the common law to the Roman system. It was publicly taught in England, by Roger Vacarius, as early as 1149; and all admit that the whole equity of jurisprudence prevailing in England and the United States is mainly based on the civil law. Consult Poll. & Maitl.; Social England; Address of Mr. Crackanthorpe, Am. Bar. Ass'n Rept. 1896; 1 Kent 516; Paper of Mr. Howe, Am. Bar. Ass'n Rept. 1895. CIVIL LIST. An annual sum granted by the English parliament at the commencement of each reign, for the expenses of the royal household and establishment as distinguished from the general exigencies of the state. It is the provision for the crown made out of the taxes in lieu of its proper patrimony and in consideration of the assignment of that patrimony to the public use. Wharton, Dict.

CIVIL OBLIGATION. One which binds in law, and which may be enforced in a court of justice. Pothier, Obl. 173, 191.

CIVIL OFFICER. Any officer of the United States who holds his appointment under the national government, whether his duties are executive or judicial, in the claring null and void marriages between whites and negroes: 1 Woods 537. A barber shop cannot discriminate against a colored person and deny him any rights therein to which a white person would be entitled if requiring the services of a barber; 25 Neb. 674.

A state is not prohibited by the 14th Amendment from prescribing the jurisdiction of the several courts, either as to their territorial limits, or the subject matter, amount, or penalties of their respective judgments; 101 U. S. 22.

A law in Maine that no person shall recover damages from any municipality for injuries caused by a defective highway, if he is a resident of a place by the laws of which such actions will not lie, is invalid under the 14th Amendment; 69 Me. 278.

The right to sell liquor is not one of the rights of citizens protected by the 14th Amendment; 18 Wall. 129. The constitutionality of statutes prohibiting the transaction of business or engaging in the ordinary secular avocations on Sunday is unquestioned; 33 Barb. 548; 4 Ired. 400; 40 Ala. 725; 31 La. Ann. 663; 33 Ind. 201.

Negroes born within the United States are entitled to vote under the 14th Amendment, and are protected therein by the act of May 31, 1870; 2 Bond 389.

This amendment does not add to the privileges and immunities of citizens, but only protects those which they already have. It does not entitle women to vote in the various states; 21 Wall. 162; 1 McArth. 169; 11 Blatch. 200. It does not prohibit a state from passing laws to regulate the charges of warehousemen in their business; 94 U. S. 113; nor a state law forbidding the carrying of dangerous weapons; 153 U. S. 535.

CIVILIAN. A doctor, professor, or student of the civil law.

CIVILITER. Civilly: opposed to criminaliter, or criminally.

When a person does an unlawful act injurious to another, whether with or without an intention to commit a tort, he is responsible civiliter. In order to make him liable criminaliter, he must have intended to do the wrong; for it is a maxim, actus non facit reum nisi mens sit rea. 2 East 104.

CIVILITER MORTUUS. Civilly dead. In a state of civil death.

In New York one sentenced to life imprisonment in the state prison is civiliter mortuus; 4 Johns. Ch. 228; 6 id. 118.

The owner of property proceeded against in admiralty by a suit in rem must present a claim to such property, verified by oath or affirmation, stating that the claimant by whom or on whose behalf the claim is made, and no other person, is the true and bona fide owner thereof, as a necessary preliminary to his making defence; 2 Conkl. Adm. 201-210.

A demand entered of record of a mechanic or material man for work done or material furnished in the erection of a building, in Pennsylvania and some other states.

CLARENDON, CONSTITUTIONS OF. The constitutions of Clarendon were certain statutes made in the reign of Henry II. of England, at a parliament held at Clarendon (A. D. 1164) by which the king checked the power of the pope and his clergy and greatly narrowed the exemption they claimed from secular jurisdiction.

Previous to this time, there had been an entire separation between the clergy and laity, as members of the same commonwealth. The clergy, having emancipated themselves from the laws administered by the courts of law, had assumed powers and exemptions quite inconsistent with the good government of the country.

This state of things led to the enactment referred to. By this enactment all controversies arising out of ecclesiastical matters were required to be determined in the civil courts, and all appeals in spiritual causes were to be carried from the bishops to the primate, and from him to the king, but no further without the king's consent. The archbishops and bishops were to be regarded as barons of the realm, possessing the privileges and subject to the burdens belonging to that rank, and bound to attend the king in his councils. The revenues of vacant sees were to belong to the king, and goods forfeited to him by law were no longer to be protected in churches or church-yards. Nor were the clergy to pretend to the right of enforcing the payment of debts in cases where they had been accustomed to do so, but should leave all lawsuits to the determination of the civil courts. The rigid enforcement of these statutes by the king was unhappily stopped, for a season, by the fatal event of his disputes with Archbishop Becket. CLASS. A number of persons or things ranked together for some common purpose or as possessing some attribute in common.

The term is used of legatees; 3 M'Cord, Ch. 440; of obligees in a bond; 3 Dev. 284; and of other collections of persons; 17 Wend. 52; 16 Pick. 132; 77 Pa. 338; 1 Ld. Raym. 708.

CLAUSE. A part of a treaty; of a legislative act; of a deed; of a will, or other written instrument. A part of a sentence.

CLAUSUM. In Old English Law. Close. Closed.

A writ was either clausum (close) or apertum (open). Grants were said to be by litteræ patentæ (open grant) or litteræ clausæ (close grant); 2 Bla. Com. 346.

A close. An enclosure.

Occurring in the phrase quare clausum fregit (4 Blackf. 181), it denotes in this sense only realty in which the plaintiff has some exclusive interest, whether for a limited or unlimited time or for special or for general purposes; 1 Chit. Pl. 174; 9 Cow. 39; 12 Mass. 127; 6 East 606.

CLAUSUM FREGIT. See QUARE CLAUSUM FREGIT; TRESPASS.

CLEAR. Free from indistinctness or uncertainty; easily understood; perspicuous, plain; free from impediment, embarrassment or accusation. Webster.

For a clear deed, see 3 W. & S. 563; clear title; 105 Mass. 409; clear of expense; 2 Ves. & B. 341; clear of assessments; 4 Yeates 386; clear days; 14 M. & W. 120; 3 B. & Ald. 581.

CLEARANCE. A certificate given by the collector of a port, in which it is stated that the master or commander (naming him) of a ship or vessel named and described, bound for a port named (and having on board goods described, in case the master requires the particulars of his cargo to be stated in such clearance), has entered and cleared his ship or vessel according to law.

This certificate, or clearance, evidences the right of the vessel to depart on her voyage; and clearance has therefore been properly defined as a permission to sail. The same term is also used to signify the act of clearing. Worcester, Dict.

The sixteenth section of the act of August 18, 1856 (R. S. § 4207), regulating the diplomatic and consular systems of the United States, makes it the duty of the collector of the customs whenever any clearance is granted to any ship or vessel of the United States, duly registered as such, and bound on any foreign voyage, to annex thereto, in every case, a copy of the rates or tariff of fees which shall be allowed in pursuance of the provisions of that act.

The act of congress of 2d March, 1799, section 93 (R. S. § 4197), directs that the master of any vessel bound to a foreign port or place shall deliver to the collector of the district from which such vessel shall be about to depart a manifest of all the cargo on board, and the value thereof, by him subscribed, and shall swear or affirm to the truth thereof; whereupon the collector shall grant a clearance for such vessel and her cargo, but without specifying the particulars thereof in such clearance, unless required by the master so to do. And if any vessel bound to any foreign place shall depart on her voyage to such foreign place without delivering such a manifest and obtaining a clearance, the master shall forfeit and pay the sum of five hundred dollars for every such offence; provided, that the collectors and other officers of the customs shall pay due regard to the inspection laws of the states in which they respectively act, in such manner that no vessel having on board goods liable to inspection shall be cleared out until the master or other person shall have produced such certificate, that all such goods have been duly inspected, as the laws of the respective states do or may require to be produced to the collector or other officer of the customs; and provided, that receipts for the payment of all legal fees which shall have accrued on any vessel shall, before any clearance is granted, be produced to the collector or other officer aforesaid.

The 11th section of the act of February 10, 1820 (R. S. § 4200) provides that, before a clearance shall be granted for any vessel bound to a foreign place, the owners, shippers, or consignors of the cargo on board of such vessel shall deliver to the collector manifests of the cargo, or the parts thereof shipped by them respectively, and shall verify the same by oath or affirmation; and such manifests shall specify the kinds and quantities of the articles shipped by them respectively, and the value of the total quantity of each kind of articles; and such oath or affirmation shall state that such manifest contains a full, just, and true account of all articles laden on board of such vessel by the owners, shippers, or consignors respectively, and that the values of such articles are truly stated according to their actual cost or the values which they truly bear at the port and time of exportation. And, before a clearance shall be granted for any such vessel, the master of every such vessel, and the owners, shippers, and consignors of the cargo shall state, upon oath or affirmation, to the collector, the foreign place or country in which such cargo is truly intended to be landed; and the said oath or affirmation shall be taken and subscribed in writing.

According to Boulay-Paty, Dr. Com. t. 2. p. 19, the clearance is imperatively demanded for the safety of the vessel; for if a vessel should be found without it at sea it may be legally taken and brought into some court for adjudication on a charge of piracy. See SHIP'S PAPERS.

CLEARING-HOUSE. In Commercial Law. An office where bankers settle daily with each other the balance of their accounts.

The origin of the system is said to have been in Edinburgh; at least the bankers of that city so claim; but the earliest record of one (and that is not clear as to date) is that of London, founded in 1775, or possibly earlier. It was started in the ale-house of those times, the general resort of proprietors of new enterprises. The system, however, increased in usefulness so much as to require rooms, which were procured in Lombard Street, and a system was rapidly developed of exchanging checks and other securities to reduce the amount of actual money required for settlements. In this country such associations were established in New York in 1853, Boston in 1856, Philadelphia, Baltimore, and Cleveland in 1858, Worcester in 1861, Chicago in 1865, and since that date the number increased rapidly to thirty-one in 1884 (Bolles, Proct. Bkg.), and the system is now extended to most of the cities in which there are several banks. They also exist in Australia, France, Germany, Switzerland, Italy, and other continental countries of Europe. Most of these associations are unincorporated, but in Minnesota there is an act (Mar. 4, 1893) for their incorporation. The Clearing-house Association of New York consists of all the incorporated banks—private bankers not being admitted, as in London. Two clerks from each bank attend at the clearing-house every morning, where one takes a position inside of a counter at a desk bearing the number of his bank, the other standing outside the counter and holding in his hand parcels containing the checks on each of the other banks received the previous day. At the sound of a bell, the outside men begin to move, and at each desk they deposit the proper parcel, with an account of its contents—until, having walked around, they find themselves at their own desk again. At the end of this process the representative of each bank has handed to the representatives of every other bank the demands against them, and received from each of the other banks their demands on his bank. A comparison of the amounts tells him at once whether he is to pay into or receive from the clearing-house a balance in money. Balances are settled daily. In London the practice of presenting checks at the clearing-house has been held a good presentment to the banker at law. It is not usual to examine the checks until they are taken to the bank, and if any are then found not good they are returned to the bank which presented them, which settles for such returned checks. In this country when a check is returned not good through the clearing-house, it is usually again presented at the bank.

To accomplish this purpose of settling daily balances was the original and still is the principal object of a clearing-house, whatever differences of method or detail may be found in different cities. The mode of proceeding in Philadelphia is described in 32 W. N. C. Pa. 358 and 62 Fed. Rep. 645; and that of London in 5 Mann. & G. 348; s. c. 6 Scott, N. R. 1; s. c. 12 L. J. C. P. 113.

The original purpose of a clearing-house—the exchange of paper payable by the several banks and the settlement of the daily balances between them—has undergone a gradual but very extensive expansion; and their operations have naturally given rise to much litigation, and many of the questions arising are not settled. In the larger cities they have become to some extent financial regulators and the medium through which in times of financial disturbance or stringency there is attained concerted action by the banks of a city. Such was the action of the New York and other clearing-houses in the period of financial distrust in 1893, in issuing to banks requiring them clearing-house certificates, representing the deposit of securities, and as available to the banks for settling clearing-house balances as currency or other money. The result was to make a practical increase in the circulation immediately available, flexible in its operations and readily withdrawn from circulation when no longer required.

Such certificates are held valid, and suit may be brought by the clearing-house committee upon notes included in the collateral deposited by a bank for the purpose of taking out certificates; 32 W. N. C. Pa. 183; 29 id. 139, 258. A clearing-house due bill is an ordinary due bill from a bank "to Banks," and usually stipulates that it is good when both signed and countersigned by duly authorized officers, and to be payable only through the clearing-house on the day after its issue. During the financial difficulties above referred to such due bills were used by the banks in payment of checks whenever practicable, being as available as cash for deposit in another bank of the same city. They are held not to be certificates of deposit but negotiable, and requiring indemnity to recover the amount due on them if lost or stolen; 16 Phila. 94.

A clearing-house association is properly sued in the names of the committee who have the entire control of its securities and business funds; 58 Fed. Rep. 746.

The tendency of the decisions upon the rights and liabilities of clearing-houses is to treat them with respect to the customs of the banks as merely instruments of making the exchanges, and not as liable to individual depositors or holders of paper for funds which have passed through the clearing-house in the process of exchange between banks. They are not responsible for anything except the proper distribution of money paid to settle balances, their purpose being to provide a convenient place where checks may be presented and balances adjusted; 118 Pa. 294. When a bank suspended after the morning exchanges but before the payment of the general balance due from it, which was made good by the other banks and applied by the clearing-house to the indebtedness of the suspended bank, it was held that the clearing-house was not liable to the holder of a draft on one of the other banks deposited in the suspended bank, because the draft was never in the hands of the clearing-house for collection, nor did its manager hold the proceeds thereof with knowledge of the plaintiff's rights or of the existence of the draft until demand was made upon it; 32 W. N. C. Pa. 358.

The rules of a clearing-house have the binding effect of law as between the banks; 77 Hun 159; 118 Pa. 294; 31 N. J. L. 563; 35 La. Ann. 251; but do not affect the relations between the payee of a check presented through the clearing-house for payment, and the bank on which the check is drawn; 77 Hun 159.

The course of business of a clearing-house is based upon the idea that the members are principals (and trusted by each other as such), and not agents of parties not members, and this renders possible the volume of business transacted; 31 N. J. L. 563.

With respect to the effect of presentment at the clearing-house or failure to demand payment there, it has been held that presentation to the banker's clerk at the clearing-house was a presentation at the place of payment designated in a bill of exchange; 2 Campb. 596; that the failure to present a check at the clearing-house in violation of an imperative custom to do so does not discharge the drawer of the check as between the bankers and their customer; 1 Nev. & M. 541; and such failure to present is not material if presented in the ordinary way, even if the check was to have been paid if presented at the clearing-house, the latter being merely a substitute for ordinary presentation, authorized by custom but not required except as a substitute for the regular mode if that is omitted; 5 Mo. App. 444. Sending notes to a bank through the clearing-house is but leaving them there for payment during banking hours and not a demand at the bank for immediate payment; 132 Mass. 147.

The right of return of paper found not good secured by the rules of the clearing-house is a special provision in compensation for payment without inspection, with an opportunity for future inspection and recall of the payment. When the opportunity is had and not availed of, the general principles of law intervene to regulate the rights and liabilities of the paying bank; 106 Mass. 441; s. c. 8 Am. Rep. 349. The return of such paper after its receipt through the clearing-house is not prevented by its having been marked cancelled by mistake; 1 Campb. 426; 5 Mann. & G. 348; nor by putting it on a file and entering it in the journal; 118 Pa. 294; nor by failure to return by the time fixed by rule whether caused by mistake of fact; 129 Mass. 438; 101 id. 281; or not; id. 287; nor in such case if the bank had through mistake given credit to the depositor; 139 Mass. 513; but a rule of the Chicago clearing-house limiting the time of return was held to constitute a binding contract, and the right to recover back a payment made by mistake and discovered within fifteen minutes was denied and the Massachusetts rule criticised; 23 Fed. Rep. 179.

When there is no rule and no uniform custom, payment at the clearing-house is provisional, to become complete when payment is made in the ordinary course of business, and if not so made to be treated as payment under a mistake of fact, and with the same rights of reclamation as if made without a clearing-house; 132 Mass. 147. The rules may be waived; 7 Lans. 197.

A bank not a member, in sending checks through the clearing-house, is bound by its action under its rules in returning payment made by mistake; id.; but a bank not a member is not bound by the clearing-house rules as to the time of returning checks not good, in case of a check sent by it through a bank which was a member; such a case is governed by the ordinary principles applicable to it and not by the clearing-house rules; 31 N. J. L. 563.

When the drawee bank received a forged check through the clearing-house as genuine and failed to return it or to discover the forgery for several days, the bank which took the check and sent it to the clearing-house could not be held liable for negligence in receiving it from a stranger and sending it through the clearing-house without notice; 30 Md. 11; s. c. 96 Am. Dec. 554.

In London there is also a railway clearing-house.

See Sewell; Boone; Paine; Gilbert, Banking; Byles, Bills; Pulling, Laws, etc., of London; Cleveland, Banking Laws of New York; Morse, Banks and Banking; 101 N. Y. 595; 25 L. R. A. 824, note.

CLEMENTINES. In Ecclesiastical Law. The collection of decretals or constitutions of Pope Clement V., which was published, by order of John XXII., his successor, in 1317.

The death of Clement V., which happened in 1314, prevented him from publishing this collection, which is properly a compilation as well of the epistles and constitutions of this pope as of the decrees of the council of Vienna, over which he presided. The Clementines are divided into five books, in which the matter is distributed nearly upon the same plan as the decretals of Gregory IX. See Dupin, Bibliothèque.

CLENGE. In Old Scotch Law. To clear or acquit of a criminal charge. Literally to cleanse or clean. Black, L. Dict.

CLERGY. The name applicable to ecclesiastical ministers as a class.

Clergymen were exempted by the emperor Constantine from all civil burdens. Baronius, ad ann. 319, § 30. Lord Coke says, 2 Inst. 3, ecclesiastical persons have more and greater liberties than other of the king's subjects, wherein to set down all would take up a whole volume of itself. In the United States the clergy is not established by law.

CLERGYABLE. In English Law. Allowing of, or entitled to, the benefit of clergy (privilegium clericale). Used of persons or crimes. 4 Bla. Com. 371. See BENEFIT OF CLERGY.

CLERICAL ERROR. An error made by a clerk in transcribing or otherwise. This is always readily corrected by the court.

An error, for example, in the teste of a fi. fa.; 4 Yeates 185, 205; or in the teste and return of a vend. exp.; or in a certificate of a notary; 13 So. Rep. (Ala.) 947; or where an action is begun by one plaintiff and is afterwards amended by adding additional parties, the entering of judgment in favor of "the plaintiff" instead of "the plaintiffs" is a clerical error and amendable on appeal; 49 Ill. App. 203; 1 Dall. 197; or in writing Dowell for McDowell; 1

S. & R. 120; 9 id. 284. See 8 Co. 162 a; 56 Fed. Rep. 570; 99 Cal. 621. An error is amendable where there is something to amend by, and this even in a criminal case; 2 Pick. 550; 1 Binn. 367; 12 Ad. & E. 217; for the party ought not to be harmed by the omission of the clerk; 3 Binn. 102; even of his signature, if he affixes the seal; 1 S. & R. 97.

CLERICUS (Lat.). In Civil Law. Any one who has taken orders in church, of whatever rank; monks. A general term including bishops, subdeacons, readers, and cantors. Du Cange. Used, also, of those who were given up to the pursuit of letters, and who were learned therein. Also of the amanuenses of the judges or courts of the king. Du Cange.

In English Law. A secular priest, in opposition to a regular one. Kennett, Paroch. Ant. 171. A clergyman or priest; one in orders. Nullus clericus nisi causidicus (no clerk but what is a pleader). 1 Bla. Com. 17. A freeman, generally. One who was charged with various duties in the king's household. Du Cange.

CLERICUS MERCATI HOSPITII REGIS. The clerk of the market at the king's gate. An honorable office pertinent to the ancient custom of holding markets in the suburbs of the king's court. In early times he witnessed the parties' verbal contracts. At a later date he adjudicated in its prices of commodities; he inquired as to all weights and measures; he measured land; and had the power to send bakers and others to the pillory. Inderwick, The King's Peace.

CLERK. In Commercial Law. A person in the employ of a merchant, who attends only to a part of his business, while the merchant himself superintends the whole. He differs from a factor in this, that the latter wholly supplies the place of his principal in respect to the property consigned to him. Pardessus, Droit Comm. n. 38; 1 Chit. Pr. 80.

In Ecclesiastical Law. Any individual who is attached to the ecclesiastical state and has submitted to the tonsure. One who has been ordained. 1 Bla. Com. 338. A clergyman. 4 Bla. Com. 367.

In Offices. A person employed in an office, public or private, for keeping records or accounts.

His business is to write or register, in proper form, the transactions of the tribunal or body to which he belongs. Some clerks, however, have little or no writing to do in their offices: as the clerk of the market, whose duties are confined chiefly to superintending the markets. This is a common use of the word at the present day, and is also a very ancient signification, being derived, probably, from the office of the clericus, who attended, amongst other duties, to the provisioning the king's household. See Du Cange.

CLERKSHIP. The period which must be spent by a law-student in the office of a practising attorney before admission to the bar. 1 Tidd, Pr. 61.

CLIENT. In Practice. One who employs and retains an attorney or counsellor to manage or defend a suit or action to which he is a party, or to advise him about some legal matters. See ATTORNEY-AT-LAW.

CLOSE. An interest in the soil. Doctor & Stud. 30; 6 East 154; 1 Burr. 133; or in trees or growing crops. 4 Mass. 266; 9 Johns. 113.

In every case where one man has a right to exclude another from his land, the law encircles it, if not already inclosed, with an imaginary fence, and entitles him to a compensation in damages for the injury he sustains by the act of another passing through his boundary—denominating the injurious act a breach of the inclosure; Hamm. N. P. 151; Doctor & Stud. dial. 1, c. 8, p. 30; 2 Whart. 430.

In considering the cases in which trespass might be supported for an injury to land, for breaking the close, it is laid down that the term close, being technical and signifying the interest in the soil, and not merely a close or inclosure in the common acceptance of that term. It lies however temporary the tenant's interest, and though it be merely in the profits of the soil as vesturæ terræ or herbagii pascituræ; Co. Litt. 4 b; 5 East 480; 6 id. 606; 5 T. R. 535; prima tonsura; 7 East 200; chase for warren, etc.; 2 Salk. 637; if it be in exclusion of others; 2 Bla. Rep. 1150; 8 M. & S. 499. So it lies by one having a right to take off grass; 6 East 602; or after a tenancy expires to emblements; 9 Johns. 108; or one having the right to cut timber trees; 4 Mass. 266.

An ejectment will not lie for a close: 11 Co. 55; Cro. Eliz. 235; Ad. Ej. 24. See CLAUSUM.

CLOSE COPIES. Copies which might be written with any number of words on a sheet. Office copies were to contain only a prescribed number of words on each sheet.

CLOSE HAULED. In Admiralty Law. This is a nautical term and means the arrangement of a vessel's sails when she endeavors to make progress in the nearest direction possible towards that point of the compass from which the wind blows. 6 El. & Bl. 771; Black, L. Dict.

CLOSE ROLLS. Rolls containing the record of the close writs (literæ clausæ) and grants of the king, kept with the public records. 2 Bla. Com. 346.

CLOSE WRITS. Writs directed to the sheriff instead of to the lord. 3 Reeve, Hist. Eng. Law 45. Writs containing grants from the crown to particular persons and for particular purposes, which, not being intended for public inspection, are closed up and sealed on the outside, instead of being open and having the seal appended by a strip of parchment. 2 Bla. Com. 346; Sewall, Sher. 372.

CLOTURE. The procedure in deliberactive assemblies whereby debate is closed. Introduced in the English parliament in the session of 1882. Wharton. It is generally effected by moving the previous question. See Roberts. Rules of Order §§ 20, 58 a. This motion is not recognized in the senate of the United States.

CLOUD ON TITLE. See BILL TO REMOVE CLOUD FROM TITLE.

CLUB. A voluntary unincorporated association of persons for purposes of a social, literary, or political nature or the like. A club is not a partnership; 2 M. & W. 172; Black, L. Dict.

CO-ADMINISTRATOR. One who is administrator with one or more others. See ADMINISTRATOR.

CO-ASSIGNEE. One who is assignee with one or more others. See ASSIGNMENT.

CO-EXECUTOR. One who is executor with one or more others. See EXECUTOR.

COADJUTOR. The assistant of a bishop. An assistant.

COADUNATIO. A conspiracy. 9 Coke, 36.

COAL NOTE. In English Law. A species of promissory note authorized by the stat. 3 Geo. II. c. 26, §§ 7, 8, which, having these words expressed therein, namely, "value received in coals," are to be protected and noted as inland bills of exchange.

COAST. The margin of a country bounded by the sea. This term includes the natural appendages of the territory which rise out of the water, although they are not of sufficient firmness to be inhabited or fortified. Shoals perpetually covered with water are not, however, comprehended under the name of coast. The small islands situate at the mouth of the Mississippi, composed of earth and trees drifted down by the river, which are not of consistency enough to support the purposes of life, and are uninhabited, though resorted to for shooting birds, were held to form a part of the coast.

COCKET. A seal appertaining to the king's custom-house. Reg. Orig. 192. A scroll or parchment sealed and delivered by the officers of the custom-house to merchants as an evidence that their wares are customed. Cowel; Spelman. Gloss. See 7 Low. C. 116. The entry office in the custom-house itself. A kind of bread said by Cowel to be hard-baked; sea-biscuit; a measure.

CODE (Lat. Codex, the stock or stem of a tree—originally the board covered with wax, on which the ancients originally wrote). A body of law established by the legislative authority of the state, and designed to regulate completely, so far as a statute may, the subject to which it relates.

From the rude beginning, expressed in the derivation of the word, there developed the somewhat diversified signification which it has acquired in jurisprudence. It has been used to describe a collection of pre-existing laws arranged and classified into a logical system, or one intended to be such, without the interpolation of new matter, and also a declaration of the law composed partly of such materials as might be at hand from all sources,—statutes, adjudications, customs,—supplemented by such amendments, alterations, and additions as seemed to the lawgivers to be required to constitute a complete system and adapt it to the purpose of its adoption, or promulgation.

This mixed character, it may probably be asserted with confidence, is essential to the existence of a code as the term is now understood, and has entered more or less into the composition of every body of laws known as such in history.

The idea of a code involves that of the exercise of the legislative power in its promulgation; but the name has been loosely applied also to private compilations of statutes.

The subject of codes and the kindred topics of legal reform have received great attention from the jurists and statesmen of the present century. Probably no subject in the domain of law has been the occasion of more extended and earnest discussion than the relative merits of the Code system as it is understood by jurists, and that which is considered and treated on both sides of the controversy as its antithesis, a body of law partly written and partly unwritten, finding its beginnings in customs gradually ripening into customary law; seeking later expression in statutes and passing through a period of judicial interpretation and modification by being fitted, as it were, into successive cases, with sufficiently varying facts to produce that flexibility which is needed for final crystallization into a body of rules and principles sufficiently well settled as to have attained the dignity of a well ordered system. Of the one the Roman Law is the illustration unrivalled in history, as is the English Common Law of the other. While, however, these do represent two distinct and well defined systems of the development of law, the thoughtful and impartial reader of what is written by the ardent advocates of each, assuming as many of them do that the adoption of the one is the exclusion of the other, may find himself inclining to the conclusion that in dealing with this as with most juridical questions, an entirely one-sided view will leave much to be desired. It may be permissible to question whether these two systems are essentially distinct and antagonistic types, or different methods employed in and essential to the evolution of municipal law as a whole, and of the science of jurisprudence in its widest sense. It is true that there are recorded in history proposals to form a code of laws de novo having relation only to the future and disregarding the past, but this has been properly regarded as the visionary dream of the enthusiast rather than the matured conclusion of a judicious lawgiver. It is hardly to be questioned that no code has ever taken its place as an instrument of legal administration into which there did not enter as a substantial constituent a body of existing common law, and that every body of unwritten law on a given subject is tending towards ultimately finding its expression in what is tantamount to a code, whether called by that name or not. Indeed, if dry technicalities of definition be avoided, it is hardly an exaggeration to say that there are single decisions of English or American judges, such, for example, as Coggs v. Bernard, which may not be inaptly termed a code or codification of the law on the subject to which they relate, and which come to be recognized as such with authority which could hardly be increased by legislative affirmation. The difficulty of making a hard and fast line between the two systems is quite well shown by all the attempts to define precisely the word code. A very judicious writer, after a review of the historical codes, concludes that substantially they are of three kinds; and his classification is not only satisfactory in itself but admirably illustrates what has been said.

"First.—The classification of statutes of force systematically arranged, according to subject-matter, without amendment, alteration, or interpolation of new law, the only change being in the correction of errors of expression, repetitions, superfluities, and contradictions, compressed into as small a space as possible, which, when done, will leave the laws in letter and in spirit just as they were.

"Second.—The same as the first in form, but going further and making such amendments as are deemed necessary to harmonize and perfect the existing system.

"Third.—To take a yet greater latitude, and, without changing the existing system of laws, to add new laws, and to repeal old laws, both in harmony with it, so that the code will meet present exigencies, and so far as possible provide for the future; and this is real codification." To these accurate statements the writer adds a fourth, "wholly impracticable and even visionary," which is "to disregard at will existing laws, and make a system substantially new," such as the author deems best and wisest. Paper of Judge Clark, Rep't Ga. St. Bar Ass'n, 1890.

There is unquestionably a strong tendency towards codification in a general sense, which manifests itself in the tendency to general revisions of federal and state statutes, the adoption of codes of procedure by name in several of them, and in fact though not in name in many others, the codes of India, and not the least in the growing interest in an active discussion of the subject. If this interest leads to action wisely tempered with a due regard for the proper functions of written and unwritten law, and freedom from extreme views and the effort to accomplish the impossible task of reducing all law to the unyielding forms of statutory enactment, it will undoubtedly be fruitful of good results.

When it is considered how rapidly statutes accumulate as time passes, it is obvious that great convenience will be found in having the statute law in a systematic body, arranged according to subject-matter, instead of leaving it unorganized, scattered through the volumes in which it was from year to year promulgated. Revision to this extent is very frequent, and is what is usually accomplished in the Revised Statutes of many states which are inartificially termed codes. Of this general character were the Revised Statutes of the United States; infra. When the transposition of the statutes from a chronological to a scientific order is undertaken, more radical changes immediately propose themselves. These are of two classes: first, amendments for the purpose of harmonizing the inconsistencies which such an arrangement brings to notice, and supplying defects; second, the introduction into the system of all other rules which are recognized as the unwritten or common law of the state. The object of the latter class of changes is to embody in one systematic enactment all that is thenceforth to be regarded as the law of the land. It is this attempt which is usually intended by the distinctive term codification.

The first two of the questions thus indicated may be deemed as settled, by general concurrence, in favor of the expediency of such changes; and the process of the collection of the statute law in one general code, or in a number of partial codes or systematic statutes, accompanied by the amendments which such a revision invites, is a process which for some years has been renovating the laws of England and the United States. Although at the same time something has been done, especially in this country, towards embodying in these statutes principles which before rested in the common or report law, yet the feasibility of doing this completely, or even to any great extent, must be deemed an open question. It has been discussed with great ability by Bentham, Savigny, Thibaut, and others. It is undeniable that, however successfully a code might be supposed to embody all existing and declared law, so as to supersede previous sources, it cannot be expected to provide prospectively for all the innumerable cases which the diversity of affairs rapidly engenders, and there must soon come a time when it must be studied in the light of numerous explanatory decisions.

Real codification involves the most intimate and exhaustive knowledge not only of the statute law to be included, but also of the judicial interpretation and construction of it, and from the moment of the adoption of a code it begins to be the subject of a new series of decisions which are required to interpret, modify, and explain it and adapt it to modern conditions and the facts of cases of new impression, as is and always has been the case with respect to the adaptation of the ancient rules of the common law to modern conditions. In doing this the necessity for and opportunity of judicial legislation are infinite, and with the multiplicity of courts and jurisdictions the difficulties of preserving a system founded on reason are far greater than they were even a very few years ago. And this consideration is strongly urged in favor of the code system. On the other hand, that the law of master and servant, which was founded on such relations as the coachman and the blacksmith's striker, should have been applied with so little friction to the railroad and the factory, is hardly less wonderful than the development of the common carrier of the post road and van to the telephone company, and these rapid transformations may serve as the basis of an argument that no civil code can be framed with sufficient wisdom to provide for the constantly changing conditions of life and business.

In addition to the considerations herein mentioned as bearing upon the subject, the lord chief justice of England, in his address before the American Bar Association (Report 1896), in disapproving of the proposal to codify international law, mentions and illustrates a very fundamental objection to the codification of branches of the law not yet definitely reduced to fixed rules. His observations approach very nearly the suggestion of a striking and effective limitation of the extent to which codification should go beyond the scientific revision of statute law, and in the direction of including law settled by decision and not by statute. Some branches of the law are admirably adapted to complete codification, some others are not yet, and others again by their nature never can or will be.

The discussions on this subject have called attention to a subject formerly little considered, but which is of fundamental importance to the successful preparation of a code—the matter of statutory expression. There is no species of composition which demands more care and precision than that of drafting a statute. The writer needs not only to make his language intelligible, he must make it incapable of misconstruction. When it has passed to a law, it is no longer his intent that is to be considered, but the intent of the words which he has used; and that intent is to be ascertained under the strong pressure of an attempt of the advocate to win whatever possible construction may be most favorable to his cause. The true safeguard is found not in the old method of accumulating synonyms and by an enumeration of particulars, but rather—as is shown by those American codes of which the Revised Statutes of New York and the revision of Massachusetts are admirable specimens—by concise but complete statement of the full principle in the fewest possible words, and the elimination of description and paraphrase by the separate statement of necessary definitions. One of the rules to which the New York revisers generally adhered, and which they found of very great importance, was to confine each section to a single proposition. In this way the intricacy and obscurity of the old statutes were largely avoided. The reader who wishes to pursue this interesting subject will find much that is admirable in Coode's treatise on Legislative Expression (Lond. 1845) (reprinted in Brightly's Purdon's Digest, Penna.). The larger work of Gael (Legal Composition, Lond. 1840) is more especially adapted to the wants of the English profession.

GREAT BRITAIN. There has not been in England any general codification in the modern sense.

There were some early English so-called codes which were of the former character. The first code in England appears to have been about the year 600 by Athelbert, king of the Kentings. His reign overlaps the reign of Justinian. His laws have come down to us only in a copy made after the Norman Conquest. They consist of ninety brief sentences. In the end of the 7th century the west Saxons had written laws,—the laws of Inc. The next legislator we come down to is Alfred the Great, about two centuries later. Later came the code of Canute. 1 Social England 165.

These are merely of historical interest. But in recent years there has been in England as elsewhere an interest in the subject of the arrangement, classification, and simplification of the law which found expression not only in words but in legislative action. The necessity for some reform, and the conditions which have forced the subject upon the attention of the English Bar and Parliament, are well expressed by Mr. Crackanthorpe in his recent address before the American Bar Association (Report, 1896):—

"We have in our libraries a number of monographs, dealing with the subheads of Law in the most minute detail—books on Torts and Contracts, on Settlements and Wills, on Purchases and Sales, on Specific Performance, on Negotiable Instruments, and so forth. We have also many valuable compendia, or institutional treatises, dealing with the Law as a whole. Each and all of these, however, bear witness to the disjointed character of our Jurisprudence. The numerous monographs overlap and jostle each other, like so many rudderless boats tossing at random on the surface of a wind-swept lake, while the institutional treatises, in their endeavor to be exhaustive, fail in point of logical arrangement, just as a vessel overlaid with a mixed cargo fails to get it properly stowed away in the hold. Some day, perhaps, we shall produce a Corpus Juris which will reduce our legal wilderness to order, and, by grubbing up the decayed trees, enable us to discern the living forest. We have already digested with success portions of our civil law, notably that relating to bills of exchange and a part of that relating to partnership and trusts. These experiments are likely to be renewed from time to time, and I doubt not that ultimately we shall have a civil code as complete as that which has just been promulgated in Germany. At present we have not even a criminal code such as you have in the State of New York and as is to be found in most continental countries, all that has been done in that direction being to pass five consolidating statutes dealing with larceny and a few other common offences."

In addition to those mentioned the partial codes thus far adopted in England include the Bills of Sale Act, the Employers' Liability Act, and others, and the India code is the result of a very successful effort to codify specific titles of the common law, and it is now constantly referred to in common-law jurisdictions as the best considered expression of the rules of the common law on subjects covered by it at the time of its adoption. In addition to the partial or special English codes referred to, the course which the discussion upon codification has taken in that country has led to the systematic collection and revision of statutes upon particular subjects. Under the direction of Lord Cairns, the statutes of England from 1 Henry III. have been systematically revised by a committee, and published as the "Revised Statutes." Eighteen volumes have been published, bringing the work down to 1878.

In other British dependencies there have been movements in the direction of codification more pronounced in some instances than those in England. In Hong Kong and at the Straits Settlements codes of civil procedure were adopted on the lines of the New York code, which was also utilized in the Indian code.

The English Judicature Act of 1873 accomplished many of the reforms in the line of simplification which were aimed at in the New York code and those which followed it in the United States. Among other things, it provided for one civil action to take the place of the different actions of common law and the suits in equity; it provided for bringing actions in the name of the real party in interest and as many of them as had an interest, and against all against whom relief was claimed; for a decision according to the rules of the common law and equity, the latter to prevail when there was a conflict; it specified that the pleadings should be the statement of claim or complaint, the answer or defence, and the reply; that the trial should be by court, or jury, or referee.

This Judicature Act has been adopted by Victoria, Queensland, South Australia, Western Australia, Tasmania, New Zealand, Jamaica, St. Vincent, The Leeward Islands, British Honduras, Gambia, Grenada, Nova Scotia, Newfoundland, Ontario, and British Columbia. 35 Am. L. Reg. & Rev. n. s. 541.

UNITED STATES. In this country the subject has received no less attention and presented obstacles of less magnitude. Codes and revisions have been enacted as follows:

The Revision of Federal Statutes in 1873, which went into effect June 22, 1874, was by act of congress declared to constitute the law of the land; the pre-existing laws were thereby repealed, and ceased to be of effect. By subsequent acts of congress, certain errors in this revision were corrected. A new edition of the Revision of 1873 was authorized by acts of March 2, 1877, and March 9, 1878; this is not a new enactment, but merely a new publication; it contains a copy of the Revision of 1873, with certain specific alterations and amendments made by subsequent enactments of the 43d and 44th congresses, incorporated according to the judgment and discretion of the editor, under the authority of the acts providing for his appointment. These alterations, or amendments, were merely indicated by italics and brackets. The act of March 9, 1878, provides that the edition of 1878 shall be legal evidence of the laws therein contained in all the courts of the United States, and of the several states and territories, "but shall not preclude reference to, nor control, in case of any discrepancy, the effect of any original act as passed by congress since the first day of December, 1873."

The supplement of 1881 is official to a limited extent. The provisions in regard to it are as follows: "The publication herein authorized shall be taken to be prima facie evidence of the laws therein contained in all the courts of the United States, and of the several states and territories therein; but shall not preclude reference to, nor control, in case of any discrepancy, the effect of any original act as passed by congress:—Provided, that nothing herein contained shall be construed to change or alter any existing law;" 21 Stat. L. 388. See Wright v. U. S., 15 Ct. of Cl. 80, where the subject is explained by Richardson, J., one of the compilers. Volume I. Supplement to the Revised Statutes, contains all the permanent general laws enacted from the passage of the Revised Statutes in 1874, to and including the fifty-first congress, which expired in 1891, and supersedes Vol. I., prepared under resolution of June 7, 1880. The publication is prima facie evidence of the laws therein contained in all of the courts of the United States. Vol. II. of the Supplement contains the general laws of the fifty-second and subsequent congresses.

COLONIAL CODES. Of these there were several adopted in the colonies prior to the Revolution.

In 1665 a code prepared by Lord Chancellor Clarendon, called the "Duke's Laws," was promulgated and went into operation at Long Island and West Chester, New York. Afterwards its provisions slowly made their way in New York and the other provinces.

It was an attempt to state the law relating to the rights of persons and property, and of procedure both civil and criminal.

The Massachusetts colony, in March, 1634, appointed a committee to revise the law. Other committees were appointed in 1635 and 1637. Maryland adopted a code in 1639. In Massachusetts in 1641, a code of laws was adopted which was called "The Liberties of the Massachusetts Colony in New England." Connecticut adopted a code in 1650, chiefly copied from the Massachusetts code. Virginia appears to have adopted a body of laws in 1611, and in 1656 their laws were reduced into one volume.

STATE CODES. New York is the pioneer in the work of codification. In that state the first act relating to procedure after the organization of state government was passed March 16, 1778. Various other acts were passed between 1801 and 1813. In 1813 there was a general revision of the law, and the subject of practice of the law. In 1828 the revisers collected into one act the various provisions relating to practice in all the courts which was made a part of the Revised Statutes. It is said that this part of the Revised Statutes constituted the first code of civil procedure in New York. It embraced nearly all the practice in all the courts and has been the basis of subsequent code revision. In 1848 the "Code of Procedure" was adopted. Mr. David Dudley Field, the eminent writer on this subject, had begun his work on law reform in 1839. In 1848 a commission of which he was chairman produced the "Code of Procedure," containing 391 sections, which was adopted in that year. This code was largely amended in 1849, and has received frequent amendments at various times since that year. It is said that there have been 1323 amendments to the Code of Civil Procedure, and that about 2500 statutes and code amendments have been passed, not counting the special acts, since the organization of the state government.

Codes of Civil Procedure. The condition of code practice in the various states may be fairly summarized as follows:—

The following states have a code practice; in some of them it is so designated; in others it is practically a complete scheme of civil procedure in statutory form:—

Alabama, Arkansas, California, Colorado, Georgia, Idaho, Indiana, Iowa, Kansas, Kentucky, Louisiana, Michigan, Minnesota, Missouri, Montana, Nebraska, Nevada,

New York, North Carolina, North Dakota, Ohio, Oklahoma, Oregon, South Carolina, South Dakota, Tennessee, Utah, Washington, Wisconsin, Wyoming.

The following have in effect a substantial code:—

Florida, Connecticut, Massachusetts.

The following have in effect a partial code:—

Arizona, Illinois, Maryland, Mississippi, New Mexico, Texas, Vermont.

The following have no code:—

Delaware, Maine, New Hampshire, New Jersey, Pennsylvania, Rhode Island, Virginia, West Virginia, and the District of Columbia.

Code System generally. This has been formally adopted in a few states only, though the statute law of very many states contains what are practically and substantially codes on special subjects of the character of the English partial codes above referred to.

California and Montana have adopted the entire code system, including a civil code, a code of civil procedure, a penal code, a code of criminal procedure, and a political code.

As to the working of the civil code in California after twelve years of experience, Wallace, C. J., of that state, thus expressed himself:—

"I think the civil code the most important and beneficial piece of legislation that has ever been enacted in California. It has effected more for our people than all other legislation taken together since the foundation of the state. I have never seen an unfavorable criticism of it, which was, in my judgment, well founded. I believe that while at first there was some inclination in our profession to hesitate about the propriety of its adoption, our bench and bar are now, with remarkably few exceptions, unanimous in its commendation."

In Louisiana, the civil law prevails and there are complete codes framed thereunder. One feature of the Louisiana code should be carefully noted. It assumes that cases not anticipated may occur. Art. 21 declares that "in all civil matters where there is no express law, the judge is bound to proceed and decide according to equity. To decide equitably an appeal is to be made to natural law and reason, or received usages, where positive law is silent." This code was adopted in 1824 and took effect in 1825, the revision of 1870 being the same code, with the slavery provisions omitted, and with such amendments as had previously been made. It is said that the power above quoted has never been exercised except to furnish a remedy or mode of procedure. See LOUISIANA.

North Dakota also has the code system, and in addition to the subjects covered in California has probate and justices' codes.

South Dakota, in addition to its code of practice, has probate and justices' codes.

Mr. Field, in writing on the subject, "Law Reform in the United States and its Influence Abroad," in the American Law Review for August, 1891, after referring to the adoption of the New York Code of Civil Procedure, thus summarizes the action taken in other states up to that time in the same direction:

"Though this revolution in legal procedure encountered the most violent opposition from lawyers in New York, the example was speedily followed by other American states. The beginning was made by Missouri, led by Mr. Justice Wells, District Judge of the United States for that district. Then came other states and most of the territories, at different times, numbering, I believe, twenty-five already. I am not sure that I can give the order in which they came in, but I think the following is a correct enumeration: California in 1851, Kentucky in 1851, Ohio in 1853, Iowa in 1855, Wisconsin in 1856, Kansas in 1859, Nevada in 1861, Dakota in 1862, Oregon in 1862, Idaho in 1864, Minnesota in 1866, Nebraska in 1866, Arizona in 1866, Arkansas in 1868, North Carolina in 1868, Wyoming in 1869, Washington Territory in 1870, South Carolina in 1870, Utah in 1870, Connecticut in 1879, Indiana in 1881, Colorado in 1887, Georgia later."

He also states that the Code of Criminal Procedure "was enacted by the legislature of New York in 1881. . . . Before this time, however, it had been adopted by eighteen of the other American States or Territories, viz.: By California in 1850, by Kentucky in 1854, Iowa in 1855, Kansas in 1859, Nevada in 1861, Dakota in 1863, Oregon in 1864, Idaho in 1864, Montana in 1864, Washington in 1869, Wyoming in 1869, Arkansas in 1874, Utah in 1876, Arizona in 1877, Wisconsin in 1878, Nebraska in 1881, Indiana in 1881, and Minnesota in 1883;" and that before the penal code of New York was enacted in 1882 it had been adopted by California and the territories of Dakota and Idaho since admitted as states, and no considerable portion of it has been adopted in Oregon.

FOREIGN COUNTRIES. On the continent of Europe the systems of law are generally founded upon the civil law, and each country has its own code, which is usually an adaptation in whole or in part of Roman Law. These codes are different in character, falling within sometimes one and sometimes another of the classes above enumerated, as they were intended to be scientific collections and classifications of existing law or to include new legislation.

The modern codes of Europe were preceded by periods of codification, such as that which Maine designates the "era of codes," in which, throughout the world, so far as the sphere of Roman and Hellenic influence extended, there appeared codes of the class of which The Twelve Tables is the conspicuous example; Maine, Anc. L. 2, 13; and the many codes of the Middle Ages based upon Roman law modified by local customs. There were also a great number of codes of maritime law, which in its nature was, and still is, well adapted to this exact form of expression, many of which are collected in the Black Book of the Admiralty (q. v.), which has been said to contain all maritime codes known at the time. Below are briefly referred to the best known historic codes, ancient and modern.

AUSTRIAN. The Civil Code was promulgated July 7, 1810, under Joseph II. (1786). The first part of it was published and submitted to the Universities and the courts of justice, and some parts having been found wholly unsuited to the purpose, were by his successor abrogated. It is founded in a great degree upon the Prussian. The Penal Code (1852) is said to adopt to some extent the characteristics of the French Penal Code.

The civil code originated in an ordinance issued by Maria Theresa in 1753, the avowed objects being to provide for uniformity of the law in the provinces and digest the existing law. The result was unsatisfactory and another commission authorized Counsellor Harten to construct a code, of which the conditions prescribed are quite worthy of repetition. They were:—1. To abstain from doctrinal development. 2. To have in view contestations of the most frequent occurrence. 3. To be clear in expression. 4. To be governed by natural equity rather than the principles of the Roman Law. 5. To simplify the laws and to refrain from too much subtlety in details.

BURGUNDIAN. Lex Romana, otherwise known in modern times as the Papiniani Responsorum. Promulgated A. D. 517.

It was founded on the Roman law; and its chief interest is the indication which, in common with the other Barbaric codes, it affords of the modifications of jurisprudence under the changes of society amidst which it arose.

CONSOLATO DEL MARE. A code of maritime law of high antiquity and great celebrity.

Its origin is not certainly known. It has been ascribed to the authority of the ancient kings of Arragon; but there is some reason for maintaining the theory that it was gradually collected and handed down as a digest of all the principal rules and usages established among the maritime nations of Europe from the twelfth to the fourteenth century. Since it was first promulgated at Barcelona in the fourteenth century it has been enlarged from time to time by the addition of various commercial regulations. Its doctrines are founded to a large extent on the Greek and Roman law. It seems to have been originally written in the dialect of Catalonia; but it has been translated into every language of Europe, except English. It has had great weight in determining the maritime law of Europe. It comprised the ancient ordinances of the Greek and Roman emperors and of the kings of France and Spain, and the laws of the Mediterranean islands and of Venice and Genoa. It is referred to at the present day as an authority in respect to the ownership of vessels, the rights and obligations thereto, to the rights and responsibilities of master and seamen, to the law of freight, of equipment and supply, of jettison and average, of salvage, of ransom, and of prize. The edition of Pardessus, in his Collection de Lois Maritimes (vol. 2), is deemed the best. There is also a French translation by Boucher, Paris, 1808. The original printed edition was published at Barcelona, in 1494. See also, Reddie, Hist. of Mar. Com. 171; Marvin's Leg. Bibl.; J. Duer, Ins.; 7 N. A. Rev. 330.

FRENCH CODES. The chief French codes of the present day are five in number, sometimes known as Les Cinq Codes. They were in great part the work of Napoleon, and the first in order bears his name. They are all frequently printed in one duodecimo volume. These codes do not embody the whole French law, but minor codes and a number of scattered statutes must also be resorted to upon special subjects.

Code Civil, or Code Napoléon, is composed of thirty-six laws, the first of which was passed in 1803 and the last in 1804, which united them all in one body, under the name of Code Civil des Français.

The first steps towards its preparation were taken in 1793, but it was not prepared till some years subsequently, and was finally thoroughly discussed in all its details by the Court of Cassation, of which Napoleon was president and in the discussions of which he took an active part throughout. In 1807 a new edition was promulgated, the title Code Napoléon being substituted. In the third edition (1816) the old title was restored; but in 1852 it was again displaced by that of Napoleon.

Under Napoleon's reign it became the law of Holland, of the Confederation of the Rhine, Westphalia, Bavaria, Italy, Naples, Spain, etc. It has undergone great amendment by laws enacted since it was established. It is divided into three books. Book 1, Of Persons and the enjoyment and privation of civil rights. Book 2, Property and its different modifications. Book 3, Different ways of acquiring property. Prefixed to it is a preliminary title, Of the Publication, Effects, and Application of Laws in General.

One of the most perspicuous and able commentators on this code is Toullier, frequently cited in this work.

Code de Procédure Civile. That part of the code which regulates civil proceedings.

It is divided into two parts. Part First consists of five books: the first of which treats of justices of the peace; the second, of inferior tribunals; the third, of royal (or appellate) courts; the fourth, of extraordinary means of proceeding; the fifth, of the execution of judgments. Part Second is divided into three books, treating of various matters and proceedings special in their nature.

Code de Commerce. The code for the regulation of commerce.

This code was enacted in 1807. Book 1 is entitled, Of Commerce in General. Book 2, Maritime Commerce. The whole law of this subject is not embodied in this book. Book 3, Failures and Bankruptcy. This book was very largely amended by the law of 28th May, 1838. Book 4, Of Commercial Jurisdiction,—the organization, jurisdiction and proceedings of commercial tribunals. This code is, in one sense, a supplement to the Code Napoléon, applying the principle of the latter to the various subjects of commercial law. Sundry laws amending it have been enacted since 1807. Pardessus is one of the most able of its expositors. See Goirand, Code of Commerce.

Code d'Instruction Criminelle. The code regulating procedure in criminal cases, taking that phrase in a broad sense.

Book 1 treats of the police; Book 2, of the administration of criminal justice. It was enacted in 1808 to take effect with the Penal Code in 1811.

Code Pénal. The penal or criminal code.

Enacted in 1810. Book 1 treats of penalties in criminal and correctional cases, and their effects; Book 2, of crimes and misdemeanors, and their punishment; Book 3, offences against the police regulations, and their punishment. Important amendments of this code have been made by subsequent legislation.

There is also a Code Forestier; and the name code has been inaptly given to some private compilations on other subjects.

GENTOO CODE. A translation of the laws of the Hindus made during the administration of Warren Hastings as Governor-General of India, and prior to the translation of the Institutes of Menu.

The formulation of Hindu law in those institutes (q. v. supra) had the same effect in India as had always resulted from the written expression of the law. There was gradually formed a new body of law consisting of decisions and opinions of learned men upon the construction of written law closely resembling the body of law which was engrafted upon the Institutes of Justinian. The translation of those laws in the Gentoo code was followed by a further digest under the authority of the English government, so that a very complete body of Hindu law grew up, which discloses a system of procedure resembling in a marked degree that of the present day, comprising,—a complaint, a summons or citation, an appearance, a hearing of both parties, the presence of attorneys, and a law of evidence and method of examining witnesses.

There seems also to have been in India in very early times a system of natural arbitration by neighbors, probably the earliest effort at an administration of justice and resembling the ancient county court of the Saxons. See Menu, infra.

GERMAN CODE. In the current which swept over Europe during the sixteenth century, substituting, as Professor Sohn phrases it, "the revived spirit of antiquity for mediæval conceptions and ideas," Germany participated in the changes which took place in all departments of science. Then the Roman law was "received" in that country, and from that time it has been a controlling factor in the jurisprudence of the countries which form the German Empire. In certain territorial limits over which the Prussian Landrecht (see PRUSSIAN CODE) held sway "the formal validity of the Corpus Juris Civilis has been expressly set aside," but even there "the force of Roman principles of law has nevertheless remained substantially unimpaired within large departments of German jurisprudence." Particularly is the science of the Roman private law imbedded in the German jurisprudence, and indeed the existence of law as a science in Germany dates from the introduction of the Roman law. There were no preconceived ideas with which to conflict, and it was accepted by a national intellect unprejudiced by any preconceived ideas. See Prussian Code, infra.

The completion of twenty-five years of the life of the Empire has been made the occasion of the construction and promulgation of a new German code which has been in the course of preparation for several years. It is an example for the most part of antecedent laws, though of an arrangement novel in various respects. The civil code, having passed the Reichstag and received the approval of the emperor, was duly promulgated August 19, 1896, to go into effect January 1, 1900, at the same time with other special codes, including those of Civil Procedure, Insolvency, Assignments, Arbitrations, and the like.

GREGORIAN. An unofficial compilation of the rescripts of the Roman emperors. It was made in the fourth century, and is not now extant.

The Theodosian Code, which was promulgated nearly a century afterwards, was a continuation of this and of the collection of Hermogenes. The chief interest of all these collections is in their relation to their great successor the Justinian Code.

HANSE TOWNS, LAWS OF THE. A code of maritime law established by the Hanseatic towns.

It was first published in German, at Lubec, in 1597. In an assembly of deputies from the several towns, held at Lubec, May 23, 1614, it was revised and enlarged. The text, with a Latin translation, was published with a commentary by Kuricke; and a French translation has been given by Cleirac in Us et Coutumes de la Mer. It is not unfrequently referred to on subjects of maritime law.

HENRI (French). The best-known of several collections of ordinances made during the sixteenth, seventeenth, and eighteenth centuries, the number of which in part both formed the necessity and furnished the material for the Code Napoléon.

HENRI (Haytien). A very judicious adaptation from the Code Napoléon for the Haytiens. It was promulgated in 1812 by Christophe (Henri I.).

HERMOGENIAN. An unofficial compilation made in the fourth century, supplementary to the code of Gregorius. It is not now extant.

JUSTINIAN CODE. A collection of imperial ordinances compiled by order of the emperor Justinian.

All the judicial wisdom of the Roman civilization which is of importance to the American lawyer is embodied in the compilations to which Justinian gave his name, and from which that name has received its lustre. Of these, first in contemporary importance, if not first in magnitude and present interest, was the Code. In the first year of his reign he commanded Tribonian, a statesman of his court, to revise the imperial ordinances. The first result, now known as the Codex Vetus, is not extant. It was superseded a few years after its promulgation by a new and more complete edition. Although it is this alone which is now known as the Code of Justinian, yet the Pandects and the Institutes which followed it are a part of the same system, declared by the same authority; and the three together form one codification of the law of the Empire. The first of these works occupied Tribonian and nine associates fourteen months. It is comprised in twelve divisions or books, and embodies all that was deemed worthy of preservation of the imperial statutes from the time of Hadrian down. The Institutes is an elementary treatise prepared by Tribonian and two associates upon the basis of a similar work by Gaius, a lawyer of the second century.

The Pandects, which were made public about a month after the Institutes, were an abridgment of the treatises and the commentaries of the lawyers. They were presented in fifty books. Tribonian and the sixteen associates who aided him in this part of his labors accomplished this abridgment in three years. It has been thought to bear obvious marks of the haste with which it was compiled; but it is the chief embodiment of the Roman law, though not the most convenient resort for the modern student of that law.

Tribonian found the law, which for fourteen centuries had been accumulating, comprised in two thousand books, or—stated according to the Roman method of computation—in three million sentences. It is probable that this matter, if printed in law volumes such as are now used, would fill from three to five hundred volumes. The comparison, to be more exact, should take into account treatises and digests, which would add to the bulk of the collection more than to the substance of the material. The commissioners were instructed to extract a series of plain and concise laws, in which there should be no two laws contradictory or alike. In revising the imperial ordinances, they were empowered to amend in substance as well as in form.

The codification being completed, the emperor decreed that no resort should be had to the earlier writings, nor any comparison be made with them. Commentators were forbidden to disfigure the new with explanations, and lawyers were forbidden to cite the old. The imperial authority was sufficient to sink into oblivion nearly all the previously existing sources of law; but the new statutes which the emperor himself found it necessary to establish, in order to explain, complete, and amend the law, rapidly accumulated throughout his long reign. These are known as the "Novels." The Code, the Institutes, the Pandects, and the Novels, with some subsequent additions, constitute the Corpus Juris Civilis.

Among English translations of the Institutes are that by Cooper (Phila. 1812; N. Y. 1841)—which is regarded as a very good one—and that by Sanders (Lond. 1853), which contains the original text also, and copious references to the Digests and Code. Among the modern French commentators are Orléan and Pasquiere.

LIVINGSTON'S CODE. Edward Livingston, one of the commissioners who prepared the Louisiana Code, prepared and presented to congress a draft of a penal code for the United States; which, though it was never adopted, is not unfrequently referred to in the books as stating principles of criminal law.

MARINE ORDINANCES OF LOUIS XIV. See ORDONNANCE DE LA MARINE, infra.

MENU, INSTITUTES OF. A code of Hindu law, of great antiquity, which still forms the basis of Hindu jurisprudence (Elphinstone's Hist. of India, p. 83), and is said also to be the basis of the laws of the Burmese and of the Laos. Buckle, Hist. of Civilization, vol. 1, p. 54, note 70. "It undoubtedly enshrines many genuine observances of the Hindu race, but the opinion of the best contemporary orientalists is that it does not, as a whole, represent a set of rules ever actually administered in Hindustan." Maine, Anc. Law 16.

This code contains simple rules for regulating the trial of ordinary actions; the number and competency of witnesses and sufficiency of evidence; methods of procedure in court and the judgment and its enforcement. There is no indication of such an office as the attorney, as the judge is required to examine witnesses and parties; there is also a summary of the customary law.

The Institutes of Menu are in, point of the relative progress of Hindu jurisprudence, a recent production; Maine, Anc. Law 17; though ascribed to the ninth century B. C. A translation will be found in the third volume of Sir William Jones's Works. See, also, Gentoo Code, supra; HINDU LAW.

MOSAIC CODE. The code proclaimed by Moses for the government of the Jews, B. C. 1491.

One of the peculiar characteristics of this code is the fact that, whilst all that has ever been successfully attempted in other cases has been to change details without reversing or ignoring the general principles which form the basis of the previous law, that which was chiefly done here was the assertion of great and fundamental principles in part contrary and in part perhaps entirely new to the customs and usages of the people. These principles, thus divinely revealed and sanctioned, have given the Mosaic Code vast influence in the subsequent legislation of other nations than the Hebrews. The topics on which it is most frequently referred to as an authority in our law are those of marriage and divorce, and questions of affinity and of the punishment of murder and seduction. The commentaries of Michaelis and of Wines are valuable aids to its study.

ORDONNANCE DE LA MARINE. A code of maritime law enacted in the reign of Louis XIV.

It was promulgated in 1681, and with great completeness embodied all existing rules of maritime law, including insurance. Kent pronounces it a monument of the wisdom of the reign of Louis "far more durable and more glorious than all the military trophies won by the valor of his armies." Its compilers are unknown. An English translation is contained in the appendix to Peter's Admiralty Decisions, vol. 2. The ordinance has been at once illustrated and eclipsed by Valin's commentaries upon it.

OLERON, LAWS OF. A code of maritime law which takes its name from the island of Oleron.

Both the French and the English claim the honor of having originated this code,—the former attributing its compilation to the command of Queen Eleanor, Duchess of Guienne, near which province the island of Oleron lies; the latter ascribing its promulgation to her son, Richard I. A recent English writer considers that the greater part of it is probably of older date, and was merely confirmed by Richard; 1 Soc. Eng. 313. The latter monarch, without doubt, caused it to be improved, if he did not originate it, and he introduced it into England. He did at Chinon, in 1190, issue ordinances for the government of the navy which have been fairly described as the basis of our modern articles of war, and what they did for the navy, the code of Oleron, to which they were allied, did for the mercantile service. The provisions of both are extremely interesting, and some of the most curious of them may be found in 1 Social England 312. Some additions were made to this Code by King John. It was promulgated anew in the reign of Henry III., and again confirmed in the reign of Edward III. It is most accessible to the American profession in the translation contained in the appendix to the first volume of Peter's Admiralty Decisions. The French version, with Cleirac's commentary, is contained in Us et Coutumes de la Mer. The subjects upon which it is now valuable are much the same as those of the Consolato del Mare.

OSTROGOTHIC. The code promulgated by Theodoric, king of the Ostrogoths, at Rome, A. D. 500. It was founded on the Roman law.

PRUSSIAN CODE. Allgemeines Landrecht. The former code of 1751 was not successful, and the Grand Chancellor de Cocceji was charged by Frederick II. with the duty of codifying the law of Prussia; he died in 1735, and afterwards the work was arrested by the seven years' war, but was resumed in 1780, under Frederic II., and a project was prepared by Dr. Carmer and Dr. Volmar, which was submitted to the savans of Europe and to the royal courts. After long and thorough discussion, the present code was finally promulgated and put in force June 1, 1794, by Frederick William, and then for the first time all Europe was united under one system of law. It is known also as the Code Frederic. See German code, supra.

RHODIAN LAWS. A maritime code adopted by the people of Rhodes, and in force among the nations upon the Mediterranean nine or ten centuries before Christ. There is reason to suppose that the collection under this title in Vinnius is spurious, and, if so, the code is not extant. See Marsh. on Ins. b. 1, c. 4, p. 15.

THEODOSIAN. A code compiled by a commission of eight, under the direction of Theodosius the Younger.

It comprises the edicts and rescripts of sixteen emperors, embracing a period of one hundred and twenty-six years. It was promulgated in the Eastern Empire in 438, and quickly adopted, also, in the Western Empire. The great modern expounder of this code is Gothofredus (Godefroi). The results of modern researches regarding this code are well stated in the Foreign Quar. Rev. vol. 9, 374.

TWELVE TABLES. Laws of ancient Rome, compiled on the basis of those of Solon and other Greek legislators.

They first appeared in the year of Rome 303, inscribed on ten plates of brass. In the following year two more were added; and the entire code bore the name of the Laws of the Twelve Tables. The principles they contained were the germ of the body of the Roman law, and enter largely into the modern jurisprudence of Europe. See fragment of the law of the Twelve Tables, in Cooper's Justinian 656; Gibbon's Rome c. 44; Maine, Anc. Law 2.

VISIGOTHIC. The Lex Romani; now known as Breviarum Alaricianum. Ordained by Alaric II. for his Roman subjects, A. D. 506.

WISBUY, LAWS OF. A concise but comprehensive code of maritime law, established by the "merchants and masters of the magnificent city of Wisbuy."

The port of Wisbuy, now in ruins, was situated on the northwestern coast of Gottland, in the Baltic sea. It was the capital of the island, and the seat of an extensive commerce, of which the chief relic and the most significant record is this code. It is a mooted point whether this code was derived from the Laws of Oleron, or that from this; but the similarity of the two leaves no doubt that one was the offspring of the other. It was of great authority in the northern parts of Europe. "Lex Rhodia navalis," says Grotius, "pro jure gentium in illo mare Mediterraneo vigebat; sicut apud Gallum leges Oleronis, et apud omnes transrhenanos, legis Wisbuenes. De Jure B. lib. 2, c. 3." It is still referred to on subjects of maritime law. An English translation will be found in the appendix to the first volume of Peter's Admiralty Decisions.

In a learned address before the American Bar Association (Annual Report, 1886), upon "Codification, the Natural Result of the Evolution of the Law," Mr. Semmes, one of the most earnest advocates of the merits of the civil law and the code system, sketches the history of the codes of Europe and the relation of the civil to the common law. From this paper many of the historical facts connected with the European codes are obtained, and to it are referred those who wish to pursue the study of the subject for an admirable guide to the learning of the civilians and a judicious argument in favor of the system. Mr. Semmes in his conclusion says:—

"The history of codification teaches that the task of preparing a code of laws is difficult, that its proper execution is a work of years, to be entrusted, not to a deciduous committee of fugitive legislators, but to a permanent commission of the most enlightened and cultivated jurists, whose project, prior to adoption, should be subjected to rigid and universal criticism."

CODEX (Lat.). A volume or roll. The code of Justinian.

CODICIL. Some addition to, or qualification of, a last will and testament.

This term is derived from the Latin codicillus, which is a diminutive of codex, and in strictness imports a little code or writing,—a little will. In the Roman Civil Law, codicil was defined as an act which contains dispositions of property in prospect of death, without the institution of an heir or executor. Domat, Civil Law, p. ii. b. iv. tit. i. s. 1; Just. De Codic. art. i. s. 2. So, also, the early English writers upon wills define a codicil in much the same way. "A codicil is a just sentence of our will touching that which any would have done after their death, without the appointing of an executor." Swinb. Wills, pt. i. s. 5, pl. 2. But the present definition of the term is that first given. 1 Wills, Exrs. 8; Swinb. Wills, pt. i. s. v. pl. 5.

Under the Roman Civil Law, and also by the early English law, as well as the canon law, all of which very nearly coincided in regard to this subject, it was considered that no one could make a valid will or testament unless he did name an executor, as that was of the essence of the act. This was attended with great formality and solemnity, in the presence of seven Roman citizens as witnesses, omni exceptione majores. Hence a codicil is there termed an unofficial, or unsolemn, testament. Swinb. Wills, pt. i. s. v. pl. 4; Godolph, pt. i. c. 1, s. 2; id. pt. i. c. 6, s. 2; Plowd. 185; where it is said by the judges, that "without an executor a will is null and void," which has not been regarded as law in England, for the last two hundred years, probably.

The office of a codicil under the civil law seems to have been to enable the party to dispose of his property, in the near prospect of death, without the requisite formalities of executing a will (or testament, as it was then called). Codicils were strictly confined to the disposition of property; whereas a testament had reference to the institution of an heir or executor, and contained trusts and confidences to be carried into effect after the decease of the testator. Domat, b. iv. tit. i.

In the Roman Civil Law there were two kinds of codicils: the one, where no testament existed, and which was designed to supply its place as to the disposition of property, and which more nearly resembled our donatio causa mortis than anything else now in use; the other, where a testament did exist, had relation to the testament, and formed a part of it and was to be construed in connection with it. Domat, p. ii. b. iv. tit. i. s. i. art. v. It is in this last sense that the term is now universally used in the English law, and in the American states where the common law prevails.

Codicils owe their origin to the following circumstance. Lucius Lentulus, dying in Africa, left codicils, confirmed by anticipation in a will of former date, and in those codicils requested the Emperor Augustus, by way of fidei commissum, or trust, to do something therein expressed. The emperor carried this will into effect, and the daughter of Lentulus paid legacies which she would not otherwise have been legally bound to pay. Other persons made similar fidei commissum, and then the emperor, by the advice of learned men whom he consulted, sanctioned the making of codicils, and thus they became clothed with legal authority. Inst. 2. 25; Bowy. Com. 155.

All codicils are part of the will, and are to be so construed; 4 Bro. Ch. 55; 17 Sim. 108; 16 Beav. 510; 2 Ves. Sen. Ch. 242, by Lord Hardwicke; 4 Y. & C. Ch. 160; 2 Russ. & M. 117; 3 Sandf. Ch. 11; 4 Kent 531. See 88 Ala. 427; 43 Barb. 424; and executed with the same formalities; Shoul. Wills 359; 4 Kent 531; 13 Gray 103.

A codicil properly executed to pass real and personal estate, and in conformity with the statute of frauds, and upon the same piece of paper with the will, operates as a republication of the will, so as to have it speak from that date; 4 Pa. 376; 4 Dane Abr. c. 127, a. 1, § 11, p. 550; 14 B. Monr. 333; 1 Cush. 118; 3 M. & C. 359. So also it has been held that it is not requisite that the codicil should be on the same piece of paper in order that it should operate as a republication of the will; 1 Hill 590; 7 id. 346; 3 Zab. 447; 1 Ves. Sen. 442; 14 Mo. 587; but where it is on the same piece of paper, not signed, only the will proper which was signed should be admitted to probate; 9 Pa. Co. Ct. R. 333; but see 5 Har. & J. 371.

A codicil duly executed, and attached or referring to a paper defectively executed as a will, has the effect to give operation to the whole, as one instrument; Shoul. Wills 448; 3 B. Monr. 390; 6 Johns. Ch. 374, 375; 14 Pick. 543; 16 Ves. Ch. 167; 7 id. 98; 1 Ad. & E. 423; 85 Hun 580. See numerous cases cited by Mr. Perkins, Pigott v. Walker, 7 Ves. Ch., Sumner ed. 98; 1 Cr. & M. 42.

There may be numerous codicils to the same will. In such cases, the later ones operate to revive and republish the earlier ones; 3 Bingh. 614; 12 J. B. Moore 2. See 55 Md. 365.

But in order to set up an informally executed paper by means of one subsequently executed in due form, referring to such informal paper, the reference must be such as clearly to identify the paper; 4 N. Y. 140.

A codicil which depends on the will for interpretation or execution falls, if the will be revoked; 1 Tucker 436; 5 Bush 337.

It is not competent to provide by will for the disposition of property to such persons as shall be named in a subsequent codicil, not executed according to the prescribed formalities in regard to wills; since all papers of that character, in whatever form, if intended to operate only in the disposition of one's property after death, are of a testamentary character, and must be so treated; 2 Ves. Ch. 204; 2 M. & K. 765; 1 V. & B. 422, 445.

So much of the will as is inconsistent with the codicil is revoked; 14 How. 390; 28 Vt. 374.

A codicil whose only provision is the appointment of an executor who died, cannot be admitted to probate apart from the will; 148 Pa. 5. A testator executed a codicil which was described as "a codicil to my will executed some years ago." After his death the will could not be found, but probate of the codicil was granted; [1892] Prob. 254. See WILLS.

COEMPTIO (Lat.). In Civil Law.

The ceremony of celebrating marriage by solemnities.

The parties met and gave each other a small sum of money. They then questioned each other in turn. The man asked the woman if she wished to be his mater-familias. She replied that she so wished. The woman then asked the man if he wished to be her pater-familias. He replied that he so wished. They then joined hands; and these were called nuptials by coemptio. Boethius, Coemptio; Calvinus, Lex.; Taylor, Law Gloss.

COERCION. Constraint; compulsion; force.

Direct or positive coercion takes place when a man is by physical force compelled to do an act contrary to his will: for example, when a man falls into the hands of the enemies of his country, and they compel him, by a just fear of death, to fight against it. See 4 Ct. Cls. 1; id. 288, 317.

Implied coercion exists where a person is legally under subjection to another, and is induced, in consequence of such subjection, to do an act contrary to his will.

As will is necessary to the commission of a crime or the making of a contract, a person actually coerced into either has no will on the subject, and is not responsible; 1 East, Pl. Cr. 225; 5 Q. B. 279; 45 Mich. 2; 90 Pa. 161. The command of a superior to an inferior; 3 Wash. C. C. 209, 220; 12 Metc. 56; 1 Blatchf. 549; 13 How. 115; of a parent to a child; Broom, Max. 11; of a master to his servant, or a principal to his agent; 13 Mo. 246; 3 Cush. 279; 5 Miss. 304; 14 Ala. 365; 22 Vt. 32; 14 Johns. 119; do not amount to coercion.

As to persons acting under the constraint of superior power, and, therefore, not criminally amenable, the principal case is that of married women, with respect to whom the law recognizes certain presumptions. Thus, if a wife commits a felony, other than treason or homicide, or, perhaps, highway robbery, in company with her husband, the law presumes that she acted under his coercion, and, consequently, without any guilty intent, unless the fact of non-coercion is distinctly proved; Clarke, Cr. L. 77. See 2 C. & K. 887, 903; 103 Mass. 71; 65 N. C. 398. This presumption appears on some occasions to have been considered conclusive, and is still practically regarded in no very different light, especially when the crime is of a flagrant character; but the better opinion seems to be that in every case the presumption may now be rebutted by positive proof that the woman acted as a free agent; and in one case that was much discussed, the Irish judges appear to have considered that such positive proof was not required, but that the question was always one to be determined by the jury on the evidence submitted to them; Jebb 93; 1 Mood. 143. It seems that a married woman cannot be convicted under any circumstances as a receiver of stolen goods, when the property has been taken by her husband and given to her by him; 1 Dears. 184.

Husband and wife were jointly charged with felonious wounding with intent to disfigure and to do grievous bodily harm. The jury found that the wife acted under the coercion of the husband, and that she did not personally inflict any violence on the prosecutor. On this finding, the wife was held entitled to an acquittal; 1 Dears. & B. 553.

Whether the doctrine of coercion extends to any misdemeanor may admit of some doubt; but the better opinion seems to be that, provided the misdemeanor is of a serious nature, as, for instance, the uttering of base coin, the wife will be protected in like manner as in cases of felony; although it has been distinctly held that the protection does not extend to assaults and batteries or the offence of keeping a brothel; Russ. Cr. 38; 2 Lew. 229; 8 C. & P. 19, 541; 1 Metc. 151; 10 Mass. 152. Indeed, it is probable that in all inferior misdemeanors this presumption, if admitted at all, would be held liable to be defeated by far less stringent evidence of the wife's active co-operation than would suffice in cases of felony; 8 C. & P. 541; 2 Mood. 53; 1 Tayl. Ev. 152. The law upon responsibility of married women for crime is fully stated in 1 B. & H. Lead. Cr. Cas. 76-87.

CO-EXECUTOR. One who is a joint executor with one or more others.

COFRADIA. The congregation or brotherhood entered into by several persons for the purpose of performing pious works. No society of this kind can be lawfully formed without license from the king and the bishop of the diocese.

COGNATES. In Civil and Scotch Law. Relations through females. 1 Mackelvey, Civ. Law 137; Bell, Dict.

COGNATI. In Civil Law. Collateral heirs through females. Relations in the line of the mother. 2 Bla. Com. 235.

The term is not used in the civil law as it now prevails in France. In the common law it has no technical sense; but as a word of discourse in English it signifies, generally, allied by blood, related in origin, of the same family.

Originally, the maternal relationship had no influence in the formation of the Roman family, nor in the right of inheritance. But the edict of the praetor established what was called the Praetorian succession, or the bonorum possessio, in favor of cognates in certain cases. Dig. 38. 8. See PATER-FAMILIAS; AGNATI.

COGNATION. In Civil Law. Signifies generally the kindred which exists between two persons who are united by ties of blood or family, or both.

Civil cognation is that which proceeds alone from the ties of families, as the kindred between the adopted father and the adopted child.

Mixed cognation is that which unites at the same time the ties of blood and family, as that which exists between brothers the issue of the same lawful marriage. Inst. 3. 6; Dig. 38. 10.

Natural cognation is that which is alone formed by ties of blood; such is the kindred of those who owe their origin to an illicit connection, either in relation to their ascendants or collaterals.

COGNISANCE. See COGNIZANCE.

COGNITIONIBUS ADMITTENDIS. A writ requiring a justice or other qualified person, who has taken a fine and neglects to certify it in the court of common pleas, to do so.

COGNIZANCE (Lat. cognitio, recognition, knowledge; spelled, also, Conusance and Cognisance). Acknowledgment; recognition; jurisdiction; judicial power; hearing a matter judicially. See 12 Ad. & El. 259.

Of Pleas. Jurisdiction of causes. A privilege granted by the king to a city or town to hold pleas within the same. Termes de la Ley. It is in frequent use among the older writers on English law in this latter sense, but is seldom used, if at all, in America, except in its more general meaning. The universities of Cambridge and Oxford possess this franchise: 11 East, 543; 1 W. Bla. 454; 10 Mod. 126; 3 Bla. Com. 298.

Claim of Cognizance (or of Conusance). An intervention by a third person, demanding judicature in the cause against the plaintiff, who has chosen to commence his action out of claimant's court. 2 Wils. 409; 2 Bla. Com. 350, n.

It is a question of jurisdiction between the two courts, Fortesc. 157; 5 Viner, Abr. 588, and not between the plaintiff and defendant, as in the case of plea to the jurisdiction, and must be demanded by the party entitled to conusance, or his representative, and not by the defendant or his attorney. 1 Chit. Pl. 403.

There are three sorts of conusance. Tenere placita, which does not oust another court of its jurisdiction, but only creates a concurrent one. Cognitio placitorum, when the plea is commenced in one court, of which conusance belongs to another. A conusance of exclusive jurisdiction: as, that no other court shall hold plea, etc. Hardr. 509; Bac. Abr. Courts, D.

In Pleading. The answer of the defendant in an action of replevin who is not entitled to the distress or goods which are the subject of the action—acknowledging the taking, and justifying it as having been done by the command of one who is so entitled. Lawes, Pl. 35, 36. An acknowledgment made by the deforciant, in levying a fine, that the lands in question are the right of the complainant. 2 Bla. Com. 350. See 21 Pick. 87; 5 Hill 194.

COGNOMEN (Lat.). A family name.

The prænomen among the Romans distinguished the person, the nomen the gens, or all the kindred descended from a remote common stock through males, while the cognomen denoted the particular family. The agnomen was added on account of some particular event, as a further distinction. Thus, in the designation Publius Cornelius Scipio Africanus, Publius is the prænomen, Cornelius is the nomen, Scipio the cognomen, and Africanus the agnomen. Vicat. These several terms occur frequently in the Roman laws. See Cas. temp. Hardw. 286; 6 Co. 65; 1 Tayl. 148.

COGNOVIT ACTIONEM (Lat. he has confessed the action. Cognovit alone is in common use with the same significance).

In Pleading. A written confession of an action by a defendant, subscribed, but not sealed, and authorizing the plaintiff to sign judgment and issue execution, usually for a sum named.

It is given after the action is brought to save expense, and differs from a warrant of attorney, which is given before the commencement of any action and is under seal. 3 Bouvier, Inst. 3229.

COHABIT (Lat. con and habere). To live together in the same house, claiming to be married.

The word does not include in its signification, necessarily, the occupying the same bed; 1 Haggg. Cons. 144; 4 Paige, Ch. 425; though the word is popularly, and sometimes in statutes, used in this latter sense; 20 Mo. 210; Bish. Marr. & Div. § 506, n.; 116 Ind. 464; 82 Va. 115; 159 Mass. 61; 116 U. S. 55.

To live together in the same house.

Used without reference to the relation of the parties to each other as husband and wife, or otherwise. Used of sisters or other members of the same family, or of persons not members of the same family, occupying the same house; 2 Vern. 323; Bish. Marr. & Div. & Sep. 506, n. See 75 Pa. 207; 32 Ark. 187; 54 Me. 565.

COIF. A head-dress.

In England there are certain serjeants at law who are called serjeants of the coif, from the lawn coif they wear on their heads under their thin caps when they are admitted to that order. It was anciently worn as a distinguishing badge. Spelman, Gloss.

COIN. A piece of metal stamped with certain marks and made current at a certain value. Strictly speaking, coin differs from money as the species differs from the genus. Money is any matter, whether metal, paper, beads, or shells, which has currency as a medium in commerce. Coin is a particular species, always made of metal, and struck according to a certain process called coining. Wharton. To fashion pieces of metal into a prescribed shape, weight, and fineness, and stamp them with prescribed devices, by authority of government, that they may circulate as money. 22 Ind. 306; 2 Duvall 29. Congress alone has the power to coin money; Const. U. S. Art. 1, § 7; but the states may pass laws to punish the circulation of false coin; 5 How. 410.

So long as a genuine silver coin is worn only by natural abrasion, is not appreciably diminished in weight, and retains the appearance of a coin duly issued from the mint, it is a legal tender for its original value; 12 Fed. Rep. 840. See 160 U. S. 288.

COLIBERTUS. One who, holding in free socage, was obliged to do certain services for the lord. A middle class of tenants between servile and free, who held their freedom of tenure on condition of performing certain services. Said to be the same as the conditionales. Cowel.

COLLATERAL (Lat. con, with, latus, the side). That which is by the side, and not the direct line. That which is additional to or beyond a thing.

COLLATERAL ANCESTORS. Sometimes used to designate uncles and aunts and other collateral ancestors of the person spoken of, who are in fact not his ancestors. 3 Barb. Ch. 446.

COLLATERAL ASSURANCE. That which is made over and above the deed itself.

COLLATERAL CONSANGUINITY. That relationship which subsists between persons who have the same ancestors but not the same descendants,—who do not descend one from the other. 2 Bla. Com. 203.

The essential fact of consanguinity (common ancestral blood) is the same in lineal and collateral consanguinity; but the relationship is aside from the direct line. Thus, father, son, and grandson are lineally related; uncle and nephew, collaterally.

COLLATERAL ESTOPPEL. The collateral determination of a question by a court having general jurisdiction of the subject. See 26 Vt. 209.

COLLATERAL FACTS. Facts not directly connected with the issue or matter in dispute.

Such facts are inadmissible in evidence; but, as it is frequently difficult to ascertain a priori whether a particular fact offered in evidence will or will not clearly appear to be material in the progress of the cause, in such cases it is usual in practice for the court to give credit to the assertion of the counsel who tenders such evidence, that the facts will turn out to be material. But this is always within the sound discretion of the court. It is the duty of the counsel, however, to offer evidence, if possible, in such order that each part of it will appear to be pertinent and proper at the time it is offered; and it is expedient to do so, as this method tends to the success of a good cause.

When a witness is cross-examined as to collateral facts, the party cross-examining will be bound by the answer; and he cannot, in general, contradict him by another witness; Rosc. Cr. Ev. 139.

COLLATERAL INHERITANCE TAX. A tax levied upon the collateral devolution of property by will or under the intestate law. See Tax.

COLLATERAL ISSUE. An issue taken upon some matter aside from the general issue in the case.

Thus, for example, a plea by the criminal that he is not the person attainted when an interval exists between attainder and execution, a plea in abatement, and other such pleas, each raises a collateral issue. 4 Bla. Com. 358, 396.

COLLATERAL KINSMEN. Those who descend from one and the same common ancestor, but not from one another.

Thus brothers and sisters are collateral to each other; the uncle and the nephew are collateral kinsmen, and cousins are the same. All kinsmen are either lineal or collateral.

COLLATERAL LIMITATION. A limitation in the conveyance of an estate, giving an interest for a specified period, but making the right of enjoyment depend upon some collateral event; as an estate to A till B shall go to Rome. Park, Dow. 163; 4 Kent 128; 1 Washb. R. P. 215.

COLLATERAL SECURITY. A separate obligation attached to another contract to guaranty its performance. The transfer of property or of other contracts to insure the performance of a principal engagement. See 38 Ga. 292; 9 Ia. 331.

The property or securities thus conveyed are also called collateral securities; 1 Pow. Mortg. 303; 2 id. 666, n. 871; 3 id. 944, 1001; 10 Watts 270. See PLEDGE; CHATTEL MORTGAGE.

COLLATERAL UNDERTAKING. A contract based upon a pre-existing debt, or other liability, and including a promise to pay, made by a third person, having immediate respect to and founded upon such debt or liability, without any new consideration moving to him. 7 Har. & J. 391.

COLLATERAL WARRANTY. Warranty as to an estate made by one who was ancestor to the heir thereof, either actually or by implication of law, in respect to other property, but who could not have been so in respect to the estate in question.

Warranty made where the heir's title to the land neither was nor could have been derived from the warranting ancestor. Termes de la Ley.

Collateral warranty is spoken of as "a mode of common assurance." The statute of Gloucester being silent as to a collateral warranty, a warranty of a collateral ancestor, whose heir the issue in tail might be descending upon the latter, would bind him without assets by force of the common law. Therefore, by getting a collateral relation, whose heir the issue in tail was to be, to concur in the alienation and bind himself and his heirs to warranty, the statute De Donis was successfully evaded.

Thus, if a tenant in tail should discontinue the tail, have issue and die, and the uncle of the issue should release to the discontinuee and die without issue, this is a collateral warranty to the issue in tail. Littleton § 709. The tenant in tail having discontinued as to his issue before his birth, the heir in tail was driven to his action to regain possession upon the death of his ancestor tenant in tail; and in this action the collateral warranty came in as an estoppel. 2 Washb. R. P. 670.

The heir was barred from ever claiming the land, and, in case he had assets from the warranting ancestor, was obliged to give the warrantee other lands in case of an eviction. 4 Cruise, Dig. 436.

By the statute of Gloucester, 6 Edw. I. c. 3, tenant by the curtesy was restrained from making such warranty as should bind the heir. By a favorable construction of the statute De Donis, and by the statute 3 & 4 Will. IV. c. 74, tenants in tail were deprived of the power of making collateral warranty. By statute 11 Hen. VII. c. 20, warranty by a tenant in dower, with or without the assent of her subsequent husband, was prevented; and finally the statute

4 & 5 Anne, c. 16, declares all warranties by a tenant for life void against the heir, unless such ancestor has an estate of inheritance in possession. See Co. Litt. 373, Butler's note [328]; Stearns, R. Act. 135, 372.

It is doubtful if the doctrine has ever prevailed to a great extent in the United States, and the statute of Anne has not been generally adopted in the American statute law, although re-enacted in New York; 4 Kent *469; and in New Jersey; 3 Halst. 106. It has been adopted and is in force in Rhode Island; 1 Sumn. 235; and in Delaware; 1 Harr. 50. In Kentucky and Virginia, it seems that collateral warranty binds the heir to the extent of assets descended; 1 Dana 59. In Pennsylvania, the statute of Gloucester is in force, but the statute of Anne is not, and a collateral warranty of the ancestor, with sufficient real assets descending to the heirs, bars them from recovering the lands warranted; 104 Pa. 575. See 2 Bla. Com. 301; 2 Washb. R. P. 668. If the learning of collateral warranty has been called difficult, it is simply because the law of warranty came to be turned from the purpose of its introduction,—that of protection and defence,—and fashioned into a remedy to meet an entirely different purpose. Later, collateral warranty ceased to be used for the purpose of barring estates tail, and its use could never have been universal. Rawle, Cov. for Title, secs. 8, 9. See Litt. § 709; 12 Mod. 513; Year Book 12; Edw. IV. 19; Tudor, Lead. Cas. R. P. 695; Pig. Recov. 9.

COLLATERALES ET SOCII. The former title of masters in chancery.

COLLATIO BONORUM. A collation of goods.

COLLATION. In Civil Law. The supposed or real return to the mass of the succession, which an heir makes of the property he received in advance of his share or otherwise, in order that such property may be divided together with the other effects of the succession. See 9 La. Ann. 96; 4 Mart. U. S. 557.

As the object of collation is to equalize the heirs, it follows that those things are excluded from collation which the heir acquired by an onerous title from the ancestor; that is, where he gave a valuable consideration for them. And, upon the same principle, if a co-heir claims no share of the estate, he is not bound to collate. Qui non vult hereditatem non cogitur ad collationem. It corresponds to the common law hotchpot; 1 Sumn. 421; 2 Bla. Com. 517.

In Ecclesiastical Law. The act by which the bishop who has the bestowing of a benefice gives it to an incumbent.

Where the ordinary and patron were the same person, presentation and institution to a benefice became one and the same act; and this was called collation. Collation rendered the living full except as against the king; 1 Bla. Com. 391. An advowson under such circumstances is termed collative; 2 Bla. Com. 22.

In Practice. The comparison of a copy with its original, in order to ascertain its correctness and conformity. The report of the officer who made the comparison is also called a collation.

COLLECTOR. One appointed to receive taxes or other impositions: as, collector of taxes, collector of militia fines, etc. A person appointed by a private person to collect the credits due him.

COLLECTOR OF THE CUSTOMS. An officer of the United States, appointed for the term of four years. Rev. Stat. U. S. § 2613. His general duties are defined in § 2621.

COLLEGA. In Civil Law. One invested with joint authority. A colleague; an associate. Black, L. Dict.

COLLEGE. An organized collection or assemblage of persons. A civil corporation, society, or company, having, in general, some literary object.

The assemblage of the cardinals at Rome is called a college. The body of presidential electors is called the electoral college, although the whole body never come together.

COLLEGIUM (Lat. colligere, to collect). In Civil Law. A society or assemblage of those of the same rank or honor. An army. A company, in popular phrase. The whole order of bishops. Du Cange.

Collegium illicitum. One which abused its right, or assembled for any other purpose than that expressed in its charter.

Collegium licitum. An assemblage or society of men united for some useful purpose or business, with power to act like a single individual.

All collegia were illicita which were not ordained by a decree of the senate or of the emperor; 2 Kent 269.

COLLIERY or COALERY. A coal mine, coal pit, or place where coals are dug, with the engines and machinery used in discharging the water and raising the coal. Webster.

Colliery is a collective compound including many things, and is not limited to the lease and fixtures of a tunnel, drift, shaft, slope, or vein from which the coal is mined; 58 Pa. 85.

COLLISION. In Maritime Law. The act of ships or vessels striking together, or of one vessel running against or foul of another.

It may happen without fault, no blame being imputable to those in charge of either vessel. In such case, in the English, American, and French courts, each party must bear his own loss; Pardessus, Droit Comm. p. 4, t. 2, c. 2, § 4; 14 How. 352; 1 Pars. Sh. & Adm. 525.

A collision by inevitable accident is when a collision is caused exclusively by natural causes, without any fault on the part of the owners or those in charge; 23 Wall. 169; 3 Cliff. 456; 12 Ct. Cl. 480. It must appear that neither vessel was in fault; 3 Cliff. 633. Where the captain and crew, except the second mate, were taken sick, and a collision occurred, through the absence of a lookout, it was held to be inevitable accident; 8 Reporter 389. See also 7 Biss. 249.

It may happen by mutual fault, that is, by the misconduct, fault, or negligence of those in charge of both vessels; 49 Fed. Rep. 475; 50 id. 581, 590; 53 id. 286; 9 C. C. A. 73. In such case, neither party has relief at common law; 3 Kent 231; 3 C. & P. 528; 21 Wend. 188, 615; 6 Hill 592; 12 Metc. 415; 26 Me. 89; (though now otherwise in England by the Judicature Act 1873;) but the maritime courts aggregate the damages to both vessels and their cargoes, and then divide the same equally between the two vessels; 3 Kent 232; 1 Conkl. Adm. 374-376; 17 How. 170; 23 Wall. 84; 3 Ben. 371; 49 Fed. Rep. 765; 1 C. C. A. 224; 49 Fed. Rep. 169; 51 id. 766; 56 id. 271; 122 U. S. 97. See 1 Swab, 60-101. But where the collision is by intentional wrong of both parties, the libel will be dismissed; 4 Blatch. 124.

It may happen by inscrutable fault, that is, by the fault of those in charge of one or both vessels and yet under such circumstances that it is impossible to determine who is in fault. In such case the American courts of admiralty and the European maritime courts adopt the rule of an equal division of the aggregate damage; 1 Abb. N. S. 451; Daveis 365; Flanders, Mar. Law, 296. But the English courts have refused a remedy in admiralty; 2 Hagg. Adm. 145; 6 Thornt. 240; and see 2 Hugh. 128.

It may happen by the fault of those belonging to one of the colliding vessels, without any fault being imputable to the other vessel. In such case the owners of the vessel in fault must bear the damage which their own vessel has sustained, and are liable as well as their master to a claim for compensation from the owners of the other vessel for the damage done to her; 1 Swab. 23, 173, 200, 211; 3 W. Rob. 283; 1 Blatchf. 211; 2 Wall. Jr. 52; 1 How. 28; 13 id. 101. See 48 Fed. Rep. 334; although wilfully committed by the master; Crabbe 22; 1 Wash. C. C. 13; 3 id. 262. But see 1 W. Rob. 399; 2 id. 502; 1 Hill 343; 19 Wend. 343; 1 East 106; 6 Jur. 443.

Where one vessel, clearly shown to be guilty of a fault adequate in itself to have caused a collision, seeks to impugn the other vessel, there is a presumption in favor of the latter, which can only be rebutted by clear proof of a contributing fault, and this principle is peculiarly applicable to a vessel at anchor, complying with regulations concerning lights and receiving injuries, through the fault of a steamer in motion; 158 U. S. 186. If a cargo be damaged by collision between two vessels, the owner may pursue both vessels or either, or the owners or both, or either; and in case he proceeds against one only, and both are held in fault, he may recover his entire damages of the one sued; 153 U. S. 303.

These four classes of cases are noted in 2 Dods. 85, by Lord Stowell.

Full compensation is, in general, to be made in such cases for the loss and damage which the prosecuting party has sustained by the fault of the party proceeded against; 2 W. Rob. 279; including all damages which are fairly attributable exclusively to the act of the original wrong-doer, or which may be said to be the direct consequence of his wrongful act; 3 W. Rob. 7, 282; 11 M. & W. 228; 1 Swab. 200; 1 Blatchf. 211; 2 Wall. Jr. 52; 1 How. 28; 13 id. 113; 17 id. 170.

The personal liability of the owners is, however, limited in some cases to the value of the vessel and freight (but not by common law, or the earlier civil law, or the earlier general maritime law); Code de Comm. art. 216; Stat. 17 & 18 Vict. c. 104 (Merchants' Shipping Act), pt. 9. § 503; 9 U. S. Stat. L. 635; 10 id. 68, 72, 73; 3 W. Rob. 16, 41, 101; 1 E. L. & Eq. 637; 3 Hagg. Adm. 431; 15 M. & W. 391; 3 Stor. 465; Daveis 172; 2 Am. L. Reg. 157; 13 Wall. 104. See 5 Mich. 368; 53 Fed. Rep. 952. The owner is not liable in respect of the insurance moneys; 8 Ben. 312; 9 Cent. L. J. 285; nor for loss of bounty the vessel might have earned; 3 C. C. A. 534. In maritime law the vessel itself is hypothecated as security for the injury done in such cases; 1 Swab. 1, 3; 22 E. L. & Eq. 63, 72; 14 How. 351; 16 id. 469. In England, the owner's liability is the value of the offending ship in her undamaged state; by the American and continental rule, it is the value of the ship immediately after the collision; 9 Cent. L. J. 285. When an owner has neglected to surrender any part of his vessel, he cannot avail himself of this limited liability; 24 Int. Rev. Rec. 198; nor can he where he has parted with his interest in, or title to, the ship before offering to surrender her; id. 123.

For the prevention of collisions, certain rules have been adopted (see NAVIGATION RULES) which are binding upon vessels approaching each other from the time the necessity for precaution begins, and continue to be applicable, as the vessels advance, so long as the means and opportunity to avoid the danger remain; 21 How. 372. But, whatever may be the rules of navigation in force at the place of collision, it is apparent that they must sometimes yield to extraordinary circumstances, and cannot be regarded as binding in all cases. Thus, if a vessel necessarily goes so near a rock, or the land, that by following the ordinary rules she would inevitably go upon the rock, or get on shore or aground, no rule should prevail over the preservation of property and life; 1 W. Rob. 478, 485; 4 J. B. Moore 314; 123 U. S. 349; 150 id. 674; but obedience to the rules is not a fault, even if a different course would have prevented a collision, and the necessity must be clear and the emergency sudden and alarming before an act of disobedience can be excused; 150 U. S. 674. No vessel should unnecessarily incur the probability of a collision by a pertinacious adherence to the rule of navigation; 1 W. Rob. 471, 478; 2 Wend. 452; and if it was clearly in the power of one of the vessels which came into collision to have avoided all danger by giving way, she will be held bound to do so, notwithstanding the rule of navigation; 6 Thornt. Adm. 600, 607; 3 Cliff. 117. But a vessel is not required to depart from the rule when she cannot do so without danger; 2 Curt. C. C. 363; 18 How. 581.

There must be a lookout properly stationed and kept; and under circumstances of special danger, two; 158 U. S. 186; and the absence of such a lookout is prima facie evidence of negligence; 10 How. 557; 23 id. 448; Daveis 359; 1 C. C. A. 219; 50 Fed. Rep. 585. The rule requiring a lookout admits of no exception on account of size in favor of any craft capable of committing injury; 56 Fed. Rep. 271. The absence of a lookout is not material where the presence of one would not have availed to prevent a collision; 144 U. S. 371. A sailing vessel is entitled to assume that a steam vessel approaching her is being navigated with a proper lookout; 1 C. C. A. 219. By the International Code, rule 8, lights also must be kept; the rule was formerly otherwise in regard to vessels on the high seas; 1 Pars. Sh. & Adm. 549; 2 W. Rob. 4; 2 Wall. Jr. 268. See NAVIGATION RULES; 12 How. 443; 23 id. 287; 1 Blatchf. 236, 370; Stu. Adm. Low. C. 222, 242; 21 Pick. 254; 6 Whart. 324; 1 Thornt. Adm. 592; 2 id. 101; 4 id. 97, 161; 6 id. 176; 7 id. 507; 2 W. Rob. 377; 3 id. 7, 49, 190; 1 Swab. 20, 233; 1 C. C. A. 519; 158 U. S. 186.

The injury to an insured vessel occasioned by a collision is a loss within the ordinary policy of insurance; 4 Ad. & E. 420; 6 N. & M. 713; 14 Pet. 99; 14 How. 352; 8 Cush. 477; but when the collision is occasioned by the fault of the insured vessel, or the fault of both vessels, the insurer is not ordinarily liable for the amount of the injury done to the other vessel which may be decreed against the vessel insured; 4 Ad. & E. 420; 7 E. & B. 172; 40 E. L. & Eq. 54; 11 N. Y. 9; 14 How. 352, and cases cited; but some policies now provide that the insurer shall be liable for such a loss; 40 E. L. & Eq. 54; 7 E. & B. 172.

When the collision was without fault on either side, and occurred in a foreign country, where, in accordance with the local law, the damages were equally divided between the colliding vessels, the amount of the decree against the insured vessel for its share of the damages suffered by the other vessel was held recoverable under the ordinary policy; 14 Pet. 99.

The fact that the libellants in a collision case had received satisfaction from the insurers for the vessel destroyed, furnishes no ground of defence for the respondent; 17 How. 152.

Improper speed on the part of a steamer in a dark night, during thick weather, or in the crowded thoroughfares of commerce, will render such vessel liable for the damages occasioned by a collision; and it is no excuse for such dangerous speed that the steamer carries the mail and is under contract to convey it at a greater average speed than that complained of; 3 Hagg. Adm. 414; 2 W. Rob. 2, 205; 18 How. 89, 223; 21 id. 1; 12 Ct. Cls. 480; 7 Biss. 35; 1 C. C. A. 78; 3 id. 534; 49 Fed. Rep. 169; 54 id. 542; 52 id. 400; 55 id. 117; 153 U. S. 130; 137 id. 330.

As between a steamer and a sailing vessel, the former must keep out of the way of the latter; 14 Blatch. 524; 91 U. S. 200; 144 id. 371; 137 id. 330; 54 Fed. Rep. 411; 59 id. 200; as between a vessel in motion and one at anchor, with proper lights, the former is ordinarily liable for a collision; 3 Cliff. 636; 2 Low. 220; 4 L. & Eq. Rep. 676; 2 Hugh. 17; 18 Alb. L. J. 151. Where a vessel is moored for the night according to custom along a well-known dock and not projecting beyond the wharf, if run into by a steamer in the fog, she is not at fault because she had no lights set and sounded no gongs; 48 Fed. Rep. 323.

A sailing vessel beating in the vicinity of a steam vessel is not obliged to run out her tack, provided her going about is not calculated to mislead or embarrass the steam vessel; 1 C. C. A. 219.

Instances of negligence are to be found in 95 U. S. 600; 98 id. 440; 3 Cliff. 456, 636; 14 Blatch. 37, 254, 480, 524, 531, 545. An inexperienced oarsman is guilty of negligence in attempting to cross the path of a steamboat but a short distance in front of it; 153 Pa. 117.

When a collision is occasioned solely by the error or unskillfulness of a pilot in charge of a vessel under the provisions of a law compelling the master to take such pilot and commit to him the management of his vessel, the pilot is solely responsible for the damage, and neither the master, his vessel, nor her owner is responsible. But the burden of proof is on the vessel to show that the collision is wholly attributable to the fault of the pilot; L. R. 2 Ad. & Ecc. 3; [1892] Prob. 419. The rule in the United States is otherwise; 7 Wall. 53; but in this case the pilotage law was not absolutely compulsory. See PILOTAGE.

A cause of collision, or collision and damage, as it is technically called, is a suit in rem in the admiralty.

In the United States courts it is commenced by the filing of a libel and the arrest of the vessel to the mismanagement or fault of which the injury is imputed. In the English admiralty the suit is commenced by the arrest of the vessel and the filing of a petition. In England, the judge is usually assisted at the hearing of the cause by two of the Masters or Elder Brethren of Trinity House, or other experienced shipmasters, whose opinions upon all questions of professional skill involved in the issue are usually adopted by the court; 1 W. Rob. 471; 2 id. 225; 2 Chit. Genl. Pr. 514.

In the American courts of admiralty, the judge usually decides without the aid or advice of experienced shipmasters acting as assessors or advisers of the court; but the evidence of such shipmasters, as experts, is sometimes received in reference to questions of professional skill or nautical usage. Such evidence is not, however, admissible to establish a usage in direct violation of those general rules of navigation which have been sanctioned and established by repeated decisions; 2 Curt. C. C. 141, 383.

When a party sets up circumstances as the basis of exceptions to the general rules of navigation, he is held to strict proof; 1 W. Rob. 157, 182, 478; 6 Thornt. 607; 5 id. 170; 3 Hagg. Adm. 321; and courts of admiralty lean against such exceptions; 11 N. Y. Leg. Obs. 353, 355. The admissions of a master of one of the colliding vessels subsequently to the collision are admissible in evidence; 5 E. L. & Eq. 556; and the masters and crew are admissible as witnesses; 2 Dods. 83; 2 Hagg. Adm. 145; 3 id. 321, 325; 1 Conkl. 384.

As to the burden of proof in collision cases, see 9 Jur. 282, 670; 2 W. Rob. 30, 244, 504; 12 id. 131, 371; 2 Hagg. Adm. 356; 4 Thornt. Adm. 161, 356; 1 Conkl. 382; 1 How. 28; 18 id. 570; Olc. 132; 55 Fed. Rep. 338; [1892] Prob. 419.

The general rules in regard to costs in collision cases, in the admiralty courts, are that if only one party is to blame, he pays the costs of both; if neither is to blame, and the party prosecuting had apparent cause for proceeding, each party pays his own costs, but in the absence of apparent or probable cause the libel will be dismissed with costs; if both parties are to blame, the costs of both are equally divided, or, more generally, each party is left to pay his own costs. But costs in admiralty are always in the discretion of the court, and will be given or withheld in particular cases without regard to these general rules, if the equity of the case requires a departure from them; 2 W. Rob. 213, 244; 5 Jur. 1067; 2 Conkl. 438.

COLLISTRIGIUM. The pillory.

COLLOCATION. In French Law.

The act by which the creditors of an estate are arranged in the order in which they are to be paid according to law.

The order in which the creditors are placed is also called collocation. 2 Low. C. 9, 139.

COLLOQUIUM. In Pleading. A general averment in an action for slander connecting the whole publication with the previous statement. 1 Stark. Sl. 431; Heard, Lib. & Sl. 228; or stating that the whole publication applies to the plaintiff, and to the extrinsic matters alleged in his declaration. 1 Greenl. Ev. § 417.

An averment that the words were spoken "of or concerning" the plaintiff, where the words are actionable in themselves. 6 Term 162; 16 Pick. 132; Cro. Jac. 674; Heard, Lib. & Sl. § 212; 1 Greenl. Ev. § 417; or where the injurious meaning which the plaintiff assigns to the words results from some extrinsic matter, or of and concerning, or with reference to, such matter. 2 Pick. 328; 16 id. 1; Heard, Lib. & Sl. §§ 212, 217; 11 M. & W. 287.

An averment that the words in question are spoken of or concerning some usage, report, or fact which gives to words otherwise indifferent the peculiar defamatory meaning assigned to them. Shaw, C. J., 16 Pick. 6.

Whenever words have the slanderous meaning alleged, not by their own intrinsic force, but by reason of the existence of some extraneous fact, this fact must be averred in a traversable form, which averment is called the inducement. There must then be a colloquium averring that the slanderous words were spoken of or concerning this fact. Then the word "meaning," or innuendo, is used to connect the matters thus introduced by averments and colloquia with the particular words laid, showing their identity and drawing what is then the legal inference from the whole declaration, that such was, under the circumstances thus set out, the meaning of the words used. Per Shaw, C. J.; 16 Pick. 6. By the Com. L. Proc. Act (1852) in England the colloquium has been rendered unnecessary. See INNUEUDO; Odger, Lib. & Sl.

COLLUSION. An agreement between two or more persons to defraud a person of his rights by the forms of law, or to obtain an object forbidden by law.

Collusion and fraud of every kind vitiate all acts which are infected with them, and render them void. See Shelf. Marr. & Div. 415, 450; 3 Hagg. Eccl. 130, 133; 67 Mich. 547; 87 id. 324; 2 Greenl. Ev. § 51; Bousquet, Dict. Abordage.

In Divorce Law. An agreement between a husband and wife that one of them will commit or appear to commit a breach of matrimonial duties in order that the other may obtain a remedy at law as for a real injury. 2 Wait, Act. & Def. 591; 2 Lev. & Tr. 302; L. R. 1 P. & M. 121. See 86 Mich. 600; 33 Ill. App. 105. Such an agreement is a fraud upon the court where the remedy is sought; 39 Wis. 167; and will bar a divorce; L. R. 1 P. & M. 121; 2 Bish. Mar. Div. & Sep. 251-266.

COLOMBIA. A republic of South America. It has a president elected for six years and a responsible ministry, a senate of 27 members representing the departments, and a house of representatives of 66 members elected by the people. There is a supreme court composed of seven magistrates appointed for life by the executive with the approval of the national council. The republic is divided into nine departments, each with its own judiciary. Colombia, which was formerly subject to Spain, became independent in 1819, and was divided in 1832 into the three republics of Ecuador, Granada, and Venezuela. In 1858 it became a confederation of eight states, which three years later were increased to nine. Subsequently, in 1883, a new constitution was formed and amended in 1886, when the nine states became mere departments, and their presidents were reduced to governors.

COLONIAL LAWS. The laws of a colony.

In the United States the term is used to designate the body of law in force in the colonies of America at the time of the commencement of our independence, which was, in general, the common law of England, with such modifications as the colonial experience had introduced. The colonial law is thus a transition state through which our present law is derived from the English common law.

In England the term colonial law is used with reference to the present colonies of that realm.

COLORADO. One of the United States of America, being the twenty-fifth state admitted into the Union.

The territory of which it is composed was ceded by the treaties with France in 1803, and Mexico in 1848. The enabling act was approved March 3, 1875, and the state was finally admitted August 1, 1876. The Constitution was adopted in Convention March 14, 1876, and ratified July 1, 1876. See CALIFORNIA; LOUISIANA.

THE EXECUTIVE DEPARTMENT consists of a governor, lieutenant-governor, secretary of state, auditor of state, state treasurer, attorney-general, and superintendent of public instructions, each of whom is elected by the qualified electors of the state for a term of two years. The supreme executive power is vested in the governor, who is charged with the duty of seeing that the laws are faithfully executed.

THE LEGISLATIVE DEPARTMENT is vested in a general assembly which is composed of a senate and house of representatives, the members of which are elected by the people, the former for a term of four years, and the latter for two years. The aggregate number of senators and representatives can at no time exceed one hundred. No act of the general assembly can take effect until ninety days after its passage, except in certain emergencies and under certain conditions.

THE JUDICIAL POWER is vested in a supreme court, district courts, county courts and justices of the peace, and such other courts as may be created. The supreme court is composed of three judges, who are elected by the electors of the state for a term of nine years; it has appellate jurisdiction only and general superintending control over all inferior courts. District courts have original jurisdiction of all causes at law and equity, and such appellate jurisdiction as may be conferred by law; the judges of these courts are elected for a term of six years. The county courts, criminal courts and justices of the peace have certain limited jurisdiction.

COLONUS (Lat.). In Civil Law. A freeman of inferior rank, corresponding with the Saxon ceorl and the German rural slaves.

It is thought by Spence not improbable that many of the ceorls were descended from the coloni brought over by the Romans. The names of the coloni and their families were all recorded in the archives of the colony or district. Hence they were called adscriptitii. 1 Spence, Eq. Jur. 51.

COLONY. A union of citizens or subjects who have left their country to people another, and remain subject to the mother-country. 3 Wash. C. C. 287.

The country occupied by the colonists.

A colony differs from a possession or a dependency. See DEPENDENCY.

COLOR. In Pleading. An apparent but legally insufficient ground of action admitted to subsist in the opposite party by the pleading of one of the parties to an action. 3 Bla. Com. 309; 4 B. & C. 547; 1 M. & P. 307. To give color is to give the plaintiff credit for having an apparent or prima facie right of action, independent of the matter introduced to destroy it, in order to introduce new matter in avoidance of the declaration. It was necessary that all pleadings in confession and avoidance should give color. See 3 Bla. Com. 309, n.; 1 Chit. Pl. 531.

Express color is a feigned matter pleaded by the defendant, from which the plaintiff seems to have a good cause, whereas he has in truth only an appearance or color of cause. Bacon, Abr. Trespas, I, 4; 1 Chit. Pl. 530. It was not allowed in the plaintiff to traverse the colorable right thus given; and it thus became necessary to answer the plea on which the defendant intended to rely.

Implied color is that which arises from the nature of the defence; as where the defence consists of matter of law, the facts being admitted but their legal sufficiency denied by matters alleged in the plea. 1 Chit. Pl. 528; Steph. Pl. 206.

By giving color the defendant could remove the decision of the case from before a jury and introduce matter in a special plea, which would otherwise oblige him to plead the general issue; 3 Bla. Com. 309.

The colorable right must be plausible or afford a supposititious right such as might induce an unlearned person to imagine it sufficient, and yet it must be in legal strictness inadequate to defeat the defendant's title as shown in the plea; Comyns, Dig. Pleading; Keilw. 1036; 1 Chit. Pl. 531; 4 Dane, Abr. 553; Archb. Pl. 211.

COLOR OF OFFICE. A pretence of official right to do an act made by one who has no such right. 9 East 364. Such person must be at least a de facto officer; 23 Wend. 606.

An act wrongfully done by an officer, under the pretended authority of his office, and grounded upon corruption, to which the office is a mere shadow of color. 41 N. Y. 464.

COLOR OF TITLE. In Ejectment. An apparent title founded upon a written instrument, such as a deed, levy of execution, decree of court, or the like; 3 Wait, Act. & Def. 17; 35 Ill. 394; 94 Ala. 135. A tax deed, though void for failure to comply with the statutes, affords color of title; 37 Neb. 353; 143 Ill. 265; 3 C. C. A. 294. To give color, the conveyance, etc., must be good in form, and profess to convey the title and be duly executed; 8 Cow. 589; 4 Mart. (N. S.) 224; 47 Fed. Rep. 614; 132 Ind. 546; but a deed to a tenant in possession from one who has no title to the land is insufficient as a basis for adverse possession; 132 N. Y. 73. A conveyance void on its face is not sufficient; 11 How. 424; 21 Tex. 97. An entry is by color of title when it is made under a bona fide and not pretended claim of title existing in another; 3 Watts 72. A quit-claim deed is sufficient color of title to support a plea of title by limitation; 83 Tex. 428. The deed, or color of title, under which a person takes possession of land, serves to define specifically the boundaries of his claims; 10 Pet. 412. When a disseisor enters upon and cultivates part of a tract, he does not thereby hold possession of the whole tract constructively, unless this entry was by color of title by specific boundaries to the whole tract; color of title, is valuable only so far as it indicates the extent of the disseisor's claim; 82 Pa. 99. See 108 Mo. 343; 139 Ill. 21. A person taking lands under a judicial sale, though void, has color of title; 134 Ind. 238; 37 W. Va. 215.

COLORE OFFICII. By color of office.

COLORED MAN. This term generally refers to one of the negro race.

There is no legal technical signification to this phrase which the courts are bound judicially to know; 31 Tex. 74.

COLT. An animal of the horse species, whether male or female, not more than four years old. Russ. & R. 416.

COMBAT. The form of a forcible encounter between two or more persons or bodies of men; an engagement or battle. A duel.

COMBINATION. A union of men for the purpose of violating the law.

This term has become prominent of late in reference to labor troubles. A strike is defined as "a combination among laborers (those employed by others), to compel an increase of wages, a change in the hours of labor, some change in the mode and manner of conducting the business of the principal, or to enforce some particular policy in the character or number of the men employed, or the like." 58 N. Y. 582. Such combinations are illegal at common law; 8 Mod. 10; 10 Cox, C. C. 593; 1 M. & Rob. 179; C. & M. 663; 12 Cox, C. C. 316; Bright. (Pa.) 36; but are not so in the United States, unless the objects of the combination are sought to be effected by unlawful means; 23 Fed. Rep. 554; 24 id. 217; 27 id. 443; 62 id. 803; 63 id. 310; 106 Mass. 1; 57 Vt. 273; 84 Va. 927. See STRIKE; BOYCOTT.

A union of different elements. A patent may be taken out for a new combination of existing machines; 2 Mas. 112.

COMBUSTIO DOMORUM. Arson. 4 Bla. Com. 272.

COMBUSTIO PECUNIÆ. Burning of money; the ancient method of testing mixed and corrupt money paid into the exchequer, by melting it down. Black, L. Dict.

COMES. In Pleading. A word used in a plea or answer which indicates the presence in court of the defendant.

In a plea, the defendant says, "And the said C D, by E F, his attorney, comes, and defends," etc. The word comes, venit, expresses the appearance of the defendant in court. It is taken from the style of the entry of the proceedings on the record, and formed no part of the viva voce pleading. It is, accordingly, not considered as, in strictness, constituting a part of the plea; 1 Chit. Pl. 411; Steph. Pl. 432.

COMES (Lat. comes, a companion). An earl. A companion, attendant, or follower.

By Spelman the word is said to have been first used to denote the companions or attendants of the Roman proconsuls when they went to their provinces. It came to have a very extended application, denoting a title of honor generally, always preserving this generic signification of companion or attendant on, one of superior rank.

Among the Germans the comes accompanied the kings on their journeys made for the purpose of hearing complaints and giving decisions. They acted in the character of assistant judges. Tac, de

Mor. Germ. cap. 11, 12; 1 Spence, Eq. Jur. 66; Spelman, Gloss. Among the Anglo-Saxons, the comites were the great vassals of the king, who attended, as well as those of inferior degree, at the great councils or courts of their kings. The term included also the vassals of those chiefs, 1 Spence, Eq. Jur. 42. Comitatus, county, is derived from comes, the earl or earldorman to whom the government of the district was intrusted. This authority he usually exercised through the vice-comes, or shire reeve (whence our sheriff). The comites of Chester, Durham, and Lancaster maintained an almost royal state and authority; and these counties have obtained the title of palatine: 1 Bla. Com. 116; COUNTY PALATINE. The title of earl or comes has now become a mere shadow, as all the authority is exercised by the sheriff (vice-comes); 1 Bla. Com. 398.

COMITAS (Lat.). Courtesy; comity. An indulgence or favor granted another nation, as a mere matter of indulgence, without any claim of right made.

COMITATUS (Lat. from comes). A county. A shire. The portion of the country under the government of a comes or count. 1 Bla. Com. 116.

An earldom. Earls and counts were originally the same as the comitates. 1 Ld. Raym. 13.

The county court, of great dignity among the Saxons. 1 Spence, Eq. Jur. 42, 66.

The retinue which accompanied a Roman proconsul to his province. Du Cange. A body of followers; a prince's retinue. Spelman, Gloss.

COMITES. Persons who are attached to a public minister. As to their privileges, see 1 Dall. 117; Baldw. 240; AMBASSADOR.

COMITIA (Lat.). The public assemblies of the Roman people at which all the most important business of the state was transacted, including in some cases even the trial of persons charged with the commission of crime. Anthon, Rom. Antiq. 51. The votes of all citizens were equal in the comitiæ. 1 Kent 518.

COMITIA CALATA. A session of the comitia curiata for the purpose of adrogation, the confirmation of wills, and the adoption by an heir of the sacred rites which followed the inheritance.

COMITIA CENTURIATA (called, also, comitia majora). An assemblage of the people voting by centuries. The people acting in this form elected their own officers, and exercised an extensive jurisdiction for the trial of crimes. Anthon, Rom. Antiq. 52.

COMITIA CURIATA. An assemblage of the populus (the original burgesses) by tribes. In these assemblies no one of the plebs could vote. They were held for the purpose of confirming matters acted on by the senate, for electing certain high officers, and for carrying out certain religious observances.

COMITIA TRIBUTA. Assemblies to create certain inferior magistrates, elect priests, make laws, and hold trials. Their power was increased very materially subsequently to their first creation, and the range of subjects acted on became much more extensive than at first. Anthon, Rom. Antiq. 62; 1 Kent 518.

COMITY. Courtesy; a disposition to accommodate.

Courts of justice in one state will, out of comity, enforce the laws of another state, when by such enforcement they will not violate their own laws or inflict an injury on some one of their own citizens: as, for example, the discharge of a debtor under the insolvent laws of one state will be respected in another state, where there is a reciprocity in this respect.

A circuit court should follow the decisions of another circuit court, upholding a patent, except where new evidence of invalidity is introduced and then the investigation should be confined to that; 3 C. C. A. 672; but see 54 Fed. Rep. 169.

COMITY OF NATIONS. The most appropriate phrase to express the true foundation and extent of the obligation of the laws of one nation within the territories of another. It is derived altogether from the voluntary consent of the latter, and it is inadmissible when it is contrary to its known policy, or prejudicial to its interests. In the silence of any positive rule affirming or denying or restraining the operation of foreign laws, courts of justice presume the tacit adoption of them by their own government, unless repugnant to its policy, or prejudicial to its interests. It is not the comity of the courts, but the comity of the nation which is administered and ascertained in the same way and guided by the same reasoning by which all other principles of the municipal law are ascertained and guided. Story, Confl. L. § 38.

COMMANDER-IN-CHIEF. The president is made commander-in-chief of the army and navy of the United States and of the militia when in actual service, by art. ii. § 2 of the constitution. The term implies supreme authority over the army and navy.

COMMANDITE. In French Law. A partnership in which some furnish money, and others furnish their skill and labor in place of capital. A special or limited partnership.

Those who embark capital in such a partnership are bound only to the extent of the capital so invested; Guyot, Rép. Univ.

The business being carried on in the name of some of the partners only, it is said to be just that those who are unknown should lose only the capital which they have invested, from which alone they can receive an advantage. Under the name of limited partnerships, such arrangements are now allowed by many of the states; although no such partnerships are recognized at common law. Troubat, Lim. Partn. cc. 3, 4.

The term includes a partnership containing dormant rather than special partners. Story, Partn. § 109.

COMMENCEMENT OF A DECLARATION. That part of the declaration which follows the venue and precedes the circumstantial statement of the cause of action. It formerly contained a statement of the names of the parties, and the character in which they sue or are sued, if any other than their natural capacity; of the mode in which the defendant had been brought into court, and a brief statement of the form of action. In modern practice, however, in most cases, little else than the names and character of the parties is contained in the commencement.

COMMENDA. In French Law. The delivery of a benefice to one who cannot hold the legal title, to keep and manage it for a time limited and render an account of the proceeds. Guyot, Rép. Univ.

In Mercantile Law. An association in which the management of the property was intrusted to individuals. Troubat, Lim. Partn. c. 3, § 27.

COMMENDAM. In Ecclesiastical Law. The appointment of a suitable clerk to hold a void or vacant benefice or church living until a regular pastor be appointed. Hob. 144; Latch 236.

In Louisiana. A species of limited partnership.

It is formed by a contract, by which one person or partnership agrees to furnish another person or partnership a certain amount, either in property or money, to be employed by the person or partnership to whom it is furnished, in his or their own name or firm, on condition of receiving a share in the profits in the proportion determined by the contract, and of being liable to losses and expenses to the amount furnished, and no more. A similar partnership exists in France. Code de Comm. 26, 33; Sirey, 12, pt. 2, p. 25. He who makes this contract is called, in respect to those to whom he makes the advance of capital, a partner in commendam. La. Civ. Code, art. 2811.

COMMENDATORS. In Ecclesiastical Law. Secular persons upon whom ecclesiastical benefices are bestowed. So called because they are commended and intrusted to their oversight. They are merely trustees.

COMMENDATORY LETTERS. In Ecclesiastical Law. Such as are written by one bishop to another on behalf of any of the clergy or others of his diocese travelling thither, that they may be received among the faithful; or that the clerk may be promoted; or necessities administered to others. Wharton.

COMMENDATUS. In Feudal Law. One who by voluntary homage puts himself under the protection of a superior lord. Cowel; Spelman, Gloss.

COMMERCE. The various agreements which have for their object facilitating the exchange of the products of the earth or the industry of man, with an intent to realize a profit. Pardessus, Dr. Com. n. 1. Any reciprocal agreements between two persons, by which one delivers to the other a thing, which the latter accepts, and for which he pays a consideration: if the consideration be money, it is called a sale; if any other thing than money, it is called exchange or barter. Domat, Dr. Pub. liv. 1, tit. 7, s. 1, n. 2.

Congress has power by the constitution to regulate commerce with foreign nations and among the several states, and with the Indian tribes; 1 Kent 431; Story, Const.

§ 1052; and such power is not restricted by state authority; 125 U. S. 181; but a state statute, which conflicts with the actual exercise of the powers of congress, must give way to the supremacy of the national authority; 124 U. S. 465.

Commerce with foreign countries and among the states, strictly considered, consists in intercourse and traffic, including in these terms navigation and the transportation of persons and property, as well as the purchase, sale, and exchange of commodities; the power conferred upon congress by the above clause is exclusive, so far as it relates to matters within its purview which are national in their character, and admit of a requisite uniformity of regulation affecting all the states. That clause was adopted in order to secure such uniformity against discriminating state legislation.

State legislation is not forbidden in matters either local in their operation, or intended to be mere aids to commerce, for which special regulations can more effectually provide, such as harbors, pilotage, beacons, buoys, and other improvements of harbors, bays, and rivers within a state, if their free navigation be not thereby impaired; congress by its inaction in such matters virtually declares that till it deems best to act they may be controlled by the states; 102 U. S. 691, per Field, J. See also 3 Cliff. 339, for a definition of commerce; Cooley, Const. L. 67.

The powers conferred upon congress to regulate commerce among the several states, are not confined to the instrumentalities of commerce known or in use when the constitution was adopted, but keep pace with the progress of the country, and adapt themselves to new developments of time and circumstances so as to include, for example, telegraph lines; 96 U. S. 1. Congress may, in the exercise of its power, construct or authorize individuals or corporations to construct railroads across the states and territories of the United States; 127 U. S. 1.

The fact that congress has not legislated in regard to such commerce does not make it lawful for the states to do so. Such inaction shows only that no restrictions are to be put upon commerce in that direction. The right to legislate is exclusively vested in congress; 92 U. S. 259; 91 id. 275; 135 id. 100; 122 id. 326; 120 id. 489. But in another case it was held, that, while action by congress prescribing regulations is exclusive of state authority, yet, until action taken by congress, a state may legislate touching the rights, duties, and liabilities of citizens (if not directed against commerce or any of its regulations), notwithstanding such legislation may indirectly and remotely affect foreign or interstate commerce, for instance, to give a right of action against the owners of a vessel engaged in interstate traffic for the death of a passenger caused by the negligence of those in charge of the vessel; 93 U. S. 99; 121 id. 444.

merce, and that which is a mere police regulation, is sometimes exceedingly dim and shadowy, and it is not to be wondered at that learned jurists differ when endeavoring to classify the cases which arise. It is not doubted that congress has the power to go beyond the general regulations of commerce which it is accustomed to establish, and to descend to the most minute directions, if it shall be deemed advisable; and that, to whatever extent ground shall be covered by those directions, the exercise of state power is excluded. Congress may establish police regulations, as well as the states; confining their operations to the subjects over which it is given control by the constitution. But as the general police power can better be exercised under the supervision of the local authorities, and mischiefs are not likely to spring therefrom so long as the power to arrest collision resides in the national courts, the regulations which are made by congress do not often exclude the establishment of others by the state covering very many particulars. Moreover, the regulations of commerce are usually, and in some cases must be, general and uniform for the whole country; while in some localities, state and local policy will demand peculiar regulations with reference to special and peculiar circumstances." Cooley Const. Lim. 731. See 120 U. S. 489; 123 id. 326.

The commercial clause of the constitution includes authority to regulate navigation in aid of commerce and to make improvements in navigable waters, such as building a lighthouse in the bed of a stream or requiring navigators of a stream to follow a prescribed course, or directing the water of a navigable stream from one channel to another; 93 U. S. 4. See also 1 Dill. 469. It renders invalid a state statute regulating the arrival of passengers from a foreign port with a view practically to exclude Chinese emigration to the United States, and not merely to exclude pauper or convict emigrants from the state; 92 U. S. 275. See also 3 Sawy. 144. But it does not where the detention is for the purpose of disinfection by order of a state Board of Health; 12 Wheat. 419; 57 Fed. Rep. 276. It invalidates a state statute which requires the payment of a license tax by commercial travellers selling goods manufactured in other states, but not by those selling goods manufactured in the state itself; 153 U. S. 289; 103 id. 344; 91 id. 275; 128 id. 129; 120 id. 489; 136 id. 104; 44 La. Ann. 356; 70 Miss. 558; 91 Tenn. 669, (but not when the same tax is levied upon peddlers selling goods made in or out of the state; 100 U. S. 676; 156 id. 296; and see 102 id. 123). So of an act requiring importers of foreign goods to take out a license, in the exercise of a power of taxation; 12 Wheat. 419; 136 U. S. 114; and a state law which requires a party to take out a license for carrying on interstate commerce is unconstitutional and void; 141 U. S. 47. Also a city ordinance of Baltimore laying wharf fees upon vessels laden with the products of other states, which are not exacted from vessels laden with Maryland products; 100 U. S. 434. Also a state statute imposing a burdensome condition upon a shipmaster as a prerequisite for landing his passengers, with the alternative of the payment of a small sum for each of them; 92 U. S. 259. Also a state tonnage tax on foreign vessels, 20 Wall. 577, levied to defray quarantine expenses; 19 Wall. 581; but this does not extend to a tax for city purposes levied upon a vessel owned by a resident of the city, which is not imposed for the privilege of trading; 6 Biss. 505; 99 U. S. 273. It invalidates a state law granting a telegraph company exclusive right to maintain telegraph lines in such state, as contrary to the act of July 24, 1866, which practically forbids a state to exclude from its borders a telegraph company building its lines in pursuance of this act of congress; 96 U. S. 1; also an attempt to regulate transmission of telegraphic messages unto other states and their delivery; 122 U. S. 347; as telegraphic communications carried on between different states are interstate commerce; 127 U. S. 640; also one providing for inspection of sea-going vessels arriving at a port, and of damaged goods found thereon, by a state officer, with a view to furnishing official evidence to the parties immediately concerned, and when goods are damaged, to provide for their sale; 94 U. S. 246; also a state law which requires those engaged in the transportation of passengers among the states upon vessels within the state to give all persons travelling among the states equal rights and privileges in all parts of the vessels without distinction on account of race or color; 95 U. S. 485; (but not one which only applies to passengers carried within the state; 133 U. S. 587; also a state law laying a tax on foreign corporations engaged in carrying passengers or merchandise upon their gross receipts outside of the state; 15 Wall. 284; 7 Biss. 227; also a law of Missouri prohibiting the driving of cattle from Texas and other states into Missouri, during certain months; 95 U. S. 465.

A state law, requiring the master of every vessel in the foreign trade to pay a certain sum to a state officer for every passenger brought from a foreign country into the state, is void as infringing this provision of the constitution; 7 How. 283. No state can grant an exclusive monopoly for the navigation of any portion of the waters within its limits upon which commerce is carried on under coasting licenses granted under the authority of congress; Gibbons v. Ogden, 9 Wheat. 1; the rights here in controversy were the exclusive right to navigate the Hudson river with steam vessels. See also, on this point, 3 Wall. 713; 10 id. 657; 65 Pa. 399; s. c. 3 Am. Rep. 636. But a state law granting to an individual an exclusive right to navigate the upper waters of a stream which is wholly within the limits of a state, separated from tide waters by falls impassable for purposes of navigation, and not forming a part of a continuous track of navigation between two or more states, or with a foreign country, is not invalid; 14 How. 568; and see 8 Bush 447. Interstate commerce by sea is of a national character and within the exclusive power of congress; 122 U. S. 326; and is commerce among the states even as to that part of the voyage within the state; 118 U. S. 557.

The state may authorize the building of bridges over navigable waters, notwithstanding the fact that they may, to some extent, interfere with the navigation of the stream. If the stream is one over which the regulation of congress extends, the question arises whether the bridge will interfere with navigation or not; it is not necessarily unlawful if properly built, and if the general traffic of the country will be benefited rather than injured by its construction. There are many cases in which a bridge may be vastly more important than the navigation of the stream which it crosses. It may be said that a state may authorize such constructions, provided they do not constitute a material obstruction to navigation; and each case depends upon its own particular facts. The decision of the state legislature is not conclusive; the final decision rests with the federal courts, who may cause the structure to be abated if it be found to obstruct unnecessarily the traffic on the stream. Those who build the bridge must show the state authority that the construction of the bridge is proper, and that it benefits more than it impedes the general commerce; Cooley, Const. Lim. 738, 739, 740; the Wheeling Bridge Case, 13 How. 518; see also 6 McLean 72, 209, 237; 5 Ind. 13; 50 Fed. Rep. 16; 83 Me. 419; 153 U. S. 525; 154 id. 204. See BRIDGE.

The states may establish ferries; 1 Black 603; 41 Miss. 27; 11 Mich. 43; and dams; 2 Pet. 245; 42 Pa. 219; 28 Ind. 257; 1 Biss. 546; 108 Mo. 550.

The state has also the power to regulate the speed and general conduct of vessels navigating its waters, provided such regulations do not conflict with regulations prescribed by congress for foreign commerce, or commerce among the states; Cooley, Const. Lim. 740; 1 Hill 467, 470. It may also provide that a railroad is liable for damage from fire; 38 S. C. 103.

Thus the commercial power of congress is exclusive of state authority only where the subjects upon which it is exerted are national in their character and admit and require uniformity of regulations affecting alike all the states, and when the subjects within that power are local in their nature or operation, or constitute mere aids to commerce, the states may provide for their regulation until congress intervenes; 50 Fed. Rep. 16; 113 U. S. 205.

The constitutional provision does not apply to regulations as to life-preservers, boiler inspections, etc., on steamboats which confine their business to ports wholly within a state; 6 Ben. 42; nor to any commerce entirely within a state; 10 Wall.

557; 145 U. S. 192; 133 id. 587; nor to a condition in a railroad charter granted by a state that the company shall pay a part of its earnings to the state, from time to time, as a bonus; 21 Wall. 456; nor to a state law prescribing regulations for warehouses, carrying on business within the state exclusively, notwithstanding they are used as instruments of interstate traffic; 94 U. S. 113; nor to a law of Virginia by which only such persons as are not citizens of that state are prohibited from planting oysters in a soil covered by her tide-waters. Subject to the paramount right of navigation, each state owns the beds of all tide-waters within its jurisdiction, and may appropriate them to be used by its own citizens; 94 U. S. 291. It does not forbid a state from enacting, as a police regulation, a law prohibiting the manufacture and sale of intoxicating liquors; 97 U. S. 25; nor the sale of oleomargarine brought from another state; 148 Pa. 559; 156 id. 201; 156 Mass. 236; but the right of importation of intoxicating liquors from one state to another includes the right of sale in the original packages at the place where the importation terminates; 135 U. S. 100; 135 id. 161; nor a state act prescribing maximum rates of transportation within the state; 94 U. S. 155; and see id. 164; Cooley, Const. L. 75. Nor is a city ordinance, exacting a license fee, for the maintenance of its office in the city, from an express company doing business beyond the limits of a state, invalid; 16 Wall. 479; nor does it apply to a tax on telegraph poles erected with a city; 148 U. S. 92; 67 Hun 21; nor to a statute requiring locomotive engineers to be licensed after examination, it being a valid exercise of the police power; 124 U. S. 465; see 128 id. 96. See INTERSTATE COMMERCE COMMISSION.

COMMERCIA BELLI. Compacts entered into by belligerent nations to secure a temporary and limited peace. 1 Kent 159.

Contracts made between citizens of hostile nations in time of war. 1 Kent 104.

COMMERCIAL AGENCY. A person, firm, or corporation engaged in the business of collecting information as to the financial standing, ability, and credit of persons engaged in business and reporting the same to subscribers or to customers applying and paying therefor. "They have become vast and extensive factors in modern commercial transactions for furnishing information to retail jobbers as well as to wholesale merchants. The courts are bound to know judicially that no vendor of goods at wholesale can be regarded as a prudent business man if he sells to a retail dealer, upon a credit, without first informing himself through these mediums of information of the financial standing of the customer, and the credit to which he is fairly entitled;" 1 Ind. App. 573; s. c. 28 N. E. Rep. 103. See also 83 N. Y. 31; 20 Mo. App. 661.

How far the agency may contract against its own negligence. An exception is made to some extent in favor of such agencies to the rule against stipulations by a person against liability for his own negligence. The agency usually contracts that their agents shall be considered as the agents of their patrons, and that they shall not be liable for the negligence of their agents. Where in an action upon such a contract the plaintiff contended that under it the agency was protected only against gross and not against ordinary negligence, the court thought otherwise, and on motion to take off a non-suit said:—

"By the contract the plaintiffs expressly agreed to take such loss upon themselves. The authorities to which we have been referred have, in our judgment, no application to the case. Common carriers, innkeepers, and others, engaged in the exercise of a public calling, cannot thus protect themselves against the consequences of gross negligence in the agents whom they employ. This limitation of the right to contract, as parties may choose, is an exception from the general rule and confined to the class of cases named, when the public interests are supposed to demand its application. It has no place here. The contract which these parties entered into must be enforced as they made it. It may have been unwise, but with that we have nothing to do. One or the other must bear the risk involved in depending upon agents scattered over the country, of whom neither could know much. The plaintiffs agreed to bear it and they must take the consequence;" 7 W. N. C. Pa. 246.

Under a contract that the actual verity or correctness of the information was in no manner guaranteed, the agency was not liable for loss occasioned to a subscriber by the wilful and fraudulent act of a sub-agent in furnishing false information; 58 Fed. Rep. 174, reversing 51 id. 160. Where the inquiry was made concerning a grocer and the agency reported concerning the wrong person, who had the same name and was a grocer and saloon keeper, the plaintiff could not recover from the agency the value of goods sold on the strength of the report, the evidence being held to show that there was not such gross negligence as would render the agency liable; 70 Hun 334; but such a contract does not protect the agency from an error made in the publication of its books of reference giving the financial responsibility of merchants and others, and upon which a subscriber of the agency relied in selling goods and suffered a loss, and in such case it is unnecessary to thus establish the insolvency of the purchaser by suit before suing the agency; 134 Pa. 161.

When reports are privileged and when libellous. Such an agency is a lawful business and beneficial when lawfully conducted, but not exempt from liability for false and defamatory publications when other citizens would not be exempt. Its communications to a person interested in the information are privileged even if false, if made in good faith and without malice, but if communicated to its subscribers generally they are not privileged; 72 Tex. 15; 116 N. Y. 211; id. 217; 81 Mich. 280; 116 Mo. 226; 48 Wis. 348; 18 Fed. Rep. 214; 4 McCrary 160; 77 Ga. 172; 8 Phila. 617. See also 3 Montreal, Q. B. 83; 5 id. 42; 18 Can. S. C. 222. The contract of the agency to furnish information to all its subscribers, including those who have no special interest in it, is no defence to an action for libel; 49 N. Y. 417; nor was the fact that the information was given by printed signs of which each subscriber had the key; 46 N. Y. 188; the matter is privileged if communicated to the proper person by a clerk or agent as well as by the proprietor of the agency; 49 N. Y. 417; 12 Fed. Rep. 526; (but see 5 Blatchf. 497 and s. c. 10 Wall. 427, criticised in the two cases just cited;) or if specially reported upon proper occasion to subscribers having special interest in them, though not applied for by such subscribers; 22 Fed. Rep. 771; but if a subscriber apply for special information from the agency, a false denunciation of the person inquired about, coupled with the report, is actionable; 22 S. W. Rep. (Tex.) 868. So also are statements at first privileged but repeated and persisted in when known to be false, or, if otherwise privileged, made maliciously; 12 Fed. Rep. 526; or if made recklessly and without due care and caution in making inquiry; 22 Fed. Rep. 771; 72 Tex. 115; 40 Minn. 475.

The publication and circulation to subscribers in daily reports of the execution of a chattel mortgage was not libellous; 57 Md. 38; contra, 49 N. Y. 417; nor was the mere publication of a notice of foreclosure sale under a mortgage; 1 Mo. App. 4; nor of a copy of a judgment, with a note that the judgment was paid the same day; 8 Ir. Rep. 349; but in a similar case when the judgment was so paid, but it was not so stated, the publication was held libellous; 16 Ir. Rep. C. L. 298; and so also is a false publication of a trader that a judgment had been rendered; 22 Q. B. 134. And where the action was for publishing that a judgment had been rendered when only a verdict had been returned, it was held proper to ask a witness to the effect of such statement, whether if he had known the actual fact his conduct would have been the same; 141 Pa. 501.

The burden of proof is upon the agency to show privilege prima facie, and after its character is established the burden is on the plaintiff to show malice; 12 Fed. Rep. 526; 37 N. Y. 477; and it is matter of law for the court to determine whether the matter published is libellous per se; 35 Hun 16.

Blacklisting. An action for libel may be brought by a person whose name is published in a book containing a list of delinquent debtors, printed and distributed to subscribers, manifestly for coercing the payment of claims, who is denied credit because of such publication, or by one to whom a letter is sent in an envelope on which is printed the name of an association and a statement that it is an organization for the purpose of collecting bad debts; 77 Wis. 236; but the publication and circulation by a corporation among its officers and employés, of a list of discharged employés, who are considered incompetent or untrustworthy, is not libellous, and a person whose name is on the list has no action unless he can show that the publication was malicious or known to be false; 73 Tex. 568.

Effect of fraudulent representations by vendee to agency upon vendor who relies upon them. An action for deceit will lie against persons or corporations making false representations of pecuniary responsibility to an agency in order to obtain credit and defraud those who may rely upon the reports; 50 Mo. App. 94; 83 N. Y. 31; 18 Hun 44; in such action the statements falsely made to the agency are admissible, if relied on by the vendee; 1 Ind. App. 573; or if approved by him after being written out by the agency, but not if not known to the vendor until after the sale; 81 Ala. 134; 75 Mich. 188. A contract for the sale of goods to the person making such representations, who proves to be insolvent at the time of making them and of the sale, may be rescinded and possession of the goods recovered; 58 Hun 610; 43 N. Y. 802; 31 Mo. App. 199; 85 Mich. 535; 61 Ia. 667; 77 Tex. 48; but where there were no representations other than those obtained by the agency from the seller, a fraudulent intent on the part of the vendee to use the agency as an instrument of fraud must be clearly shown; 33 Hun 549; 2 Cent. Rep. (Md.) 620; 99 N. Y. Rep. 9; s. c. 2 N. E. Rep. 19; 2 N. E. Rep. (N. Y.) 19. The vendor may show that he refused to make the sale until he received the report of the agency, and the agent may show his business methods; 85 Mich. 535. The right to rescind the sale is not affected by a refusal of the vendee to give further statements of his condition, as the original one is presumed to continue if not recalled by the agency; 36 N. Y. St. Rep. 728; but if the vendee has made subsequent reports showing an impaired responsibility, the vendor must take all the reports into consideration, and not only on the original one; but the vendee is not required to make subsequent reports unless he actually becomes insolvent or knows that he will soon be; 83 Mich. 412; 75 id. 188. Reports made six weeks before the sale may be relied on; 20 Mo. App. 173; but not those made from five to seven months before; 88 Mich. 413; 85 id. 535; 58 Hun 606; 99 N. Y. 353; 49 id. 417.

How affected by the statute of frauds. With respect to the liability of the agency for representations not made in writing when the liability was contested, on the ground that the contract was within the statute of frauds, there is not a satisfactory result to be found in decisions; but it has been held that the action was upon the original contract with the customer, which was by no statute required to be written; U. C. 39 Q. B. 551; (reversed on other points and doubted on this; 1 Ont. App. 153;) and also that the action was sustainable on the original contract to furnish accurate statements, in response to inquiry respecting any persons; 12 Phila. 310.

No remedy in equity against publication. An injunction will not be granted to restrain the agency from the publication of matter injurious to the standing of the plaintiff, there being no jurisdiction in equity unless there is a breach of trust or contract involved; 143 Mass. 295; 9 N. Y. 544.

COMMERCIAL LAW. A phrase employed to denote those branches of the law which relate to the rights of property and relations of persons engaged in commerce.

This term denotes more than the phrase "maritime law," which is sometimes used as synonymous, but which more strictly relates to shipping and its incidents.

As the subjects with which commercial law, even as administered in any one country, has to deal are dispersed throughout the globe, it results that commercial law is less local and more cosmopolitan in its character than any other great branch of municipal law; and the peculiar genius of the common law, in adapting recognized principles of right to new and ever-varying combinations of facts, has here found a field where its excellence has been most clearly shown. The various systems of commercial law have been well contrasted by Leone Levi in his collection entitled "Commercial Law, its Principles and Administration, or the Mercantile Law of Great Britain compared with the Codes and Laws of Commerce of all the Important Mercantile Countries of the Modern World, and with the Institutes of Justinian;" London, 1850-52; a work of great interest both as a contribution to the project of a mercantile code and as a manual of present use.

As to the rule in the Federal Courts, see 16 Pet. 1; id. 511; 107 U. S. 33, where Bradley, J., says, "Where the law has not been settled, it is the right and duty of the Federal Courts to exercise their own judgment, as they also always do in reference to the doctrines of commercial law." See 12 Am. L. Reg. (N. S.) 473; UNITED STATES COURTS.

COMMERCIAL PAPER. Negotiable paper given in due course of business, whether the element of negotiability be given it by the law merchant or by statute. 5 Biss. 113.

COMMERCIAL TRAVELLER. A travelling salesman who simply exhibits samples of goods kept for sale by his principal, and takes orders from purchasers for such goods, which goods are afterwards to be delivered by the principal to the purchasers, and payment for the goods is to be made by the purchaser to the principal on such delivery. 34 Kans. 436; 93 N. C. 511. An order solicited by and given to such salesman does not constitute a sale, either absolute or conditional, of the goods ordered, but is a mere proposal, to be accepted or not, as the principal may see fit; 55 Wis. 515; 88 Ill. 298.

An agent who sells by sample and on credit, and is not intrusted with the possession of the goods to be sold, has no implied authority to receive payment, and payment to him will not discharge the purchaser; 68 Mo. 302; 32 N. J. Law 250; 30 Pa. 513; 24 Mich. 36. See 78 Me. 160; 119 Mass. 140.

COMMISSARIA LEX. A principle of the Roman law relative to the forfeiture of contracts. It is not unusual to restrict a sale upon credit, by a clause in the agreement that if the buyer should fail to make due payment the seller might rescind the sale. In the meantime, however, the property was the buyer's and at his risk. A debtor and his pledgee might also agree that if the debtor did not pay at the day fixed, the pledge should become the absolute property of the creditor. 2 Kent 583. This was abolished by a law of Constantine. Cod. 8. 35. 3.

COMMISSARY. An officer whose principal duties are to supply an army, or some portion thereof, with provisions.

The subsistence department of the army shall consist of one commissary-general of subsistence, with the rank of brigadier-general; two assistant commissaries-general of subsistence, with the rank of lieutenant-colonel of cavalry; eight commissaries of subsistence, with the rank of major of cavalry; and sixteen commissaries of subsistence, with the rank of captain of cavalry. U. S. Rev. Stat. § 1140. Their duties are defined in the following sections.

COMMISSARY COURT. In Scotch Law. A court of general ecclesiastical jurisdiction. It was held before four commissioners, appointed by the crown from among the faculty of advocates.

It had a double jurisdiction: first, that exercised within a certain district; second, another, universal, by which it reviewed the sentences of inferior commissioners, and confirmed the testaments of those dying abroad or dying in the country without having an established domicil. Bell, Dict.

It has been abrogated, its jurisdiction in matters of confirmation being given to the sheriff, and the jurisdiction as to marriage and divorce to the court of session. Paterson, Comp. See 4 Geo. IV. c. 47; 1 Will. IV. c. 69; 6 & 7 Will. IV. c. 41; 13 & 14 Vict. c. 36.

COMMISSION (Lat. commissio; from committere, to intrust to).

An undertaking without reward to do something for another, with respect to a thing bailed. Rutherford, Inst. 105.

A body of persons authorized to act in a certain matter. 5 B. & C. 850.

The act of perpetrating an offence.

An instrument issued by a court of justice, or other competent tribunal, to authorize a person to take depositions, or do any other act by authority of such court or tribunal, is called a commission.

Letters-patent granted by the government, under the public seal, to a person appointed to an office, giving him authority to perform the duties of his office. The commission is not the appointment, but only evidence of it, and, as soon as it is signed and sealed, vests the office in the appointee. 1 Cra. 137; 2 N. & M'C. 357. See 1 Pet. C. C. 194; 2 Sumn. 299; 8 Conn. 109; 1 Pa. 297.

In Common Law. A sum allowed, usually a certain per cent. upon the value of the property involved, as compensation to a servant or agent for services performed. See COMMISSIONS.

COMMISSION MERCHANT. As this term is used, it is synonymous with the legal term "factor," and means one who receives goods, chattels, or merchandise, for sale, exchange, or other disposition, and who is to receive a compensation for his services, to be paid by the owner or derived from the sale of the goods. 50 Ala. 154. See AGENCY; FACTORS.

COMMISSION OF ASSIZE. In English Practice. A commission which formerly issued from the king, appointing certain persons as commissioners or judges of assize to hold the assizes in association with discreet knights during those years in which the justices in eyre did not come.

Other commissions were added to this, which has finally fallen into complete disuse. See COURTS OF ASSIZE AND NISI PRIUS.

COMMISSION OF LUNACY. A writ issued out of chancery, or such court as may have jurisdiction of the case, directed to a proper officer, to inquire whether a person named therein is a lunatic or not. 1 Bouvier, Inst. n. 382.

COMMISSION OF REBELLION. In English Law. A writ formerly issued out of chancery to compel an attendance. It was abolished by the order of August 8, 1841.

COMMISSIONER OF PATENTS. The title given by law to the head of the patent office. Prior to 1836 the business of that office was under the immediate charge of a clerk in the state department, who was generally known as the superintendent of the patent office. He performed substantially the same duties which afterwards devolved upon the commissioner, except that he was not required to decide upon the patentability of any contrivance for which a patent was sought, inasmuch as the system of examinations had not then been introduced and the applicant was permitted to take out his patent at his own risk. See PATENTS; PATENT OFFICE, EXAMINERS IN.

COMMISSIONERS OF BAIL. Officers appointed by some courts to take recognizances of bail in civil cases.

COMMISSIONERS OF DEEDS. Officers appointed by the governors of many of the states, resident in another state or territory, empowered to take acknowledgments, administer oaths, etc., to be used in the state from which they derive their appointment. They have, for the most part, all the powers of a notary public, except that of protesting negotiable paper. Rap. & Lawr. Law Dict.

COMMISSIONERS OF HIGHWAYS. Officers having certain powers and duties concerning the highway, within the limits of their jurisdiction. They are usually three in number. In some of the states they are county officers, and their jurisdiction is coextensive with the county. In others, as in New York, Michigan, Illinois, and Wisconsin, they are town or township officers. They have power to establish, alter, and vacate highways; and it is their duty to cause them to be kept in repair.

COMMISSIONERS OF SEWERS. In English Law. A court of record of special jurisdiction in England.

It is a temporary tribunal, erected by virtue of a commission under the great seal, which formerly was granted pro re nata at the pleasure of the crown, but now at the discretion and nomination of the lord chancellor, lord treasurer, and chief justices, pursuant to the statute of sewers. 23 Hen. VIII. c. 5.

Its jurisdiction is to overlook the repairs of the banks and walls of the sea-coast and navigable rivers and the streams communicating therewith, and is confined to such county or particular district as the commission shall expressly name. The commissioners may take order for the removal of any annoyances or the safeguard and conservation of the sewers within their commission, either according to the laws and customs of Romney Marsh, or otherwise, at their own discretion. They are also to assess and collect taxes for such repairs and for the expenses of the commission. They may proceed with the aid of a jury or upon their own view; 3 Bla. Com. 73, 74; Crabb, Hist. Eng. Law 460.

In American Law. Commissioners have been appointed for the purpose of regulating the flow of water in streams. Their duties are discharged in the different states by county courts, county commissioners, etc.

Municipal officers in many cities having jurisdiction of the construction, maintenance, and regulation of sewers.

COMMISSIONER OF WOODS AND FORESTS. An officer created by act of parliament of 1817, to whom was transferred the jurisdiction of the chief justices of the forest. Inderwick, The King's Peace.

COMMISSIONS. In Practice. Compensation allowed to agents, factors, executors, trustees, receivers, and other persons who manage the affairs of others, in recompense for their services.

The right to such allowance may either be the subject of a special contract, may rest upon an implied contract to pay quantum meruit, or may depend upon statutory provisions; 7 C. & P. 584; 9 id. 559.

The right does not generally accrue till the completion of the services; 4 C. & P. 289; 7 Bingh. 99; and see 10 B. & C. 433; and does not then exist unless proper care, skill, and perfect fidelity have been employed; 3 Campb. 451; 9 Bingh. 287; 12 Pick. 328; 94 Mich. 172; 2 Tex. Civ. App. 267; and the services must not have been illegal nor against public policy; 4 Esp. 179; 3 B. & C. 639; 11 Wheat. 258. See 10 Lawy. Rep. Ann. 103.

A real estate broker solicited the privilege of offering an oil property for sale at a price which was fixed and afterwards reduced, upon express condition that the property if not sold on a given day should be taken off the market, which, as the broker failed to make the sale, was done. Eleven days afterward the owner sold the property to a person with whom the broker had opened negotiations, and it was held that time was of the essence of the contract and that the broker was not entitled to a commission; 172 Pa. 396.

The amount of such commissions is generally a percentage on the sums paid out or received. When there is a usage of trade at the particular place or in the particular business in which the agent is engaged, the amount of commissions allowed to auctioneers, brokers, and factors is regulated by such usage, in the absence of special agreement; 10 B. & C. 438; 1 Pars. Contr. 84, 85; Story, Ag. § 326; where there is no agreement and no custom, the jury may fix the commission as a quantum meruit; 9 C. & P. 620; 43 Miss. 288.

The amount which executors, etc., are to receive is frequently fixed by statute, subject to modification in special cases by the proper tribunal; 12 Barb. 671; Edw. Receiv. 176, 302, 643. In the absence of statutory provision, commissions cannot be allowed to executors for services in partitioning real estate, and allotting and transferring the same; 62 Hun 416. Where the executor has failed to keep accounts and to make investments according to the directions in the will, and by his negligence has involved the estate in litigation, he will not be allowed commissions; 48 N. J. Eq. 559. The entire commissions are not properly exigible before the administration is terminated; 40 La. Ann. 484; 44 id. 871. An executor is not entitled to commissions on his own indebtedness to the estate; 156 Pa. 473. In England, no commissions are allowed to executors or trustees; 1 Vern. Ch. 316; 4 Ves. Ch. 72, n.; 9 Cl. & F. 111; even where he carries on the testator's business by his direction; 6 Beav. 371. See the cases in all the states in 2 Perry, Trusts § 918, note.

In case the factor guaranties the payment of the debt, he is entitled to a larger compensation (called a del credere commission) than is ordinarily given for the transaction of similar business where no such guaranty is made; Paley, Ag. 88.

See AGENCY; AGENTS; EXECUTORS; ADMINISTRATION.

COMMITMENT. In Practice. The warrant or order by which a court or magistrate directs a ministerial officer to take a person to prison.

The act of sending a person to prison by means of such a warrant or order. 9 N. H. 204.

A commitment should be in writing under the hand and seal of the magistrate, and should show his authority and the time and place of making it; 2 R. I. 436; 3 Harr. & M'H. 113; T. U. P. Charlt. 280; 3 Cra. 448. It must be made in the name of the United States or of the commonwealth or people, as required by the constitution of the United States or of the several states.

It should be directed to the keeper of the prison, and not generally to carry the party to prison; 2 Stra. 934; 1 Ld. Raym. 424.

It should describe the prisoner by his name and surname, or the name he gives as his.

It ought to state that the party has been charged on oath; 14 Johns. 371; 3 Cra. 448; but see 2 Va. Cas. 504; 2 Bail. 290; and should mention with convenient certainty the particular crime charged against the prisoner; 3 Cra. 448; 11 St. Tr. 304, 318; Hawk. Pl. Cr. b. 2, c. 16, s. 16; 4 Md. 262; 1 Rob. 744; 5 Ark. 104; 26 Vt. 205. See 17 Wend. 181; 23 id. 638; but a defect in describing the offence is immaterial if it is sufficiently described in the order endorsed on the deposition; 88 Cal. 316. It should point out the place of imprisonment, and not merely direct that the party be taken to prison; 2 Stra. 934; 1 Ld. Raym. 424.

It may be for further examination, or final. If final, the command to the keeper of the prison should be to keep the prisoner "until he shall be discharged by due course of law," when the offence is not bailable; see 3 Conn. 502; 29 E. L. & E. 134; when it is bailable, the gaoler should be directed to keep the prisoner in his "said custody for want of sureties, or until he shall be discharged by due course of law." When the commitment is not final, it is usual to commit the prisoner "for further hearing."

The word commit in a statute has a technical meaning, and a warrant which does not direct an officer to commit a party to prison but only to receive him into custody and safely keep him for further examination, is not a commitment; 23 Ct. Cls. 218.

See, generally, 4 Cra. 129; 2 Yerg. 53; 6 Humphr. 391; 9 N. H. 185; 5 Rich. So. C. 255; 85 Ga. 171.

COMMITTEE. In Legislation. One or more members of a legislative body, to whom is specially referred some matter before that body, in order that they may investigate and examine into it and report to those who delegated this authority to them.

The minority of a committee to which a corporate power has been delegated, cannot bind the majority, or do any valid act, in the absence of any special provision otherwise; 127 U. S. 579.

In Practice. A guardian appointed to take charge of the person or estate of one who has been found to be non compos mentis.

For committee of the person, the next of kin is usually selected; and, in case of the lunacy of a husband or wife, the one who is of sound mind is entitled, unless under very special circumstances, to be the committee of the other; Shelf. Lun. 137, 140. It is the duty of such a person to take care of the lunatic.

For committee of the estate, the heir at law is favored. Relations are preferred to strangers; but the latter may be appointed; Shelf. Lun. 144. It is the duty of such committee to administer the estate faithfully and to account for his administration. He cannot, in general, make contracts in relation to the estate of the lunatic, or bind it, without a special order of the court or authority that appointed him.

COMMITTITUR PIECE. In English Law. An instrument in writing, on paper or parchment, which charges a person already in prison, in execution at the suit of the person who arrested him.

COMMIXTION. In Civil Law. A term used to signify the act by which goods are mixed together.

The matters which are mixed are dry or liquid. In the commixtion of the former, the matter retains its substance and individuality; in the latter, the substance no longer remains distinct. The commixtion of liquid is called confusion (q. v.), and that of solids a mixture. Lec. Elem. du Dr. Rom. §§ 370, 371; Story, Bailm. § 40; 1 Bouvier, Inst. n. 506.

COMMULATE. In Scotch Law. A gratuitous loan for use. Erskine, Inst. b. 3, t. 1, § 20; 1 Bell, Com. 225. The implied contract of the borrower is to return the thing borrowed in the same condition as received.

Judge Story regrets that this term has not been adopted and naturalized, as mandate has been from mandatum. Story, Bailm. § 221. Ayliffe, in his Pandects, has gone further and terms the bailor the commodatant, and the bailee the commodatory, thus avoiding those circumlocutions which, in the common phraseology of our law, have become almost indispensable. Ayliffe, Pand. b. 4, t. 16, p. 517. Brown, in his Civil Law, vol. 1, 352, calls the property loaned "commodated property."

COMMODO. In Spanish Law. A contract by which one person lends gratuitously to another some object not consumable, to be restored to him in kind at a given period.

COMMODATUM. A contract by which one of the parties binds himself to return to the other certain personal chattels which the latter delivers to him to be used by him without reward; loan for use.

COMMON. An incorporeal hereditament, which consists in a profit which one man has in connection with one or more others in the land of another. 12 S. & R. 32; 10 Wend. 647; 16 Johns. 14, 30; 10 Pick. 364; 3 Kent 403.

Common of digging, or common in the soil, is the right to take for one's own use part of the soil or minerals in another's lands; the most usual subjects of the right are sand, gravel, stones and clay. It is of a very similar nature to common of estovers and of turbary. Elton, Com. 109; Black, L. Dict.

Common of estovers is the liberty of taking necessary wood, for the use of furniture of a house or farm, from another man's estate. This right is inseparably attached to the house or farm, and is not apportionable. If, therefore, a farm entitled to estovers be divided by the act of the party among several tenants, neither of them can take estovers, and the right is extinguished; 2 Bla. Com. 34; Plowd. 381; 10 Wend. 639. It is to be distinguished from the right to estovers which a tenant for life has in the estate which he occupies. See ESTOVERS.

Common of pasture is the right of feeding one's beast on another's land. It is either appendant, appurtenant, because of vicinage, or in gross.

Common of piscary is the liberty of fishing in another man's water. 2 Bla. Com. 34. See FISHERY.

Common of shack. The right of persons occupying lands, lying together in the same common field, to turn out their cattle after harvest to feed promiscuously in that field. Whart. Dict.; Steph. Com., 11th ed. 623; 1 B. & Ald. 710.

Common of turbary is the liberty of digging turf in another man's ground. Common of turbary can only be appendant or appurtenant to a house, not to lands, because turves are to be spent in the house; 4 Co. 37; 3 Atk. 189; Noy. 145; 7 East 127.

The taking seaweed from a beach is a commonable right in Rhode Island; 2 Curt. C. C. 571; 1 R. I. 106; 2 id. 218. In Virginia there are statutory provisions concerning the use of all unappropriated lands on the Chesapeake Bay, on the shore of the sea, or of any river or creek, and the bed of any river or creek in the eastern part of the commonwealth, ungranted and used as common; Va. Code, c. 62, § 1.

In most of the cities and towns in the United States, there are considerable tracts of land appropriated to public use. These commons were generally laid out with the cities or towns where they are found, either by the original proprietors or by the early inhabitants.

Where land thus appropriated has been accepted by the public, or where individuals have purchased lots adjoining land so appropriated, under the expectation excited by its proprietors that it should so remain, the proprietors cannot resume their exclusive ownership; 3 Vt. 521; 10 Pick. 310; 4 Day 328; 1 Ired. 144; 7 Watts 394. And see 14 Mass. 440; 2 id. 475; 37 Mich. 291; 2 Pick. 475; 12 S. & R. 32; 6 Vt. 355.

COMMON APPENDANT. Common of pasture appendant is a right annexed to the possession of land, by which the owner thereof is entitled to feed his beasts on the wastes of the manor. It can only be claimed by prescription: so that it cannot be pleaded by way of custom; 1 Rolle, Abr. 396; 6 Coke 59. It is regularly annexed to arable land only, and can only be claimed for such cattle as are necessary to tillage, as horses and oxen to plough the land, and cows and sheep to manure it; 2 Greenl. Cruise, Dig. 4. 5; 10 Wend. 647. Common appendant may by usage be limited to any certain number of cattle; but where there is no such usage, it is restrained to cattle levant and couchant upon the land to which it is appendant; Digb. R. P. 156; 8 Term 396; 2 M. & R. 205; 2 Dane, Abr. 611, § 12. It may be assigned; and by assigning the land to which it is appended, the right passes as a necessary incident to it. It may be apportioned by granting over a parcel of the land to another, either for the whole or a part of the owner's estate; Willes 227; 4 Co. 36; 8 id. 78. It may be extinguished by a release of it to the owner of the land, by a severance of the right of common, by unity of possession of the land, or by the owner of the land, to which the right of common is annexed, becoming the owner of any part of the land subject to the right; 25 Pa. 161; 16 Johns. 14; Cro. Eliz. 592.

Common of estovers or of piscary, which may also be appendant, cannot be apportioned; 8 Co. 78. But see 2 R. I. 218.

COMMON APPURTENANT. Common appurtenant differs from common appendant in the following particulars, viz.: it may be claimed by grant or prescription, whereas common appendant can only arise from prescription; it does not arise from any connection of tenure, nor is it confined to arable land, but may be claimed as annexed to any kind of land; it may be not only for beasts usually commonable, such as horses, oxen, and sheep, but likewise for goats, swine, etc.; it may be severed from the land to which it is appurtenant, it may be commenced by grant; and an uninterrupted usage for twenty years is evidence of a grant. In most other respects commons appendant and appurtenant agree; 2 Greenl. Cruise, Dig. 5; 30 E. L. & Eq. 176; 15 East 108.

COMMON BECAUSE OF VICINAGE. The right which the inhabitants of two or more contiguous townships or vills have of intercommoning with each other. It ought to be claimed by prescription, and can only be used by cattle levant and couchant upon the lands to which the right is annexed; and cannot exist except between adjoining townships, where there is no intermediate land; Co. Litt. 122 a; 4 Co. 38 a; 7 id. 5; 10 Q. B. 581, 589, 604; 19 id. 620; 18 Barb. 523.

COMMON IN GROSS. A right of common which must be claimed by deed or prescription. It has no relation to land, but is annexed to a man's person, and may be for a certain or indefinite number of cattle. It cannot be aliened so as to give the entire right to several persons to be enjoyed by each in severalty. And where it comes to several persons by operation of law, as by descent, it is incapable of division among them, and must be enjoyed jointly. Common appurtenant for a limited number of cattle may be granted over, and by such grant becomes common in gross; Co. Litt. 122 a, 164 a; 5 Taunt. 244; 16 Johns. 30; 2 Bla. Com. 34.

See, generally, Viner, Abr. Common; Bacon, Abr. Common; Comyns, Dig. Common; 2 Bla. Com. 34; 2 Washb. R. P.; Williams, Rights of Common (1880); 61 Mo. 210; 97 Ill. 498; 4 How. 421.

COMMON ASSURANCES. Deeds which make safe or assure to a man the title to his estate, whether they are deeds of conveyance or to charge or discharge.

COMMON BAIL. Fictitious sureties entered in the proper office of the court. See BAIL; ARREST.

COMMON BAR. In Pleading. A plea to compel the plaintiff to assign the particular place where the trespass has been committed. Steph. Pl., And. ed. 351. It is sometimes called a blank bar.

COMMON BARRATRY. See BAR-RATRY.

COMMON BENCH. The ancient name for the court of common pleas. See BENCH; BANCUS COMMUNIS.

COMMON CARRIERS. A common carrier is one whose business, occupation, or regular calling it is to carry chattels for all persons who may choose to employ and remunerate him. 1 Pick. 50; 2 Kelly 353; Schouler, Bailm., 2d ed. § 345; Edw. Bailm. 495; 24 Conn. 479.

The definition includes carriers by land and water. They are, on the one hand, stagecoach and omnibus proprietors, railroad and street railway companies; 36 Neb. 890; truckmen, wagoners, and teamsters, carmen and porters; and express companies, whether such persons undertake to carry goods from one portion of the same town to another, or through the whole extent of the country, or even from one state or kingdom to another. And, on the other hand, this term includes the owners and masters of every kind of vessel or water-craft who set themselves before the public as the carriers of freight of any kind for all who choose to employ them, whether the extent of their navigation be from one continent to another or only in the coasting trade or in river or lake transportation, or whether employed in lading or unlading goods or in ferrying, with whatever mode of motive power they may adopt; Story, Bailm. §§ 494-496; 2 Kent 598, 599; Redf. Railw. § 124; 1 Salk. 249; 2 Ga. 348; 14 Ala. n. s. 261; 129 U. S. 397; 2 Dana 431; 12 Ga. 217; 26 Wend. 153. A pipe line company is a common carrier bound to receive and transport, for all persons alike, all oil intrusted to its care, and is not in any sense an agent for the person who employs it to transfer oil; 172 Pa. 580.

It has been doubted whether carmen; 8 C. & P. 207; and coasters; 6 Cow. 266; were common carriers; but these cases stand alone, and are contradicted by many authorities; 19 Barb. 577; 24 id. 533; 9 Rich. 193. Telegraph or telephone companies are not carriers; 60 Ill. 421; 41 N. Y. 544; 78 Pa. 238; 45 Barb. 274; 58 Ga. 433; 49 Conn. 352; but they are subject to the rules governing common carriers and others engaged in like public employment; 50 Fed. Rep. 677; 154 U. S. 1. See TELEGRAPH COMPANIES; TELEPHONE COMPANIES.

The liability of the owner of a tug-boat to his tow is not that of a common carrier; 77 Pa. 238; 13 Wend. 387; 24 La. Ann. 165; 1 Black 62; 6 Cal. 462.

And although the carrier receives the goods as a forwarder only, yet if his contract is to transport and to deliver them at a specified address, he is liable as a common carrier; 5 Am. Law Reg. n. s. 16; 48 N. H. 339.

Common carriers are responsible for all loss or damage during transportation, from whatever cause, except the act of God or the public enemy; Ang. Carr. 70, § 67; 1 Term 27; 2 Ld. Raym. 909, 918; 1 Salk. 18 and cases cited; 25 E. L. & Eq. 595; 2 Kent 597, 598; 7 Yerg. 340; 3 Munf. 239; 21 Wend. 190; 5 Strobb. 119; Rice 198; 4 Zab. 697; 12 Conn. 410; 4 N. H. 259; 11 Ill. 579; 129 U. S. 397; 15 Minn. 279; 66 Ala. 167; 55 Tex. 323. The act of God is held to extend only to such inevitable accidents as occur without the intervention of man's agency; Wood, Ry. L. 1877; 21 Wend. 192; 4 Dougl. 287; which could not be avoided by the exercise of due skill and care; 2 Watts 114; 10 Wall. 176; but where freight cars are stopped by a flood and the contents stolen, the loss is not due to inevitable accident, act of God, or insurrection; 154 Pa. 342. See ACT OF GOD.

The carrier is not responsible for losses occurring from natural causes, such as frost, fermentation, evaporation, or natural decay of perishable articles, or the natural and necessary wear in the course of transportation, or the shipper's carelessness, provided the carrier exercises all reasonable care to have the loss or deterioration as little as practicable; Bull. N. P. 69; 2 Kent 299, 300; Story, Bailm. § 492 a; 6 Watts 424; Redf. Railw. § 141; 86 Me. 225; 53 Fed. Rep. 936; 21 S. W. Rep. (Tex.) 622; 28 Pac. Rep. (Or.) 894. See 115 Ill. 407; 1 L. R. A. 702.

In every contract for the carriage of goods by sea, unless otherwise expressly stipulated, there is a warranty on the part of the ship-owner that the ship is seaworthy when she begins her voyage, and his undertaking is not discharged because the want of fitness is the result of latent defects; 157 U. S. 124.

Carriers, both by land and water, when they undertake the general business of carrying every kind of goods, are bound to carry for all who offer; and if they refuse, without just excuse, they are liable to an action; 4 B. & Ald. 32; 8 M. & W. 372; 1 Pick. 50; 5 Mo. 36; 15 Conn. 539; 2 Sumn. 221; 6 Railw. Cas. 61; 6 Wend. 335; 19 id. 261; 2 Story 16; 12 Mod. 484; 4 C. B. 555; L. R. 1 C. P. 423; 19 S. C. 353; 6 How. 344; 30 L. J. Q. B. 273. But the business of a common carrier may be restricted within such limits as he may deem expedient, if an individual, or which may be prescribed in its grant of powers, if a corporation, and he is not bound to accept goods out of the line of his usual business. But should the carrier accept goods not within the line of his business, he assumes the liability of a common carrier as to the specific goods accepted; 23 Vt. 186; 14 Pa. 48; 10 N. H. 481; 30 Miss. 231; 4 Exch. 369; 17 Wall. 357; 6 Wend. 335; 26 Vt. 248; Schouler, Bailm., 2d ed. § 372; Redf. Railw. Ca. 116. The carrier may require freight to be paid in advance; but in an action for not carrying, it is only necessary to allege a readiness to pay freight; 8 M. & W. 372; 18 Ill. 488; 14 Ala. n. s. 249. It is not required to prove or allege a tender, if the carrier refuse to accept the goods for transportation. The carrier is entitled to a lien upon the goods for freight; 2 Ld. Raym. 752; and for advances made to other carriers; 6 Humphr. 70; 16 Ill. 408; 16 Johns. 356; 13 B. Monr. 243. The consignor is prima facie liable for freight; but the consignee may be liable when the consignor is his agent, or when the title is in him and he accepts the goods; 3 Bingh. 383; 4 Den. 110; 3 E. D. Sm. 187; Schouler, Bailm., 2d ed. § 535.

Common carriers may qualify their common-law responsibility by special contract; 4 Coke 83; Ang. Carr. § 220; 1 Ventr. 238; Story, Bailm. § 549, and note 5; 17 Wall. 357; 16 Wall. 318; 63 Pa. 14; 4 Ind. App. 326. A carrier cannot exact as a condition precedent that a shipper must sign a contract in writing limiting the common law liability; 48 Kan. 210; 29 S. W. Rep. (Tex.) 565. A contract to qualify the common-law liability may be shown by proving a notice, brought home to and assented to by the owner of the goods or his authorized agent, wherein the carrier stipulates for a qualified liability; 8 M. & W. 243; 6 How. 344; 3 Me. 223; 11 N. Y. 491; 9 Watts 87; 8 Pa. 479; 31 id. 209; 2 Rich. 286; 12 B. Monr. 63; 23 Vt. 186; 4 Har. & J. 317. Or it may be reduced to writing, in the form of a bill of lading. See BILL OF LADING. A contract by carrier limiting his liability for negligence is governed by the lex loci contractus; 143 Pa. 527.

But the carrier cannot contract against his own negligence or the negligence of his employés and agents; 15 Am. Law Reg. N. S. 140; 50 Pa. 313; 1 Fed. Rep. 382; 41 Conn. 333; 17 Wall. 357; 54 Pa. 53; 77 id. 516; 129 U. S. 128, 307; 153 id. 193; L. R. 2 App. Cas. 792; 93 U. S. 174; 95 id. 655; 17 Blatchf. 412; 56 Ala. 303; 86 Ill. 71; 6 Ind. 416; 47 id. 471; 97 Mass. 124; 115 id. 304; 42 Mo. 88.

Railroad companies, steamboats, and all other carriers who allow express companies to carry parcels and packages on their cars, or boats, or other vehicles, are liable as common carriers to the owners of goods for all loss or damage which occurs, without regard to the contract between them and such express carriers; 6 How. 344; 23 Vt. 186. See Wheeler, Carriers 89.

Railways, steamboats, packets, and other common carriers of passengers, although not liable for injuries to their passengers without their fault, are nevertheless responsible for the baggage of such passengers intrusted to their care as common carriers of goods; and such responsibility continues for a reasonable time after the goods have been placed in the warehouse or depot of the carrier, at the place of destination, for delivery to the passenger or his order; 1 C. B. 833; 2 B. & P. 416; 6 Hill 586; 26 Wend. 591; 10 N. H. 481; 7 Rich. 158. See 81 Tex. 479. Where one company checks baggage through a succession of lines owned by different companies, each company becomes responsible for the whole route; 8 N. Y. 37; 2 E. D. Sm. 184. The baggage-check given at the time of receiving such baggage is regarded as prima facie evidence of the liability of the company. It stands in the place of a bill of lading; 7 Rich. 158; Redf.

Railw. § 128. Baggage will not include merchandise; 9 Eng. L. & Eq. 477; 25 Wend. N. Y. 459; 6 Hill, N. Y. 586; 12 Ga. 217; 10 Cush. 506. Jewelry and a watch in a trunk, being female attire, are regarded as proper baggage; 4 Bingh. 218; 3 Pa. 451. See 131 U. S. 440; 148 U. S. 627. But money, except a reasonable amount for expenses, is not properly baggage; 9 Wend. 85; 5 Cush. 69; 9 Humphr. 621; 20 Mo. 513; 15 Ala. 242. See BAGGAGE.

The responsibility of common carriers begins upon the delivery of the goods for immediate transportation. A delivery at the usual place of receiving freight, or to the employés of the company in the usual course of business, is sufficient; 20 Conn. 534; 2 C. & K. 680; 2 M. & S. 172; 16 Barb. 383; Ang. Carr. §§ 129-147; 46 Mo. App. 574; 56 Ark. 279; 52 N. Y. 262; 38 Ill. 354; Edw. Bailm. 528; but where carriers have a warehouse at which they receive goods for transportation, and goods are delivered there not to be forwarded until some event occur, the carriers are, in the mean time, only responsible as depositaries; 24 N. H. 71; and where goods are received as wharfingers, or warehousemen, or forwarders, and not as carriers, liability will be incurred only for ordinary negligence; 7 Cow. 497. Where goods are injured because of insecure packing or boxing, the carrier is not liable; 22 Or. 14; but where it does not appear that they were received as in bad order, or that they were so in fact, the presumption is that they were in good order; 89 Ga. 815. Where there was less than a carload of goods, and there was no agreement on the part of the carrier to transport them in a ventilated car, although it was requested by the carrier that they should be so shipped, it was held that the carrier was not liable for the loss of perishable goods; 173 Pa. 398.

The responsibility of the carrier terminates after the arrival of the goods at their destination and a reasonable time has elapsed for the owner to receive them in business hours. After that, the carrier may put them in a warehouse, and is only responsible for ordinary care; Wood, Ry. L. 1906; 10 Metc. 472; 27 N. H. 86; 2 M. & S. 172; Story, Bailm. § 444. Where goods are delivered to the consignee in violation of instructions not to deliver without a bill of lading, the company is liable to the shipper for loss thereby sustained; 61 Hun 623. In carriage by water, the carrier is, as a general rule; bound to give notice to the consignee of the arrival of the goods; Redf. Railw. § 130; and the delivery of goods from a ship must be according to the custom and usages of the port, and such delivery will discharge the carrier of his responsibility; 154 U. S. 51.

Where goods are so marked as to pass over successive lines of railways, or other transportation having no partnership connection in the business of carrying, the successive carriers are only liable for damage or loss occurring during the time the goods are in their possession for transportation; 48 N. H. 339; 22 Wall. 129; 52 Vt. 335; 23 id. 186;

6 Hill 158; 22 Conn. 502; 1 Gray 502; 4 Am. Law Reg. 234; 36 S. C. 110; 1 Okla. 44. A carrier may stipulate that it shall be released from liability after goods have left its road; 78 Tex. 372; 84 Tex. 352; 41 Ill. App. 607; 5 Tex. Civ. App. 547. The English courts hold the first carrier, who accepts goods marked for a place beyond his route, responsible for the entire route, unless he stipulates expressly for the extent of his own route only; 8 M. & W. 421; 3 E. L. & Eq. 497; 18 id. 553, 557.

Where one of the carriers has contracted clearly and unequivocally to deliver goods at their destination, i. e., to carry them over the whole route, his liability will continue until final delivery; 33 Conn. 178; 68 Pa. 272; 3 Fed. Rep. 768; 51 N. H. 9; 48 id. 339; 96 U. S. 258; 84 Ill. 239. See 9 L. R. A. 833, note; 49 Vt. 255; 127 N. Y. 438; but the carrier upon whose line the damage or loss has occurred will also be liable; 1 Am. Law Reg. o. s. 119; 28 Wis. 209; 32 Vt. 665. Where the connecting carrier refuses or unreasonably delays to accept goods, the original carrier while so holding them is a carrier, and the liability as such continues until they are warehoused; 46 Mo. App. 656.

A contract to transport goods from or to points not on the carrying line, and without the state by which it is incorporated, is held to be good; 2 Am. Law Reg. n. s. 184; 47 Me. 573; 27 Vt. 110; 19 Wend. 534; Redf. Railw. Cases 110; 48 N. H. 339; contra, 24 Conn. 468.

The agents of corporations who are common carriers, such as railway and steamboat companies, will bind their principals to the full extent of the business intrusted to their control, whether they follow their instructions or not; 14 How. 468, 483. See 127 N. Y. 438. Nor will it excuse the company because the servant or agent acted wilfully in disregard of his instructions; 5 Duer, N. Y. 193; Redf. Railw. § 137, and cases cited in notes.

The contracts of common carriers, like all other contracts, are liable to be controlled and qualified by the known usages and customs and course of the business in which they are engaged; and all who do business with them are bound to take notice of such usages and customs as are uniform, of long standing, and generally known and understood by those familiar with such transactions; 25 Wend. 660; 6 Hill 157; 23 Vt. 186, 211, 212; 21 Ga. 526.

The liability of a common carrier may, at common law, be limited by the character of, or defects in, the subject-matter of the contract. The limitation was formerly applied to contracts for the carriage of slaves, and it was held in such cases that a carrier was not an insurer, and was only liable for the want of skill and care; 2 Pet. 150; 4 McCord 223; 4 Port. 234. The carrier of animals is not answerable for the damages caused by the conduct or propensities of the animals themselves; 9 Barb. 145; s. c. 13 Am. L. Reg. n. s. 145 (with note by Mr. Hunter). See 21 Mich. 165; 9 Bush 645; 111 Mass. 142; 8 Ill. App. 160;

75 Ala. 596; 44 Ia. 424; 27 S. W. Rep. (Tex.) 887; 29 id. (Tex.) 1110; but in other respects the liability for injury to live stock is as great as it would be under a contract for the carriage of inanimate objects; 4 Ohio St. 722; 9 Kan. 235; 26 Vt. 248; 52 N. H. 355; 5 Neb. 117; 72 Ill. 504; 4 M. & W. 749; 1 H. & H. 489.

In Michigan, Kentucky, and Tennessee, a railroad company is not at common law a carrier of live stock and may refuse to receive it for transportation; and only becomes liable as a common carrier by assuming to carry it as such; 21 Mich. 165; 25 id. 329; 10 Lea, Tenn. 304; 9 Bush, Ky. 645. Where a mandamus was asked to compel a common carrier to receive live stock for transportation under common-law liability, it was refused by the supreme court of New York; 16 Hun 313. If the carrier accept live stock for transportation, he is bound to exercise at least ordinary care; 38 Ia. 127; 70 Tex. 491; 29 S. W. Rep. (Tex.) 695; 57 Mo. App. 550; 22 S. E. Rep. (Va.) 490; 168 Pa. 209; 28 S. W. Rep. (Tex.) 925; 57 Mo. App. 135. The burden of proof is on carrier to show that loss or injury to live stock resulted from an excepted cause, when shipped under special contract, containing exemptions from liability; 69 Miss. 191.

There has been much legislation on the subject of special contracts for the transportation of live stock, and the courts have construed them with reference to their subject-matter and intrinsic qualities. In most of the states it seems to be settled that a carrier of live stock is liable for all accidents to them except those which arise from the act of God, the public enemy, or the inherent propensities of the animals themselves. See Wheel. Com. Car.

The carrier has an insurable interest in the goods, both in regard to fire and marine disasters, measured by the extent of his liability for loss or damage; 13 Barb. 595.

The carrier is not bound, unless he so stipulate, to deliver goods by a particular time, or to do more than to deliver in a reasonable time under all the circumstances attending the transportation; Story, Bailm. § 545 a; 5 M. & G. 551; 6 McLean 296; 19 Barb. 36; 12 N. Y. 245. See 15 W. R. 792; L. R. 9 C. P. 325; 23 Wis. 138; 41 Ill. 73; 79 Mo. 296. What is a reasonable time is to be decided by the jury, from a consideration of all the circumstances; 7 Rich. 190, 409; 32 L. J. Q. B. 292; 4 B. & S. 66.

But if the carrier contract specially to deliver in a prescribed time, he must perform his contract, or suffer the damages sustained by his failure; 1 Duer, N. Y. 209; 12 N. Y. 99; 2 B. & P. 416; 21 L. J. Q. B. 178; 105 Mass. 437; 83 Mo. 574.

He is liable, upon general principles, where the goods are not delivered through his default, to the extent of their market value at the place of their destination; Ang. Carr. 488, 489; 4 Whart. 204; 11 La. Ann. 324; Sedg. Dam. 356; 2 B. & Ad. 932; 49 Vt. 255; 27 Ill. 148; 55 Mo. 167; 43 Mich. 209. See, also, 12 S. & R. 183; 1 Cal. 108.

If the goods are only damaged, or not delivered in time, the owner is bound to receive them. He will be entitled to damages, but cannot repudiate the goods and recover from the carrier as for a total loss; 5 Rich. 462; 12 N. Y. 509; 35 N. H. 390; 60 N. Y. Super. Ct. 132.

COMMON CARRIERS OF PASSENGERS. Common carriers of passengers are such as undertake for hire to carry all persons indifferently who may apply for passage, so long as there is room, and there is no legal excuse for refusing. Thomps. Carriers of Passengers 26, n. § 1; 11 Allen 304; 19 Wend. 239; 10 N. H. 486; 15 Ill. 472; 2 Sumn. 221; 3 B. & B. 54; 9 Price 408.

A company owning parlor and sleeping cars, who enter into no contract of carriage with the passenger, but only give him superior accommodations during the journey, is not a common carrier; 73 Ill. 360; 62 Fed. Rep. 265. See PARLOR CARS; SLEEPING CARS. A street railway company is a common carrier of passengers and liable as such on common-law principles; 36 Neb. 890. See STREET RAILWAYS.

Common carriers may excuse themselves when there is an unexpected press of travel and all their means are exhausted. But see Redfield, Railw. 344. § 155, and notes, and cases cited; Story, Bailm. § 591; 10 N. H. 486; and they may for good cause exclude a passenger: thus, they are not required to carry drunken and disorderly people, or one affected with a contagious disease, or those who come on board to assault passengers, commit a crime, flee from justice, gamble, or interfere with the proper regulations of the carrier, and disturb the comfort of the passengers; Wood, Ry. L. 1200; 4 Dill. 321; 4 Wall. 605; 15 Gray 20; 11 Allen 304; 57 Ind. 576; 68 id. 316; 76 Pa. 510; 32 Ohio St. 345; or one whose purpose is to injure the carrier's business; 2 Sumn. 221; 11 Blatchf. 233; but if a carrier receives a passenger, knowing that a good cause exists for his exclusion, he cannot afterwards eject him for such cause; 4 Wall. 605; 34 Cal. 616. Where one rightfully on a train as a passenger is put off, it is of itself a good cause of action against the company irrespective of any physical injury that may have resulted; 143 U. S. 60. It is not liable for injuries resulting from one trying to steal a ride on a freight train; 157 Mass. 377.

Passenger-carriers are not held responsible as insurers of the safety of their passengers, as common carriers of goods are. But they are bound to the very highest degree of care and watchfulness in regard to all their appliances for the conduct of their business; so that, as far as human foresight can secure the safety of passengers, there is an unquestionable right to demand it of all who enter upon the business of passenger-carriers; 2 Esp. 533; 17 Ill. 496; 36 Neb. 890; 1 Tex. Civ. App. 642; 145 Ill. 67; L. R. 9 Q. B. 122; 2 Q. B. D. 377; 136 Mass. 321; 102 U. S. 451; 94 Pa. 351.

The carrier is not excused because the passenger does not pay fare; 14 How. 483; or because he is an express messenger and is injured while engaged in his duties as such; 56 Ark. 594; 96 Pa. 256; common carriers must exercise the same degree of care in carrying passengers free, on pass or otherwise, as in carrying them for hire, and cannot in such case exempt themselves from liability for negligence; Ray, Neg. Imp. Dut. 5; 37 Mich. 111; 1 Cal. 348; 40 Barb. 546; 21 Ind. 48; 30 Allen 9; 30 Ill. 9; 24 N. Y. 196; 57 Pa. 335; 39 Ia. 246; 63 Mo. 340; 63 Md. 433; 71 Ind. 271; 22 L. R. When live stock is shipped upon a railroad it is customary to issue to the persons in charge "drover's" passes, which entitle the holder to accompany the stock and return. By the terms of such a pass the carrier may restrict his liability for injury done to the holder, but cannot, by any limitation therein contained, relieve himself from accountability for injury caused by his own or his servants' negligence; 17 Wall. 357; 19 Ohio 1, 221, 260; 51 Pa. 315; 47 Ind. 471; 41 Ala. 486; 39 Ia. 246; 20 Minn. 125; 93 U. S. 291; 26 Gratt. 328; 71 Ind. 271. But contra in case of negligence, in England; L. R. 8 Q. B. 57; 10 id. 212; and in New York; 24 N. Y. 181, 196; 25 id. 442; 32 id. 333; 49 id. 263; 61 Hun 623. Where a train is signalled at a section house, which is not a regular stopping-place, and a person boards it without any one's knowledge, and in doing so is injured, the road is not liable; 68 Miss. 643. The passenger must be ready and willing to pay such fare as is required by the established regulations of the carriers in conformity with law. But an actual tender of fare or passage-money does not seem requisite in order to maintain an action for an absolute refusal to carry, and much less is it necessary in an action for any injury sustained; 6 C. B. 775; Story, Bailm. § 591; 1 East 203; 2 Kent 598, 599, and note. The rule of law is the same in regard to paying fare in advance that it is as to freight, except that, the usage in the former case being to take pay in advance, a passenger is expected to have procured his ticket before he had taken passage; and the law will presume payment according to such usages; 3 Pa. 451. One ceases to be a passenger of a street car the moment he leaves it; 156 Mass. 320.

Passenger-carriers are responsible as common carriers for the baggage or their passengers; 13 Wend. 626; but may limit their common-law liability by express contract, and by specific and reasonable regulations made known to the public, but they cannot relieve themselves from liability from loss occasioned by their own or their servants' negligence; 19 Wend. 234, 251; 2 Ohio 132; 8 Pa. 479; 47 Ind. 471; 41 Ala. 488. See L. R. 10 Q. B. 437. The term baggage includes such articles as the traveller's comfort, convenience, and amusement require. See BAGGAGE. The carrier may make such reasonable regulations as seem to him proper for the checking, custody, and carriage of baggage; 7 Allen 329. And is liable as a carrier until the passenger has had a reasonable time to remove it after its arrival at his destination; 69 Hun 479. But a steamship company is not responsible as a carrier for the baggage retained by a passenger; 2 N. Y. 355; 7 Cush. 155; 32 Wis. 85; 3 H. & C. 137; L. R. 6 C. P. 44; 83 Pa. 446.

Where the servants of common carriers of passengers—as the drivers of stage-coaches, etc., the captains of steamboats, and the conductors of railway trains—are allowed to carry parcels, the carriers are responsible for their safe delivery, although such servants are not required to account for what they receive by way of compensation; 6 Wend. 351; 23 Vt. 186, 203; 2 Story. 16; 2 Kent 609.

In regard to the particulars of the duty of carriers of passengers as to their entire equipment both of machinery and servants, the decisions are very numerous; but they all concur in the result that if there were anything more which could have been done by the carrier to insure the safety of his passengers, and injury occurs in consequence of the omission, he is liable. The consequence of such a rule naturally is, that, after any injury occurs, it is more commonly discovered that it was in some degree owing to some possible omission or neglect on the part of the carrier or his servants, and that he is, therefore, held responsible for the damage sustained; but where the defect was one which no degree of watchfulness in the carrier will enable him to discover, he is clearly not liable; Redf. Railw. § 149, notes; Ang. Carr. § 534; Story, Bailm. §§ 592-596; 2 B. & Ad. 160; 11 Gratt. 697; 1 McLean 540; 13 N. Y. 9; 16 How. 469; 97 Mass. 361; 71 Mo. 113; 102 Pa. 115; 105 id. 460; 11 C. B. N. s. 583. They must also furnish safe and convenient stations and approaches; 26 Ia. 124; 29 Ohio St. 374. And they must absolutely protect passengers against the misconduct of their own servants engaged in executing the contract; 121 U. S. 637; and if an employé is free from liability for injury done a passenger, the carrier is also;

142 U. S. 18. Where one enters a ticket-office to buy a ticket he is entitled to the protection of a passenger, although the agent refuse to sell him a ticket; 89 Va. 639.

The degree of speed allowable upon a railway depends upon the condition of the road; 5 Q. B. 747.

Passenger-carriers are not responsible where the injury resulted directly from the negligence of the passenger; Wood, Railw. L. 1272; 22 Vt. 213; 95 U. S. 439; 23 Pa. 147; Ang. Carr. 556; Redf. Railw. 330, § 150, and cases cited in notes; 3 B. & Ald. 304; 86 Pa. 303; 36 Wis. 92.

It is the duty of a street railway company to stop when a passenger is about to alight and not to start again until he has done so; 147 U. S. 571; but the act of alighting from a moving car is not negligence per se, regardless of attending circumstances; 48 Mo. App. 659; 49 id. 104; 93 Mich. 553; 44 La. Ann. 1059; 44 Ill. App. 56; but see 151 Pa. 562.

Where there is intentional wrong on the part of the defendant, the plaintiff may recover, notwithstanding negligence on his part; 5 Hill 282. So, also, where the plaintiff's negligence contributed but remotely to the injury, and the defendant's culpable want of care was its immediate cause, a recovery may still be had; 43 Mo. 480; 10 M. & W. 564; 5 C. & P. 190; 9 Ex. 91; 51 Ill. 333; 56 Cal. 513; 61 Md. 54. So, also, if the defendant is guilty of such a degree of negligence that the plaintiff could not have escaped its consequences, he may recover, notwithstanding there was want of prudence on his part; 3 M. & W. 244; 18 Ga. 679, 686; 1 Dutch. 556; Redf. Railw. § 150, and cases cited in notes. Passengers leaping from cars or other vehicles, either by land or water, from any just sense of peril, may still recover; 9 La. Ann. 441; 15 Ill. 468; 17 id. 406; 23 Pa. 147, 150; 13 Pet. 181; Redf. Railw. § 151.

Carriers of passengers are bound to carry for the whole route for which they stipulate, and according to their public advertisements and the general usage and custom of their business; Story, Bailm. § 600; 19 Wend. 534; 8 E. L. & Eq. 362. The carrier's liability extends over the entire route for which he has contracted to carry, though the destination is reached over connecting lines; 29 N. H. 49; 4 Cush. 400; 11 Minn. 277; 21 Wis. 582. But the carrier is also liable on whose line the loss or injury is suffered; 22 Conn. 502; 29 Vt. 421; 19 Barb. 222.

Where a passenger is carried some distance beyond his destination, and ejected against his protest, being compelled to walk back to the station, the company is liable for breach of contract; 6 Ind. App. 52. See TICKET.

Passenger-carriers are liable for reasonable damages for a failure to deliver passengers in reasonable time, according to their public announcements; 8 E. L. & Eq. 362; 34 id. 154; 1 Cal. 353; 18 N. Y. 534; 63 Barb. 260; 1 Hurl. & N. 408; L. R. 1 C. P. D. 286.

Passenger-carriers may establish reasonable regulations in regard to the conduct of passengers, and discriminate between those who conform to their rules in regard to obtaining tickets, and those who do not,—requiring more fare of the latter; 18 Ill. 460; 34 N. H. 230; 29 Vt. 160; 7 Metc. 596; 12 id. 483; 4 Zab. 435; 29 E. L. & Eq. 143; Redf. Railw. § 28, and notes; 24 Conn. 249; 4 Ind. App. 413; 134 Ind. 100; but a passenger is not bound to comply with the rules of a company unless they are reasonable; 90 Ga. 562. Passengers may be required to go through in the same train or forfeit the remainder of their tickets; Rav. Neg. Imp. Dut. 522; 11 Metc. 121; 1 Am. Railw. Cas. 601; 72 Pa. 231; 46 N. H. 213; 4 Zab. 438; 11 Ohio St. 462; 84 Tex. 678. The words “good this trip only” upon a ticket will not limit the undertaking of the company to any particular day or any specific train,—they relate to a journey and not to a time; and the ticket is good if used at any time within six years from its date; 24 Barb. 514; 51 Cal. 425. See article in 5 So. L. Rev. N. S. 765; 66 Cal. 191; 89 N. Y. 281; 85 Tex. 153; but a ticket “good for this day only,” or for “only two days after date,” is of no validity after that date though not used; 1 Allen 267; 7 Hun 670. Where a passenger buys a ticket which is silent as to stop-over privileges, he may rely on the statements of the ticket agent on that subject; 143 U. S. 60.

Railway passengers, when required by the regulations of the company to surrender their tickets in exchange for the conductor's checks, are liable to be expelled from the cars for a refusal to comply with such regulation, or to pay fare again; 22 Barb. 130; or for refusal to exhibit his ticket at the request of the conductor in compliance with the standing regulations of the company; 15 N. Y. 455. See TICKETS.

Railway companies may exclude merchandise from their passenger trains. The company is not bound to carry a passenger daily whose trunk or trunks contain merchandise, money, or other things known as “express matter;” 5 Am. Law Reg. 364. See, also, upon the subject of by-laws as to passengers on railways, Redf. Railw. § 28, and notes.

Where a stage-coach is overturned when laden with passengers, it is regarded as prima facie evidence of negligence in the proprietor or his servants; Ray, Neg. Imp. Dut. 25; 13 Pet. 181. Where the driver leaves his horses in the road unfastened, and a passenger is injured by their running away, he is entitled to recover; 66 Tex. 265. And where any injury occurs to a passenger upon a railway, it has been considered prima facie evidence of negligence on the part of the company; 5 Q. B. 747; 8 Pa. 493; 15 Ill. 471; 16 Barb. 113, 356; 20 id. 282.

The general rules above laid down, so far as they are applicable, mutatis mutandis, control the rights and duties of passenger-carriers both by land and water. There are many special regulations, both in regard to the conduct of sailing and steam vessels, which it is the duty of masters to observe in order to secure the safety of passengers, and which it will be culpable negligence to disregard; but they are too minute to be here enumerated. See Ang. Carr. § 633. And a pilot being on board and having the entire control of the vessel will not exonerate the owner from responsibility any more than if the master had charge of the vessel,—the pilot being considered the agent of the owner; 8 Pick. 22; 5 B. & P. 182. But in 1 How. 28 it was considered that the owner is not responsible, while a pilot licensed under the acts of parliament is directing the movements of his ship in the harbor of Liverpool, for an injury to another ship by collision, such being the English law and the collision occurring in British waters; but it was held that the vessel was liable for the negligence of a pilot which it was obliged to take under a state law, or pay full pilotage; 7 Wall. 53. It is otherwise, if the employment of a pilot is compulsory under a law providing that neglect to do so shall be a misdemeanor; 63 Fed. Rep. 845.

COMMON COUNCIL. See COUNCIL.

COMMON COUNTS. Certain general counts, not founded on any special contract, which are introduced in a declaration, for the purpose of preventing a defeat of a just right by an accidental variance in the evidence.

These are, in an action of assumpsit, counts founded on implied promises to pay money in consideration of a precedent debt, and have been variously classified. Those usually comprehended under the term are:—

1. Indebitatus assumpsit, which alleges a debt founded upon one of the several causes of action from which the law implies a promise to pay, and this is made the consideration for the promise to pay a sum of money equivalent to such indebtedness. This covers two distinct classes:—

a. Those termed money counts, because they related exclusively to money transactions as the basis of the debt alleged:

- (1) Money paid for defendant's use.
- (2) Money had and received by defendant for the plaintiff's use.
- (3) Money lent and advanced to defendant.
- (4) Interest.
- (5) Account stated.

b. Any of the usual states of fact upon which the debt may be founded, the most common being:

- (1) Use and occupation.
- (2) Board and lodging.
- (3) Goods sold and delivered.
- (4) Goods bargained and sold.
- (5) Work, labor, and services.
- (6) Work, labor, and materials.

2. Quantum meruit.

3. Quantum valebant.

See ASSUMPSIT.

COMMON FINE. A small sum of money paid to the lords by the residents in certain leets. Fleta; Wharton.

COMMON FISHERY. A fishery to which all persons have a right. A common fishery is different from a common of fishery, which is the right to fish in another's pond, pool, or river. See FISHERY.

COMMON HIGHWAY. By this term is meant a road to be used by the community at large for any purpose of transit or traffic. Hammond, N. P. 239. See HIGHWAY.

COMMON INFORMER. One who, without being specially required by law or by virtue of his office, gives information of crimes, offences, or misdemeanors which have been committed, in order to prosecute the offender; a prosecutor.

COMMON INTENT. The natural sense given to words.

It is the rule that when words are used which will bear a natural sense and an artificial one, or one to be made out by argument and inference, the natural sense shall prevail. It is simply a rule of construction, and not of addition. Common intent cannot add to a sentence words which have been omitted; 2 H. Blackst. 530. In pleading, certainty is required; but certainty to a common intent is sufficient—that is, what upon a reasonable construction may be called certain, without recurring to possible facts; Co. Litt. 203 a; Dougl. 163. See CERTAINTY.

COMMON LAW. That system of law or form of the science of jurisprudence which has prevailed in England and in the United States of America, in contradistinction to other great systems, such as the Roman or civil law.

Those principles, usages, and rules of action applicable to the government and security of persons and of property, which do not rest for their authority upon any express and positive declaration of the will of the legislature. 1 Kent 492.

The body of rules and remedies administered by courts of law, technically so called, in contradistinction to those of equity and to the canon law.

The law of any country, to denote that which is common to the whole country, in contradistinction to laws and customs of local application.

The most prominent characteristic which marks this contrast, and perhaps the source of the distinction, lies in the fact that under the common law neither the stiff rule of a long antiquity, on the one hand, nor, on the other, the sudden changes of a present arbitrary power, are allowed ascendancy, but, under the sanction of a constitutional government, each of these is set off against the other; so that the will of the people, as it is gathered both from long established custom and from the expression of the legislative power, gradually forms a system—just, because it is the deliberate will of a free people—stable, because it is the growth of centuries—progressive, because it is amenable to the constant revision of the people. A full idea of the genius of the common law cannot be gathered without a survey of the philosophy of English and American history. Some of the elements will, however, appear in considering the various narrower senses in which the phrase "common law" is used.

Perhaps the most important of these narrower senses is that which it has when used in contradistinction to statute law, to designate unwritten as distinguished from written law. It is that law which derives its force and authority from the universal consent and immemorial practice of the people. It has never received the sanction of the legislature by an express act, which is the criterion by which it is distinguished from the statute law. When it is spoken of as the lex non scripta, it is meant that it is law not written by authority of law. The statutes are the expression of law in a written form, which form is essential to the statute. The decision of a court which establishes or declares a rule of law may be reduced to writing and published in the reports; but this report is not the law; it is but evidence of the law; it is but a written account of one application of a legal principle, which principle, in the theory of the common law, is still unwritten. However artificial this distinction may appear, it is nevertheless of the utmost importance, and bears continually the most wholesome results. It is only by the legislative power that law can be bound by phraseology and by forms of expression. The common law eludes such bondage; its principles are not limited nor hampered by the mere forms in which they may have been expressed, and the reported adjudications declaring such principles are but the instances in which they have been applied. The principles themselves are still unwritten, and ready, with all the adaptability of truth, to meet every new and unexpected case. Hence it is said that the rules of the common law are flexible; 1 Gray 263; 1 Swan 42; 5 Cow. 567, 628, 652.

It naturally results from the inflexible form of the statute or written law, which has no self-contained power of adaptation to cases not foreseen by legislators, that every statute of importance becomes, in course of time, supplemented, explained, enlarged, or limited by a series of adjudications upon it, so that at last it may appear to be merely the foundation of a larger superstructure of unwritten law. It naturally follows, too, from the less definite and precise forms in which the doctrine of the unwritten law stands, and from the proper hesitation of courts to modify recognized doctrines in new exigencies, that the legislative power frequently intervenes to declare, to qualify, or to abrogate the doctrines of the common law. Thus, the written and the unwritten law, the statutes of the present and the traditions of the past, interlace and react upon each other. Historical evidence supports the view which these facts suggest, that many of the doctrines of the common law are but the common-law form of antique statutes, long since overgrown and imbedded in judicial decisions. While this process is doubtless continually going on in some degree, the contrary process is also continually going on; and to a very considerable extent, particularly in the United States, the doctrines of the common law are being reduced to the statutory form, with such modifications, of course, as the legislature will choose to make. This subject is more fully considered under the title Code, which see.

In a still narrower sense, the expression "common law" is used to distinguish the body of rules and of remedies administered by courts of law technically so called in contradistinction to those of equity administered by courts of chancery, and to the canon law, administered by the ecclesiastical courts.

In England the phrase is more commonly used at the present day in the second of the three senses above mentioned.

In this country the common law of England has been adopted as the basis of our jurisprudence in all the states except Louisiana. Many of the most valued principles of the common law have been embodied in the constitution of the United States and the constitutions of the several states; and in many of the states the common law and the statutes of England in force in the colony at the time of our independence are by the state constitution declared to be the law of the state until repealed. There is an express constitutional adoption of it in Delaware, New York, Michigan, Wisconsin, and West Virginia, and an implied adoption of it in the constitutions of Kentucky and West Virginia. It has been adopted by statute in Arizona, Arkansas, California, Colorado, Florida, Idaho, Illinois, Indiana, Kansas, Missouri, Montana, Nebraska, Nevada, New Mexico, North Carolina, Pennsylvania,

South Carolina, Texas, Vermont, Virginia, Washington and Wyoming. It was extended to Alabama by the ordinance of 1787 and the recognition of the latter in the state constitution: 3 How. 212; 28 Ala. 707. It is recognized by judicial decision without any statute in Iowa; 7 Ia. 252; Mississippi; 42 Miss. 1. See 1 Bish. Crim. Law § 15, note 4, § 45, where the rules adopted by the several states in this respect are stated. Hence, where a question in the courts of one state turns upon the laws of a sister state, if no proof of such laws is offered, it is, in general, presumed that the common law as it existed at the time of the separation of this country from England prevails in such state; 4 Denio 305; 29 Ind. 438; 11 Mich. 181; 47 Minn. 228; contra, in Pennsylvania, in cases where that state has changed from the common law; the presumption being that the law of the sister state has made the same change, if there is no proof to the contrary. The term common law as thus used may be deemed to include the doctrine of equity; 8 N. Y. 535; but the term is also used in the amendments to the constitution of the United States (art. 7) in contradistinction to equity, in the provision that "In suits at common law where the value in controversy shall exceed twenty dollars, the right of trial by jury shall be preserved." The "common law" here mentioned is the common law of England, and not of any particular state; 1 Gall. 20; 1 Baldw. 554, 558; 3 Wheat. 223; 3 Pet. 446. See 5 id. 241; 1 Mass. 61; 18 Wis. 147. The term is used in contradistinction to equity, admiralty, and maritime law; 3 Pet. 446; 1 Baldw. 554.

The common law of England is not in all respects to be taken as that of the United States or of the several states: its general principles are adopted only so far as they are applicable to our situation, and the principles upon which courts discriminate between what is to be taken and what is to be left have been much the same whether the common law was adopted by constitution, statute, or decision. While no hard and fast rule can be laid down which will at once differentiate every case, a very discriminating effort was made by Chancellor Bates, in Clawson v. Primrose, 4 Del. Ch. 643, to formulate the result of the decisions and ascertain the criterion which they had in most instances applied to the subject. In this discussion, which was characterized by Professor Washburn as the best he had ever read, the conclusion reached is thus stated:

"It cannot be overlooked that, notwithstanding the broad language of the constitution ('the common law of England as well as so much of the statute law as has been heretofore adopted in practice, . . . such parts only excepted as are repugnant to the rights and privileges contained in this constitution and the declaration of rights') there were many parts of the common law of England, as it stood prior to 1776, which never have in fact been regarded by our courts as in force in this country; yet it is to be observed that the courts have not herein acted arbitrarily in adopting some parts of the common law and rejecting other parts, according to their views of the policy of particular rules or doctrine. On the contrary, those parts of the common law of England which have not been here practically administered by the courts will be found on examination to reduce themselves to two classes, resting upon grounds which render them proper to be treated as implied exceptions to the constitutional provision in addition to the expressed exception of such parts of the common law as were repugnant to the rights and privileges contained in the constitution. One of these classes of exceptions may be briefly disposed of. It embraces those parts of the rules and practice of the common law which had become superseded by long settled usages of trade, or business, or habits of dealing among our people, such as could not be unsettled or disturbed without serious inconvenience or injury. In such cases, upon the necessary maxim that communis error facit jus, the courts accepted these departures as practical modifications of the common law.

"The other class of rules which, though parts of the common law of England, have never been administered by the courts under the constitution of 1776, embraces those parts of the common law which in the terms usually employed were, at the period of our independence, inapplicable to the existing circumstances and institutions of our people.

"There is less difficulty in applying the limitation practically than in attempting to define it. I understand it as excluding those parts of the common law of England which were applicable to subjects connected with political institutions and usages peculiar to the mother country, and having no existence in the colonies, such for example as offices, dignities, advowsons, titles, etc.; also, as excluding some of the more artificial rules of the common law, springing out of the complicated system of police, revenue, and trade, among a great commercial people and not therefore applicable to the more simple transactions of the colonies or of the states in their early history; also it may be understood as excluding or modifying many rules of what is known as the common law of practice, and possibly of evidence, which the greater simplicity in our system for the administration of justice, would render unnecessary or inconvenient.

"But, on the other hand, our legislative and judicial history shows conclusively that what may be termed the common law of property was received as an entire system, subject to alterations by the legislature only. Rights of property and of person are fundamental rights necessary to be defined and protected in every civil society. The common law, as a system framed to this very end, could not be deemed inapplicable in the colonies for want of a subject matter, or as being needless or superfluous, or unacceptable, which is the true sense of the limitation in question. Certain it is, as a matter of history, that our ancestors did not so treat it."

Among the other cases in which the subject is treated are 2 Pet. 144; 9 Cra. 333; 9 S. & R. 330; 5 Cow. 628; 5 Pet. 241; 8 id. 658; 7 Cra. 32; 1 Wheat. 415; 3 id. 223; 2 Dall. 297, 384; 1 Mass. 61; 9 Pick. 532; 3 Me. 162; 6 id. 55; 3 G. & J. 62; 1 Gall. 489; 3 Conn. 114; 34 id. 260; 28 Ind. 220; 5 W. In actions in the federal courts in a territory, the common law is the rule of decision, in the absence of statutes or proof of laws or customs prevailing in the territory ; 2 C. C. A. 367 ; 10 U. S. App. 200 ; 51 Fed. Rep. 551. The common-law rule of decision in a federal court is that of the state in which it is sitting ; 2 McLean 568.

Illustrations of what it has been held not to include are the rule respecting conveyance by parol ; 1 Ohio 245 ; but see 89 Ill. 370 ; shifting inheritances ; 13 Ohio St. 21 ; 17 Ind. 367 ; 5 Wall. 710 ; mere possession of land as against miners ; 5 Cal. 100 ; newspaper communications respecting a judge considered as a contempt in England ; 4 Ill. 404 ; cutting timber ; 28 Ind. 220 ; easement by use in party-wall ; 10 Ohio St. 523 ; estates in joint tenancy ; 2 Ohio 305 ; rule as to partial reversal of a judgment against an infant and another ; Kirby 117 ; cy prés doctrine ; 35 Ind. 198 ; riparian rights to soil under water ; 20 Nev. 269 ; overruling 7 id. 249 ; to running water ; 2 Aik. Vt. 187 ; the definition of a navigable river ; 122 Pa. 191 ; the law of waters as applied to large lakes, or to a river which is a national boundary ; 19 Barb. 484.

In criminal law the common law is generally in force in the United States to some extent, and while it is in some states held that no crime is punishable unless made such by statute, there are in many states general statutes resorting to the common law for all crimes not otherwise enumerated, and for criminal matters generally. When there is no statutory definition of a crime named, the common-law definition is generally resorted to ; 5 Cush. 295 ; as also are its rules of evidence in criminal cases, and of practice as well as principle in the absence of statutes to the contrary ; 16 Tex. 445 ; and in Louisiana, although not recognized in civil matters, the common law in criminal cases is expressly adopted ; 8 Rob. La. 545. It has been held to prevail in the District of Columbia as to theft ; 33 Conn. 260 ; as to conspiracy in Maryland ; 5 Harr. & J. 358 ; kidnapping in New Hampshire ; 8 N. H. 550 ; homicide without intent to kill in Maine ; 32 Me. 369 ; and in Tennessee ; 3 Humph. 493 ; capacity to commit rape in New York ; 2 Park. Cr. Rep. 174 ; but not in Ohio ; 14 Ohio 222.

There is no common law of the United States, as a distinct sovereignty ; 64 Fed. Rep. 59 ; 63 N. W. Rep. (Ia.) 589 ; 8 Pet. 658 ; 5 Cal. 374 ; 123 Pa. 217 ; and therefore there are no common-law offences against the United States ; 7 Cra. 32 ; 52 Fed. Rep. 101 ; 36 id. 449 ; 108 U. S. 199 ; 144 id. 677. There is a rare and valuable pamphlet on this subject, by St. George Tucker Campbell, which contains a full discussion of this question. For earlier cases before the question was fully settled, see 2 Dall. 334 ; 1 Gall. 488 ; 1 Wheat. 415. But the common law is resorted to by federal courts for definition of common-law crimes not defined by statute ; 2 Curt. C. C. 446 ; 4 Fed. Rep. 198. See COMMERCIAL LAW.

The admiralty law is distinct from the common-law and the line of demarcation is to be sought in the English decisions before the Revolution and those of the state courts prior to the constitution. See 5 Wheat. 391 ; Baldw. 558 ; 46 Me. 400. And as to the adoption of the English ecclesiastical law, see 35 Vt. 365 ; 38 N. C. 91 ; 2 Paige 501 ; 50 N. Y. 557.

In general, too, the statutes of England are not understood to be included, except so far as they have been recognized by colonial legislation, but the course pursued has been rather to re-enact such English statutes as were deemed applicable to our case. Those passed since the settlement of the particular colony are not in force, unless specially accepted by it, or expressly made to apply to it ; if these were suitable to the condition of the colony they were usually accepted ; Quincy 72 ; 5 Pet. 280 ; 2 Gratt. 579 ; 1 Dall. 64.

There cannot be said to be a settled rule as to what date is to be fixed as determining what British statutes were received as part of the common law. Many states fix July 4, 1776. This is provided by constitution in Florida, Maryland and Rhode Island, and by statute in Kentucky ; in other states 4th Jac. I. is the period named after which English statutes are not included, as Arkansas, Colorado, Illinois, Indiana, Missouri, Virginia, Wyoming, (but the last four except stats. 43 Eliz. c. 6, § 2 ; 13 Eliz. c. 8 and 37 Hen. VIII. c. 9.) ; 1 Black 459 ; 28 Ind. 220 ; 7 Pet. 596 ; 78 Mo. 587 ; 11 Colo. 393. As to English statutes in force in Pennsylvania, see Report of the Judges in 3 Binn. 595 ; Roberts, Eng. Stat. ; 1 Dall. 15 ; id. 19 ; id. 73 ; 3 Yeates 17 ; 4 id. 47 ; 2 Watts 294 ; 8 id. 388 ; 134 Pa. 315. Generally, it may be stated that the statutes adopted prior to the Revolution, and held applicable under rules stated, are accepted as part of the common law ; 1 Nev. 40 ; 8 Pick. 309 ; Mart. & Y. Tenn. 226 ; 18 Wis. 148. But see 31 Ala. 20 ; 4 Paige 178 ; 17 Ohio 452 ; 61 Mich. 105. Upon the subject of English statutes as part of the common law see an able note on the whole subject of this title in 22 L. R. A. 501. By reason of the modifications arising out of our different condition, and those established by American statutes and by the course of American adjudication, the common law of America differs widely in many details from the common law of England ; but the fact that this difference has not been introduced by violent changes, but has grown up from the native vigor of the system, identifies the whole as one jurisprudence.

See works of Franklin, by Sparks, vol. 4, p. 271, as to the adoption of the common law in America ; see also Cooley, Const. Lim., 2d ed. 34, n. 35 ; 10 R. I. 227 ; 2 Wait, Actions and Defences 276.

COMMON LAW PROCEDURE ACTS. See ENGLISH PROCEDURE ACTS.

COMMON NUISANCE. One which affects the public in general, and not merely some particular person. 1 Hawkins, Pl. Cr. 197. See NUISANCE.

COMMON PLEAS. The name of a court having jurisdiction generally of civil actions.

Such pleas or actions are brought by private persons against private persons, or by the government, when the cause of action is of a civil nature. In England, whence we derived this phrase, common pleas are so called to distinguish them from pleas of the crown.

The Court of Common Pleas in England consisted of one chief and four puisné (associate) justices. It is thought by some to have been established by king John for the purpose of diminishing the power of the aula regis, but is referred by some writers to a much earlier period. 8 Coke 289; 1 Poll. & Maitl. 177; Termes de la Ley; 3 Blackstone, Comm. 39. It exercised an exclusive original jurisdiction in many classes of civil cases. See 3 Sharsw. Bla. Comm. 38, n. The right of practising in this court was for a long time confined to two classes of practitioners, limited in number, but is now thrown open to the bar generally. See 3 C. B. 537.

Courts of the same name exist in many states of the United States.

COMMON RECOVERY. A judgment recovered in a fictitious suit, brought against the tenant of the freehold, in consequence of a default made by the person who is last vouched to warranty in the suit, which recovery, being a supposed adjudication of the right, binds all persons, and vests a free and absolute fee-simple in the recoverer.

A common recovery is a kind of conveyance, and is resorted to when the object is to create an absolute bar of estates tail, and of the remainders and reversions expectant on the determination of such estates. 2 Bla. Com. 357. Though it has been used in some of the states, this form of conveyance is nearly obsolete, easier and less expensive modes of making conveyances, which have the same effect, having been substituted; 2 Bouvier, Inst. n. 2092, 2096; 7 N. H. 9; 9 S. & R. 390; 2 Rawle 108; 1 Whart. 151; 6 Mass. 323.

COMMON SCHOOLS. Schools for general elementary instruction, free to all the public. 2 Kent 195-202.

COMMON SCOLD. One who, by the practice of frequent scolding, disturbs the neighborhood. Bish. Crim. Law § 147.

The offence of being a common scold is cognizable at common law. It is a particular form of nuisance, and was punishable by the ducking-stool at common law, in place of which punishment fine and imprisonment are substituted in the United States; Whart. Cr. L. 1442; 12 S. & R. 220; 3 Cra. 620. See 1 Term 748; 6 Mod. 11; 4 Rog. 90; 1 Russ. Cr. 302; Roscoe, Cr. Ev., 8th ed. 824; 53 N. J. L. 45.

COMMON SEAL. The seal of a corporation. See SEAL.

COMMON SERJEANT. A judicial officer of the city of London, who aids the recorder in disposing of the criminal business of the Old Bailey Sessions. Holthouse.

COMMON TRAVERSE. See TRAVERSE.

COMMON VOUCHER. In common recoveries, the person who is vouched to warranty. In this fictitious proceeding the crier of the court usually performs the office of a common voucher. 2 Bla. Com. 358.

COMMONALTY. The common people of England, as distinguished from the king and nobles.

The body of a society or corporation, as distinguished from the officers. 1 Perr. & D. 243. Charters of incorporation of the various tradesmen's societies, etc., in England are usually granted to the master, wardens, and commonalty of such corporation.

COMMONER. One possessing a right of common.

COMMONS. Those subjects of the English nation who are not noblemen. They are represented in parliament by the house of commons.

COMMONWEALTH. A word which properly signifies the common weal or public policy; sometimes it is used to designate a republican form of government.

The English nation during the time of Cromwell was called The Commonwealth. It is the legal title of the states of Kentucky, Massachusetts, Pennsylvania, and Virginia.

COMMORANT. One residing in a particular town, city, or district. Barnes 162.

COMMORIENTES. Those who perish at the same time in consequence of the same calamity. See SURVIVOR; DEATH.

COMMUNI DIVIDUNDO. In Civil Law. An action which lies for those who have property in common, to procure a division. It lies where parties hold land in common but not in partnership. Calvinus, Lex.

COMMUNINGS. In Scotch Law. The negotiations preliminary to a contract.

COMMUNIO BONORUM (Lat.). In Civil Law. A community of goods.

When a person has the management of common property, owned by himself and others, not as partners, he is bound to account for the profits, and is entitled to be reimbursed for the expenses which he has sustained by virtue of the quasi-contract which is created by his act, called communio bonorum. Vicat; 1 Bouvier, Inst. n. 907, note.

COMMUNITY (Lat. communis, common).

In Civil Law. A corporation or body politic. Dig. 3. 4.

In French Law. A species of partnership which a man and woman contract when they are lawfully married to each other.

Conventional community is that which is formed by express agreement in the contract of marriage.

By this contract the legal community which would otherwise subsist may be modified as to the proportions which each shall take, and as to the things which shall compose it.

Legal community is that which takes place by virtue of the contract of marriage itself.

The French system of community property was known as the dotal system, q. v. The Spanish system was the Ganancial System, q. v. The conquest of Mexico by the Spaniards and their acquisition of the Florida territory resulted in the introduction on American soil of the Spanish system.

Louisiana, originally a French colony, was afterwards ceded to Spain when the Spanish law was introduced. It again reverted to the French and from them was acquired by the United States. The Louisiana Code has, with slight modifications, adopted the dotal system of the Code Napoléon as regards the separate rights of husband and wife, but as to their common property it retained the essential features of the Spanish ganancial system. Texas and California have adopted the community system of Spain and Mexico or modified it by their constitutions. New Mexico appears to have followed the Spanish law of property rights of married persons in its entirety. The community system as adopted in older community states has been adopted by Nevada, Washington, and Idaho, with certain modifications. Hence it may be said that the American community system prevails at this day in Louisiana, Texas, California, Nevada, Arizona, Washington, Idaho, Montana, and New Mexico, and is indebted to Spain for its origin. See Ballinger, Community Property, sec. 6; 1 New Mexico 147.

The community embraces the profits of all the effects of which the husband has the administration and enjoyment, either of right or in fact; and of the estates which they may acquire during the marriage, either by donations made jointly to them, or through their outlay or industry as well as the fruits of the bienes propios which each one brought to the matrimony, and of all that which this acquisition produced by whatever title acquired; Ballinger, Community Prop. § 5, or by purchase, or in any other similar way, even although the purchase be made in the name of one of the two, and not of both; because in that case the period of time when the purchase is made is alone attended to, and not the person who made the purchase; 10 La. 146, 172; 1 Mart. La. N. S. 325; 4 id. 212; 12 La. Ann. 598. The debts contracted during the marriage enter into the community, and must be acquitted out of the common fund; but not the debts contracted before the marriage.

The effects which compose the community of gains are divided into two equal portions between the heirs at the dissolution of the marriage; La. Civ. Code 2375. See Pothier, Contr.; Toullier. But the wife's interest in the community property is residuary and she is not the owner of any specific property before the debts are paid, whether to third persons or to the succession of her husband; 45 La. Ann. 389.

A chose in action to recover damages for personal injuries, if acquired during marriage, is considered community property; 94 Cal. 425.

COMMUTATION. The change of a punishment to which a person has been condemned into a less severe one. This can be granted only by the authority in which the pardoning power resides. See 1 Nev. 321; 31 Ohio 206; 22 Gratt. 789.

COMMUTATIVE CONTRACT. In Civil Law. One in which each of the contracting parties gives and receives an equivalent.

The contract of sale is of this kind. The seller gives the thing sold, and receives the price, which is the equivalent. The buyer gives the price, and receives the thing sold, which is the equivalent. Such contracts are usually distributed into four classes, namely: Do ut des (I give that you may give); Facio ut facias (I do that you may do); Facio ut des (I do that you may give); Do ut facias (I give that you may do). Pothier, Obl. n. 13. See La. Civ. Code, art. 1761.

COMPACT. An agreement. A contract between parties, which creates obligations and rights capable of being enforced, and contemplated as such between the parties, in their distinct and independent characters. Story, Const. b. 3, c. 3; Ruth-erf. Inst. b. 2, c. 6, § 1.

The parties may be nations, states, or individuals; but the constitution of the United States declares that "no state shall, without the consent of congress, enter into agreement or compact with another state, or with a foreign power." See 11 Pet. 1, 185; 8 Wheat. 1; Baldw. 60.

COMPANIONS. In French Law. A general term, comprehending all persons who compose the crew of a ship or vessel. Pothier, Mar. Contr. n. 163.

COMPANY. An association of a number of individuals for the purpose of carrying on some legitimate business.

This term is not synonymous with partnership, though every such unincorporated company is a partnership. Usage has reserved the term to associations whose members are in greater number, their capital more considerable, and their enterprises greater, either on account of their risk or importance.

When these companies are authorized by the government, they are known by the name of corporations.

The proper signification of the word "company" when applied to a person engaged in trade, denotes those united for the same purpose or in a joint concern. It is commonly used in this sense or as indicating a partnership. 33 Me. 52.

Sometimes the word is used to represent those members of a partnership whose names do not appear in the name of the firm. See 12 Toullier 97.

COMPARATIVE NEGLIGENCE. That doctrine in the law of negligence by which the negligence of the parties is compared in the degree of "slight," "ordinary," and "gross" negligence, and a recovery permitted notwithstanding the contributory negligence of the plaintiff, when the negligence of the plaintiff is slight and the negligence of the defendant gross, but refused when the plaintiff has been guilty of a want of ordinary care contributing to his injury; or when the negligence of the defendant is not gross, but only ordinary or slight when compared under the circumstances of the case with the contributory negligence of the plaintiff. A. & E. Encyc.; 103 Ill. 512; 115 id. 358; 82 id. 198; Whart. Neg. § 334. See NEGLIGENCE.

COMPARISON OF HANDWRITING. See HANDWRITING.

COMPATIBILITY. Such harmony between the duties of two offices that they may be discharged by one person.

COMPEARANCE. In Scotch Practice. Appearance; an appearance made for a defendant; an appearance by counsel. Bell; Black.

COMPENSACION. In Spanish Law. The extinction of a debt by another debt of equal dignity between persons who have mutual claims on each other.

COMPENSATIO CRIMINIS. The compensation or set-off of one crime against another: for example, in questions of divorce, where one party claims the divorce on the ground of adultery of his or her companion, the latter may show that the complainant has been guilty of the same offence, and, having himself violated the contract, cannot complain of its violation on the other side. This principle is incorporated in the codes of most civilized nations. See 1 Hagg. Cons. 144; 1 Hagg. Eccl. 714; 2 Paige, Ch. 108; 2 D. & B. 64; Bishop, Marr. & D. §§ 393, 394.

COMPENSATION (Lat. compendere, to balance). In Chancery Practice. Something to be done for or paid to a person of equal value with something of which he has been deprived by the acts or negligence of the party so doing or paying.

When a simple mistake, not a fraud, effects a contract, but does not change its essence, a court of equity will enforce it, upon making compensation for the error. "The principle upon which courts of equity act," says Lord Chancellor Eldon, "is by all the authorities brought to the true standard, that though the party had not a title at law, because he had not strictly complied with the terms so as to entitle him to an action (as to time, for instance), yet if the time, though introduced (as some time must be fixed, where something is to be done on one side, as a consideration for something to be done on the other), is not the essence of the contract, a material object, to which they looked in the first conception of it, even though the lapse of time has not arisen from accident, a court of equity will compel the execution of the contract upon this ground, that one party is ready to perform, and that the other may have a performance in substance if he will permit it;" 13 Ves. Ch. 287. See 10 id. 505; 13 id. 73, 81, 426; 6 id. 575; 1 Cox, Ch. 59.

In Civil Law. A reciprocal liberation between two persons who are both creditors and debtors of each other. Est debiti et crediti inter se contributio. Dig. 16. 2. 1.

It resembles in many respects the common-law set-off. The principal difference is that a set-off must be pleaded to be effectual; whereas compensation is effectual without any such plea. See 2 Bouvier, Inst. n. 1407.

It may be legal, by way of exception, or by reconvention; 8 La. 158; Dig. 16. 2; Code, 4. 31; Inst. 4. 6. 30; Burge, Surt. b. 2, c. 6, p. 181.

It takes place by mere operation of law, and extinguishes reciprocally the two debts as soon as they exist simultaneously, to the amount of their respective sums. It takes place only between two debts having equally for their object a sum of money, or a certain quantity of consumable things of one and the same kind, and which are equally liquidated and demandable. It takes place whatever be the cause of the debts, except in case, first, of a demand of restitution of a thing of which the owner has been unjustly deprived; second, of a demand of restitution of a deposit and a loan for use; third, of a debt which has for its cause aliments declared not liable to seizure. La. Civ. Code 2203-2208. See 11 La. Ann. 520; 16 id. 181.

As to taking property, see EMINENT DOMAIN.

In Criminal Law. Recrimination, which see.

COMPERTORIUM. In the Civil Law. A judicial inquest by delegates or commissioners to find out and relate the truth of a cause. Wharton.

COMPERUIT AD DIEM (Lat. he appeared at the day).

In Pleading. A plea in bar to an action of debt on a bail bond. The usual replication of this plea is, nul tiel record: that there is not any such record of appearance of the said—. For forms of this plea, see 5 Wentworth 470; Lilly, Entr. 114; 2 Chit. Pl. 527.

When the issue is joined on this plea, the trial is by the record. See 1 Taunt. 23; Tidd, Pr. 239. And see, generally, Comyns, Dig. Pleader (2 W. 31); 7 B. & C. 478.

COMPETENCY. The legal fitness or ability of a witness to be heard on the trial of a cause. That quality of written or other evidence which renders it proper to be given on the trial of a cause.

There is a difference between competency and credibility. A witness may be competent, and, on examination, his story may be so contradictory and improbable that he may not be believed; on the contrary, he may be incompetent, and yet be perfectly credible if he were examined.

The court are the sole judges of the competency of a witness, and may, for the purpose of deciding whether the witness is or is not competent, ascertain all the facts necessary to form a judgment; 1 Greenl. Ev. § 426.

Prima facie every person offered is a competent witness, and must be received, unless his incompetency appears; 9 State Tr. 652.

In French Law. The right in a court to exercise jurisdiction in a particular case: as, where the law gives jurisdiction to the court when a thousand francs shall be in dispute, the court is competent if the sum demanded is a thousand francs or upwards, although the plaintiff may ultimately recover less.

COMPETENT. Able, fit, qualified; authorized or capable to act. Abb. L. Dict.; as competent court; 1 C. P. D. 176; competent evidence; 1 Lea 504; competent persons, 5 Ad. & El. 75; competent clerk, 27 Mis. 393.

COMPETENT EVIDENCE. That which the very nature of the thing to be proven requires, as the production of a writing where its contents are the subject of inquiry. 1 Lea 504; 1 Greenl. Ev. § 2. See EVIDENCE.

COMPETENT WITNESS. One who is legally qualified to be heard to testify in a cause. In Kentucky, Michigan, and Missouri, a will must be attested, for the purpose of passing lands, by competent witnesses; but, in Kentucky, if wholly written by the testator, it need not be so attested. See WITNESS.

COMPILATION. A literary production composed of the works of others and arranged in a methodical manner.

A compilation requiring, in its execution, taste, learning, discrimination, and intellectual labor, is an object of copyright (q. v.); as, for example, Bacon's Abridgment. Curtis, Copyr. 186. A compilation consists of selected extracts from different authors; an abridgment is a condensation of the views of an author; 4 McLean 314.

COMPLAINANT. One who makes a complaint. A plaintiff in a suit in chancery is so called.

COMPLAINT. In Criminal Law. The allegation made to a proper officer that some person, whether known or unknown, has been guilty of a designated offence, with an offer to prove the fact, and a request that the offender may be punished. It is a technical term, descriptive of proceedings before a magistrate. 11 Pick. 436. See 16 Me. 117.

To have a legal effect, the complaint must be supported by such evidence as shows that an offence has been committed and renders it certain or probable that it was committed by the person named or described in the complaint.

The fact that a complaint is drawn in flagrant disregard of the rules of pleading is not sufficient to support a demurrer thereto, if the allegations are susceptible of a construction that will support the action; 18 N. Y. S. 758.

In Practice. The name given in New York and other states to the statement of the plaintiff's case which takes the place of the declaration in common-law pleading.

COMPOS MENTIS. See NON COMPOS MENTIS.

COMPOSITION. An agreement, made upon a sufficient consideration, between a debtor and creditor, by which the creditor accepts part of the debt due to him in satisfaction of the whole. See COMPOUNDING A FELONY.

A composition deed executed by a debtor and his creditors in due form, operates as a settlement of the original claims of such creditors and supersedes the cause of action thereon, the rights and remedies of the parties being determined thereafter by the new agreement; 48 Minn. 317. An oral agreement between several creditors and their debtor to compound and discharge their claims is valid; 73 Hun 56; 85 N. Y. 189. In an action upon a composition agreement, any creditor being a party thereto may bring a several action for damages for breach thereof; 56 N. W. Rep. (Minn.) 352.

COMPOSITION OF MATTER. A mixture or chemical combination of materials. The term is used in the act of congress, July 4, 1836, § 6, in describing the subjects of patents. It may include both the substance and the process, when the compound is new.

COMPOUND INTEREST. Interest upon interest; for example, when a sum of money due for interest is added to the principal, and then bears interest. This is not, in general, allowed. See INTEREST.

COMPOUNDER. In Louisiana. He who makes a composition.

An amicable compounder is one who has undertaken by the agreement of the parties to compound or settle differences between them. La. Code of Pract. art. 444.

COMPOUNDING A FELONY. The act of a party immediately aggrieved, who agrees with a thief or other felon that he will not prosecute him, on condition that he return to him the goods stolen, or who takes a reward not to prosecute. See 2 Harr. 532; 51 Ill. 234; 39 Ga. 85.

This is an offence punishable by fine and imprisonment, and at common law rendered the person committing it an accessory; Hawk. Pl. Cr. 125. And a conviction may be had though the person guilty of the original offence has not been tried; 97 Ala. 72. A failure to prosecute for an assault with an intent to kill is not compounding a felony; 29 Ala. N. S. 628. The accepting of a promissory note signed by a party guilty of larceny, as a consideration for not prosecuting, is sufficient to constitute the offence; 16 Mass. 91; and the offence is committed although the consideration is for another than the one making the agreement; 58 Ia. 121. The mere retaking by the owner of stolen goods is no offence, unless the offender is not to be prosecuted; Hale, Pl. Cr. 546; 1 Chit. Cr. Law 4; Clarke, Cr. L. 329; 16 Ill. 93; 51 id. 234.

The compounding of misdeemeanors, as it is also a perversion or defeating of public justice, is in like manner an indictable offence at common law; 18 Pick. 440; 5 East 301; 111 Pa. 14; 47 Conn. 221. But the law will permit a compromise of any offence, though made the subject of a criminal prosecution, for which the injured party might recover damages in an action. But, if the offence is of a public nature, no agreement can be valid that is founded on the consideration of stifling a prosecution for it: 6 Q. B. 308; 9 id. 371; 2 Benn. & H. Lead. Cr. Cas. 258, 262; 6 Wis. 42; 27 Mich. 293; 42 Ia. 649; 30 Me. 105; 18 Pick. 440.

In the United States, compounding a felony is an indictable offence, and no action can be supported on any contract of which such offence is the consideration in whole or in part; 16 Mass. 91; 18 Pick. 440; 5 Vt. 42; 9 id. 23; 5 N. H. 553; 2 South. N. J. 573; 13 Wend. N. Y. 592; 6 Dana 338. A receipt in full of all demands given in consideration of stifling a criminal prosecution is void; 11 Vt. 252.

COMPRA Y VENTA (Span.). Buying and selling. The laws of contracts arising from purchase and sale are given very fully in Las Partidas, part 3, tit. xviii. ll. 56.

COMPRINT. The surreptitious printing of the copy of another to the intent to make a gain thereby. Strictly, it signifies to print together. There are several statutes in prevention of this act. Jacob; Cowel.

COMPRIVIGNI (Lat.). Step-brothers or step-sisters. Children who have one parent, and only one, in common. Calvinus, Lex.

COMPROMISARIUS. In Civil Law. An arbitrator.

COMPROMISE. An agreement made between two or more parties as a settlement of matters in dispute.

Such settlements are sustained at law; Poll. Contr. 180; 2 Strobh. Eq. 258; 2 Mich. 145; 1 Watts 216; 2 Pa. 531; and are highly favored; 6 Munf. 406; 1 Bibb 168; 2 id. 449; 4 Hawks 178; 6 Watts 321; 14 Conn. 12; 4 Metc. Mass. 270; 62 Mich. 262. See, also, 21 E. L. & Eq. 199; 6 T. B. Monr. 91; 2 Rand. Va. 442; 5 Watts 259; 143 Pa. 374. The amount in question must, it seems, be uncertain; 2 B. & Ad. 889; 1 Ad. & E. 106. And see 5 Pet. 114; 21 Pa. 237; 20 Mo. 102; 13 Pick. 284; 6 Bingham. N. C. 62; 3 M. & W. 648; 1 Bouvier, Inst. 798. The compromise of a doubtful or disputed claim is a sufficient consideration to uphold an assumpsit; 18 N. Y. Supp. 853. See 49 Fed. Rep. 715.

Where a debtor tenders part of a disputed claim to the creditor in full satisfaction, if the latter accepts the tender, he is bound by the terms thereof; 46 Mo. App. 624. An offer of settlement by plaintiff, but not accepted by defendant, does not bind either party; 29 Fla. 238. There can be no compromise of a criminal charge; 1 Chit. Pr. 17.

An offer to pay money by way of compromise is not evidence of debt, since, as was said by Lord Mansfield, "it must be permitted to men 'to buy their peace' without prejudice to them, if the offer did not succeed; and such offers are made to stop litigation without regard to the question whether anything, or what, is due."

If the terms "buy their peace" are attended to, they will resolve all doubts on this head of evidence; Bull. N. P., 7th ed. (1817) 236; and the author adds an example:—If A sue B for one hundred pounds, and B offer to pay him twenty pounds, it shall not be received in evidence, for this neither admits nor ascertains any debt, and is no more than saying he would give twenty pounds to get rid of the action. But if an account consist of ten articles, and B admits that a particular one is due, it is good evidence for so much.

In one of the oldest cases on the subject, Lord Kenyon declared at nisi prius:—"Evidence of concessions made for the purpose of settling matters in dispute I shall never admit;" 3 Esp. 113; but evidence was admitted that after the action was brought the defendant called upon the plaintiff and said he was sorry that the thing had happened, and offered two hundred pounds in settlement, which was not accepted; 3 Stark. N. P. 128; and in other cases evidence of offers of compromise made, but not expressed to be without prejudice, were held to be admissible; 1 M. & W. 446; id. 447, n.; apparently in opposition to the rule laid down by Lord Mansfield and Lord Kenyon above referred to.

It may, however, be considered settled that letters or admissions containing the expression in substance that they are to be without prejudice will not be admitted in evidence; 4 C. & P. 462; L. R. 6 Ch. 827; 3 Sc. N. R. 741.

In the last case the rule is put definitely on the ground of public policy by Tindal, C. J., who said:—"It is of great consequence that parties should be unfettered by correspondence entered into upon the express understanding that it is to be without prejudice," and he also declared "that where used in the letter containing the offer, the words 'without prejudice' must cover the whole correspondence," and this rule has been followed and it was held that not only the letter bearing the words "without prejudice," but also the answer thereto, which was not so guarded, was inadmissible in evidence; and to the same effect is L. R. 10 Ch. 264. It is the recognized rule in the United States that admissions made in treating for an adjustment cannot be given in evidence; 33 Mo. 323; 117 Mass. 55; 13 Ga. 406; 40 N. Y. Sup. Ct. 8; and in Canada; 3 Ont. 584; 11 id. 442.

Verbal offers of compromise of a claim made by a defendant's solicitor are also protected and cannot be given in evidence against his client; 2 C. & K. 24; 6 C. P. 437.

An account rendered by the defendant to the plaintiff, showing a balance in the plaintiff's favor, accompanied by a letter proposing an arrangement and stating that the letter and account were without prejudice was held to be inadmissible as evidence; 6 C. P. 437. The principle of the exclusion of such admissions, whether verbal or documentary, therefore, seems to rest on the fact that there is some matter in controversy or some claim by one person against the other for the settlement or adjustment of which the communication is made, and that in furtherance of the maxim, "Interest reipublice ut sit finis litium," it is for the public good that communications having that end in view should not be allowed to prejudice either party in the event of their proving abortive. It is not necessary that such communications should be expressly guarded if they manifestly appear to have been made by way of compromise; 2 C. & K. 24; such admissions or negotiations are inadmissible whether made "without prejudice" or not; 15 Md. 510; 15 S. E. Rep. (S. C.) 331; 14 S. E. Rep. (Ga.) 556; s. c. 88 Ga. 321; 130 N. Y. 677; 2 Whart. Ev. § 1090; but see 10 So. Rep. (La.) 360; s. c. 43 La. Ann. 1062; 28 N. E. Rep. (Ind.) 1033; 51 Ill. App. 274. Where a letter opening negotiations for a compromise, but not stated to be without prejudice, was followed a day or two afterwards by another guarding against prejudice, it was held that the whole correspondence was thereby protected; 26 W. R. 109, and Gurney, B., refused to receive in evidence a letter written "without prejudice," even in favor of the party who had written it, saying, "If you write without prejudice so as not to bind yourself, you cannot use the letter against the other party; 8 C. & P. 388.

And evidence of plaintiff that offers of compromise were made by him is inadmissible; 20 N. Y. Supp. 961; 66 Hun 316. And negotiations between parties for the purpose of clearing title to land and compromising differences will not prejudice the rights of either party; 21 S. W. Rep. (Tex.) 282.

Correspondence of this kind is not only inadmissible as evidence at the trial of the action, but it has also been held to be privileged from production for the purpose of discovery; 11 Beav. 111; 15 id. 321; id. 388.

Romilly, M. R., in the last of these cases, stated the rule very much in the same way as did Tindal, C. J., supra; he said: "Such communications made with a view of an amicable arrangement ought to be held very sacred, for if parties were to be afterwards prejudiced by their efforts to compromise, it would be impossible to attempt an amicable arrangement of differences."

When a correspondence for a settlement had commenced "without prejudice" but those words were afterwards dropped, it was immaterial; 6 Ont. 719.

The same principle is applied where the cause of action is other than a debt, as in a bastardy proceeding, where offers of compromise were held not admissible against the defendant as admissions of his guilt; 50 N. W. Rep. (Neb.) 155; 30 id. 638; 91 Ala. 615; 108 N. C. 267; nor does the payment of a certain sum on a claim for a much larger sum constitute a recognition of a legal liability to make further payments on such claim; 113 U. S. 648; but where offers of compromise are made to a third person, who has no authority to settle the claim, and there is no intimation that they were made "without prejudice" or in confidence, they are admissible in evidence; 20 S. W. Rep. (Mo.) 975; a statement made by one of several defendants to his co-defendants, advocating the settlement of plaintiff's claims is not within the rule excluding offers made for the purpose of compromise, but is competent as an admission of liability; 30 Pac. Rep. (Cal.) 529; and evidence of the admission of an independent fact, although made during a negotiation tending towards a compromise, is admissible; 32 N. Y. Supp. 156; 11 Misc. Rep. 422; 117 Mass. 55; 44 N. H. 22.

The extent of the protection which may be invoked by the use of the word "without prejudice" is limited to the purposes contemplated by the rule as stated and will not be extended to exclude evidence of communications, which from their character may prejudice the person to whom it is addressed if he should reject the offer; 62 L. J. Rep. Q. B. 511; nor a letter which is intended to be used by the party writing it; the words protect both parties from its use, but if the writer declares that he will use it, from that moment it loses its privileged character; 29 U. C. Q. B. 136. Such communications, when the negotiation is successful and a compromise is agreed to, are admissible both for the purpose of showing the terms of the compromise and enforcing it; 6 Ont. 719; and also in order to account for lapse of time; 15 Beav. 388, per Romilly, M. R.; L. R. 22 Q. B. Div. 38. But whether verbal or written, such communications cannot be regarded for the purpose of determining the question of costs; 58 L. J. Rep. Q. B. 501. In this well considered case, the English court of appeal established the rule contrary to what had been in some previous cases thought proper. See 2 Dr. & Sm. 29; 1 Jur. N. S. 899.

In Civil Law. An agreement between two or more persons, who, wishing to settle their disputes, refer the matter in controversy to arbitrators, who are so called because those who choose them give them full powers to arbitrate and decide what shall appear just and reasonable, to put an end to the differences of which they are made the judges. 1 Domat, Lois, Civ. liv. 1, t. 14.

COMPTE ARRETE. (Fr.). An account stated in writing and acknowledged to be correct on its face by the party against whom it is stated. 9 La. Ann. 485.

COMPTROLLER. An officer of a state, or of the United States, who has certain duties to perform in the regulation and management of the fiscal matters of the government under which he holds office.

In the treasury department of the United States there is an officer known as the comptroller of the treasury. The act of July 31, 1894, reorganizing the accounting offices of the government, abolished the offices of second comptroller of the treasury and the commissioner of customs, and provided that hereafter the first comptroller shall be known as the comptroller of the treasury. The Comptroller is charged with the duty of revising accounts, upon appeal from the settlements made by the auditors, such appeal to be taken within one year by either the claimant, the head of the department interested, or by the comptroller himself. Upon the request of a disbursing officer, or the head of a department, the comptroller is required to give his decision upon the validity of a payment to be made, which decision, when rendered, shall govern the auditors and the comptroller in the settlement of the account involving the payment; to approve, disapprove, or modify all decisions made by the auditors making an original construction, or modifying an existing construction of statutes, and to certify his action to the auditor. He shall transmit all decisions made by him forthwith to the auditor or auditors whose duties are affected thereby. By the regulations of the department the comptroller passes upon the sufficiency of authorities to indorse drafts and receive and receipt for money from the government, upon the evidence presented in applications for duplicates or lost or destroyed United States bonds, drafts, checks, etc. The forms of keeping and rendering all public accounts (except those relating to the postal service), the recovery of debts certified by the auditors to be due to the United States, and the preservation, with their vouchers and certificates, of accounts finally adjusted, are under the direction of the comptroller. Upon revision of accounts, appealed from the several auditors to the comptroller, his decision upon such revision is final and conclusive upon the executive branch of the government.

COMPULSION. Forcible inducement to the commission of an act.

Acts done under compulsion are not, in general, binding upon a party; but when a man is compelled by lawful authority to do that which he ought to do, that compulsion does not affect the validity of the act; as, for example, when a court of competent jurisdiction compels a party to execute a deed, under the pain of attachment for contempt, the grantor cannot object to it on the ground of compulsion. But if the court compelled a party to do an act forbidden by law, or had not jurisdiction over the parties or the subject-matter, the act done by such compulsion would be void. See COERCION; DURESS.

COMPULSORY PILOTAGE. See PILOTAGE.

COMPURGATOR. One of several neighbors of a person accused of a crime or charged as a defendant in a civil action, who appeared and swore that they believed him on his oath. 3 Bla. Com. 341.

Formerly, when a person was accused of a crime, or sued in some kinds of civil actions, he might purge himself upon oath of the accusation made against him, whenever the proof was not the most clear and positive; and if upon his oath he declared himself innocent, he was absolved.

This usage, so eminently calculated to encourage perjury by impunity, was soon found to be dangerous to the public safety. To remove this evil, the laws were changed, by requiring that the oath should be administered with the greatest solemnity; but the form was soon disregarded, for the mind became easily familiarized to those ceremonies which at first imposed on the imagination, and those who cared not to violate the truth did not hesitate to treat the form with contempt. In order to give a greater weight to the oath of the accused, the law was again altered so as to require that the accused should appear before the judge with a certain number of his neighbors, who were freeholders of the hundred, who should swear that they believed the accused had sworn truly. This new species of witnesses were called compurgators. If it was not his first offence or if his compurgators did not agree to make the oath, he was put to the ordeal (q. v.). The origin of the system lies back in the history of the Teuton race. It is said still to survive in the practice of the criminal courts by which an accused person is allowed to call witnesses as to his character, as a defence, while the prosecution is not allowed to traverse their testimony. Inderwick, The King's Peace.

The number of compurgators varied according to the nature of the charge and other circumstances. See Du Cange, Juramentum; Spelman, Gloss. Assarh; Termes de la Ley; 3 Bla. Com. 341-348.

COMPUTUS (Lat. computare, to account). A writ to compel a guardian, bailiff, receiver, or accountant, to yield up his accounts. It is founded on the stat. Westm. 2, cap. 12; Reg. Orig. 135.

CONCEAL. To withhold or keep secret mental facts from another's knowledge, as well as to hide or secrete physical objects from sight or observation. 57 Me. 339.

CONCEALED WEAPONS. As to validity of statutes against carrying concealed deadly weapons, see 8 Am. Rep. 22; 14 id. 380; ARMS.

CONCEALERS. Such as find out concealed lands: that is, lands privily kept from the king by common persons having nothing to show for them. They are called "a troublesome, disturbant sort of men; turbulent persons." Cowel.

CONCEALMENT. The improper suppression of any fact or circumstance by one of the parties to a contract from the other, which in justice ought to be known.

The omission by an applicant for insurance preliminarily to state facts known to him, or which he is bound to know, material to the risk proposed to be insured against, or omission to state truly the facts expressly inquired about by the underwriters to whom application for insurance is made, whether the same are or are not material to the risk.

Concealment, when fraudulent, avoids a contract, or renders the party using it liable for the damage arising in consequence thereof; 7 Metc. 252; 16 Me. 30; 2 Ill. 344; 3 B. & C. 605; 10 Cl. & F. 934; 12 Cush. 416. But it must have been of such facts as the party is bound to communicate; Webb, Poll. Torts 368; 3 E. L. & Eq. 17; 3 Conn. 413; 5 Ala. N. S. 596; 5 Pa. 467; 8 N. H. 463; 1 Dev. 351; 18 Johns. 403; 6 Humphr. 36. A concealment of extrinsic facts is not, in general, fraudulent, although peculiarly within the knowledge of the party possessing them; 2 Wheat. 195; 1 Baldw. 331; 14 Barb. 72; 2 Ala. N. S. 181. But see 1 Miss. 72; 1 Swan 54; 4 M'Cord 169. And the rule against the concealment of latent defects is stricter in the case of personal than of real property; 6 Woodb. & M. 358; 3 Campb. 508; 3 Term 759.

A failure to state facts known to an insurer, or his agent, or which he ought to know, since these he will be presumed to know, or which lessen the risk, for that only is material which tends to increase the risk, in the absence of express stipulation, and where no inquiry is made, is no concealment; May, Ins. § 207; 16 Ohio 334.

Where there is confidence reposed, concealment becomes more fraudulent; 9 B. & C. 577; 4 Metc. 381.

See, generally, 2 Kent 483; DECEIT; MISREPRESENTATION; REPRESENTATION.

CONCESSI (Lat. I have granted). A term formerly used in deeds.

It is a word of general extent, and is said to amount to a grant, feoffment, lease, release, and the like; 2 Saund. 96; Co. Litt. 301, 302; Dane, Abr. Index; 5 Whart. 278.

It has been held in a feoffment or fine to imply no warranty; Co. Litt. 384; 4 Co. 80; Vaughan's Argument in Hayes v. Bickersteth, Vaughan 126; Butler's note, Co. Litt. 384. But see 1 Freem. 339, 414.

CONCESSIMUS (Lat. we have granted). A term used in conveyances. It created a joint covenant on the part of the grantors. 5 Co. 16; 3 Kebl. 617; Bacon, Abr. Covenant.

CONCESSION. A grant. The word is frequently used in this sense when applied to grants made by the French and Spanish governments in Louisiana.

CONCESSOR. A grantor.

CONCILIIUM. A council.

CONCILIIUM REGIS. A tribunal which existed in England during the times of Edward I. and Edward II., composed of the judges and sages of the law. To them were referred cases of great difficulty. Co. Litt. 304.

CONCLUSION (Lat. con claudere, to shut together). The close; the end.

In Pleading. IN DECLARATIONS. That part which follows the statement of the cause of action. In personal or mixed actions, where the object is to recover damages, the conclusion is, properly, to the damage of the plaintiff, etc. Comyns, Dig. Pleader, c. 84; 10 Co. 1156. And see 1 M. & S. 236; DAMAGES.

The form was anciently, in the King's Bench, "To the damage of the said A B, and thereupon he brings suit;" in the Exchequer, "To the damage," etc., "whereby he is the less able to satisfy our said lord the king the debts which he owes his said majesty at his exchequer, and therefore he brings his suit;" 1 Chit. Pl. 356-358. It is said to be mere matter of form, and not demurrable; 7 Ark. 282.

In Pleas. The conclusion is either to the country—which must be the case when an issue is tendered, that is, whenever the plaintiff's material statements are contradicted—or by verification, which must be the case when new matter is introduced. See VERIFICATION. Every plea in bar, it is said, must have its proper conclusion. All the formal parts of pleadings have been much modified by statute in the various states and in England.

In Practice. Making the last argument or address to the court or jury. The party on whom the onus probandi is cast, in general, has the conclusion.

In Remedies. An estoppel; a bar; the act of a man by which he has confessed a matter or thing which he can no longer deny.

For example, the sheriff is concluded by his return to a writ; and, therefore, if upon a capias he return cepi corpus, he cannot afterwards show that he did not arrest the defendant, but is concluded by his return. See Plowd. 276 b; 3 Thomas, Co. Litt. 600.

CONCLUSION TO THE COUNTRY. In Pleading. The tender of an issue for trial by a jury.

When an issue is tendered by the defendant, it is as follows: "And of this the said C D puts himself upon the country." When tendered by the plaintiff, the formula is, "And this the said A B prays may be inquired of by the country." It is held, however, that there is no material difference between these two modes of expression, and that if the one be substituted for the other the mistake is unimportant; 10 Mod. 166.

When there is an affirmative on one side and a negative on the other, or vice versa, the conclusion should be to the country; 2 Saund. 189; 2 Burr. 1022; 16 Johns. 267. So it is though the affirmative and negative be not in express words, but only tantamount thereto; Co. Litt. 126 a; 1 Saund. 103; 1 Chit. Pl. 592; Com. Dig. Pleader, E, 32.

CONCLUSIVE EVIDENCE. That which cannot be controlled or contradicted by any other evidence.

Evidence which of itself, whether contradicted or uncontradicted, explained or unexplained, is sufficient to determine the matter at issue. 6 Lond. L. Mag. 373.

CONCLUSIVE PRESUMPTION. A rule of law determining the quantity of evidence requisite for the support of a particular averment which is not permitted to be overcome by any proof that the fact is otherwise. 1 Greenl. Ev. § 15. Thus, for example, the possession of land under claim of title for a certain period of time raises a conclusive presumption of a grant. See PRESUMPTION.

In the civil law, such presumptions are said to be juris et de jure.

CONCORD. An agreement or supposed agreement between the parties in levying a fine of lands in which the deforciant (or he who keeps the other out of possession) acknowledges that the lands in question are the right of complainant; and from the acknowledgment or admission of right thus made, the party who levies the fine is called the cognizor, and the person to whom it is levied, the cognizee. 2 Bla. Com. 350; Cruise, Dig. tit. 35, c. 2, § 33; Comyns, Dig. Fine (E, 9).

CONCORDAT. A convention; a pact; an agreement. The term is generally confined to the agreements made between independent governments, and most usually applied to those between the pope and some prince.

CONCUBARIA. A fold, pen or place where cattle lie. Cowel; Wharton.

CONCUBEANT. Lying together. Wharton.

CONCUBINAGE. A species of marriage which took place among the ancients, and which is yet in use in some countries. See CONCUBINATUS.

The act or practice of cohabiting, in sexual commerce, without the authority of law or a legal marriage. See 1 Brown, Civ. Law 80; Merlin, Rép.; Dig. 32. 49. 4; 7. 1. 1; Code, 5. 27. 12.

CONCUBINATUS. A natural marriage, as contradistinguished from the justæ nuptiæ, or justum matrimonium, the civil marriage.

The concubinatus was the only marriage which those who did not enjoy the jus connubii could contract. Although this natural marriage was authorized and regulated by law, yet it produced none of those important rights which flowed from the civil marriage—such as the paternal power, etc.; nor was the wife entitled to the honorable appellation of mater-familias, but was designated by the name of concubina. After the exclusive and aristocratic rules relative to the connubium had been relaxed, the concubinatus fell into disrepute; and the law permitting it was repealed by a constitution of the Emperor Leo the Philosopher, in the year 886 of the Christian era. See PATER-FAMILIAS.

CONCUBINE. A woman who cohabits with a man as his wife, without being married.

CONCUR. In Louisiana. To claim a part of the estate of an insolvent along with other claimants. 6 Mart. La. N. S. 460; as, "the wife concurs with her husband's creditors, and claims a privilege over them."

CONCURRENCE. In French Law. The equality of rights or privileges which several persons have over the same thing; as, for example, the right which two judgment-creditors, whose judgments were rendered at the same time, have to be paid out of the proceeds of real estate bound by them. Dict. de Jur.

CONCURRENT. Running together; having the same authority; thus, we say, a concurrent consideration occurs in the case of mutual promises; such and such courts have concurrent jurisdiction,—that is, each has the same jurisdiction.

Concurrent writs. Duplicate originals, or several writs running at the same time for the same purpose, for service on or arrest of a person, when it is not known where he is to be found; or for service on several persons, as when there are several defendants to an action. Mozley & W. Dict.

CONCUSSION. In Civil Law. The unlawful forcing of another by threats of violence to give something of value. It differs from robbery in this, that in robbery the thing is taken by force, while in concussion it is obtained by threatened violence. Heineccius, Lec. El. § 1071.

CONDEdit. In Ecclesiastical Law. The name of a plea entered by a party to a libel filed in the ecclesiastical court, in which it is pleaded that the deceased made the will which is the subject of the suit, and that he was of sound mind. 2 Eccl. 438; 6 id. 431.

CONDEMN. To sentence; to adjudge. 3 Bla. Com. 291.

To declare a vessel a prize. To declare a vessel unfit for service. 1 Kent 102; 5 Esp. 65.

CONDEMNATION. The sentence of a competent tribunal which declares a ship unfit for service. This sentence may be re-examined and litigated by the parties interested in disputing it; 5 Esp. 65; Abb. Sh. 15; 30 L. J. Ad. 145.

The judgment, sentence, or decree by which property seized and subject to forfeiture for an infraction of revenue, navigation, or other laws is condemned or forfeited to the government. See CAPTOR.

The sentence or judgment of a court of competent jurisdiction that a ship or vessel taken as a prize on the high seas was liable to capture, and was properly and legally captured and held as prize.

Some of the grounds of capture and condemnation are: violation of neutrality in time of war; 2 Gall 261; carrying contraband goods; 5 Wall. 1, 28; 3 id. 514. Breach of blockade; id. 28, 170; id. 603.

By the general practice of the law of nations, a sentence of condemnation is at present generally deemed necessary in order to divest the title of a vessel taken as a prize. Until this has been done, the original owner may regain his property, although the ship may have been in possession of the enemy twenty-four hours, or carried infra præsidia; Hall, Int. L. 417;

1 Rob. 139; 3 id. 97, n.; Carth. 423; 1 Kent 101–104; 10 Mod. 79; 4 Wheat. 298; Vattel, b. 3, ch. 14, § 216; 2 Dall. 1, 2, 4; 8 Cra. 226; Marsh. Ins. 402. A sentence of condemnation is generally binding everywhere; Marsh. Ins. 402; 3 Kent 103; 3 Wheat. 246; 4 Cra. 434. But see 1 Binn. 299, n.; 7 Bingh. 495. Title vests completely in the captors, and relates back to the time of capture; 2 Russ. & M. 35; 15 Ves. 139.

Confiscation is the act of the sovereign against a rebellious subject; condemnation as prize is the act of a belligerent against another belligerent. The former may be effected by such means as the sovereign through legal channels may please to adopt; the latter can be made only in accordance with principles recognized in the common jurisprudence of the world. Both are in rem; but confiscation recognizes the title of the original owner, while in prize the tenure of the property is qualified, provisional and destitute of absolute ownership; 14 Ct. Cls. 14.

The condemnation of prize property while lying in a neutral port or the port of an ally is valid; 13 How. 498. Contra, in England; 5 Rob. 285.

See BLOCKADE.

The word is in general use in connection with the taking of land under the right of eminent domain, q. v. The condemnation of lands is but a purchase of them in invitum, and the title acquired is but a quit claim; 31 Cal. 215.

In Civil Law. A sentence or judgment which condemns some one to do, to give, or to pay something, or which declares that his claim or pretensions are unfounded.

The word is used in this sense by common-law lawyers also; though it is more usual to say conviction, both in civil and criminal cases; 3 Bla. Com. 291. It is a maxim that no man ought to be condemned unheard and without the opportunity of being heard.

CONDICTIO. (Lat. from condicere).

In Civil Law. A summons.

A personal action. An action arising from an obligation to do or give some certain, precise, and defined thing. Inst. 3. 15. pr.

Condictio is a general name given to personal actions, or actions arising from obligations, and is distinguished from vindicatio (real action), an action to regain possession of a thing belonging to the actor, and from actiones mixtæ (mixed actions). Condictio is also distinguished from an action ex stipulatu, which is a personal action which lies where the thing to be done or given is uncertain in amount or identity. See Calvinus, Lex.; Halifax, Anal. 117.

CONDICTIO EX LEGE. An action arising where the law gave a remedy but provided no appropriate form of action. Calvinus, Lex.

CONDICTIO INDEBITATI. An action which lies to recover that which the plaintiff has paid to the defendant, by mistake, and which he was not bound to pay, either in fact or in law.

This action does not lie if the money was due ex æquitate, or by a natural obligation, or if he who made the payment knew that nothing was due; for qui consulto dat quod non debet præsuntur donare; Bell, Dict.; Calvinus, Lex.; 1 Kames, Eq. 307.

CONDICTIO REI FURTIVÆ. An action against the thief or his heir to recover the thing stolen.

CONDICTIO SINE CAUSA. An action by which anything which has been parted with without consideration may be recovered. It also lay in case of failure of consideration, under certain circumstances. Calvinus, Lex.

CONDITION. In Civil Law. The situation of every person in some one of the different orders of persons which compose the general order of society and allot to each person therein a distinct, separate rank. Domat, tom. ii. l. 1, tit. 9, sec. i. art. viii.

A paction or agreement which regulates that which the contractors have a mind should be done if a case which they foresee should come to pass. Domat, tom. i. l. 1, tit. 1, sec. 4.

Casual conditions are such as depend upon accident, and are in no wise in the power of the person in whose favor the obligation is entered into.

Mixed conditions are such as depend upon the joint wills of the person in whose favor the obligation is contracted and of a third person: as "If you marry my cousin, I will give," etc. Pothier.

Potestative conditions are those which are in the power of the person in whose favor the obligation was contracted: as, if I contract to give my neighbor a sum of money in case he cuts down a tree.

Resolutive conditions are those which are added not to suspend the obligation till their accomplishment, but to make it cease when they are accomplished.

Suspensive obligations are those which suspend the obligation until the performance of the condition. They are casual, mixed, or potestative.

Domat says conditions are of three sorts. The first tend to accomplish the covenants to which they are annexed. The second dissolve covenants. The third neither accomplish nor avoid, but create some change. When a condition of the first sort comes to pass, the covenant is thereby made effectual. In case of conditions of the second sort, all things remain in the condition they were in by the covenant, and the effect of the condition is in suspense until the condition comes to pass and the covenant is void. Domat, lib. i. tit. 1, § 4, art. 6. See Pothier, Obl. pt. i. c. 2, art. 1, § 1; pt. ii. c. 3, art. 2.

In Common Law. The status or relative situation of a person in the state arising from the regulations of society. Thus, a person under twenty-one is an infant, with certain privileges and disabilities. Every person is bound to know the condition of the person with whom he deals.

A qualification, restriction, or limitation modifying or destroying the original act with which it is connected.

A clause in a contract or agreement which has for its object to suspend, rescind, or modify the principal obligation, or, in a case of a will, to suspend, revoke, or modify the devise or bequest.

A modus or quality annexed by him that hath an estate, or interest or right to the same, whereby an estate, etc., may either be defeated, enlarged, or created upon an uncertain event. Co. Litt. 201 a.

A qualification or restriction annexed to a conveyance of lands, whereby it is provided that in case a particular event does or does not happen, or in case the grantor or grantee does or omits to do a particular act, an estate shall commence, be enlarged, or be defeated. Greenl. Cruise, Dig. tit. xiii. c. i. § 1.

A future uncertain event on the happening or the non-happening of which the accomplishment, modification, or rescission of a testamentary disposition is made to depend.

A condition annexed to a bond is usually termed a defeasance, which see. A condition defeating a conveyance of land in a certain event is generally a mortgage. See MORTGAGE. Conditions annexed to the realty are to be distinguished from limitations; a stranger may take advantage of a limitation, but only the grantor or his heirs of a condition; 2 Dutch. 1; 3 id. 376; 2 Paine 545; a limitation always determines an estate without entry or claim, and so doth not a condition; Sheppard, Touchst. 121; 2 Bla. Com. 155; 4 Kent 122, 127; 3 Gray 142; 19 N. Y. 169; from conditional limitations; in case of a condition, the entire interest in the estate does not pass from the grantor, but a possibility of reverter remains to him and to his heirs and devisees; in case of a conditional limitation, the possibility of reverter is given over to a third person; Chal. R. P. 233; 3 Gray 142; from remainders; a condition operates to defeat an estate before its natural termination, a remainder takes effect on the completion of a preceding estate; Co. Litt. Butler's note 94; from covenants; a covenant may be said to be a contract, a condition, something affixed nomine pæne for the non-fulfilment of a contract; the question often depends upon the apparent intention of the parties, rather than upon fixed rules of construction; if the clause in question goes to the whole of the consideration, it is rather to be held a condition; 2 Parsons Contr. 31; Platt, Cov. 71; 10 East 295; see 2 Stockt. 489; 6 Barb. 386; 4 Harr. Del. 117; a covenant may be made by a grantee, a condition by the grantor only; 2 Co. 70; from charges; if a testator create a charge upon the devisee personally in respect of the estate devised, the devisee takes the estate on condition, but where a devise is made of an estate and also a bequest of so much to another person, payable "thereout" or "therefrom" or "from the estate," it is rather to be held a charge; 4 Kent 604; 12 Wheat. 498; 4 Metc. 523; 1 N. Y. 483; 14 M. & W. 698. Where a forfeiture is not distinctly expressed or implied, it is held a charge; 10 Gill & J. 480; 10 Leigh 172. See, also, 38 Me. 18; 1 Pow. Dev. 664; CHARGE; LEGACY.

Affirmative conditions are positive conditions.

Affirmative conditions implying a negative are spoken of by the older writers; but no such class is now recognized. Shep. Touchst. 117.

Collateral conditions are those which require the doing of a collateral act. Shep. Touchst. 117.

Compulsory conditions are such as expressly require a thing to be done.

Consistent conditions are those which agree with the other parts of the transaction.

Copulative conditions are those which are composed of distinct parts or separate conditions, all of which must be performed. They are generally conditions precedent, but may be subsequent. Pow. Dev. c. 15.

Covert conditions are implied conditions.

Conditions in deed are express conditions.

Disjunctive conditions are those which require the doing of one of several things. If a condition become impossible in the copulative, it may be taken in the disjunctive. Viner, Abr. Condition (S b) (Y b 2).

Express conditions are those which are created by express words. Co. Litt. 338.

Implied conditions are those which the law supposes the parties to have had in mind at the time the transaction was entered into, though no condition was expressed. Shep. Touchst. 117.

Impossible conditions are those which cannot be performed in the course of nature.

Inherent conditions are such as are annexed to the rent reserved out of the land whereof the estate is made. Shep. Touchst. 113.

Insensible conditions are repugnant conditions.

Conditions in law are implied conditions. The term is also used by the old writers without careful discrimination to denote limitations, and is little used by modern writers. Littleton § 380; 2 Bla. Com. 155.

Lawful conditions are those which the law allows to be made.

Positive conditions are those which require that the event contemplated should happen.

Possible conditions are those which may be performed.

Precedent conditions are those which are to be performed before the estate or the obligation commences, or the bequest takes effect. Powell, Dev. c. 15. A bond to convey land on the payment of the purchase-money furnishes a common example of a condition precedent. 9 Cush. 95. They are distinguished from conditions subsequent.

Repugnant conditions are those which are inconsistent with, and contrary to, the original act.

Restrictive conditions are such as contain a restraint: as, that a lessee shall not alien. Shep. Touchst. 118.

Single conditions are those which require the doing of a single thing only.

Subsequent conditions are those whose effect is not produced until after the vesting of the estate or bequest or the commencement of the obligation.

A mortgage with a condition defeating the conveyance in a certain event is a common example of a condition subsequent. All conditions must be either precedent or subsequent. The character of a condition in this respect does not depend upon the precise form of words used; 7 Gill & J. 227, 240; 2 Dall. 317; 20 Barb. 425; 6 Me. 106; 1 Va. Cas. 198; 4 Rand. 352; 6 J. J. Marsh. 161; 6 Litt. 151; 1 Spenc. 435; 1 La. Ann. 424; 1 Wis. 527; nor upon the position of the words in the instrument; 1 Term 645; Cas. temp. Talb. 166; the question is whether the conditional event is to happen before or after the principal; 4 Rand. 358. The word "if" implies a condition precedent, however, unless controlled by other words; Crabb, R. P. § 2152.

Unlawful conditions are those which are forbidden by law.

They are those which, first, require the performance of some act which is forbidden by law, or which is malum in se; or, second, require the omission of some act commanded by law; or, third, those which encourage such acts or omissions. 1 P. Wms. 189.

Void conditions are those which are of no validity or effect.

Creation of. Conditions must be made at the same time as the original conveyance or contract, but may be by a separate instrument, which is then considered as constituting one transaction with the original; 5 S. & R. 375; 7 W. & S. 335; 3 Hill 95; 3 Wend. 208; 10 Ohio 433; 10 N. H. 64; 2 Me. 132; 7 Pick. 157; 6 Blackf. 113. Conditions are sometimes annexed to and depending upon estates, and sometimes annexed to and depending upon recognizances, statutes, obligations, and other things, and are also sometimes contained in acts of parliament and records; Shep. Touchst. 117.

Unlawful conditions are void. Conditions in restraint of marriage generally are held void; Poll. Contr. 334; 13 Mo. 211; see 10 Pa. 350; 156 Mass. 265; 152 id. 523; 84 Me. 400; otherwise of conditions restraining from marriage to a particular person, or restraining a widow from a second marriage; 10 E. L. & Eq. 139; 2 Sim. 255; 6 Watts 213. A condition in general restraint of alienation is void; 1 Den. 449; 14 Miss. 730; 24 id. 203; 6 East 173; 141 U. S. 296; and see 21 Pick. 42; but a condition restraining alienation for a limited time may be good; Co. Litt. 223; 2 S. & R. 573. An unreasonable condition is also void; 62 Hun 612; as is a condition repugnant to the grant; 111 N. C. 519.

Where land is devised, there need be no limitation over to make the condition good; 1 Mod. 300; 1 Atk. 361. See 109 N. C. 461; but where the subject of the devise is personalty without a limitation over, the condition, if subsequent, is held to be in terrorem merely, and void; 1 Jarm. Wills 887; 3 Whart. 575. See 62 Hun 612. But if there be a limitation over, a non-compliance with the condition divests the bequest; 1 Eq. Cas. Abr. 112. A limitation over must be to persons who could not take advantage of a breach; 1 Wend. 388; 2 Conn. 196. A gift of personalty may not be on condition subsequent at common law, except as here stated; 1 Rolle, Abr. 412. See 21 Mo. 277.

Any words suitable to indicate the intention of the parties may be used in the creation of a condition; "On condition" is a common form of commencement.

Formerly, much importance was attached to the use of particular and formal words in the creation of a condition. Three phrases are given by the old writers by the use of which a condition was created without words giving a right of re-entry. These were Sub conditione (On condition), Provisā ita quod (Provided always), Ita quod (So that). Littleton 331; Shep. Touchst. 125.

Amongst the words used to create a condition where a clause of re-entry was added were, Quod si contingat (If it shall happen), Pro (For), Si (If), Causa (On account of); sometimes, and in case of the king's grants, but not of any other person, ad faciendum or faciendo, ea intentione, ad effectum.

or ad propositum. For avoiding a lease for years, such precise words of condition are not required; Co. Litt. 204 b. In a gift, it is said, may be present a modus, a condition and a consideration: the words of creation are ut for the modus, si for the condition, and quid for the consideration.

Technical words in a will will not create a condition where it is unreasonable to suppose that the testator intended to create a technical condition: 7 N. H. 142. The words of condition need be in no particular place in the instrument; 1 Term 645; 6 id. 668.

Construction of. Conditions which go to defeat an estate or destroy an act are strictly construed; while those which go to vest an estate are liberally construed; Crabb, R. P. § 2130; 17 N. Y. 34; 4 Gray 140; 35 N. H. 445; 18 Ill. 431; 15 How. 323. The condition of an obligation is said to be the language of the obligee, and for that reason to be construed liberally in favor of the obligor; Co. Litt. 42 a, 183 a; 2 Pars. Contr. 22; Shep. Touchst. 375; Dy. 14 b, 17 a; 1 Johns. 267. But wherever an obligation is imposed by a condition, the construction is to be favorable to the obligee; 2 Jarm. Wills 526; 1 Sumn. 440. Conditions subsequent are not favored in law but are always strictly construed because they tend to destroy estates; 73 Ia. 328; and where it is doubtful whether a clause in a deed be a covenant or a condition, the courts will incline against the latter construction; 44 N. J. Eq. 349.

Performance should be complete and effectual; 1 Rolle, Abr. 425. An inconsiderable casual failure to perform is not non-performance; 6 Dana 44; 17 N. Y. 34. Any one who has an interest in the estate may perform the condition; but a stranger gets no benefit from performing it; 10 S. & R. 186. Conditions precedent, if annexed to land, are to be strictly performed, even when affecting marriage; 1 Mod. 300; 1 Atk. 361. Conditions precedent can generally be exactly performed; and, at any rate, equity will not generally interfere to avoid the consequences of non-performance; 3 Ves. Ch. 89; 1 Atk. 361; 3 id. 330; West 350; 2 Brown, Ch. 431. But in cases of conditions subsequent, equity will interfere where there was even a partial performance, or where there is only a delay of performance; Crabb, R. P. § 2160; 4 Ind. 628; 26 Me. 525. This is the ground of equitable jurisdiction over mortgages.

Generally, where there is a gift over in case of non-performance, the parties will be held more strictly to a performance than where the estate or gift is to revert to the grantor or his heirs.

Where conditions are liberally construed, a strict performance is also required; and it may be said, in the same way, that a non-exact performance is allowed where there is a strict construction of the condition.

Generally, where no time of performance is limited, he who has the benefit of the contract may perform the condition when he pleases, at any time during his life; Beach, Wills 412; Plowd. 16; Co. Litt. 208b; and need not do it when requested; Co. Litt. 209 a. A condition precedent must be performed within a reasonable time, when no time is fixed for the performance thereof; 17 Nev. 409. But if a prompt performance be necessary to carry out the will of a testator, the beneficiary shall not have a lifetime in which to perform the condition; 5 S. & R. 384. In this case, no previous demand is necessary; 5 S. & R. 385; nor is it when the continuance of an estate depends upon an act to be done at a fixed time; 116 Ind. 424. But even then a reasonable time is allowed; 1 Rolle, Abr. 449.

If the place be agreed upon, neither party alone can change it, but either may with consent of the other; 1 Rolle 444; 11 Vt. 612; 3 Leon. 260. See CONTRACT; PERFORMANCE.

Non-performance of a condition which was possible at the time of its making, but which has since become impossible, is excused if the impossibility is caused by act of God; Poll. Contr. 387; 10 Pick. 507; or by act of law, if it was lawful at its creation; 16 Wall. 366; 1 Pa. 495; or by the act of the party; as, when the one imposing the obligation accepts another thing in satisfaction or renders the performance impossible by his own default; 21 Pick. 389; 1 Paine 652; 6 Pet. 745; 1 Cow. 339. If performance of one part becomes impossible by act of God, the whole will, in general, be excused; 1 B. & P. 242; Cro. Eliz. 280; 5 Co. 21; 1 Ld. Raym. 279.

The effect of conditions may be to suspend the obligation; as, if I bind myself to convey an estate to you on condition that you first pay one thousand dollars, in which case no obligation exists until the condition is performed: or may be to rescind the obligation; as, if you agree to buy my house on condition that it is standing unimpaired on the tenth of May, or I convey to you my farm on condition that the conveyance shall be void if I pay you one thousand dollars, in such cases the obligation is rescinded by the non-performance of the condition: or it may modify the previous obligation; as if I bind myself to convey my farm to you on the payment of four thousand dollars if you pay in bank stock, or of five thousand if you pay in money: or, in case of gift or bequest, may qualify the gift or bequest as to amount or persons.

The effect of a condition precedent is, when performed, to vest an estate, give rise to an obligation, or enlarge an estate already vested; 12 Barb. 440. Unless a condition precedent be performed, no estate will vest; and this even where the performance is prevented by the act of God or of the law; Co. Litt. 42; 2 Bla. Com. 157; 4 Kent 125; 4 Jones, N. C. 249; 109 N. C. 461. Not so if prevented by the party imposing it; 13 B. Monr. 163; 2 Vt. 469.

If a condition subsequent was void at its creation, or becomes impossible, unlawful, or in any way void, the estate or obligation remains intact and absolute; 2 Bla. Com.

157; 15 Ga. 103. Where the condition upon which an estate is to be divested and go to a third party is founded on a contingency that can never happen, the grantee will take a fee simple; 97 N. C. 206.

In case of a condition broken, if the grantor is in possession, the estate reverts at once; 5 Mass. 321; 5 S. & R. 375; 32 Me. 394; 63 Vt. 266; 129 Ind. 244; 1 Tex. Civ. App. 245. But see 2 N. H. 120. But if the grantor is out of possession, he must enter; 8 Blackf. 138; 12 Ired. 194; 18 Conn. 535; 8 N. H. 477; 34 Me. 322; 8 Exch. 67; and is then in, as of his previous estate; Co. Litt. Butler's note, 94. Only the grantor, his heirs or devisees, can take advantage of the failure to perform a condition subsequent, contained in a deed; 129 Ill. 466; 50 Ark. 141.

It is usually said in the older books that a condition is not assignable, and that no one but the grantor and his heirs can take advantage of a breach; Gilbert, Ten. 26. Statutory have equal rights in this respect with common-law heirs; 18 Conn. 635; 25 Me. 625; and in some of the United States the common-law rule has been broken in upon, and the devisee may enter; 16 Pa. 150; 5 Pick. 528; contra, 20 Barb. 455; while in others even an assignment of the grantor's interest is held valid, if made after breach; 4 Harr. Del. 140; and of a particular estate; 19 N. Y. 100. In equity, a condition with a limitation over to a third person will be regarded as a trust, and, though the legal rights of the grantor and his heirs may not be destroyed, equity will follow him and compel a performance of the trust; Co. Litt. 236 a; 6 Pick. 306; 9 Watts 60; 2 Conn. 201.

Consult Blackstone; Kent, Commentaries; Crabb; Washburn; Real Prop.; Leake, Pollock, Contracts. As to effect of conditions in deeds, see 9 Lawy. Rep. Ann. 165.

CONDITIONAL FEE. A fee which, at the common law, was restrained to some particular heirs, exclusive of others.

It was called a conditional fee by reason of the condition, expressed or implied in the donation of it, that if the donee died without such particular heirs, the land should revert to the donor. For this was a condition annexed by law to all grants whatsoever, that, on failure of the heirs specified in the grant, the grant should be at an end and the land return to its ancient proprietor.

Such a gift, then, was held to be a gift upon condition that it should revert to the donor if the donee had no heirs of his body, but, if he had, it should then remain to the donee. It was, therefore, called a fee simple, on condition that the donee had issue. As soon as the donee had issue born, his estate was supposed to become absolute, by the performance of the condition,—at least so far absolute as to enable him to charge or to alienate the land, or to forfeit it for treason. But on the passing of the statute of Westminster II., commonly called the statute De Donis Conditionalibus, the judges determined that the donee had no longer a conditional fee simple which became absolute and at his own disposal as soon as any issue was born; but they divided the estate into two parts, leaving the donee a new kind of particular estate, which they denominated a fee tail; and vesting in the donor the ultimate fee simple of the land, expectant on the failure of issue, which expectant estate was called a reversion. And hence it is said that tenant in fee tail is by virtue of the statute De Donis. 2 Bla. Com. 112.

VOL. I.—25

A conditional fee may be granted by will as well as by deed; 37 N. E. Rep. (Ind.) 322.

CONDITIONAL LIMITATION. A condition followed by a limitation over to a third person in case the condition be not fulfilled or there be a breach of it.

A condition determines an estate after breach upon entry or claim by the proper person: a limitation marks the period which determines an estate without any act on the part of him who has the next expectant interest. A conditional limitation is, therefore, of a mixed nature, partaking of that of a condition and a limitation. 3 Gray 143. The limitation over need not be to a stranger; 2 Bla. Com. 155; 11 Metc. 102; Watk. Conv. 204.

Consult CONDITION; LIMITATION; 1 Washburn, Real Prop. 459; 4 Kent 122, 127; 1 Preston, Est. §§ 40, 41, 93.

CONDITIONAL SALE. A sale in which the transfer of title is made to depend upon the performance of a condition. Black, L. Dict. See SALE; ROLLING STOCK.

CONDITIONAL STIPULATION. In Civil Law. A stipulation on condition. Inst. 3, 16, 4.

CONDITIONS OF SALE. The terms upon which the vendor of property by auction proposes to sell it.

The instrument containing these terms, when reduced to writing or printing.

It is always prudent and advisable that the conditions of sale should be printed and exposed in the auction-room: when so done, they are binding on both parties, and nothing that is said at the time of sale, to add to or vary such printed conditions, will be of any avail; 12 East 6; 6 Ves. Ch. 330; 15 id. 521; 2 Munf. 119; 1 Des. Ch. 573; 11 Johns. 555. See forms of conditions of sale in Babington Auct. 233-243; Sugden, Vend. App. no. 4.

CONDONACION. In Spanish Law. The remission of a debt, either expressly or tacitly. 14 Am. L. Reg. 641.

CONDONATION. The conditional forgiveness or remission, by a husband or wife, of a matrimonial offence which the other has committed.

"A blotting out of an imputed offence against the marital relation so as to restore the offending party to the same position he or she occupied before the offence was committed." 1 Sw. & Tr. 334. See, as to this definition, 2 Bish. Mar. & Div. § 35; 36 Ga. 286.

While the condition remains unbroken, condonation, on whatever motive it proceeded, is an absolute bar to the remedy for the particular injury condoned; Bish. Mar. & Div. § 354.

The doctrine of condonation is chiefly, though not exclusively, applicable to the offence of adultery. It may be either express, i. e. signified by words or writing, or implied from the conduct of the parties. The latter, however, is much the more common; and it is in regard to that that the chief legal difficulty has arisen. The only general rule is, that any cohabitation with the guilty party, after the commission of the offence, and with the knowledge or belief on the part of the injured party of its commission, will amount to conclusive evidence of condonation; but this presumption may be rebutted by evidence; 60 Law J. Prob. 73. See 33 Cent. L. J. 93. The construction, however, is more strict when the wife than when the husband is the delinquent party; Bish. Mar. & Div. § 355. But a mere promise to condone is not in itself a condonation; 1 Sw. & Tr. 183; 19 Ala. 363; but see, contra, 3 Blackf. 203, where there was only an unaccepted inducement held out to the wife to return. Knowledge of the offence is essential; 60 Ind. 259; 1 Bradw. 245; 23 Ark. 615. A divorce will not be granted for adultery where the parties continue to live together after it was known; 15 So. Rep. (La.) 657.

Every implied condonation is upon the implied condition that the party forgiven will abstain from the commission of the like offence thereafter; and also treat the forgiving party, in all respects, with conjugal kindness. Such, at least, is the better opinion; though the latter branch of the proposition has given rise to much discussion. It is not necessary, therefore, that the subsequent injury be of the same kind, or proved with the same clearness, or sufficient of itself, when proved, to warrant a divorce or separation. Accordingly, it seems that a course of unkind and cruel treatment will revive condoned adultery, though the latter be a ground of divorce a vinculo matrimonii, while the former will, at most, only authorize a separation from bed and board; Geary, Mar. & F. R. 281; 1 Edw. Ch. 439; 4 Paige, Ch. 460; 14 Wend. 637; 31 N. J. Eq. 572; 6 Mo. App. 572; 8 Ore. 224. Acts of cruelty against a wife revive acts of cruelty which have been condoned; 67 Hun 491; 4 Wash. St. 705.

Condonation is not so strict a bar against the wife as the husband; 3 Md. Ch. 21; 32 Miss. 279; 1 Bradw. 245; 1 Hag. Ec. 773.

The presumption of condonation from cohabitation in cases of cruelty is not so strong as in cases of adultery; 2 Bish. Mar. & Div. § 50 et seq. See 5 Am. L. Reg. N. S. 641. A divorce on the ground of cruelty will not be granted where the parties lived together a long time after the alleged cruelty and before the action was brought, as the offence will be presumed to have been condoned; 109 N. C. 139; 140 Ill. 326; 49 Ill. App. 573.

CONDUCT MONEY. Money paid to a witness for his travelling expenses. Wharton.

CONDUCTIO (Lat.). A hiring; a bailment for hire.

It is the correlative of locatio, a letting for hire. Conducti actio, in the civil law, is an action which the hirer of a thing or his heir had against the latter or his heir to be allowed to use the thing hired. Conducere, to hire a thing. Conductor, a hirer, a carrier; one who undertakes to perform labor on another's property for a specified sum. Conductus, the thing hired. Calvinus, Lex.; Du Cange; 2 Kent 586.

CONE AND KEY. A woman at fourteen or fifteen years of age may take charge of her house and receive cone and key (that is, keep the accounts and keys). Cowel. Said by Lord Coke to be cover and keye, meaning that at that age a woman knew what in her house should be kept under lock and key. Co. 2d Inst. 203.

CONFECTIO (Lat. from conficere). The making and completion of a written instrument. 5 Co. 1.

CONFEDERACY. In Criminal Law. An agreement between two or more persons to do an unlawful act or an act which, though not unlawful in itself, becomes so by the confederacy. The technical term usually employed to signify this offence is conspiracy. See 41 Wis. 284; 52 How. Pr. 353.

In Equity Pleading. An improper combination alleged to have been entered into between the defendants to a bill in equity.

A general charge of confederacy is made a part of a bill in chancery, and is the fourth part, in order, of the bill; but it has become merely formal, except in cases where the complainant intends to show that such a combination actually exists or existed, in which case a special charge of such confederacy must be made. Story, Eq. Pl. § 29; Mitf. Eq. Pl. 41; Cooper, Eq. Pl. 9.

In International Law. An agreement between two or more states or nations, by which they unite for their mutual protection and good. This term is applied to such an agreement made between two independent nations; but it is also used to signify the union of different states of the same nation: as, the confederacy of the states.

The original thirteen states, in 1781, adopted for their federal government the "Articles of confederation and perpetual union between the states." These were completed on the 15th of November, 1777, and, with the exception of Maryland, which afterwards also agreed to them, were adopted by the several states, which were thereby formed into a federal government, going into effect on the first day of March, 1781, 1 Story, Const. § 225, and so remained until the adoption of the present constitution, which acquired the force of the supreme law of the land on the first Wednesday of March, 1789. 5 Wheat. 420. See ARTICLES OF CONFEDERATION.

CONFEDERATE BONDS. As the bonds of the Confederate States have been declared illegal by the Fourteenth Amendment, a contract entered into since the war for the sale and delivery of such bonds is void, and no action will lie for a breach of the contract; 16 Fed. Rep. 53.

CONFEDERATE MONEY. Contracts made during the rebellion in Confederate money may be enforced in the United States courts, and parties compelled to pay in lawful money of the United States the actual value of the notes at the time and place of contract; 115 U. S. 556; and when payment was accepted and receipted for by the creditor, it was held to be a valid payment; 117 U. S. 327. These notes were currency imposed upon the community by irresistible force, and it must be considered in the courts of law the same as if it had been issued by a foreign government temporarily occupying a part of the territory of the United States; 8 Wall. 1; and a contract payable in such notes was not invalid; 15 Wall. 448; 19 id. 556; 111 U. S. 50; 103 id. 792; 94 id. 434; 105 id. 132; but where a contract was entered into before the war, and the deferred payments came due and were discharged with depreciated currency, it was held, as against the non-ratification of the payment, to be void; 32 Fed. Rep. 511. Contra, 4 S. W. Rep. (Tex.) 309.

After one has accepted payment in Confederate money and acquiesces in the transaction for fifteen years, he is concluded by laches from disputing its validity; 145 U. S. 214. Where payment was made in 1864 in such money it was sufficient consideration though it afterwards became worthless; 1 Tex. Civ. App. 354. The act of a fiduciary in accepting Confederate money in payment of debts due the estate and investing the proceeds in bonds of the Confederate States issued for the avowed purpose of waging war against the United States is wholly illegal and void; 32 Fed. Rep. 511.

CONFEDERATE STATES. The Confederate States were a de facto government in the sense that its citizens were bound to render the government obedience in civil matters, and did not become responsible, as wrong-doers, for such acts of obedience; 8 Wall. 9; but it was not strictly a de facto government; ibid.; see 96 U. S. 176. During the war, the inhabitants of the Confederate States were treated as belligerents; 8 Wall. 10; 2 id. 404. Land sold to the Confederate government, and captured by the Federal government, became the property of the United States; 16 Wall. 414.

The Confederate States was an illegal organization, within the provision of the constitution of the United States prohibiting any treaty, alliance, or confederation of one state with another; whatever efficacy, therefore, its enactments possessed in any state entering into that organization, must be attributed to the sanction given to them by that state; 96 U. S. 176. The laws of the several states were valid except so far as they tended to impair the national authority or the rights of citizens under the constitution; ibid.

Unless suspended or superseded by the commanders of the United States forces which occupied the insurrectionary states, the laws of those states, so far as they affected the inhabitants, remained in force during the war, and over them their tribunals continued to exercise their ordinary jurisdiction; 97 U. S. 509. See articles in 2 So. L. Rev. 313; 3 id. 47.

CONFEDERATION. The name given to the form of government which the American colonies during the revolution devised for their mutual safety and government.

CONFERENCE. In French Law. A similarity between two laws or two systems of laws.

In International Law. Verbal explanations between the representatives of at least two nations, for the purpose of accelerating matters by avoiding the delays and difficulties of written communications.

A meeting of plenipotentiaries of different nations to adjust differences or formulate a plan of joint action; as, the conference at Berlin of representatives of the United States, Great Britain, and Germany respecting the affairs of Samoa, in 1889, and the monetary conference at Brussels of representatives of the United States and several European powers in 1894. See CONGRESS.

In Legislation. Mutual consultations by two committees appointed, one by each house of a legislature, in cases where the houses cannot agree in their action.

CONFESSION. In Criminal Law. The voluntary declaration made by a person who has committed a crime or misdemeanor, to another, of the agency or participation which he had in the same.

An admission or acknowledgment by a prisoner, when arraigned for an offence, that he committed the crime with which he is charged.

Judicial confessions are those made before a magistrate or in court in the due course of legal proceedings.

Extra-judicial confessions are those made by the party elsewhere than before a magistrate or in open court.

Voluntary confessions are admissible in evidence; 20 Ga. 60; 12 La. Ann. 805; 3 Ind. 552; 30 Miss. 593; 30 Tex. App. 619; 94 Ala. 50; 3 Wash. St. 99; 92 Ky. 282; 93 Mich. 638; 76 Cal. 328; 25 Neb. 55; 41 La. Ann. 617; but a confession is not admissible in evidence where it is obtained by temporal inducement, by threats, promise or hope of favor held out to the party in respect of his escape from the charge against him, by a person in authority; 4 C. & P. 570; 4 Harr. Del. 503; 37 N. H. 175; 5 Fla. 285; 10 Ind. 106; 10 Gratt. 734; 40 Mich. 706; 38 Ala. 422; 55 Ga. 136; 63 id. 600; 50 Miss. 147; 1 Mont. 394; 2 Col. 186; 31 Tex. Cr. App. 489; 37 Vt. 191; 84 Pa. 200; 91 N. C. 581; see 18 N. Y. 9; 108 Mass. 285; 135 id. 269; 119 id. 305; 55 Vt. 510; 126 Mass. 464; 66 N. C. 639; 51 Ill. 236; 44 L. T. Rep. N. s. 687; 29 Pa. 429; 113 N. C. 688; or where there is reason to presume that such person appeared to the party to sanction such threat or inducement; 5 C. & P. 539; 2 Crawf. & D. 347; 1 Dev. 259; but the inducement must be held out by a person in authority; 12 E. L. & Eq. 591; 10 Gray 173; 3 Heisk. 232; but see 4 C. & P. 570; otherwise the confession is admissible; 1 C. & P. 97, 129; Russ. & R. 153; 1 Leach 291; 1 Gray 461; 1 Strobh. 155; 9 Rich. 428; 14 Gratt. 652; 19 Vt. 116; 125 Mass. 210; 44 Miss. 332; 15 La. Ann. 145; 39 Mich. 245; but see 5 Jones, N. C. 432; 32 Miss. 382; 2 Ohio St. 583; or if the inducement be spiritual merely; 1 Mood. 197; Jebb, Ir. 15; 15 Mass. 161; 8 Ohio St. 98; or an appeal to the party to speak the truth; L. R. 1 C. C. C. 362; 44 Miss. 333; 125 Mass. 210; even if the appeal comes from an officer of the law; 15 Ir. L. R. N. s. 60; 51 Ind. 359; 44 Ia. 82; 2 Tex. Ap. 588; 94 Ala. 55; 160 Mass. 530; but see 2 Crawf. & D. 152; Tayl. Ev. § 804. Mere advice to confess and tell the truth does not exclude; 75 N. C. 356; 54 Mo. 192; 55 Ga. 592; but see 36 S. C. 524; and the temporal inducement must have been held out by the person to whom the confession was made; Phill. Ev. 430; 4 C. & P. 223; Jebb 15; unless collusion be suspected; 4 C. & P. 550. The fact that defendant was intoxicated when he made his confession, though tending to affect its weight, is not ground for its exclusion; 32 Tex. Cr. App. 625.

A confession is admissible though elicited by questions put to a prisoner by a constable, magistrate, or other person; 5 C. & P. 312; 8 id. 179, 621; 14 Ark. 556; 119 Mass. 305; 63 N. Y. 590; 57 Mo. 102; 16 Kans. 14; 94 Ala. 50; 31 Tex. Crim. R. 276; 44 Ia. 82; even though the question assumes the prisoner's guilt or the confession is obtained by trick or artifice; 1 Mood. 28; Phill. Ev. 427; 33 Miss. 347; 85 Mo. 145; 14 Minn. 165; 80 N. Y. 484; 40 Ala. 314; see 8 C. & P. 622; 91 Ga. 277; and although it appears that the prisoner was not warned that what he said would be used against him; 8 Mod. 89; 9 C. & P. 124. Statements made to a trial judge freely and voluntarily are admissible in evidence; 45 La. Ann. 36.

A statement not compulsory, made by a party not at the time a prisoner under a criminal charge, is admissible in evidence against him, although it is made upon oath; 5 C. & P. 530; 7 Ired. 96; 5 Rich. 391; 122 Mass. 454; 71 N. Y. 602; 41 Tex. 39; 59 Ind. 105; 31 Tex. Cr. App. 485; contra, 39 Miss. 615; see 8 C. & P. 250; otherwise, if the answers are compulsory; 1 Den. Cr. Cas. 236; 6 C. & P. 161, 177; 15 N. Y. 384; 3 Wis. 823; 2 Park. Cr. Cas. 663; 2 Dill. 405; 49 Cal. 69. A confession may be inferred from the conduct and demeanor of a prisoner when a statement is made in his presence affecting himself; 5 C. & P. 332; 21 Pick. 515; 98 N. C. 595; 76 Ill. 217; 36 Ohio St. 628; 47 Ind. 251; 121 Mass. 69; see 26 Mich. 1; 32 Ala. N. s. 560; 126 Mass. 374; 63 N. Y. 522; 14 Tex. App. 474; unless such statement is made in the deposition of a witness or examination of another prisoner before a magistrate; 1 Mood. 347; 6 C. & P. 164.

Where a confession has been obtained, or an inducement held out, under circumstances which would render a confession inadmissible, a confession subsequently made is not admissible in evidence; unless from the length of time intervening, from proper warning of the consequences, or from other circumstances, there is reason to presume that the hope or fear which influenced the first confession is dispelled; 1 Greenl. Ev. 221; 4 C. & P. 225; 1 Wheel. Cr. Cas. 67; 5 Halst. 163; 3 Jones, N. C.

443; 5 Rich. 391; 24 Miss. 512; 33 Neb. 663; 113 N. C. 624; 10 N. J. L. 163; 37 Vt. 191; 2 Cra. C. C. 76; and the motives proved to have been offered will be presumed to continue, and to have produced the confession, unless the contrary is shown by clear evidence, and the confession will be rejected; 1 Dev. 259; 12 Miss. 31; 5 Cush. 605; 18 Conn. 166; 2 Leigh 701; 32 Ala. N. s. 560; 1 Sneed 75. And see 6 C. & P. 404; 5 Jones, N. C. 315; 12 La. Ann. 895.

Under such circumstances, contemporaneous declarations of the party are receivable in evidence, or not, according to the attending circumstances; but any act of the party, though done in consequence of such confession, is admissible if it appears from a fact thereby discovered that so much of the confession as immediately relates to it is true; 1 Leach 263, 386; Russ. & R. 151; 9 Pick. 496; 32 Miss. 382; 7 Rich. 327.

A confession made before a magistrate is admissible though made before the evidence of the witnesses against the party was concluded; 4 C. & P. 567. See 45 La. Ann. 36.

Parol evidence, precise and distinct, of a statement made by a prisoner before a magistrate during his examination, is admissible though such statement neither appears in the written examination nor is vouched for by the magistrate; 61 Me. 171; 2 Russ. Cr. 876; 7 C. & P. 188; but not if it is of a character which it was the duty of the magistrate to have noted; 1 Greenl. Ev. § 227, n. Parol evidence of a confession before a magistrate may be given where the written examination is inadmissible through informality; 1 Lew. 46; 4 C. & P. 550, n.; 1 M. & M. 403; Busb. 239.

The whole of what the prisoner said must be taken together; 1 Greenl. Ev. 218; 2 C. & K. 221; 9 Leigh 633; 2 Dall. 86; 5 Miss. 364. See 3 Park. Cr. Cas. 256; 26 Ala. N. s. 107; 11 Colo. 637; 61 Mo. 302; 24 Wis. 144; 39 Cal. 52; 11 Gray 323. Where a prisoner signs the confession which is written by another for him, he waives any objection to it as evidence; 157 Mass. 200.

All confessions are prima facie involuntary and therefore inadmissible, and they can be rendered admissible only by showing that they are voluntary and not constrained; 83 Ala. 1, 76; 84 id. 430; 50 Ark. 305; but a confession is not rendered inadmissible by the fact that the party is in custody, provided it is not extorted by inducements or threats; 160 U. S. 355.

The prisoner's confession, when the corpus delicti is not otherwise proved, is insufficient to warrant his conviction; 1 Hayw. 455; 5 Halst. 163, 185; 18 Miss. 229; 17 Ill. 426; 2 Tex. 79. See, contra, Russ. & R. 481, 509; 1 Leach 311; 3 Park. Cr. Cas. 401; 11 Ga. 225. Consult Greenleaf; Phillipps, Evidence; Wharton, Criminal Evidence; Roscoe, Crim. Ev; Joy, Confessions; 1 Bennett & H. Lead. Cr. Cas. 112; ADMISSIONS.

CONFESSION AND AVOIDANCE.
In Pleading. The admission in a pleading of the truth of the facts as stated in the pleading to which it is an answer, and the allegation of new and related matter of fact which destroys the legal effect of the facts so admitted. The plea and any of the subsequent pleadings may be by way of confession and avoidance, or, which is the same thing, in confession and avoidance. Pleadings in confession and avoidance must give color. See COLOR; 1 East 212. They must admit the material facts of the opponent's pleading, either expressly in terms; Dy. 171 b; or in effect. They must conclude with a verification; 1 Saund. 103, n. For the form of statement, see Steph. Pl. 72, 79.

Pleas in confession and avoidance are either in justification and excuse, which go to show that the plaintiff never had any right of action, as, for example, son assault demesne, or in discharge, which go to show that his right has been released by some matter subsequent.

See, generally, 1 Chit. Pl. 540; 2 id. 644; Co. Litt. 282 b; Archb. Civ. Pl. 215; Dane, Abr. Index.

CONFESSOR. A priest of some Christian sect, who receives an account of the sins of his people, and undertakes to give them absolution of their sins. The common law does not recognize any such relation, at least so as to exempt or prevent the confessor from disclosing such communications as are made to him in this capacity, when he is called upon as a witness. See CONFIDENTIAL COMMUNICATIONS.

CONFIDENCE. This word is considered peculiarly appropriate to create a trust. It is, when applied to the subject of a trust, as nearly a synonym as the English language is capable of. Trust is a confidence which one man reposes in another, and confidence is a trust. 2 Pa. 133.

CONFIDENTIAL COMMUNICATIONS. Those statements with regard to any transaction made by one person to another during the continuance of some relation between them which calls for or warrants such communications.

At law, certain classes of such communications are held not to be proper subjects of inquiry in courts of justice, and the persons receiving them are excluded from disclosing them when called upon as witnesses, upon grounds of public policy.

Secrets of state and communications between the government and its officers are usually privileged; 2 S. & R. 23; 6 Watts 164; 22 N. J. Eq. 111; 1 F. & F. 425; 5 H. & N. 538; 92 U. S. 107. So also the consultations of the judges, the testimony of arbitrators in certain cases, and the sources of information in criminal prosecutions. 1 Wharton, Ev. sec. 600; 11 Am. Rep. 349; 11 Barb. (N. Y.) 510; 10 Ohio 112; 23 Me. 85; 4 C. & P. 327; 78 Mo. 115; 14 Am. Dec. 214; 12 Am. Rep. 736; Steven's Dig. Ev. art. 113.

Of this character are all communications made between a husband and his lawful wife in all cases in which the interests of the other party are involved; Tayl. Ev.

781; 13 Pet. 223; 117 Mass. 90; 41 Ga. 613; 21 La. Ann. 343; 15 Me. 104; 2 Leigh 142; 6 Binn. 488; 6 H. & J. 153; 4 Term 678; 5 Esp. 107; 132 N. Y. 181; 35 Kan. 391; 22 Ill. 661; 101 Ind. 160. See 10 Metc. 287; 3 Day 37; 4 Vt. 116; 1 Dougl. 48; 3 Harring. 88; 8 C. & P. 284. Nor does it make any difference which party is called upon as a witness; Ry. & M. 352; or when the relation commenced; 3 C. & P. 558; or whether it has terminated; 13 Pet. 209; 3 Dev. & B. 110; 1 Barb. 392; 6 East 192; 1 C. & P. 364; 98 Pa. 501; 45 Ind. 366; 102 id. 102; 81 Ill. 266; 29 Ga. 470; 31 Ark. 604. And see 13 Pick. 445; 7 Vt. 506; 5 Ala. N. S. 224; 1 B. Monr. 224. A third party who overheard such a conversation may testify as to it; 110 Mass. 181; 127 Ill. 518. The wife may be examined as to a conversation with her husband in the presence of a third party; 35 Vt. 379; 46 Barb. 158; 62 Hun 622; 154 Mass. 488; 131 id. 31; 61 Ind. 224; 25 Ohio St. 500; but not if the third person failed to hear or paid no attention to the conversation; 113 Mass. 160.

The confidential counsellor, solicitor, or attorney of any party cannot be compelled to disclose papers delivered or communications made to him, or letters or entries made by him, in that capacity; 4 B. & Ad. 876; 45 N. Y. 57; 80 id. 394; 33 Wis. 205; 12 Pick. 89; 23 Mo. 474; 11 Wheat. 295; 109 Mo. 1; 42 Ill. App. 370; 33 Ark. 771; 119 Ill. 543; 103 Mass. 523; 110 U. S. 311; 74 Me. 540; 9 Exch. 298; 7 Q. Ch. 528; 8 Mass. 370; nor even if the communication is made in the presence of a third person; 155 Mass. 378. nor will the client be compelled to disclose such communications; 43 Ind. 112; 34 Ohio St. 91; 28 Vt. 701; not even when the client takes the witness stand in his own behalf; 43 Ind. 112; 38 Ia. 395; 34 Ohio St. 91; contra, 101 Mass. 193. The privilege extends to all matters made the subject of professional intercourse, without regard to the pendency of legal proceedings; 5 C. & P. 592; 6 Madd. 47; 22 Pa. 89; 12 Pick. 89; 38 Me. 581; 25 Vt. 47; 24 Miss. 134; 80 N. Interpreters; 4 Term 756; 3 Wend. 337; 4 Munf. 273; 7 Ind. 202; 1 Pet. C. C. 356; and agents to collect evidence; 2 Beav. 173; 1 Phill. Ch. 471, 687; are considered as standing in the same relation as the attorney; so, also, is a barrister's clerk; 2 C. & P. 195; 1 id. 545; 5 id. 177; 5 M. & G. 271; 8 D. & R. 726; 12 Pick. 93; 3 Wend. 337; 16 N. Y. 180; 5 Cal. 450; but not a student at law in an attorney's office; 7 Cush. 576.

The cases in which communications to counsel have been holden not to be privileged may be classed under the following heads: When the communication was made before the attorney was employed as such; 1 Ventr. 197; see 38 Me. 581; 79 Cal. 636; 40 Hun 336; 34 Mo. 337; after the attorney's employment has ceased; 4 Term 431; 12 La. Ch. 189; 2 Curt. Eccl. 866; 29 N. H. 163; see 46 Ia. 88; when the matter communicated was not in its nature private, and could in no sense be termed the subject of a confidential communication; 7 East 357; 2 Brod. & B. 176; 3 Johns. Cas. 198; 2 Ind. App. 170; when it was intended that the communications should be imparted by him to others; 91 Cal. 63; when the things disclosed had no reference to professional employment, though disclosed while the relation of attorney and client subsisted; Peake 77; when the attorney made himself a subscribing witness; 10 Mod. 40; 2 Curt. Eccl. 866; 3 Burr. 1687; when he is a party to the transaction; 3 Wis. 274; Story, Eq. Pl. § 601; when he was directed to plead the facts to which he is called to testify; 7 Mart. La. N. S. 179; where an attorney is employed only to draw up a deed and bill of sale to be executed by another to such person, he may testify as to what passed between them and himself; 6 Dak. 107. The attorney may be called upon to prove his client's handwriting; 120 Mass. 215; L. R. 8 Eq. 575; L. R. 5 Ch. Ap. 703; 47 Fed. R. 5 Ch. 703. He may be required to testify as to whether he was retained by his client, and in what capacity; Whart. Ev. 589; 12 Pa. 304; but see 11 Wheat. 280.

After testator's death on the question whether an instrument present for probate was his will, the attorney may testify as to directions given him in its preparation by testator; 157 Mass. 90; see 111 N. Y. 239. He may testify as to what was said in their presence by a third person brought by his client; 106 Mo. 313.

The doctrine of privileged communications does not apply to testimony of a solicitor of patents, who is not an attorney-at-law; 49 Fed. Rep. 124.

Communications between a party or his legal adviser and witnesses are privileged; L. R. 8 Eq. 522; 16 id. 112; but see 63 Hun 632; so are communications between parties to a cause touching the preparation of evidence; Hare, Discov. 152; 43 L. J. C. P. 206; but see 6 B. & S. 888; 3 H. & N. 871. Communications between an attorney and client are not privileged where the latter disclaims the existence of such relations; 63 Hun 632.

CONFIRMATIO (Lat. confirmare). The conveyance of an estate, or the communication of a right that one hath in or unto lands or tenements, to another that hath the possession thereof, or some other estate therein, whereby a voidable estate is made sure and unavoidable, or whereby a particular estate is increased or enlarged. Shep. Touchst. 311; 2 Bla. Com. 325.

Confirmatio crescens tends and serves to increase or enlarge a rightful estate, and so to pass an interest.

Confirmatio diminuens tends or serves to diminish and abridge the services whereby the tenant holds.

Confirmatio perficiens tends and serves to confirm and make good a wrongful and defeasible estate, by adding the right to the possession or defeasible seisin, or to make a conditional estate absolute, by discharging the condition.

CONFIRMATIO CHARTARUM (Lat. confirmation of the charters). A statute passed in the 25 Edw. I., whereby the Great Charter is declared to be allowed as the common law; all judgments contrary to it are declared void; copies of it are ordered to be sent to all cathedral-churches and read twice a year to the people; and sentence of excommunication is directed to be as constantly denounced against all those that, by word or deed or counsel, act contrary thereto or in any degree infringe it. 1 Bla. Com. 128.

CONFIRMATIO PERFICIENS. A confirmation which makes valid a wrongful and defeasible title, or makes a conditional estate, absolute. Shep. Touchst. 311; Black.

CONFIRMATION. A contract by which that which was voidable is made firm and unavoidable.

A species of conveyance.

Where a party, acting for himself or by a previously authorized agent, has attempted to enter into a contract, but has done so in an informal or invalid manner, he confirms the act and thus renders it valid, in which case it will take effect as between the parties from the original making. See 2 Bouvier, Inst. nn. 2067-2069.

To make a valid confirmation, the party must be apprized of his rights; and where there has been a fraud in the transaction he must be aware of it and intend to confirm his contract. See 1 Ball & B. 353; 2 Sch. & L. 486; 12 Ves. Ch. 373; 1 id. 215; 1 Atk. 301; 8 Watts 280.

A confirmation does not strengthen a void estate. For confirmation may make a voidable or defeasible estate good, but cannot operate on an estate void in law; Co. Litt. 295. The canon law agrees with this rule; and hence the maxim, qui confirmat nihil dat. Toullier, Dr. Civ. Fr. 1. 3, t. 3, c. 6, n. 476. See Viner, Abr.; Comyns, Dig.; Ayliffe, Pand.*386; 1 Chit. Pr. 315; 3 Gill & J. 290; 3 Yerg. 405; 1 Ill. 236; 9 Co. 142 a; RATIFICATION.

CONFIRMEE. He to whom a confirmation is made.

CONFIRMOR. He who makes a confirmation to another.

CONFISCARE. To confiscate.

CONFISCATE. To appropriate to the use of the state.

Especially used of the goods and property of alien enemies found in a state in time of war. 1 Kent 52 et seq. Bona confiscata and forisfacta are said to be the same (1 Bla. Com. 299), and the result to the individual is the same whether the property be forfeited or confiscated; but, as distinguished, an individual forfeits, a state confiscates, goods or other property. Used also as an adjective—forfeited. 1 Bla. Com. 299.

It is a general rule that the property of the subjects of an enemy found in the country may be appropriated by the government without notice, unless there be a treaty to the contrary; Hall, Int. L. 397; 1 Gall. 563; 3 Dall. 199. It has been frequently provided by treaty that foreign subjects should be permitted to remain and continue their business, notwithstanding a rupture between the governments, so long as they conducted themselves innocently; and when there was no such treaty, such a liberal permission has been announced in the very declaration of war. Vattel, l. 3, c. 4, § 63. Sir Michael Foster (Discourses on High Treason, pp. 185-6) mentions several instances of such declarations by the king of Great Britain; and he says that alien enemies were thereby enabled to acquire personal chattels and to maintain actions for the recovery of their personal rights in as full a manner as alien friends; 1 Kent 57.

In the United States, the broad principle has been assumed "that war gives to the sovereign full right to take the persons and confiscate the property of the enemy, wherever found. The mitigations of this rigid rule which the policy of modern times has introduced into practice will more or less affect the exercise of this right, but cannot impair the right itself;" 8 Cra. 122. Commercial nations have always considerable property in the possession of their neighbors; and when war breaks out, the question what shall be done with enemies' property found in the country is one rather of policy than of law, and is properly addressed to the consideration of the legislature, and not to courts of law. The strict right of confiscation exists in congress; and without a legislative act authorizing the confiscation of enemies' property, it cannot be condemned; 8 Cra. 128.

The right of confiscation exists as fully in case of a civil war as it does when the war is foreign, and rebels in arms against the lawful government, or persons inhabiting the territory exclusively within the control of the rebel belligerents, may be treated as public enemies. So may adherents, or aiders and abettors of such a belligerent, though not resident in such enemy's territory; 11 Wall. 269. Proceedings under the Confiscation Act of July 17, 1862, were justified as an exercise of belligerent rights against a public enemy, but were not, in their nature, a punishment for treason. Therefore, confiscation being a proceeding distinct from, and independent of, the treasonable guilt of the owner of the property confiscated, pardon for treason will not restore rights to property previously condemned and sold in the exercise of belligerent rights as against a purchaser in good faith and for value; 91 U. S. 21.

The claim of a right to confiscate debts contracted by individuals in time of peace, and which remain due to subjects of the enemy in time of war, rests very much upon the same principles as that concerning the enemy's tangible property found in the country at the commencement of the war. But it is the universal practice to forbear to seize and confiscate debts and credits; 1 Kent 64. See 4 Cra. 415; T. U. P. Charlt. 140; 2 H. & J. 101, 112, 286, 471; 7 Conn. 428; 1 Day 4; Kirb. 228, 291; 2 Tayl. 115; Cam. & N. 77, 492; 2 Dill. 555; 15 Wall. 591; Chase, Dec. 259.

A suit in confiscation is an action of entirely different nature from a proceeding in prize. Confiscation is the act of the sovereign against a rebellious subject. Condemnation as prize is the act of a belligerent against another belligerent. Confiscation may be effected by such means, either summary or arbitrary, as the sovereign expressing its will through lawful channels, may please to adopt. Condemnation as prize can only be made in accordance with principles of law recognized in the common jurisprudence of the world. Both are proceedings in rem, but confiscation recognizes the title of the original owner to the property which is to be forfeited, while in prize the tenure of the property seized is qualified, provisional and destitute of absolute ownership; Blatchf. Pr. Cas. 620. To confiscate property seized upon land, resort must be had to the common-law side of the court; 20 Wall. 110; prize proceedings are always in admiralty; 14 Ct. Cls. 48.

CONFITENS REUS. An accused person who admits his guilt. Wharton.

CONFLICT OF LAWS. A contrariety or opposition in the laws of states or countries in those cases where, from their relations to each other or to the subject-matter in dispute, the rights of the parties are liable to be affected by the laws of both jurisdictions.

As a term of art, it also includes the deciding which law is in such cases to have superiority. It also includes many cases where there is no opposition between two systems of law, but where the question is how much force may be allowed to a foreign law with reference to which an act has been done, either directly or by legal implication, in the absence of any domestic law exclusively applicable to the case.

An opposition or inconsistency of domestic laws upon the same subject.

Among the leading canons on the subject are these: the laws of every state affect and bind directly all property, real or personal, situated within its territory, all contracts made and acts done and all persons resident within its jurisdiction, and are supreme within its own limits by virtue of its sovereignty; 6 Binn. 361; 7 Wall. 151; 37 Mo. 354; Cowp. 208; 4 T. R. 192. Ambassadors and other public ministers while in the state to which they are sent, and members of an army marching through or stationed in a friendly state, are not subject to this rule; 4 Barb. 522; 4 Cra. 173.

Possessing exclusive authority, with the above qualification, a state may regulate the manner and circumstances under which property, whether real or personal, in possession or in action, within it, shall be held, transmitted, or transferred, by sale, barter, or bequest, or recovered or enforced; the condition, capacity, and state of all persons within it; the validity of contracts and other acts done there; the resulting rights and duties growing out of these contracts and acts; and the remedies and modes of administering justice in all cases; Story, Confl. Laws § 18; Vattel, b. 2, c. 7, §§ 84, 85.

Whatever force and obligation the laws of one country have in another depends upon the laws and municipal regulations of the latter; that is to say, upon its own proper jurisprudence and polity, and upon its own express or tacit consent; Huberus, lib. 1, t. 3, § 2. When a statute or the unwritten or common law of the country forbids the recognition of the foreign law, the latter is of no force whatever. When both are silent, then the question arises, which of the conflicting laws is to have effect.

Generally, force and effect will be given by any state to foreign laws in cases where from the transactions of the parties they are applicable, unless they affect injuriously her own citizens, violate her express enactments, or are contra bonos mores.

The broad rule as to contracts is thus stated by Mr. Wharton (Confl. Laws § 401): "Obligations, in respect to the mode of their solemnization, are subject to the rule locus regit actum; in respect to their interpretation, to the lex loci contractus; in respect to the mode of their performance, to the law of the place of their performance. But the lex fori determines when and how such laws, when foreign, are to be adopted, and in all cases not specified above, supplies the applicatory law." This rule is quoted by Hunt, J., in 91 U. S. 411. In a later part of his opinion, in the same case, he says: "Matters bearing upon the execution, the interpretation, and the validity of a contract are determined by the law of the place where the contract is made. Matters connected with its performance are regulated by the law prevailing at the place of performance. Matters respecting the remedy, such as the bringing of suits, admissibility of evidence, statutes of limitations, depend upon the law of the place where the suit is brought. A careful consideration of the decisions of this country and of England will sustain these positions;" cited in 125 Mass. 374, which is in turn cited in 106 U. S. 124, where, in a suit on a bond executed in New York to indemnify the plaintiff's intestate assuery in an appeal bond in a suit in Louisiana, the court defined the "seat of the obligation" and held the law applicable to be the lex loci solutionis which was the law of Louisiana; the lex loci contractus was said to be a confusing phrase, because it is in reality the law not of the place of execution but of the seat of the obligation, and that might be either the place of execution or the place of performance.

Mr. Wharton has since expressed the rule in the following terms, in the second edition (1881) of his Confl. Laws § 401: "A contract, so far as concerns its formal making, is to be determined by the place where it is solemnized, unless the lex situs of property disposed of otherwise requires; so far as concerns its interpretation, by the law of the place where its terms are settled, unless the parties had the usages of another place in view; so far as concerns the remedy, by the law of the place of suit; and so far as concerns its performance, by the law of the place of performance." See 62 Ga. 241; 62 Ala. 518; 48 N. H. 176; 74 Ill. 197; 150 Pa. 466; 11 Cal. 118; as to lex solutionis; 22 Kan. 89; 4 McLean 440; 76 Ark. 356; 44 La. Ann. 511; 14 Johns. 338; 3 Mas. 91; as to lex fori; 80 N. C. 294; 26 Ark. 356; 11 La. 465; 1 Pet. 312; 4 McLean 540; 56 Ark. 187; 5 How. 83; as to lex loci; where a contract is a fraud on the laws of the lex fori, it will not be enforced; 47 Me. 120; See 49 Minn. 356; nor will it be enforced if contrary to public policy; Poll. Contr. 371; Whart. Confl. Laws § 490.

REAL ESTATE. In general, the mode of conveying, incumbering, transmitting, devising, and controlling real estate is governed by the law of the place of situation of the property; 44 Minn. 348; 126 Ind. 58; 7 Cr. 115; 11 How. 33; 3 La. Ann. 418; 14 Ves. 541; 4 T. R. 182. See LEX REI SITÆ.

Perhaps an exception may exist in the case of mortgages; 23 Miss. 175; 3 McLean 397. But the point cannot be considered as settled; 1 Washb. R. P. 524; Story, Conf. Laws § 363; Westl. Priv. Int. Law 75. It is said by Wharton (Conf. Laws § 368) that the law governing the mortgage, as such, is the law of situs of the land which the mortgage covers; but the debt is governed by the law of the domicile of the party to whom it is due, no matter where the property be situated; see 46 N. H. 300; 5 Sawy. 32; 41 N. Y. 313; 21 Wis. 340; 138 Ill. 559; 1 N. D. 216; and that when the money is invested on the land for which the mortgage is given, the lex sitæ prevails. For the purposes of taxation a debt has its situs at the domicile of the creditor; 100 U. S. 490.

PERSONAL PROPERTY. For the general rules as to the disposition of personal property, see DOMICIL. Bills of exchange and promissory notes are to be governed, as to validity and interpretation, by the law of the place of making, as are other contracts. The residence of the drawee of a bill of exchange, and the place of making a promissory note where no other place of payment is specified, is the locus contractus; 10 B. & C. 21; 1 Woodb. & M. 381; 4 C. & P. 35; 4 Mich. 450; 6 McLean 622; 35 N. J. L. 285; 9 Cush. 46; 26 Vt. 698; 11 Gratt. 477; 3 Gill 430; 18 Conn. 138; 6 Ind. 107; 65 N. H. 39; 89 Ky. 461; see 11 Tex. 54; 17 Miss. 220, where the place of address is said to be the place of making. As between the drawee and drawer and other parties (but not as between an indorser and indorsee, 19 N. Y. 436; but see 14 Vt. 33), each indorsement is considered a new contract; 14 B. Monr. 556; 5 Sandf. 330; 2 Ga. 158; 3 McLean 397. On a bill of exchange drawn in one state and payable in another, the time within which notice of protest must be mailed is determined by the law of a latter state; 125 Ind. 375. See LEX LOCI. A statute of limitations of a foreign state providing that an action on a note shall be brought within a certain time after the cause of action accrues bars the debt itself if not brought within the time limited, and may be pleaded in bar of an action brought on the note in another state; 6 Dak. 91. See 83 Me. 87.

The place of payment is, however, to be considered as the place of making; 30 Miss. 59; 7 Ohio St. 134; 4 Mich. 450; 5 McLean 448; 3 Gill 430; 8 B. Monr. 306; 14 Ark. 189; 17 Miss. 220; 13 Gray 597. But see 4 N. J. 319.

The better rule as to the rate of interest to be allowed on bills of exchange and promissory notes, where no place of payment is specified and no rate of interest mentioned seems to be the interest of the lex loci; 6 Johns. 183; 5 C. & F. 1, 12; 6 Cra.

221; 3 Wheat. 101; 1 Dall. 191; 12 La. Ann. 815; 58 Hun 606. And see 9 Gratt. 31; 24 Miss. 463; 24 Mo. 65; 1 Pars. Contr. 238; 53 Barb. 350; 33 N. J. L. 81; 3 Wheat. 101. The damages recoverable on a bill of exchange not paid are those of the place where the plaintiff is entitled to reimbursement. In the United States, these are generally fixed by statute; 4 Johns. 119; 6 Mass. 157; 2 Wash. C. C. 167; 3 Sumn. 523.

Where a place of payment is specified, the interest of that place must be allowed; 126 Mass. 360; 14 Vt. 33; 22 Barb. 118; 77 N. Y. 573. See 17 Johns. 511; except that when a contract is made in one state, to be performed in another, parties may contract for the legal rate of interest allowable in either state, provided such contract is entered into in good faith, and not merely to avoid the usury laws; 20 Mart. La. 1; 46 N. H. 300; 1 Wall. 310; 26 Barb. 213; 25 Ohio St. 413; 22 Ia. 194; 35 N. J. L. 285. See 91 Ga. 505; contra, Story, Conf. Laws § 298. A note made in one state and payable in another, is not subject to the usury laws of the latter state, if it is valid in that respect in the state where it was made; 47 Ark. 54; 2 Miles Pa. 185.

Chattel mortgages valid and duly registered under the laws of the state in which the property is situated at the time of the mortgage, will be held valid in another state to which the property is removed, although the regulations there are different; 13 Pet. 107; 62 Mo. 524; 25 Miss. 471; 53 N. H. 562; 7 Ohio St. 134; 12 Barb. 631; but see 48 Kan. 606; 40 Ill. App. 234; 7 Wall. 140; 35 N. Y. 657; and it will be enforced in the state to which the property has been removed, although it would have been invalid if made in that state; 30 Mo. 383; but it is said by Wharton (Conf. Laws § 317), that the law in regard to chattel mortgages is governed by the lex rei sitæ; that a lien is extinguished when goods are taken from the place where the lien was created to a place where such a lien is not recognized; Whart. Conf. Laws § 318; 9 Phila. 615 (where a chattel mortgage made in Maryland was held invalid in Pennsylvania as against a bona fide purchaser without notice); and a Louisiana court refused to enforce a chattel mortgage made in another state, such mortgages being unknown in Louisiana; 26 La. Ann. 185. See 37 Pa. 508, where it was held that a trust of personalty valid in the domicile would be protected if the parties removed to another state. See also 4 Dist. Rep. Pa. 270; 15 Pa. Co. Ct. 471.

The law of the situs governs a mortgage of chattels in one state, executed in another; Rorer, Int. St. L. 96; Jones, Chat. Mortg. § 305; 58 N. H. 88; 7 Wall. 139; 22 Kan. 89; 38 Ala. 67. See 76 Ind. 512; 21 Barb. 198; contra, 12 N. J. Eq. 86; 10 Ind. 28. The lex fori determines the remedies on the mortgage; 37 N. H. 86; contra, Story, Conf. Laws § 402; 50 Ill. 370 (where there appears to have been notice). See 38 N. Y. 153, where a mortgage on a ship, made and shown to be invalid in Pennsylvania, was held invalid in New York; 8 Humphr. 542.

The registration of chattel mortgages and transfer of government and local stocks are frequently made subjects of positive law, which then suspends the law of the domicil.

Where the mortgagor of chattels removes with them to another state, the mortgagee, to preserve his rights, need not again record the mortgage in such other state; 32 Minn. 377; 37 N. H. 87; 62 Mo. 524; 37 N. J. L. 201. But in Alabama it must be recorded to preserve its validity; 14 Ala. 55; 89 Ala. 538.

As to whether such mortgages will be respected in preference to claims of citizens of the state into which the property is removed, it is held that they will; 30 Vt. 42, overruling 23 Vt. 279; 7 Ohio St. 134; 12 Barb. 631; 8 Humphr. 542. A chattel mortgage valid in the state where executed without change of possession protects the property mortgaged against an attachment in Vermont, though in the possession of the mortgagor; 25 Vt. 581; 57 id. 360.

Questions of priority of liens and other claims are, in general, to be determined by the lex rei sitæ even in regard to personal property; 5 Cra. 289; 4 Binn. 353; 14 Mart. La. 93; 2 H. & J. 193, 224; 3 Pick. 128; 3 Rawle 312; 13 Pet. 312; 17 Ga. 491; 4 Rich. 561; 13 Ark. 543; 3 Barb. 89; see 33 Ala. 536. A chattel mortgage made in Canada, with possession delivered to the mortgagee, was held entitled to priority in Michigan, whither the property was taken without consent of the mortgagee, over a prior chattel mortgage in Michigan executed before the property was taken to Canada and recorded after its return; Vining v. Millar, 32 L. R. A. (Mich.) 442.

The existence of the lien will generally depend on the lex loci; Story, Confl. Laws §§ 322 b, 402; 5 Cra. 289. See note on extra-territoriality of chattel mortgages, 17 L. R. A. 127.

Marriage comes under the general rule in regard to contracts, with some exceptions. See LEX LOCI. 25 Amer. Law Rev. 82.

The scope of a marriage settlement made abroad is to be determined by the lex loci contractus; 1 Bro. P. C. 129; 2 M. & K. 513; where not repugnant to the lex rei sitæ; 31 E. L. & Eq. 443; 4 Bosw. 266.

When the contract for marriage is to be executed elsewhere, the place of execution becomes the locus contractus; 23 E. L. & Eq. 288.

Torts. In an action brought in one state for injuries done in another, the statutes and decisions of the courts of the latter state must fix the liability; 47 Minn. 92; 48 Ohio St. 623; 88 Va. 971; 89 Tenn. 235. See 145 U. S. 193.

Movables in general. Personal property follows the owner; and hence its disposition and transfer must be determined by the law of his domicil; 2 Kent 428. See DOMICIL.

SPECIAL PERSONAL RELATIONS. Executors and administrators, in the absence of a specific statute authorizing it, have no power to sue or be sued by virtue of a foreign appointment as such; Westl. Priv. Int. Law 279; 2 Jones, Eq. 276; 10 Rich. 393; L. R. 5 Ch. App. 315; 1 Woolw. 383; 110 Mass. 369; 61 Pa. 478; 3 W. Va. 154; 55 Ga. 253; 54 Mo. 408; 38 Ala. 678; 54 Me. 453; 12 Wheat. 169; 3 Q. B. 498; 2 Ves. 35. It seems to be otherwise where a foreign executor has brought assets into the state; 18 B. Monr. 582; 1 Bradf. Surr. 241; and see 16 Ark. 28; 15 La. Ann. 243; and is otherwise by statute in Ohio; 5 McLean 4.

In the United States, however, payment to such executor will be a discharge, it seems; 7 Johns. Ch. 49; 18 How. 104; contra, 3 Sneed 55; otherwise in England; Dy. 305; 3 Kebl. 163; 1 M. & G. 159; 3 Q. B. 493. But see Westl. Priv. Int. Law 272.

And an executor who has so changed his situation towards the action as to render it his own may sue in a foreign court; Westl. Priv. Int. Law 286; 1 Hare 84; 4 Beav. 506.

Administration must be taken out in the situs (place of situation) of the property; 12 Wheat. 109; 20 Johns. 229; 1 Mas. 381; 1 Bradf. Surr. 69.

But, in general, administration is granted as of course to the executor or administrator entitled under the lex domicilii (but not, it seems, to a minor; 1 Sw. & T. 253; or a creditor; Ambl. 416). In such cases the probate granted in the place of domicil is the principal, that in the situs is ancillary; 3 Bradf. Surr. 233; L. R. 2 P. & M. 89; 1 Woolw. 383; 10 Gray 162; 10 H. L. Cas. 1; 3 Rawle 312; 61 Pa. 478; 21 Conn. 577. There is no legal privity between them; 35 N. H. 484.

All property of the decedent which is in the jurisdiction of the court granting principal or ancillary administration, or which comes into it if not already taken possession of under a grant of administration, comes under its operation; 3 Paige, Ch. 459.

Whether or not a legacy bears interest, depends on the laws of the state of the domicil; 152 Mass. 74.

Ships and cargoes and the proceeds thereof, on the death of the owner, complete their voyages and return to the home port to be administered; Story, Confl. Laws § 520; 45 Ill. 382; 1 Strobh. 25; 3 Paige, Ch. 459; 1 Strobh. L. 25.

The property in each jurisdiction is held liable for debts due in that jurisdiction, and the surplus is to be remitted to the principal administrator for distribution under the lex domicilii; 8 Cl. & F. 1; L. R. 4 Ch. App. 735; but whether the court of the ancillary jurisdiction will decree a distribution or remit the property to the domiciliary jurisdiction, has been held to be a matter of judicial discretion; 53 N. Y. 192; 52 Ala. 124. See 57 Miss. 566; 24 Beav. 100; 3 Pick. 145; 3 Bradf. Surr. 233; 21 Conn. 577. See DOMICIL.

In case of insolvency, it is said the assets would be retained for an equitable distribution among the creditors of an amount proportioned to the whole amount of assets and claims; 3 Pick. 147; but this rule has been doubted: Whart. Confl. Laws § 623.

Each administrator must give priority to claims according to the law of his jurisdiction: Story, Confl. Laws § 524; 5 Pet. 518; 20 Johns. 265.

Guardians have no power over the property, whether real or personal, of their wards, by virtue of a foreign appointment; 4 Cow. 52; 1 Johns. Ch. 153; 4 Gill & J. 332; 4 T. R. 185; they must have the sanction of the appropriate local tribunal; Rorer, Int. St. L. 356; 6 Blatch. 537; 9 Wall. 394; 4 Allen 321; Whart. Confl. Laws § 260; L. R. 2 Eq. 74. As to the relations of foreign and domestic guardians, see 14 B. Monr. 544.

As to the power of a guardian over the domicile of his ward, see DOMICIL.

Receivers in equity have no extra-territorial powers by virtue of their appointment; 17 How. 322; 52 Mo. 17; 25 N. Y. 577; but see 3 Biss. 513. A receiver appointed for an insolvent corporation in one state has no title to its property in another state; 52 Tex. 396; 28 Conn. 274; 57 Fed. Rep. 531. See RECEIVERS.

Sureties come under the general rules, and their contracts are governed by the lex loci; but in the case of a bond with sureties, given to the government by a navy agent for the faithful performance of his duties, the liability of the sureties is governed by the common law, as the accountability of the principal was at Washington, the seat of government; 6 Pet. 172 (the case coming up from Louisiana). See 7 Pet. 435. See SURETYSHIP.

JUDGMENTS AND DECREES OF FOREIGN COURTS relating to immovable property within their jurisdiction are held binding everywhere. And the rule is the same with regard to movables actually within their jurisdiction; Story, Confl. Laws § 592; 79 Pa. 354; 23 Wall. 458; 2 C. & P. 155. See 95 U. S. 714; L. R. 4 H. L. 414; 23 Pick. 270; 4 Cra. 434.

Thus admiralty proceedings in rem are held conclusive everywhere if the court had a rightful jurisdiction founded on actual possession of the subject-matter; 4 Cra. 241, 293, 433; 7 id. 423; 9 id. 126; 4 Johns. 34; 3 Sumn. 600; 1 Stor. 157; 1 H. & J. 142; 1 Binn. 299; 6 Mass. 277; L. R. 5 Q. B. 599; 1 Low. 253; 10 Nev. 47.

But such decree may be avoided for matter apparently erroneous on the face of the record; 7 Term 523; 1 Cai. Cas. 21; or if there be an ambiguity as to grounds of condemnation; 7 Bingh. 495; 1 Greenl. Ev. § 541, n.; 14 Cow. 520, n. 3; 2 Kent 120.

Proceedings under the garnishee process are held proceedings in rem; and a decree may be pleaded in bar of an action against the trustee or garnishee; 1 Greenl. Ev. § 542; 4 Cow. 520, n. But the court must have rightful jurisdiction over the res to make the judgment binding; and then it will be effectual only as to the res, unless the court had actual jurisdiction over the person also; 31 Me. 314; 7 B. Monr. 376; 9 Mass. 498; Story, Confl. Laws § 592;

ASSIGNMENTS AND TRANSFERS. Voluntary assignments of personal property, valid where made, will transfer property everywhere; 15 N. Y. 320; 4 N. J. 163, 270; 17 Pa. 91; 58 Fed. Rep. 672; 43 id. 716; 1 La. Ann. 430; 2 id. 659; 52 Conn. 330; 137 Mass. 366; not as against citizens of the state of the situs attaching prior to the assignees' obtaining possession; 13 Mass. 146; 5 Harring. 31. Otherwise 12 Md. 54; 4 N. J. 162.

An involuntary assignment by operation of law as under bankrupt or insolvent laws will not avail as against attaching creditors in the place of situation of the property; 5 N. Y. 320; 4 Zab. 162, 270; 6 Pick. 286, 302; 2 Hayw. 24; 4 M'Cord 519; 5 N. H. 213; 14 Mart. La. 93; 6 Binn. 353; 5 Cra. 289; 29 Me. 208; 1 Harr. & McH. 236; 19 N. Y. 207; 32 Miss. 246; 28 Conn. 274; 23 Ark. 526; 18 Pick. 247; 37 La. Ann. 522. See 61 Conn. 154; 49 N. J. Eq. 48.

It may be a question whether the same rule would hold if the assignees had obtained possession; Dougl. 161; 81 Wis. 291. An assignment by operation of law is good so as to vest property in the assignees by comity of nations; 6 M. & S. 126; 20 Johns. 262; 6 Binn. 363; 3 Mass. 517.

In England it is firmly settled that an assignment under the bankrupt law of a foreign country passes all the personal property of the bankrupt locally situate, and debts owing in England, and that an attachment of such property by an English creditor, after such bankruptcy, with or without notice to him, is invalid to overreach the assignment; but this rule does not prevail in the United States, either as regards a foreign assignee or an assignee under the laws of another state in the Union; Story, Confl. Laws § 409; 17 How. 322. See 25 Q. B. Div. 399.

The assignment by marriage is held valid; Story, Confl. Laws § 423. See DOMICIL.

Discharges by the lex loci contractus are valid everywhere; 4 Bosw. 459; 7 Cush. 15; 40 Me. 204; 26 Vt. 703; 13 Mass. 1; 12 Wheat. 370; 5 East 124. This rule is restricted in the United States by the clause in the constitution forbidding the passage of any law impairing the obligation of contracts. Under this provision, it is held that a state insolvent or bankrupt law may not have any extra-territorial effect to discharge the debtor; 5 How. 307; 7 N. Y. 500; Story, Const. § 1115. See LEX FORI. It may, however, take away the remedy for non-performance of the contract in the locus contractus, on contracts made subsequently.

As to FOREIGN JUDGMENTS and FOREIGN LAWS, see those titles.

CONFRONTATION. In Practice. The act by which a witness is brought into the presence of the accused, so that the latter may object to him, if he can, and the former may know and identify the accused and maintain the truth in his presence. In criminal cases no man can be a witness unless confronted with the accused, except by consent.

CONFUSIO (Lat. confundere). In Civil Law. A pouring together of liquids; a melting of metals; a blending together of an inseparable compound.

It is distinguished from commixtion by the fact that in the latter case a separation may be made, while in a case of confusio there cannot be. 2 Bla. Com. 405.

CONFUSION OF DEBTS. The concurrence of two adverse rights to the same thing in one and the same person. 11 Humph. 198.

CONFUSION OF GOODS. Such a mixture of the goods of two or more persons that they cannot be distinguished.

When this takes place by the mutual consent of the owners, they have an interest in the mixture in proportion to their respective shares; 6 Hill 425, but see 112 N. C. 233. Where it is caused by the wilful act of one party without the other's consent, the one causing the mixture must separate them at his own peril; Bisp. Eq. § 86; 30 Me. 237, 295; 19 Ohio 337; 9 Barb. 630; 3 Kent 365; and must bear the whole loss; 2 Blackf. 377; 3 Ind. 306; 2 Johns. Ch. 62; 11 Metc. 493; 30 Me. 237; 11 Colo. 223; otherwise, it is said, if the confusion is the result of negligence merely, or accident; 20 Vt. 333. The rule extends no further than necessity requires; 2 Campb. 575; 1 Vt. 286; 24 Pa. 246; 97 N. C. 383; for if the goods can be distinguished, it will not justify one in taking another's goods upon the ground that they have been intermingled; 55 Fed. Rep. 576.

See 35 Cent. Law J. 405; 49 N. J. Eq. 573; 36 Neb. 607.

CONFUSION OF RIGHTS. A union of the qualities of debtor and creditor in the same person. The effect of such a union is, generally, to extinguish the debt; 1 Salk. 306; Cro. Car. 551; 1 Ld. Raym. 515. See 5 Term 381; Comyns, Dig. Baron et Feme (D).

CONGE. In French Law. A clearance. A species of passport or permission to navigate.

CONGE D'ACCORDER (Fr. leave to accord). A phrase used in the process of levying a fine. Upon the delivery of the original writ, one of the parties immediately asked for a congé d'accorder, or leave to agree with the plaintiff. Termes de la Ley; Cowel. See LICENTIA CONCORDANDI; 2 Bla. Com. 350.

CONGE D'EMPARLER (Fr. leave to imparl). The privilege of an imparlance (licentia loquendi). 3 Bla. Com. 299.

CONGE D'ELIRE (Fr.). The king's permission royal to a dean and chapter in time of vacation to choose a bishop, or to an abbey or priory of his own foundation to choose the abbot or prior.

Originally, the king had free appointment of all ecclesiastical dignities whensoever they chanced to be void. Afterwards he made the election over to others, under certain forms and conditions: as, that at every vacation they should ask of the king congé d'elire; Cowel; Termes de la Ley; 1 Bla. Com. 379, 382. The permission to elect is a mere form; the choice is practically made by the crown.

CONGEABLE (Fr. congé, permission, leave). Lawful, or lawfully done, or done with permission; as, entry congeable, and the like. Littleton § 279.

CONGO. A free state in Africa. There is a Supreme Council of State under the nominal presidency of Leopold II., King of the Belgians, who has offered, after the lapse of ten years from 1890, to hand over the state to Belgium. It has a Civil Code compiled in 1890.

CONGREGATION. A society of a number of persons who compose an ecclesiastical body.

In the ecclesiastical law, this term is used to designate certain bureaux at Rome, where ecclesiastical matters are attended to.

In the United States, by congregation is meant the members of a particular church who meet in one place to worship. See 2 Russ. 120; 9 Barb. 64.

CONGRESS. An assembly of deputies convened from different governments to treat of peace or of other international affairs; as the Congress of Berlin to settle the terms of peace between Russia and Turkey in 1878, composed of representations of the great Powers of Europe.

In theory a congress may conclude a treaty, while a conference is for consultation, and its result, ordinarily a protocol, prepares the way for a treaty. See Cent. Dict.; Encyc. Dict. But this is not always true, as the Berlin conference of 1889 was composed of plenipotentiaries and its deliberations resulted in a treaty.

The legislative body of the United States, composed of the senate and house of representatives (q. v.). U. S. Const. art. 1, § 1.

Each house is the judge of the election and qualifications of its members. A majority of each house is a quorum; but a smaller number may adjourn from day to day, and compel the attendance of absent members. Each house may make rules, punish its members, and by a two-thirds vote expel a member. Each house must keep a journal and publish the same, excepting such parts as may, in their judgment, require secrecy, and record the yeas and nays at the desire of one-fifth of the members present. Art. 1, s. 5. A court is bound to assume that the journal speaks the truth and cannot receive oral testimony to impeach its correctness; 144 U. S. 1.

The members of both houses are in all cases, except treason, felony, and breach of the peace, privileged from arrest while attending to and returning from the session of their respective houses: and no member can be questioned in any other place for any speech or debate in either house. U. S. Const. art. 1, s. 6.

Each house of congress has claimed and exercised the power to punish contempt and breaches of its privileges, on the ground that all public functionaries are essentially invested with the powers of self-preservation, and that whenever authorities are given, the means of carrying them into execution are given by necessary implication. Jefferson, Manual, § 3, art. Privilege; Duane's Case, Senate Proceedings, Gales and Seaton's Annals of Cong., 6th Congress, pp. 122-124, 184, and Index; Wolcott's Case, Journal Hon. Reps. 1st Sess. 35th Congress, pp. 371-374, 386-389, 535-539; Irwin's Case, 2d Sess.

43d Congress, Index. In Kilbourn's Case, 103 U. S. 188, it was held that although the house can punish its own members for disorderly conduct or for failure to attend its sessions, and can decide cases of contested elections and determine the qualifications of its members, and exercise the sole power of impeachment of officers of the government, and may, when the examination of witnesses is necessary to the performance of these duties, fine or imprison a contumacious witness,—there is not found in the constitution any general power vested in either house to punish for contempt. The order of the house ordering the imprisonment of a witness for refusing to answer certain questions put to him by the house, concerning the business of a real estate partnership of which he was a member, and to produce certain books in relation thereto, was held void and no defence on the part of the sergeant-at-arms in an action by the witness for false imprisonment. The members of the committee, who took no actual part in the imprisonment, were held not liable to such action. The cases in which the power had been exercised are numerous. See Barclay, Dig. Rules of Hou. Reps. U. S. tit. Privilege. This power, however, extends no further than imprisonment; and that will continue no further than the duration of the power that imprisons. The imprisonment will therefore terminate with the adjournment or dissolution of congress.

The rules of proceeding in each house are substantially the same; the house of representatives choose their own speaker; the vice-president of the United States is, ex officio, president of the senate. For rules of proceeding and forms observed in passing laws, see Barclay's Dig.

When a bill is engrossed, and has received the sanction of both houses, it is sent to the president for his approbation. If he approves of the bill, he signs it. If he does not, it is returned, with his objections, to the house in which it originated, and that house enters the objections at large on its journal and proceeds to reconsider it. If, after such reconsideration, two-thirds of the house agree to pass the bill, it is sent, together with the objections, to the other house, by which it is likewise reconsidered, and, if approved by two-thirds of that house, it becomes a law. But in all such cases the votes of both houses are determined by yeas and nays, and the names of the persons voting for and against the bill are to be entered on the journal of each house respectively.

If any bill shall not be returned by the president within ten days (Sundays excepted) after it shall have been presented to him, the same shall be a law, in like manner as if he had signed it, unless the congress by their adjournment prevent its return; in which case it shall not be a law. See Kent, Lect. XI.

The right of the president to sign a bill after an adjournment of congress although within ten days of its passage, has been inferentially approved by the supreme court on four different occasions, in connection with the captured and abandoned property act, which was signed by the president on March 12, 1863, and after the adjournment of congress; 2 Wall. 423; 2 id. 561; 9 id. 56; 13 id. 128. Upon this point the court of claims held, in a remarkably thorough and convincing opinion delivered by Mr. Justice Nott, that a bill signed by the president after the usual adjournment of congress for the winter holidays, but within ten days from the time when it was presented to him, was duly approved within the intent and meaning of the constitution, and must be recognized and administered as a law of the United States; 29 Ct. Cls. 523.

The house of representatives has the exclusive right of originating bills for raising revenue; and this is the only privilege that house enjoys in its legislative character which is not shared equally with the other; and even those bills are amendable by the senate in its discretion; Art. 1, s. 7.

One of the houses cannot adjourn, during the session of congress, for more than three days without the consent of the other; nor to any other place than that in which the two houses shall be sitting; Art. 1, s. 5.

All the legislative powers granted by the constitution of the United States or necessarily implied from those granted, are vested in the congress.

CONJECTIO CAUSÆ. In Civil Law. A statement of the case. A brief

synopsis of the case given by the advocate to the judge in opening the trial. Calvinus, Lex.

CONJECTURE. A slight degree of credence, arising from evidence too weak or too remote to cause belief. 1 Mascardus, De Prob. quæst. 14, n. 14.

An idea or notion founded on a probability without any demonstration of its truth.

CONJOINTS. Persons married to each other. Story, Conf. Laws § 71; Wolffius, Droit de la Nat. § 858.

CONJUGAL RIGHTS. A class of personal rights arising from the relation of husband and wife.

In England, a writ lies for the restitution of conjugal rights in case of intentional desertion, including, perhaps, a refusal to consummate marriage, under some circumstances; but this remedy has never been adopted in the United States; Bish. Mar. & Div. § 503 et seq.; 3 Bla. Com. 94; Geary, Mar. & Fam. R. 371 et seq.

CONJUNCTIVE. Connecting in a manner denoting union.

There are many cases in law where the conjunctive and is used for the disjunctive or, and vice versa.

An obligation is conjunctive when it contains several things united by a conjunction to indicate that they are all equally the object of the matter or contract.

CONJUNCTIVE OBLIGATION. One in which the several objects in it are connected by a copulative, or in any other manner which shows that all of them are severally comprised in the contract. This contract creates as many different obligations as there are different objects; and the debtor, when he wishes to discharge himself, may force the creditor to receive them separately. Civil Code, La. § 2063.

CONJURATION (Lat. a swearing together).

A plot, bargain, or compact, made by a number of persons under oath, to do some public harm.

Personal conference with the devil or some evil spirit, to know any secret or effect any purpose. The laws against conjuration and witchcraft were repealed in 1736, by stat. 9 Geo. II. c. 5; Mozley & W. Law Dict.

CONNECTICUT. The name of one of the original states of the United States of America.

It was not until the year 1665 that the whole territory now known as the state of Connecticut was under one colonial government. The charter was granted by Charles II. in April, 1662. Previous to that time there had been two colonies, with separate governments.

As this charter to the colony of Connecticut embraced the colony of New Haven, the latter resisted it until about January, 1665, when the two colonies, by mutual agreement, became indissolubly united. In 1687, Sir Edward Andros attempted to seize and take away the charter; but it was secreted and preserved in the famous Charter Oak at Hartford, and is now kept in the office of the secretary of state. 1 Hollister, Hist. Conn. 315. It remained in force, with a temporary suspension, as a fundamental law of the state, until the present constitution was adopted. Story, Const. 386; Comp. Stat. Conn. Rev. of 1875, iii. xlv.

The present constitution was adopted on the 15th of September, 1818. Seventeen amendments have been adopted, 1823-1875.

THE LEGISLATIVE POWER.—This is vested in two distinct houses or branches, the one styled the senate, the other the house of representatives, and both together, the General Assembly.

The Senate consists of twenty-four members, one elected biennially from each of the twenty-four senatorial districts into which the state is divided.

The House of Representatives consists of two members from each town which was in existence when the constitution was adopted, unless the right to one of them has been voluntarily relinquished, and from every other town having five thousand inhabitants, and of one member from each of the towns which have been organized since the adoption of the constitution. The representatives are elected annually, on the Tuesday after the first Monday in November.

THE EXECUTIVE POWER.—This is vested in a governor and lieutenant-governor.

The Governor is chosen biennially on the Tuesday after the first Monday in November by the electors of the state. He is to hold his office for two years from the Wednesday after the first Monday of January succeeding his election, and until his successor is duly qualified.

THE JUDICIAL POWER.—This is vested in a supreme court of errors, a superior court, and such inferior courts as the general assembly may from time to time establish.

The courts of general jurisdiction are the supreme court of errors, superior court, court of common pleas, and district courts. No person can hold a judicial office after the age of seventy.

The Supreme Court of Errors is held by five judges. The judges hold office for eight years. They are elected by the general assembly on nomination by the governor. This court has final and conclusive jurisdiction of all proceedings in error, from judgments of inferior courts, and may carry into complete execution all judgments and decrees.

The Superior Court is composed of these judges and eight others, elected in the same way and for the same term. It is the principal nisi prius court, and has also jurisdiction of petitions for change of name.

The Court of Common Pleas exists only in New Haven, Hartford, Fairfield, Litchfield, and New London counties. These courts are nisi prius courts with a limited jurisdiction, regulated mainly by the value of the amount in controversy, which can in no case exceed $1000. Legal and equitable remedies are granted in all these courts in the same proceeding, there being a code of civil practice, partly resembling that of New York. Criminal Courts of Common Pleas are established for New London and Fairfield counties, respectively; they have appellate jurisdiction in all criminal cases; acts 1893, pp. 63, 113. In the counties of Windham, Tolland, and Middlesex, where there are no courts of common pleas, the superior courts exercise criminal jurisdiction in cases not cognizable by a justice of the peace. In the principal cities there are city courts having a limited civil and, in some cases, criminal jurisdiction.

Probate Courts are held, in the districts into which the state is divided for this purpose, by judges elected biennially by the people of the district.

Justices of the Peace are elected biennially in November, by the electors of the several towns.

County Commissioners, three in number in each county, are appointed annually by the general assembly. They have power to remove deputy sheriffs, enter upon county lands, levy county taxes, take care of the highways, administer the poor debtor's oath, and appoint county treasurers.

CONNECTING LINES. See COMMON CARRIERS.

CONNIVANCE. An agreement or consent, indirectly given, that something unlawful shall be done by another.

Connivance differs from condonation, though the same legal consequences may attend it. Connivance necessarily involves criminality on the part of the individual who connives; condonation may take place without imputing the slightest blame to the party who forgives the injury. Connivance must be the act of the mind before the offence has been committed; condonation is the result of a determination to forgive an injury which was not known until after it was inflicted. 3 Hagg. Eccl. 350.

Connivance differs, also, from collusion: the former is generally collusion for a particular purpose, while the latter may exist without connivance. 3 Hagg. Eccl. 130.

The connivance of the husband to his wife's prostitution deprives him of the right of obtaining a divorce, or of recovering damages from the seducer; Geary, Mar. & Fam. R. 268; 4 Term 657. The husband may actively connive at the adultery; 41 Barb. 114; 21 N. J. Eq. 61; or he may passively; 5 Eng. Ecc. 27; 3 Hagg. Eccl. 87. It may be satisfactorily proved by implication. See Shelf. Mar. & Div. 449; 2 Bish. Mar. & Div. § 6; 2 Hagg. Eccl. 278, 376; 3 id. 58, 82, 107, 119, 312; 3 Pick. 299; 2 Cal. 219; 15 N. H. 161; 31 Mich. 300; 109 Mass. 407; 35 Iowa 477.

CONNOISSEMENT. In French Law. An instrument, signed by the master of a ship or his agent, containing a description of the goods loaded on a ship, the persons who have sent them, the persons to whom they were sent, and the undertaking to transport them. A bill of lading. Guyot, Répert. Univ.; Ord. de la Marine, l. 3, t. 3, art. 1.

CONNUBIUM (Lat.). A lawful marriage.

CONOCIMIENTO. In Spanish Law. A bill of lading. In the Mediterranean ports it is called poliza de cargamento. For the requisites of this instrument, see the Code of Commerce of Spain, arts. 799-811.

CONQUEST (Lat. conquiro, to seek for).

In Feudal Law. Purchase; any means of obtaining an estate out of the usual course of inheritance.

The estate itself so acquired.

According to Blackstone and Sir Henry Spelman, the word in its original meaning was entirely dissociated from any connection with the modern idea of military subjugation, but was used solely in the sense of purchase. It is difficult and quite profitless to attempt a decision of the question which has arisen, whether it was applied to William's acquisition of England in its original or its popular meaning. It must be allowed to offer a very reasonable explanation of the derivation of the modern signification of the word, that it was still used at that time to denote a technical purchase—the prevalent method of purchase then, and for quite a long period subsequently, being by driving off the occupant by superior strength. The operation of making a conquest, as illustrated by William the Conqueror, was no doubt often afterwards repeated by his followers on a smaller scale; and thus the modern signification became established. On the other hand, it would be much more difficult to derive a general signification of purchase from the limited modern one of military subjugation. But the whole matter must remain mainly conjectural; and it is undoubtedly going too far to say, with Burrill, that the meaning assigned by Blackstone is "demonstrated," or, with Wharton, that the same meaning is a "mere idle ingenuity." Fortunately, the question is not of the slightest importance in any respect.

In International Law. The acquisition of the sovereignty of a country by force of arms, exercised by an independent power which reduces the vanquished to the submission of its empire.

It is a general rule that, where conquered countries have laws of their own, those laws remain in force after the conquest until they are abrogated, unless contrary to religion or mala in se. In this case, the laws of the conqueror prevail; 1 Story, Const. § 150.

The conquest and occupation of a part of the territory of the United States by a public enemy renders such conquered territory during such occupation a foreign country with respect to the revenue laws of the United States; 4 Wheat. 246; 2 Gall. 486. The people of a conquered territory change their allegiance, but not their relations to each other; 7 Pet. 86. Conquest does not per se give the conqueror plenum dominum et utile, but a temporary right of possession and government; 2 Gall. 486; 3 Wash. C. C. 101; 8 Wheat. 591; 2 Bay 229; 2 Dall. 1; 12 Pet. 410.

The right which the English government claimed over the territory now composing the United States was not founded on conquest, but discovery. Story, Const. § 152.

In Scotch Law. Purchase. Bell, Dict.; 1 Kames 210.

CONQUETS. In French Law. The name given to every acquisition which the husband and wife, jointly or severally, make during the conjugal community. Thus, whatever is acquired by the husband and wife, either by his or her industry or good fortune, enures to the extent of one half for the benefit of the other. Merlin, Rép. Conquêt; Merlin, Quest., Conquêt. In Louisiana, these gains are called acquêts. La. Civ. Code, art. 2369. The conquêts by a former marriage may not be settled on a second wife to prejudice the heirs; 2 Low. C. 175.

CONSANGUINEOUS FRATER. A brother who has the same father. 2 Bla. Com. 231.

CONSANGUINITY (Lat. consanguis, blood together).

The relation subsisting among all the different persons descending from the same stock or common ancestor. See 1 Brad. Surr. R. 495.

Having the blood of some common ancestor. 9 Vt. 30.

Collateral consanguinity is the relation subsisting among persons who descend from the same common ancestor, but not from each other. It is essential, to constitute this relation, that they spring from the same common root or stock, but in different branches.

Lineal consanguinity is that relation which exists among persons where one is descended from the other, as between the son and the father, or the grandfather, and so upward in a direct ascending line; and between the father and the son, or the grandson, and so downwards in a direct descending line.

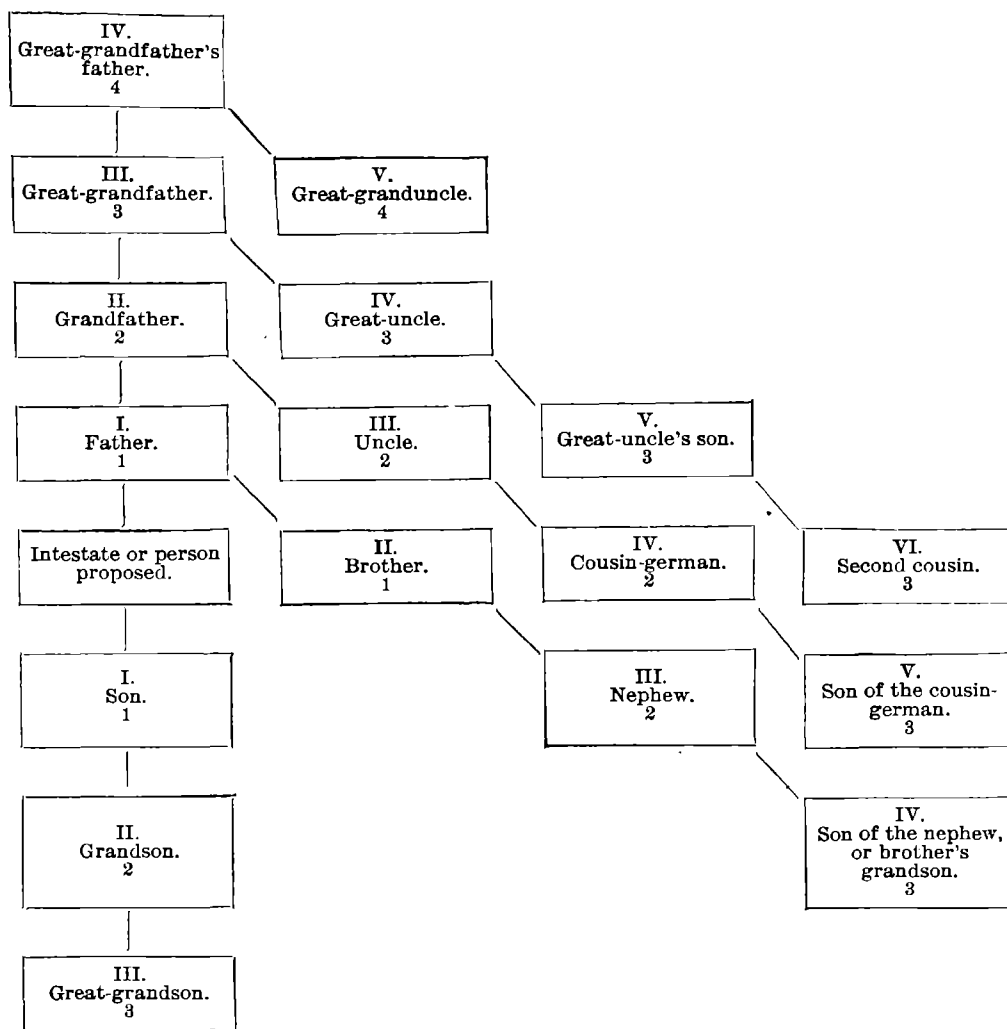

In computing the degree of lineal consanguinity existing between two persons, every generation in the direct course of relationship between the two parties makes a degree; and the rule is the same by the canon, civil, and common law.

The mode of computing degrees of collateral consanguinity at the common and by the canon law is to discover the common ancestor, to begin with him to reckon downwards, and the degree the two persons, or the more remote of them, is distant from the ancestor, is the degree of kindred subsisting between them. For instance, two brothers are related to each other in the first degree, because from the father to each of them is one degree. An uncle and a nephew are related to each other in the second degree, because the nephew is two degrees distant from the common ancestor; and the rule of computation is extended to the remotest degrees of collateral relationship.

The method of computing by the civil law is to begin at either of the persons in question, and count up to the common ancestor, and then downwards to the other person, calling it a degree for each person, both ascending and descending, and the degrees they stand from each other is the degree in which they stand related. Thus, from a nephew to his father is one degree; to the grandfather, two degrees; and then to the uncle three; which points out the relationship.

The following table, in which the Roman numeral letters express the degrees by the civil law, and those in Arabic figures those by the common law, will fully illustrate the subject.

The mode of the civil law is preferable, for it points out the actual degree of kindred in all cases; by the mode adopted by the common law, different relations may stand in the same degree. The uncle and nephew stand related in the second degree by the common law, and so are two first cousins, or two sons of two brothers; but by the civil law the uncle and nephew are in the third degree, and the cousins are in the fourth. The mode of computation, however, is immaterial; for both will establish the same person to be the heir; 2 Bla. Com. 202.

CONSCRIPTION. A compulsory enrolment of men for military service ; draft. The body of conscripts. Stand. Dict.

SENSUAL CONTRACT. In Civil Law. A contract completed by the consent of the parties merely, without any further act.

The contract of sale, among the civilians, is an example of a consensual contract, because the moment there is an agreement between the seller and the buyer as to the thing and the price, the vendor and the purchaser have reciprocal actions. On the contrary, on a loan, there is no action by the lender or borrower, although there may have been consent, until the thing is delivered or the money counted ; Pothier, Obl. pt. 1, c. 1, s. 1, art. 2 ; 1 Bell, Comm. 435.

CONSENT (Lat. con, with, together, sentire, to feel). A concurrence of wills.

Express consent is that directly given, either viva voce or in writing.

Implied consent is that manifested by signs, actions, or facts, or by inaction or silence, which raises a presumption that the consent has been given.

Consent supposes a physical power to act, a moral power of acting, and a serious, determined, and free use of these powers.

Fonblanque, Eq. b. 1, c. 2, s. 1. Consent is implied in every agreement. See AGREEMENT ; CONTRACT.

Where a power of sale requires that the sale should be with the consent of certain specified individuals, the fact of such consent having been given ought to be evinced in the manner pointed out by the creator of the power, or such power will not be considered as properly executed ; 10 Ves. Ch. 308, 378. See further, as to the matter of consent in vesting or divesting legacies : 2 V. & B. 234 ; 3 Ves. Ch. 239 ; 12 id. 19 ; 3 Bro. Ch. 145 ; 1 Sim. & S. 172. As to implied consent arising from acts, see ESTOPPEL IN PAIS.

In Criminal Law. No act shall be deemed a crime if done with the consent of the party injured, unless it be committed in public, and is likely to provoke a breach of the peace, or tends to the injury of a third party ; provided no consent can be given which will deprive the consentor of any inalienable right ; A. & E. Encyc ; Desty, Cr. L. § 33. The one who gives consent must be capable of doing so ; 1 Whar. Cr. L. § 146 ; 25 N. Y. 373. As to age of consent, see RAPE.

CONSENT RULE. An entry of record by the defendant, confessing the lease, entry, and ouster by the plaintiff, in an action of ejectment. This was, until recently, used in England, and still is in those of the United States in which the action of ejectment is still retained as a means of acquiring possession of land.

The consent rule contains the following particulars, viz.: first, the person appearing consents to be made defendant instead of the casual ejector; second, he agrees to appear at the suit of the plaintiff, and, if the proceedings are by bill, to file common bail; third, to receive a declaration in ejectment, and to plead not guilty; fourth, at the trial of the case, to confess lease, entry, and ouster, and to insist upon his title only; fifth, that if, at the trial, the party appearing shall not confess lease, entry, and ouster, whereby the plaintiff shall not be able to prosecute his suit, such party shall pay to the plaintiff the cost of the non pros., and suffer judgment to be entered against the casual ejector; sixth, that if a verdict shall be given for the defendant, or the plaintiff shall not prosecute his suit for any other cause than the non-confession of lease, entry, and ouster, the lessor of the plaintiff shall pay costs to the defendant; seventh, that, when the landlord appears alone, the plaintiff shall be at liberty to sign judgment immediately against the casual ejector, but that execution shall be stayed until the court shall further order; Ad. Eject. 233. See, also, 2 Cow. 442; 4 Johns. 311; 1 Cai. Cas. 102.

CONSEQUENTIAL DAMAGES. Those damages which arise not from the immediate act of the party, but as an incidental consequence of such act. See DAMAGES.

CONSEQUENTS. In Scotch Law. Implied powers or authorities. Things which follow, usually by implication of law. A commission being given to execute any work, every power necessary to carry it on is implied; 1 Kames, Eq. 241; Black, L. Dict.

CONSERVATOR (Lat. conservare, to preserve). A preserver; one whose business it is to attend to the enforcement of certain statutes.

A delegated umpire or standing arbitrator, chosen to compose and adjust difficulties arising between two parties. Cowel.

A guardian. So used in Connecticut. 3 Day 472; 5 Conn. 280; 12 id. 376.

CONSERVATOR OF THE PEACE. He who hath an especial charge, by virtue of his office, to see that the king's peace be kept.

Before the reign of Edward III., who created justices of the peace, there were sundry persons interested to keep the peace, of whom there were two classes: one of which had the power annexed to the office which they hold; the other had it merely by itself, and were hence called wardens or conservators of the peace. Lambard, Eirenarchia, l. 1, c. 3. This latter sort are superseded by the modern justices of the peace; 1 Bla. Com. 349.

The king's majesty was the principal conservator of the peace within all his dominions. The lord chancellor or keeper, the lord treasurer, the lord high steward of England, and the lord mareschal and lord high constable of England, all the justices of the court of king's bench (by virtue of their offices), and the master of the rolls (by prescription) were general conservators of the peace throughout the whole kingdom, and might commit all breakers of it, or bind them in recognizances to keep it; the other judges were only so in their own courts. The coroner was also a conservator of the peace within his own county, as also the sheriff, and both of them might take recognizances or security for the peace. Constables, tythingmen, and the like were also conservators of the peace within their own jurisdiction; and might apprehend all breakers of the peace, and commit them until they found sureties for their keeping it.

The judges and other similar officers of the various states, and also of the United States, are conservators of the public peace, being entitled "to hold to the security of the peace and during good behavior."

The Constitution of Delaware (1831) provides that:—

"The members of the senate and house of representatives, the chancellor, the judges, and the attorney-general shall, by virtue of their offices, be conservators of the peace throughout the state; and the treasurer, secretary, and prothonotaries, registers, recorders, sheriffs, and coroners, shall, by virtue of their offices, be conservators thereof within the counties respectively in which they reside."

CONSERVATOR TRUCIS (Lat.). An officer whose duty it was to inquire into all offences against the king's truces and safe conducts upon the main seas out of the liberties of the Cinque Ports.

Under stat. 2 Hen. V. stat. 1, c. 6, such offences are declared to be treason, and such officers are appointed in every port, to hear and determine such cases, "according to the ancient maritime law then practised in the admiral's court as may arise upon the high seas, and with two associates to determine those arising upon land." 4 Bla. Com. 69, 70.

CONSIDERATIO. See CONSIDERATION.

CONSIDERATION (L. Latin, consideratio). An act or forbearance, or the promise thereof, which is offered by one party to an agreement, and accepted by the other as an inducement to that other's act or promise. Poll. Contr. 91.

Blackstone defines it to be the reason which moves a contracting party to enter into a contract (2 Com. 443); but this definition is manifestly defective because it is within the distinction so well taken by Pateson, J., who says:—"It is not to be confounded with motive, which is not the same thing as consideration. The latter means something which is of value in the eye of the law, moving from the plaintiff, either of benefit to the plaintiff or of detriment to the defendant;" Langd. Sel. Cas. Cont. 168; s. c. 2 Q. B. 851. In distinguishing between consideration and motive a helpful criterion is to be found in the expression

"nothing is consideration that is not regarded as such by both parties;" 14 Wall. 570, 577; 110 Mass. 389; 79 Ind. 549, 551.

The price, motive, or matter of inducement to a contract,—whether it be the compensation which is paid, or the inconvenience which is suffered by the party from whom it proceeds. A compensation or equivalent. A cause or occasion meritorious, requiring mutual recompense in deed or in law. Viner, Abr. Consideration (A).

It is also defined as "any act of the plaintiff from which the defendant or a stranger derives a benefit or advantage, or any labor, detriment, or inconvenience sustained by the plaintiff, however small, if such act is performed or inconvenience suffered by the plaintiff by the consent, express or implied, of the defendant." Tindal, C. J., in 3 Scott 250. According to Kent it must be:—given in exchange, mutual, an inducement to the contract, lawful, and of sufficient value, with respect to the assumption. 2 Com. 464.

Concurrent considerations are those which arise at the same time or where the promises are simultaneous and reciprocal.

Continuing considerations are those which consist of acts which must necessarily continue over a considerable period of time.

Executed considerations are acts done or values given at the time of making the contract. Leake, Contr. 18, 612.

Executory considerations are promises to do or give something at a future day. Ibid.

Good considerations are those of blood, natural love or affection, and the like.

Motives of natural duty, generosity, and prudence come under this class; 2 Bla. Com. 297; 2 Johns. 52; 10 id. 293; 2 Bail. 588; 1 McCord 504; 2 Leigh 337; 20 Vt. 595; 1 C. & P. 401; 48 Ohio St. 562; 150 Pa. 98; 61 Conn. 50. The only purpose for which a good consideration may be effectual is to support a covenant to stand seized to uses; Shep. Touchst. 512. The term is sometimes used in the sense of a consideration valid in point of law; and it then includes a valuable as well as a meritorious consideration; 3 Cra. 140; 2 Aik. 601; 24 N. H. 302; 2 Madd. 430; 3 Co. 81; Ambl. 598; 1 Ed. Ch. 167. Generally, however, good is used in antithesis to valuable.

Illegal considerations are acts, which if done or promises which if enforced, would be prejudicial to the public interest. Hariman, Cont. 101.

Impossible considerations are those which cannot be performed.

Moral considerations are such as are based upon a moral duty.

Past consideration is an act done before the contract is made, and is ordinarily by itself no consideration for a promise; Anson, Contr. 82. Pollock considers that whether a past benefit is, in any case, a good consideration is a question not free from uncertainty. On principle it should not be. Possible exceptions might be services rendered on request, without definite promise of reward (see Hob. 105) and voluntarily doing something which one was legally bound to do. Also a promise to pay a debt barred by the statute of limitations; but he considers that none of these exceptions are logical. See Poll. Cont. 170.

Valuable considerations are either some benefit conferred upon the party by whom the promise is made, or upon a third party at his instance or request; or some detriment sustained, at the instance of the party promising, by the party in whose favor the promise is made. Chit. Contr. 7; Doct. & Stud. 179; 2 Pet. 182; 5 Cra. 142, 150; 1 Litt. 183; 3 Johns. 100; 8 N. Y. 207; 6 Mass. 58; 2 Bibb 30; 2 J. J. Marsh. 222; 2 N. H. 97; Wright, Ohio 660; 13 S. & R. 29; 12 Ga. 52; 24 Miss. 9; 4 Ill. 33; 5 Humphr. 19; 4 Blackf. 388; 3 C. B. 321; 4 East 55; 96 N. C. 67. The detriment to the promisee must be a detriment on entering into the contract and not from the breach of it; 2 Misc. Rep. 293.

"A valuable consideration may consist either in some right, interest, profit, or benefit accruing to one party, or some forbearance, detriment, loss, or responsibility given, suffered, or undertaken by the other." L. R. 10 Ex. 162. See 5 Pick. 380.

A valuable consideration is usually in some way pecuniary, or convertible into money; and a very slight consideration, provided it be valuable and free from fraud, will support a contract; 2 How. 426; 12 Mass. 365; 12 Vt. 259; 29 Ala. n. s. 188; 20 Pa. 303; 22 N. H. 246; 11 Ad. & E. 983; 16 East 372; 9 Ves. Ch. 246; 2 Cr. & E. 623; 2 Sch. & L. 395, n. a; 52 Mich. 83; 23 Ohio St. 292. Valuable considerations are divided by the civilians into four classes, which are given, with literal translations: Do ut des (I give that you may give), Facio ut facias (I do that you may do), Facio ut des (I do that you may give), Do ut facias (I give that you may do).

Consideration has been treated as the very life and essence of a contract; and a parol contract or promise for which there was no consideration could not be enforced at law; 7 W. & S. 317; Plowd. 308; Smith. Lead. Cas. 456; Doct. & Stud. 2, c. 24; 3 Call 439; 7 Conn. 57; 1 Stew. 51; 5 Mass. 301; 4 Johns. 235; 6 Yerg. 418; Cooke 467; 6 Halst. 174; 4 Munf. 95; 11 Md. 281; 25 Miss. 66; 30 Me. 412; 140 Ill. 269; 153 Pa. 281; 89 Ga. 117; 114 Mo. 203; Brooke, Abr. Action sur le Case, 40; such a promise was often termed a nudum pactum (ex nudo pacto non oritur actio), or nude pact.

This phrase was undoubtedly borrowed from the Roman law, but its use in English law had no relation whatever to its meaning in the Roman; nor is the word pact of the latter in any sense related to the common-law contract. The nudum pactum, as appears by the note cited infra from Pollock, had not anciently in England its modern signification of an agreement without consideration in the sense of the maxim quoted. In an elaborate note to Pollock on Contracts 673, Note F., the learned author calls attention to a difference between consideration in the English law and its nearest continental analogies, which difference, he says, has not always been realized. The actual history of the English doctrine is obscure. The most we can affirm is that the general idea was formed somewhere in the latter part of the fifteenth century. At the same time or a little later, nudum pactum lost its ancient meaning (viz.: an agreement not made by specialty so as to support an action of covenant or falling within one of certain classes so as to support an action of debt), and came to mean what it does now. The word consideration in the sense now before us came into use, at least as a settled term of art, still later. In the early writers, consideration always means the judgment of a court. . . .

The early cases of actions of assumpsit show by negative evidence which is almost conclusive that in the first half of the 15th century, the doctrine of consideration was quite unformed, though the phrase quid pro quo is earlier. But in 1459 there was a case which showed that an action of debt would then lie on any consideration executed. In the Doctor and Student (A. D. 1530) we find substantially the modern doctrine. So far as the writer of that work knows, he finds the first full discussion of consideration by that name in Plowden's report of Sharlington v. Stratton; Plowd. 298.

The question of consideration was of importance in the learning of Uses before the statute, and the reflection is obvious that both the general conception and the name of Consideration have had their origin in the court of chancery in the law of uses and have been thence imported into the law of contracts rather than developed by the common-law courts. On this hypothesis, a connection with the Roman causa may be suggested with some plausibility.

The same writer proceeds to say that in the process thus sketched out some steps are conjectural, and considers that the materials are not ripe for a positive conclusion and will not be until the unpublished records of mediæval English law shall be competently edited. See Holmes, The Common Law 253, where a different theory of the origin of consideration is given as being a generalization from the technical requirements of the action of debt in its earlier form.

The theory on which the phrase nudum pactum was wrongly applied was that the maxim signified that a gratuitous promise to do or pay anything on the one side, without any compensation on the other, could only be enforced, in the Roman law, when made (or clothed) with proper words or formalities—pactum verbis prescriptis vestitum; Vinnius, Com. de Inst. lib. 3, de verborum obligationibus, tit. 16, p. 677; Cod. lib. 7, tit. 52. This solemnity it was argued had much the force of our seal, which imported consideration, as it was said, meaning that the formality implied consideration in its ordinary sense i. e., deliberation, caution, and fulness of assent; Hare, Contr. 146; 3 Bingh. 111; 3 Burr. 1639; 4 Md. Ch. Dec. 176; 35 Me. 260, 491; 25 Miss. 86; 53 Minn. 10; but see 2 Colo. App. 259. There was, however, the distinction often lost sight of but which ought to be made that even on the theory that the vitality of a seal was solely as a token of the existence of a consideration, under the common law it was not the fact that the instrument was under seal which gave it vitality, but the consideration whose existence is implied therefrom, while, under the civil law, the subject of consideration bore no such relation to the contract as it does under the English law even accepting the theory of Stephen and other writers stated under title CONTRACT, q. v., that the consideration is not an essential element of a contract,—necessary to its existence. Under the civil law it was of the essence of certain contracts that they should be gratuitous, and those based upon a consideration constituted only a single division called commutative contracts, which again was subdivided into the four classes represented by the formula quoted, supra, do et des, etc.

While, therefore, the Roman law doubtless exercised a large influence upon the English law of contracts, the subject of consideration particularly has been overlaid with erroneous theories, and the ascertainment of its true bearing long postponed, by the pursuit of false analogies, due probably to the early adoption of such phrases as the above and their incorporation into the common law, to express superficial impressions created by them rather than the meaning attributed to them by the Roman jurists.

These analogies have, however, been in recent years the subject of more careful investigation, and the study of the early English authorities and a greatly increased interest in, and knowledge of, the Roman law, have resulted in disturbing many of the theories of consideration in its true relation to the contract and the true meaning of the seal as making a contract actionable which would not be so if by parol.

The consideration is generally conclusively presumed from the nature of the contract, when sealed; 11 S. & R. 107; 66 Hun 635; but in some of the states by law, and in others by statute, the want or failure of a consideration may be a good defence against an action on a sealed instrument or contract; 1 Bay 275; 5 Binn. 232; 11 Wend. 106; 1 Blackf. 173; 3 J. J. Marsh. 473; 1 Bibb 500; 13 Ired. 235; 8 Rich. 437.

Negotiable instruments also, as bills of exchange and promissory notes, by statute 3 & 4 Anne (adopted as common law or by re-enactment in the United States), carry with them prima facie evidence of consideration; 4 Bla. Com. 445. See BILLS OF EXCHANGE, etc.

The consideration, if not expressed (when it is prima facie evidence of consideration), in all parol contracts (oral or written), must be proved; this may be done by evidence aliunde; 2 Ala. 51; 3 N. Y. 335; 7 Conn. 57, 291; 16 Me. 394, 458; 4 Munf. 95; 4 Pick. 71; 26 Me. 397; 1 La. Ann. 192; 21 Vt. 292; 4 Mo. 33.

A contract upon a good consideration is considered merely voluntary, but is good both in law and equity as against the grantor himself when it has once been executed; Chit. Contr. 28; but void against creditors and subsequent bona fide purchasers for value; Stat. 27 Eliz. c. 4; Cowp. 705; 10 B. & C. 606; 69 Ia. 755.

Moral or equitable considerations are not sufficient to support an express or implied promise. They are only sufficient as between the parties in conveyances by deed, and in transfers, not by deed, accompanied by possession; 9 Yerg. 418; 3 B. & P. 249. See 11 A. & E. 438; 3 Pick. 207. These purely moral obligations are left by the law to the conscience and good faith of the individual. Mr. Baron Parke says, "A mere moral consideration is nothing;" 9 M. & W. 501; 8 Mo. 698. See 78 Hun 121. It was at one time held in England that an express promise made in consequence of a previously existing moral obligation created a valid contract; per Mansfield, C. J., Cowp. 290; 5 Taunt. 36. This doctrine was at one time received in the United States, but appears now to be repudiated there; Poll. Contr. 168; except in Pennsylvania; 4 Pa. 361; 24 id. 370.

It is often said that a moral obligation is sufficient consideration; but it is a rule, that such moral obligation must be one which has once been valuable and enforceable at law, but has ceased to be so by the operation of the statute of limitations, or by the intervention of bankruptcy for instance. The obligation, in such case, remains equally strong on the conscience of the debtor. The rule amounts only to a permission to waive certain positive rules of law as to remedy; Poll. Contr. 623; 2 Bla. Com. 445; Cowp. 290; 3 B. & P. 249, n.; 2 East 506; 2 Ex. 90; 8 Q. B. 487; 6 Cush. 238; 20 Ohio 332; 24 Wend. 97; 24 Me. 561; 38 Pa. 306; 13 Johns. 259; 7 Conn. 57; 1 Vt. 420; 3 Pa. 172; 12 S. & R. 177; 17 id. 126; 14 Ark. 267; 1 Wis. 131; 21 N. H. 129; 4 Md. 476. See 51 Mo. App. 637; 78 Hun 121; 125 Pa. 394. But now, by statute, in England a promise to pay a debt barred by bankruptcy or one contracted during infancy is void; Leake, Contr. 318. If the moral duty were once a legal one which could have been made available in defence, it is equally within the rule; 5 Barb. 556; 2 Sandf. 311; 25 Wend. 389; 10 B. Monr. 382; 8 Tex. 397. See as to moral obligation as a consideration, 32 Cent. L. J. 53.

An express promise to perform a previous legal obligation, without any new consideration, does not create a new obligation; 7 Dowl. 781; 25 Ind. 328; 15 C. B. 295; 16 Q. B. 689; 91 N. Y. 401; 40 Ohio St. 400; 34 N. J. L. 54; 40 Vt. 28; 54 Ill. 303; 121 Mass. 106.

A valuable consideration alone is good as against subsequent purchasers and attaching creditors; and one which is rendered at the request, express or implied, of the promisor; Dy. 172, n.; 1 Rolle, Abr. 11, pl. 2, 3; 1 Ld. Raym. 312; 1 Wms. Saund. 264, n. (1); 3 Bingh. N. C. 710; 6 Ad. & E. 718; 3 C. & P. 36; 6 M. & W. 485; 2 Stark. 201; 2 Stra. 933; 3 Q. B. 234; Cro. Eliz. 442; F. Moore 643; 1 M'Cord 22.

Among valuable considerations may be mentioned these:—

In general, the waiver of any legal or equitable right at the request of another is sufficient consideration for a promise; 3 Pick. 452; 2 N. H. 97; Wright, Ohio 660; 20 Wend. 184; 4 Ired. Eq. 207; 4 Harr. 311; 4 B. & C. 8; 5 Pet. 114; 2 Nev. & P. 114; 4 Ad. & E. 108; 47 Minn. 320; 62 Mich. 570; 23 Mo. App. 427.

Forbearance for a certain or reasonable time to institute a suit upon a valid or doubtful claim, but not upon one utterly unfounded. This is a benefit to one party, the promisor, and an injury to the other, the promisee; 1 Rolle, Abr. 24, pl. 33; Com. Dig. Action on the Case upon Assumpsit (B, 1); L. R. 7 Ex. 235; L. R. 10 Q. An agreement to forbear suit, though for an indefinite period, is sufficient consideration; 130 N. Y. 415; 34 Neb. 592; 42 Mo. App. 503.

An invalid or not enforceable agreement to forbear is not a good consideration; for suit may be brought immediately after the promise is made. The forbearance must be an enforceable agreement for a reasonable time; Hardr. 5; 4 East 455; 4 M. & W. 795; 4 Me. 387; 3 Pa. 282; 9 Vt. 233; L. R. 8 Eq. 36; 43 Ia. 80; 25 Ala. 320; 45 N. H. 530; 74 Ill. 58; 78 Ky. 550. But if a meritorious claim is made in good faith, a forbearance to prosecute it may be a good consideration for a promise, although on the facts or on the law the suit would have failed of success; 11 Ill. 140; 60 Ill. 185; L. R. 5 Q. B. 449; 43 N. J. Eq. 377; 25 L. T. R. 504; 32 Ch. Div. 269; 63 Wis. 387; 5 Gray 45; 10 Harv. L. Rev. 113.

The prevention of litigation is a valid and sufficient consideration; for the law favors the settlement of disputes. Thus, a compromise or mutual submission of demands to arbitration is a highly favored consideration at law; 1 Ch. Rep. 158; 4 Pick. 507; 2 Strobb. Eq. 258; 2 Mich. 145; 2 Pa. 531; 6 Munf. 406; 1 Bibb 168; 4 Hawks 178; 14 Conn. 12; 4 Metc. 270; 35 N. H. 556; 11 Vt. 483; 28 Miss. 56; 4 Jones. N. C. 359; 27 Me. 262; 21 Ala. N. The giving up a suit instituted to try a question respecting which the law is doubtful, or is supposed by the parties to be doubtful, is a good consideration for a promise; Poll. Contr. 180; Leake, Contr. 626; L. R. 5 Q. B. 241; 82 Tex. 677; 2 Binn. 509; 2 C. B. 548; 4 East 455; 78 N. Y. 334; 102 Ill. 272; 5 Pet. 98; 112

Mass. 438; 49 N. J. Law 508; 78 N. Y. 334; 154 Mass. 453 and cases cited.

Incurring a legal liability to a third party is a valid consideration for a promise by the party at whose request the liability was incurred; L. R. 8 Eq. 134.

Refraining from the use of liquor and tobacco for a certain time at the request of another, is a sufficient consideration for a promise by the latter to pay a sum of money; 124 N. Y. 538.

The assignment of a debt or chose in action (unless void by reason of maintenance) with the consent of the debtor, is a good consideration for the debtor's promise to pay the assignee. It is merely a promise to pay a debt due, and the consideration is the discharge of the debtor's liability to the assignor; 4 B. & C. 525; 13 Q. B. 548; 23 Vt. 532; 7 Tex. 47; 22 N. H. 185; 10 J. B. Moo. 34; 2 Bingham 437; 1 Cr. M. & R. 430; 22 Me. 484; 7 N. H. 549. See 63 Hun 572. Work and service are perhaps the most common considerations.

In the case of deposit or mandate it was once held that there was no consideration; Yelv. 4, 128; Cro. Eliz. 883; the reverse is now usually maintained; 10 J. B. Moo. 192; 2 M. & W. 143; M'Cl. & Y. 205; 13 Ired. 39; 24 Conn. 484; 1 Perr. & D. 3; 1 Sm. Lead. Cas. 96.

In these cases there does not appear to be any benefit arising from the bailment to the promisor. The definitions of mandate and deposit exclude this. Nor does any injury at the time accrue to the promisee; the bailment is for his benefit entirely.

Trust and confidence in another are said to be the considerations which support this contract. But we think parting with the possession of a thing may be considered an injury to the promisee, for which the prospect of return was the consideration held out by the promisor.

Mutual promises made at the same time are concurrent considerations, and will support each other if both be legal and binding; Cro. Eliz. 543; 6 B. & C. 255; 3 B. & Ad. 703; 3 E. L. & Eq. 420; 12 How. 126; 8 Miss. 508; 17 Me. 372; 4 Ind. 257; 4 Jones, N. Yet the promise of an infant is a consideration for the promise of an adult. The infant may avoid his contract, but the adult cannot; 9 Metc. 519; 7 Watts 412; 5 Cow. 475; 1 D. Chipm. 252; 1 A. K. Marsh. 76; 2 Bail. 497; 3 Maule & S. 205.

Marriage is now settled to be a valuable consideration, though it is not convertible into money or pecuniarily valuable; 3 Cow. 537; 11 Leigh 136; 7 Pet. 348; 6 Dana 89; 22 Me. 374; 2 D. F. & J. 566; 39 Ill. App. 145; 4 Wash. St. 199; 2 Yeates 109; 74 Ga. 669.

Subscriptions to take shares in a chartered company are said to rest upon sufficient consideration; for the company is obliged to give the subscriber his shares, and he must pay for them; Pars.

Contr. 377; 16 Mass. 94; 8 id. 138; 21 N. H. 247; 34 Me. 360; 15 Barb. 249; 5 Ala. N. S. 787; 22 Me. 84; 9 Vt. 289.

On the subject of voluntary subscriptions for charitable purposes there is much confusion among the authorities; 6 Metc. 310. See SUBSCRIPTION.

Illegal considerations can be no foundation for a contract. Violations of morality, decency, and policy are in contravention of common law: as, contracts to commit, conceal, or compound a crime. So, a contract for future illicit intercourse, or in fraud of a third party, will not be enforced. Ex turpi contractu non oritur actio. But the act in question is not always a criterion; e. g. as to immoral considerations that which the law considers is whether the promise has a tendency to produce immoral results; hence while a promise of future illicit cohabitation is an illegal consideration; L. R. 16 Eq. 275; 54 Cal. 146; 11 Pa. 316; Harriman, Cont. 114; but a promise founded upon past illicit cohabitation is not illegal; 1 Johns. Ch. 329; but simply voluntary and governed by the same rules as other past executed considerations; Poll. Cont. 262. The illegality created by statute exists when the statute either expressly prohibits a particular thing, or affixes a penalty which implies prohibition, or implies such prohibition from its object and nature; 1 Ball & B. 360; 10 Ad. & E. 815; 2 E. L. & Eq. 113; 2 M. & G. 167; 6 Dana 91; 3 Bibb 500; 9 Vt. 23; 21 id. 184; 11 Wheat. 258; 22 Me. 488; 2 Miss. 18; 2 Ind. 392; 14 Mass. 322; 4 S. & R. 159; 15 Pa. 452; 4 Halst. 352; 2 Sandf. 186; 4 Humphr. 199; 3 McLean 214; 14 N. H. 294, 435; 5 Rich. 47; 3 Brev. 54; 145 U. S. 421. If any part of the consideration is void as against the law, it is void in toto; 11 Vt. 592; 84 Ga. 606; see 15 R. I. 261; 26 Vt. 184; 20 Ohio St. 431, but contra, if the promise be divisible and apportionable to any part of the consideration, the promise so far as not attributable to the illegal consideration might be valid; Leake, Contr. 631; 2 M. & G. 167.

A contract founded upon an impossible consideration is void. Lex neminem cogit ad vana aut impossibilia; 5 Viner, Abr. 110, 111, Condition (C) a, (D) a; 1 Rolle, Abr. 419; Co. Litt. 206 a; 2 B. & C. 474; Leake, Contr. 719. But this impossibility must be a natural or physical impossibility; 3 B. & P. 296, n.; 7 Ad. & E. 798; 1 Pet. C. C. 91, 221; 5 Taunt. 249; 2 Moore & S. 89; 9 Bingham 68; but it may be otherwise when the consideration is valid at the time the contract was formed, but afterwards became impossible; Leake, Contr. 719.

An executory consideration which has totally failed will not support a contract when the performance of the consideration forms a condition precedent to the performance of the promise; Add. Contr. 126; 7 C. & P. 108; 2 C. B. 548; 3 Johns. 458; 7 N. Y. 369; 1 Vt. 166; 7 Mass. 14; 13 id. 216; 23 Ala. N. S. 320; 1 Const. S. C. 467; 2 Day 437; 2 Root 258; 4 Conn. 428; 1 N. &

M'C. 210; 1 Ov. 438; 3 Call 373; 26 Me. 217; 5 Humphr. 337, 496; 3 Pick. 83; 6 Cra. 53; 4 Dev. & B. 212; 15 N. H. 114; 3 Ind. 289; Dudl. 161.

Sometimes when the consideration partially fails, the appropriate part of the agreement may be apportioned to what remains, if the contract is capable of being severed; 4 Ad. & E. 605; 1 M. & R. 218; 8 M. & W. 870; 2 Cro. & M. 48, 214; 14 Pick. 198; 28 N. H. 290; 2 W. & S. 235; L. R. 10 Q. B. 491; 1 Q. B. Div. 679; 26 Minn. 288; 26 Me. 217.

A past consideration will not generally be sufficient to support a contract. It is something done before the obligor makes his promise, and, therefore, cannot be a foundation for that promise, unless it has been executed at the request (express or implied) of the promisor. Such a request plainly implies a promise of fair and reasonable compensation; 6 M. & G. 153; L. R. 8 Ch. 888; id. 5 C. P. 65; 2 Ill. 113; 14 Johns. 378; 22 Pick. 393; 9 N. H. 195; 7 Me. 76, 118; 27 id. 106; 7 Johns. 87; 2 Conn. 404; 1 Sm. Lead. Cas., note to Lampleigh v. Braithwaite. But a pre-existing obligation will support a promise to perform that obligation which the law, in the case of a debt, will imply; Harriman, Contr. 83; 5 M. & W. 541; but a past consideration which did not raise an obligation at the time it was furnished, will support no promise whatever; 3 Q. B. 234; Harriman, Contr. 83; where there has been a request for services, a subsequent promise to pay a definite sum for them is evidence of the actual value of the services; id.

As to time, considerations may be of the past, present, or future. Those which are present or future will support a contract not void for other reasons; Story, Contr. 71. When the consideration is to do a thing hereafter, and the promise has been accepted, and a promise in return founded upon it, the latter promise rests upon sufficient foundation, and is obligatory; 3 Md. 67; 17 Me. 303; 24 Wend. 285; 17 Pick. 407; 1 Spear 368.

The adequacy of the consideration is generally immaterial; Add. Contr. 11; L. R. 5 Q. B. 87; s. c. 43 L. J. Q. B. 35; 8 A. & E. 745; 6 id. 438; 11 id. 983; L. R. 7 Ex. 235; 5 C. B. N. S. 265; 24 L. J. C. P. 271; 16 East 372; 5 W. & S. 476; 5 Rawle 69; excepting formerly in England before 31 & 32 Vict. c. 4, in the case of the sale of a reversionary interest or where the inadequacy of the consideration is so gross as of itself to prove fraud or imposition; 48 Ohio St. 562. There is no case where mere inadequacy of price, independent of other circumstances has been held sufficient to set aside a contract between parties standing on equal ground and dealing with each other without imposition or oppression; 2 Watts 104; 75 Mo. 681; 68 Ind. 405; 85 id. 294; 57 Vt. 227; 42 N. Y. 369. The adequacy of the consideration does not affect the contract; 2 How. 426; but the consideration must be real and not merely colorable; one cent has been held not to be a sufficient consideration for a promise to pay $700; 17 Ind. 29; and $1 has been held insufficient to support a promise to pay $1000; 7 R. I. 470; a dollar would be a sufficient consideration for any promise except one to pay a larger sum of money absolutely; 2 How. 426.

See note to Chesterfield v. Jannsen in 1 W. & T. Lead. Cas.; CONTRACT.

CONSIDERATUM EST PER CURIAM (Lat. it is considered by the court). A formula used in giving judgments.

A judgment is the decision or sentence of the law, given by a court of justice, as the result of proceedings instituted therein for the redress of an injury. The language of the judgment is not, therefore, that "it is decreed," or "resolved," by the court, but that "it is considered by the court," consideratum est per curiam, that the plaintiff recover his debt, etc.

In the early writers, considerare, consideratio always means the judgment of a court. This usage was preserved down to our time in the judgment of the common-law courts in the form "It is considered," which, as Sir Frederick Pollock says, has been "wantonly" altered to "It is adjudged," under the Judicature Acts. Poll. Cont. 675, Note F.

CONSIGN. To send goods to a factor or agent. See 4 Daly 320.

In Civil Law. To deposit in the custody of a third person a thing belonging to the debtor, for the benefit of the creditor, under the authority of a court of justice. Pothier, Obl. pt. 3, c. 1, art. 8.

The term to consign, or consignment, is derived from the Latin consignare, which signifies to seal; for it was formerly the practice to seal up the money thus received in a bag or box. Aso & M. Inst. b. 2, t. 11, c. 1, § 5.

Generally, the consignment is made with a public officer: it is very similar to our practice of paying money into court. See Burge, Suret.

CONSIGNATIO. See CONSIGN.

CONSIGNEE. One to whom a consignment is made.

When the goods consigned to him are his own, and they have been ordered to be sent, they are at his risk the moment the consignment is made according to his direction; and the persons employed in the transmission of the goods are his agents; 1 Liverm. Ag. 9. When the goods are not his own, if he accept the consignment, he is bound to pursue the instructions of the consignor: as, if the goods be consigned upon condition that the consignee will accept the consignor's bills, he is bound to accept them; id. 139; or if he is directed to insure, he must do so; id. 325.

It is usual in bills of lading to state that the goods are to be delivered to the consignee or his assigns, he or they paying freight: in such case the consignee or his assigns, by accepting the goods, by implication become bound to pay the freight; 29 N. Y. 436; 47 N. Y. 619; 3 Bingh. 383; 2 Pars. Contr. 640.

CONSIGNMENT. The goods or property sent by means of a common carrier by one or more persons, called the consignors, in one place, to one or more persons, called the consignees, who are in another. The goods sent by one person to another, to be sold or disposed of by the latter for and on account of the former. The transmission of the goods.

CONSIGNOR. One who makes a consignment.

CONSILIARIUS (Lat. consiliare, to advise). In Civil Law. A counsellor, as distinguished from a pleader or advocate. An assistant judge. One who participates in the decisions. Du Cange.

CONSILIUM (called, also, Dies Consilii). A day appointed to hear the counsel of both parties. A case set down for argument.

It is commonly used for the day appointed for the argument of a demurrer, or errors assigned; 1 Tidd, Pr. 438; 2 id. 684, 1123; 1 Sell. Pr. 336; 2 id. 385; 1 Archb. Pr. 191, 246.

CONSIMILI CASU (Lat. in like case). In Practice. A writ of entry, framed under the provisions of the statute Westminster 2d (13 Edw. I.), c. 24, which lay for the benefit of the reversioner, where a tenant by the curtesy aliened in fee or for life; 3 Bla. Com., 4th Dublin ed. 183 n.; Bac. Abr. Court of Chancery (A).

Many other new writs were framed under the provisions of this statute; but this particular writ was known emphatically by the title here defined. The writ is now practically obsolete. See 3 Bla. Com. 51; CASE; ASSUMPSIT.

CONSISTORY. In Ecclesiastical Law. An assembly of cardinals convoked by the pope.

The consistory is either public or secret. It is public when the pope receives princes or gives audience to ambassadors; secret when he fills vacant sees, proceeds to the canonization of saints, or judges and settles certain contestations submitted to him.

CONSISTORY COURT. In English Law. The courts of diocesan bishops held in their several cathedrals (before the bishop's chancellor, or commissary, who is the judge) for the trial of all ecclesiastical causes arising within their respective dioceses, and also for granting probates and administrations. From the sentence of these courts an appeal lies to the archbishop of each province respectively. 2 Steph. Com. 230, 237; 3 id. 430, 431; 3 Bla. Com. 64; 1 Woodd. Lect. 145; Halifax, An. b. 3, c. 10, n. 12.

CONSOLATO DEL MARE. See CODE.

CONSOLIDATE. To unite into one, distinct things or parts of a thing. In a general sense, to unite into one mass or body, as to consolidate the forces of an army or various funds. In parliamentary usage, to consolidate two bills is to unite them into one. In law, to consolidate benefices, actions, or corporations is to combine them into one. See 45 Ia. 56.

CONSOLIDATED FUND. In England. (Usually abbreviated to Consols.) A fund for the payment of the public debt.

Formerly, when a loan was made, authorized by government, a particular part of the revenue was appropriated for the payment of the interest and of the principal. This was called the fund; and every loan had its fund. In this manner the Aggregate fund originated in 1715; the South-Sea fund in 1717; the General fund in 1717; and the Sinking fund, into which the surplus of these flowed, which, although intended for the diminution of the debt, was applied to the necessities of the government. These four funds were consolidated into one in the year 1787; and this fund is the Consolidated fund.

It is wholly appropriated to the payment of certain specific charges and the interest on the sums originally lent the government by individuals, which yield an annual interest of three per cent. to the holders. The principal of the debt is to be returned only at the option of the government.

CONSOLIDATION. In Civil Law. The union of the usufruct with the estate out of which it issues, in the same person; which happens when the usufructuary acquires the estate, or vice versa. In either case the usufruct is extinct. Lec. Elm. Dr. Rom. 424.

It may take place in two ways: first, by the usufructuary surrendering his right to the proprietor, which in the common law is called a surrender; secondly, by the release of the proprietor of his rights to the usufructuary, which in our law is called a release.

In Ecclesiastical Law. The union of two or more benefices in one. Cowel.

In Practice. The union of two or more actions in the same declaration.

CONSOLIDATION OF CORPORATIONS. See MERGER.

CONSOLIDATION OF RAILROADS. See MERGER; RAILROAD.

CONSOLIDATION RULE. In Practice. An order of the court requiring the plaintiff to join in one suit several causes of action against the same defendant which may be so joined consistently with the rules of pleading, but upon which he has brought distinct suits. 1 Dall. 147; 3 S. & R. 264; 2 Archb. Pr. 180. The matter is regulated by statute in many of the states.

An order of court, issued in some cases, restraining the plaintiff from proceeding to trial in more than one of several actions brought against different defendants but involving the same rights, and requiring the defendants also, in such actions, to abide the event of the suit which is tried. It is in reality in this latter case a mere stay of proceedings in all the cases but one.

It is often issued where separate suits are brought against several defendants founded upon a policy of insurance; 2 Marsh. Ins. 701; see 4 Cow. 78, 85; 1 Johns. 29; or against several obligors in a bond; 3 Chit. Pr. 645; 3 C. & P. 58. See 1 N. & M'C. 417, n.; 1 Ala. 77; 5 Yerg. 297; 7 Mo. 477; 2 Tayl. 200; 4 Halst. 335; 3 S. & R. 262; 19 Wend. 63.

Where two actions arose upon the same transaction, one for trespass against defendant's property, another against his person, and might have been joined, the court ordered them tried at the same time; 1 Dill. 351.

When two actions are consolidated, the original actions are discontinued and only the consolidated action remains; 30 Abb. N. C. 131; 3 Misc. Rep. 110.

The Federal courts are authorized to consolidate actions of a like nature, or relative to the same question, as they may deem reasonable; Rev. Stat. § 921.

CONSORTIUM (Lat. a union of lots or chances). A lawful marriage. Union of parties in an action.

Company; companionship.

It occurs in this last sense in the phrase per quod consortium amisit (by which he has lost the companionship), used when the plaintiff declares for any bodily injury done to his wife by a third person. 3 Bla. Com. 140.

CONSPIRACY (Lat. con, together, spiro, to breathe). In Criminal Law. A combination of two or more persons by some concerted action to accomplish some criminal or unlawful purpose, or to accomplish some purpose, not in itself criminal or unlawful, by criminal or unlawful means. 4 Metc. 111; 4 Wend. 229; 15 N. H. 396; 5 H. & J. 317; 3 S. & R. 220; 12 Conn. 101; 11 Cl. & F. 155; 4 Mich. 414; 38 Ill. App. 168; 148 U. S. 197; Stimson, Lab. Law 195.

Lord Denman defined conspiracy as a combination for accomplishing an unlawful end, or a lawful end by unlawful means. 4 B. & Ad. 345.

The terms criminal or unlawful are used, because it is manifest that many acts are unlawful which are not punishable by indictment or other public prosecution, and yet there is no doubt that a combination by numbers to do them is an unlawful conspiracy and punishable by indictment; 12 Conn. 101; 15 N. H. 396; 1 Mich. 216; Dears. 337; 11 Q. B. 245; 9 Pa. 24; 8 Rich. 72; 1 Dev. 357.

Of this character was a conspiracy to cheat by false pretences without false tokens, when a cheat by false pretences only by a single person was not a punishable offence; 11 Q. B. 245. So a combination to destroy the reputation of an individual by verbal calumny of itself is not indictable; per Shaw, C. J., 4 Metc. 123. So a conspiracy to induce and persuade a young woman, by false representations, to leave the protection of her parent's house, with a view to facilitate her prostitution; 5 W. & S. 461; 2 Den. C. Cas. 79; and to procure an unmarried girl of seventeen to become a common prostitute; 4 F. & F. 160; to procure a woman to be married by a mock ceremony, whereby she was seduced; 48 Ia. 562. And see 5 Rand. 627; 6 Ala. N. s. 765. So a conspiracy, by false and fraudulent representations that a horse bought by one of the defendants from the prosecutor was unsound, to induce him to accept a less sum for the horse than the agreed price; 1 Dears. 337. A conspiracy by traders to dispose of their goods in contemplation of bankruptcy, with intent to defraud their creditors; 1 F. & F. 33.

The obtaining of goods on credit by an insolvent person without disclosing his insolvency, and without having any reasonable expectation of being able to pay for such goods in and by means of the fair and ordinary course of his business, is not of itself such an unlawful act as may be the subject of an action for conspiracy; though it would be otherwise, it seems, in the case of a purchase made without any expectation of payment; 1 Cush. 189. But the obtaining possession of goods under the pretence of paying cash for them on delivery, the buyer knowing that he has no funds to pay with, and appropriating the goods to his own use in fraud of the seller, is such a fraud or cheat as may be the subject of a charge of conspiracy; 1 Cush. 189.

A combination to go to a theatre to hiss an actor; 2 Campb. 369; 6 Term 628; to indict for the purpose of extorting money; 4 B. & C. 329; to charge a person with being the father of a bastard child; 1 Salk. 174; to coerce journeymen to demand a higher rate of wages; 6 Term 619; 14 Wend. 9; to charge a person with poisoning another; F. Moore 816; to affect the price of public stocks by false rumors; 3 M. & S. 67; to prevent competition at an auction; 6 C. & P. 239; to cheat by a fraudulent prospectus of a projected company and by false accounts; 11 Cox, Cr. Ca. 414; by false accounts between partners; L. R. 1 C. C. 274; by a mock auction; 11 Cox, Cr. Ca. 404; have each been held indictable.

Where the retail dealers of coal in a city form an association the main purpose of which is to fix prices below which it should not be retailed, whereby they prevent a dealer, not a member of the association, from obtaining coal from the wholesale dealers, they are guilty of conspiracy; 66 Hun 590; 139 N. Y. 251.

Strikes of laborers to raise wages or lock-outs by employers are lawful; 10 Cox, Cr. Ca. 592; if without intimidation; 11 Cox, Cr. Ca. 325. The system of sending a committee to the neighborhood of each factory where the strike is on, for the purpose of reporting the number of workmen engaged in such factories and their addresses, is not necessarily unlawful; 28 Wkly. Law Bul. Ohio 32; workmen may peaceably persuade their fellow-workmen to leave their employer's service in order to compel an advance in wages; 17 N. Y. Supp. 264; and where they enter into a lawful combination to control by artificial means the supply of labor preparatory to a demand for advance in wages, a combination of the employers to resist such is lawful; 159 Pa. 420. See Stimson, Lab. L.; Cogley, Strikes; Carson's Wright, Crim. Conspiracies. See also COMBINATION, LABOR UNIONS. This subject is mostly regulated by statute in England. An action will lie for damages for conspiracy where journeymen tailors by concerted action return all their garments unfinished to their employer; 9 Neb. 390; and for the fraudulent use of legal proceedings to injure another; 76 N. Y. 247. A combination by two or more persons to induce others not to deal with or enter into contracts with a particular individual, is actionable, if injury results and it is done for that purpose: [1893] 1 Q. B. 715; 52 N. J. L. 284. A combination to boycott is illegal and will be enjoined; 45 Fed. Rep. 135.

In order to render the offence complete, it is not necessary that any act should be done in pursuance of the unlawful agreement entered into between the parties, or that any one should have been defrauded or injured by it. The conspiracy is the gist of the crime; 9 Co. 55; 23 L. T. N. s. 75; 2 Mass. 337, 538; 3 S. & R. 220; 23 Pa. 355; 4 Wend. 259; 3 Zab. 33; 3 Ala. 360; 5 Harr. & J. 317; 107 N. C. 822; 44 Fed. Rep. 896. But see 10 Vt. 353. Where persons enter on an unlawful purpose, with the intent to aid or encourage each other in carrying out their design, they are each criminally responsible for everything resulting from such purpose whether specifically contemplated or not; 97 Ala. 57; 142 U. S. 450.

By the laws of the United States (R. S. § 5364), a wilful and corrupt conspiracy to cast away, burn, or otherwise destroy any ship or vessel, with intent to injure any underwriter thereon, or the goods on board thereof, or any lender of money on such vessel on bottomry or respondentia, is made felony, and the offender punishable by fine not exceeding ten thousand dollars, and by imprisonment and confinement at hard labor not exceeding ten years.

Conspiracies to prevent witnesses from testifying, to impede the course of justice, to hinder citizens from voting, to prevent persons from holding office, to defraud the United States by obtaining approval of false claims, to levy war against the United States, to impede the enforcement of the laws, etc., etc., are made punishable by act of congress; U. S. R. S. Index, Conspiracy.

In the absence of damage, the simple act of conspiracy does not furnish ground for a civil action; 76 Md. 118.

After a conspiracy has come to an end, the admissions of one conspirator by way of narrative of past facts are not admissible in evidence against the others; 150 U. S. 93; 144 id. 263.

In a prosecution under U. S. R. S. § 5480, as amended, for a conspiracy to defraud by means of the postoffice, three matters of fact must be charged in the indictment and established by the evidence: 1. That the persons charged devised a scheme to defraud; 2. that they intended to effect this scheme by opening or intending to open correspondence with some other person through the postoffice establishment or by inciting such other person to open communication with them; 3. and that in carrying out such scheme such person must have either deposited a letter or packet in the postoffice, or taken or received one therefrom; 157 U. S. 187.

Where parties are on trial for conspiracy to stop the mails, contemporary telegrams from different parts of the country, announcing the stoppage of mail trains, are admissible in evidence against the defendants if brought home to them, and so, too, are acts and declarations of persons not parties to the record if it appears that they were made in carrying the conspiracy into effect; 159 U. S. 590.

A combination of persons not themselves employes, to procure the latter to strike to the injury of the employer's business, is held to be a criminal conspiracy giving also the right to an injunction and damages; 148 U. S. 197 (but see a criticism of this case, Stimson, Lab. Law 269); 106 Mass. 1; 107 id. 555; 147 id. 212; 62 Fed. Rep. 803; but the tendency in the American courts is not to treat such combinations as unlawful conspiracies; 63 Fed. Rep. 310; 38 Leg. Int. Pa. 412; 60 How. Pr. 168; but, where the evidence included facts showing intimidation, it is a criminal conspiracy; 34 Pitts. L. J. Pa. 313; and an injunction will be granted; 30 Atl. Rep. 261; s. c. 164 Pa. 449. In England the subject is regulated by statute providing that no agreement or combination of two or more to do, or procure to be done, any act in contemplation or furtherance of a trade dispute between employer and workmen shall be indictable as a conspiracy, if such act would not be criminal if committed by one; 38 & 39 Vict. c. 86. In the United States, the Maryland statute contains an exact copy of the English; in Montana, Minnesota and Oklahoma, the common law of conspiracy seems to be repealed, and in New York it is modified. For legislation on the subject and the course of decisions concerning it see Stimson, Lab. Law § 55.

CONSPIRATORS. Persons guilty of a conspiracy.

CONSTABLE. An officer whose duty it is to keep the peace in the district which is assigned to him.

The most satisfactory derivation of the term and history of the origin of this office is that which deduces it from the French comestable (Lat. comes stabuli), who was an officer second only to the king. He might take charge of the army, wherever it was, if the king were not present, and had the general control of everything relating to military matters, as the marching troops, their encampment, provisioning, etc. Guyot, Rép. Univ.

The same extensive duties pertained to the constable of Scotland. Bell, Dict.

The duties of this officer in England seem to have been first fully defined by the stat. Westm. (13 Edw. I.); and question has been frequently made whether the office existed in England before that time. 1 Bla. Com. 356. It seems, however, to be pretty certain that the office in England is of Norman origin, being introduced by William, and that subsequently the duties of the Saxon tithing-men, borsholders, etc., were added to its other functions. See Cowel; Willc. Const.; 1 Bla. Com. 356; 1 Poll. & M. 542.

High constables were first ordained, according to Blackstone, by the statute of Westminster, though they were known as efficient public officers long before that time. 1 Sharsw. Bla. Com. 356. They are to be appointed for each franchise or hundred by the leet, or, in default of such appointment, by the justices at quarter-sessions. Their first duty is that of keeping the king's peace. In addition, they are to serve warrants, return lists of jurors, and perform various other services enumerated in Coke, 4th Inst. 267; 3 Steph. Com. 47; Jacob, Law Dict. In some cities and towns in the United States there are officers called high constables, who are the principal police officers in their jurisdiction.

Petty constables are inferior officers in every town or parish, subordinate to the high constable. They perform the duties of headborough, tithing-man, or bors-holder, and, in addition, their more modern duties appertaining to the keeping the peace within their town, village, or tithing.

In England, however, their duties have been much restricted by the act 5 & 6 Vict. c. 109, which deprives them of their power as conservators of the peace. 3 Steph. Com. 47.

In the United States, generally, petty constables only are retained, their duties being generally the same as those of constables in England prior to the 5 & 6 Vict. c. 109, including a limited judicial power as conservators of the peace, a ministerial power for the service of writs, etc., and some other duties not strictly referable to either of these heads. Their immunities and indemnities are proportioned to their powers, and are quite extensive. See 1 Sharsw. Bla. Com. 356, n. They are authorized to arrest without warrant on a reasonable suspicion of felony, for offences against the peace committed in their presence, and in various other cases: 1 Russ. Cr. 800; 1 Chit. Cr. Law 20; 4 Sharsw. Bla. Com. 292. See ARREST.

CONSTABLE OF A CASTLE. The warden or keeper of a castle; the castellan. Stat. Westm. 1, c. 7 (3 Edw. I.); Spelman, Gloss.

The constable of Dover Castle was also warden of the Cinque Ports. There was besides a constable of the Tower, as well as other constables of castles of less note. Cowel; Lambard, Const.

CONSTABLE OF ENGLAND (called, also, Marshal). His office consisted in the care of the common peace of the realm in deeds of arms and matters of war. Lambard, Const. 4.

He was to regulate all matters of chivalry, tournaments and feats of arms which were performed on horseback. 3 Steph. Com. 47. He held the court of chivalry, besides sitting in the aula regis. 4 Bla. Com. 92.

The office is disused in England, except on coronation-days and other such occasions of state, and was last held by Stafford, Duke of Buckingham, under Henry VIII. His title is Lord High Constable of England. 3 Steph. Com. 47; 1 Bla. Com. 355.

CONSTABLE OF SCOTLAND.

An officer who was formerly entitled to command all the king's armies in the absence of the king, and to take cognizance of all crimes committed within four miles of the king's person or of parliament, the privy council, or any general convention of the estates of the kingdom. The office was hereditary in the family of Errol, and was abolished by the 20 Geo. III. c. 43. Bell, Dict.; Erskine, Inst. 1. 3. 37.

CONSTABLE OF THE EXCHEQUER. An officer spoken of in the 51 Hen. III. stat. 5, cited by Cowel.

CONSTABLEWICK. The territorial jurisdiction of a constable. 5 Nev. & M. 261.

CONSTABULARIUS (Lat.). An officer of horse; an officer having charge of foot or horse; a naval commander; an officer having charge of military affairs generally. Spelman, Gloss.

The titles were very numerous, all derived, however, from comes-stabuli, and the duties were quite similar in all the countries where the civil law prevailed. His powers were second only to those of the king in all matters relating to the armies of the kingdom.

In England his power was early diminished and restricted to those duties which related to the preservation of the king's peace. The office is now abolished in England, except as a matter of ceremony, and in France. Guyot, Rép. Univ.; Cowel.

CONSTAT (Lat. it appears). A certificate by an officer that certain matters therein stated appear of record. See 1 Hayw. 410.

An exemplification under the great seal of the enrolment of letters patent. Co. Litt. 225.

A certificate which the clerk of the pipe and auditors of the exchequer make at the request of any person who intends to plead or move in the court for the discharge of anything; and the effect of it is, the certifying what constat (appears) upon record touching the matter in question.

CONSTAT D'HUISSIER. In French Law. An affidavit made by a huissier setting forth the appearance, form, quality, color, etc., of any article upon which a suit depends. Arg. Fr. Merc. L. 554; Black, L. Dict.

CONSTATING INSTRUMENTS. The term is used to signify the documents or collection of documents which fix the constitution or charter of a corporation. Brice, Ultra Vires 34; 37 N. J. Eq. 363.

CONSTITUENT (Lat. constituo, to appoint). He who gives authority to another to act for him. The constituent is bound by the acts of his attorney, and the attorney is responsible to his constituent.

CONSTITUERE. In Old English Law. To establish; to appoint; to ordain. Used in letters of attorney, and translated by constitute. Applied generally, also, to denote appointment. Reg. Orig. 172; Du Cange.

CONSTITUTED AUTHORITIES. The officers properly appointed under the constitution for the government of the people. Those powers which the constitution of each people has established to govern them, to cause their rights to be respected, and to maintain those of each of its members.

They are called constituted, to distinguish them from the constituting authority which has created or organized them, or has delegated to an authority, which it has itself created, the right of establishing or regulating their movements.

CONSTITUTIO. In Civil Law. An establishment or settlement. Used of controversies settled by the parties without a trial. Calvinus, Lex.

A sum paid according to agreement. Du Cange.

An ordinance or decree having its force from the will of the emperor. Dig. 1. 4. 1, Cooper's notes.

In Old English Law. An ordinance or statute. A provision of a statute.

CONSTITUTION. The fundamental law of a state, directing the principles upon which the government is founded, and regulating the exercise of the sovereign powers, directing to what bodies or persons those powers shall be confided and the manner of their exercise.

An established form of government; a system of laws and customs.

Constitution, in the former law of the European continent, signified as much as decree,—a decree of importance, especially ecclesiastical decrees. The decrees of the Roman emperors referring to the jus circa sacra, contained in the code of Justinian, have been repeatedly collected and called the Constitutions. The famous bull Unigenitus was usually called in France the Constitution. Comprehensive laws or decrees have been called constitutions; thus, the Constitutio Criminalis Carolina, which is the penal code decreed by Charles V. for Germany, the Constitutions of Clarendon (q. v.). In political law the word constitution came to be used more and more for the fundamentals of a government,—the laws and usages which give it its characteristic feature. We find, thus, former English writers speak of the constitution of the Turkish empire. These fundamental laws and customs appeared to our race especially important where they limited the power and action of the different branches of government; and it came thus to pass that by constitution was meant especially the fundamental law of a state in which the citizen enjoys a high degree of civil liberty; and, as it is equally necessary to guard against the power of the executive in monarchies, a period arrived—namely, the first half of the present century—when in Europe, and especially on the continent, the term constitutional government came to be used in contradistinction to absolutism.

We now mean by the term constitution, in common parlance, the fundamental law of a free country, which characterizes the organism of the country and secures the rights of the citizen and determines his main duties as a freeman. Sometimes, indeed, the word constitution has been used in recent times for what otherwise is generally called an organic law. Napoleon I. styled himself Emperor of the French by the Grace of God and the Constitutions of the Empire.

Constitutions were generally divided into written and non-written constitutions, analogous to leges scriptæ and non scriptæ. These terms do not indicate the distinguishing principle; Lieber, therefore, divides political constitutions into accumulated or cumulative constitutions and enacted constitutions. The constitution of ancient Rome and that of England belong to the first class. The latter consists of the customs, statutes, common laws, and decisions of fundamental importance. The Reform act is considered by the English a portion of the constitution as much as the trial by jury or the representative system, which have never been enacted, but correspond to what Cicero calls leges natæ. Our constitutions are enacted; that is to say, they were, on a certain day and by a certain authority, enacted as a fundamental law of the body politic. In many cases enacted constitutions cannot be dispensed with, and they have certain advantages which cumulative constitutions must forego; while the latter have some advantages which the former cannot obtain. It has been thought, in many periods, by modern nations, that enacted constitutions and statutory law alone are firm guarantees of rights and liberties. This error has been exposed in Lieber's Civil Liberty. Nor can enacted constitutions dispense with the "grown law" (lex nata). For the meaning of much that an enacted constitution establishes can only be found by the grown law on which it is founded, just as the British Bill of Rights (an enacted portion of the English constitution) rests on the common law.

Enacted constitutions may be either octroyed, that is, granted by the presumed full authority of the grantor, the monarch; or they may be enacted by a sovereign people prescribing high rules of action and fundamental laws for its political society, such as ours is; or they may rest on contracts between contracting parties,—for instance, between the people and a dynasty, or between several states. We cannot enter here into the interesting inquiry concerning the points on which all modern constitutions agree, and regarding which they differ,—one of the most instructive inquiries for the publicist and jurist. See Hallam's Constitutional History of England; Hare; Miller; Rawle; Story on the Constitution; Sheppard's Constitutional Text-Book; Elliot's Debates on the Constitution, etc.; Lieber's article (Constitution), in the Encyclopedia Americana; Cooley, Const. Lim.; Bryce, Am. Com.; Von Holst, Hist. U. S.

For the constitutions of the several states, including those in force and the previous ones, see Charters and Constitutions, published under authority of Congress in 1878.

Constitution, Self-Executing Provisions. A constitutional provision may be said to be self-executing if it supplies a sufficient rule by means of which the right given may be enjoyed and protected, or the duty imposed may be enforced, and it is not self-executing when it merely indicates principles, without laying down rules by means of which those principles may be given the force of law. Cooley, Const. Lim. 99.

"The question in every case is whether the language of a constitutional provision is addressed to the courts or the legislature. . . . If the nature and extent of the right conferred and of the liability imposed is fixed by the provision itself, so that they can be determined by the examination and construction of its own terms, and there is no language used indicating that the subject is referred to the legislature for action, then the provision should be construed as self-executing, and its language as addressed to the courts." 48 Minn. 150.

"But it must remain entirely clear that where a state constitution declares in clear language that the members of corporations shall be individually liable for their debts to a defined extent, it cannot be held that supplementary legislation is required to execute this provision, and hence that the legislature may leave it forever dormant and inoperative merely because the framers of the constitution did not go on and prescribe the remedy which should be pursued for enforcing it." Thomp. Corp. § 3004.

See 3 Fed. Rep. 739; 80 Hun 14; 77 Wis. 104; 15 Pet. 449; 104 Pa. 150; 148 id. 317.

But it has been held that a constitutional provision that "dues from corporations shall be secured by individual liability of the stockholders to an additional amount equal to the stock owned by such stockholder, and such other means as shall be provided by law," is not self-executing and is inoperative until supplemented by statute; 42 N. E. Rep. (N. Y.) 419.

CONSTITUTION OF THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA. The supreme law of the United States.

It was framed by a convention of delegates from all of the original thirteen states (except Rhode Island), which assembled at Philadelphia on the 14th of May, 1787. On September 17, 1787, by the unanimous consent of the states present, a form of constitution was agreed upon, and on September 28th was submitted to the congress of the confederation, with recommendations as to the method of its adoption by the states. In accordance with these recommendations, it was transmitted by the congress to the several state legislatures, in order to be submitted to conventions of delegates chosen in each state by the people thereof. The several states accordingly called conventions, which ratified the constitution upon the following dates: Delaware, December 7, 1787; Pennsylvania, December 12, 1787; New Jersey, December 18, 1787; Georgia, January 2, 1788; Connecticut, January 9, 1788; Massachusetts, February 6, 1788; Maryland, April 28, 1788; South Carolina, May 23, 1788; New Hampshire, June 21, 1788; Virginia, June 26, 1788; New York, July 26, 1788; North Carolina, November 21, 1789; Rhode Island, May 29, 1790.

Under the terms of the constitution (art. vii.), its ratification by nine states was sufficient to establish it between the states so ratifying it. Accordingly, when, on July 2, 1788, the ratification by the ninth state was read to congress, a committee was appointed to prepare an act for putting the constitution into effect; and on September 13, 1788—in accordance with the recommendations made by the convention in reporting the constitution—congress appointed days for choosing electors, etc., and resolved that the first Wednesday in March then next (March 4, 1789) should be the time, and the then seat of congress (New York) the place, for commencing government under the new constitution. Proceedings were had in accordance with these directions, and on March 4, 1789, congress met, but, owing to the want of a quorum, the house did not organize until April 1st, nor the senate until April 6th. Washington took the oath of office on April 30th. The constitution became the law of the land on March 4, 1789. 5 Wheat. 420.

The preamble of the constitution declares that the people of the United States, in order to form a more perfect union, establish justice, insure domestic tranquillity, provide for the common defence, promote the general welfare, and secure the blessings of liberty to themselves and their posterity, do ordain and establish this constitution for the United States of America.

The first article is divided into ten sections. By the first the legislative power is vested in congress. The second regulates the formation of the house of representatives, and declares who shall be electors. The third provides for the organization of the senate, and bestows on it the power to try impeachments. The fourth directs the time of meeting of congress, and who may regulate the times, places, and manner of holding elections for senators and representatives. The fifth determines the power of the respective houses. The sixth provides for a compensation to members of congress, and for their safety from arrests, and disqualifies them from holding certain offices. The seventh directs the manner of passing bills. The eighth defines the powers vested in congress. The ninth contains the following provisions: 1st. That the migration or importation of certain classes of persons shall not be prohibited prior to the year 1808. 2d. That the writ of habeas corpus shall not be suspended, except in particular cases. 3d. That no bill of attainder or ex post facto law shall be passed. 4th. The manner of levying taxes. 5th. The manner of drawing money out of the treasury. 6th. That no title of nobility shall be granted. 7th. That no officer shall receive a present from a foreign government. The tenth forbids the respective states to exercise certain powers there enumerated.

The second article is divided into four sections. The first vests the executive power in the president of the United States, and (as amended) provides for his election and that of the vice-president. The second section confers various powers on the president. The third defines his duties. The fourth provides for the impeachment of the president, vice-president, and all civil officers of the United States.

The third article contains three sections. The first vests the judicial power in sundry courts, provides for the tenure of office by the judges, and for their compensation. The second provides for the extent of the judicial power, vests in the supreme court original jurisdiction in certain cases, and directs the manner of trying crimes. The third defines treason, and vests in congress the power to declare its punishment.

The fourth article is composed of four sections. The first provides that state records, etc., shall have full faith and credit in other states. The second secures to citizens of each state all privileges and immunities of citizens in the several states, and the delivery of fugitives from justice or from labor. The third provides for the admission of new states, and the government of the territories. The fourth guarantees to every state in the Union a republican form of government, and protection from invasion or domestic violence.

The fifth article provides for amendments to the constitution.

The sixth article declares that the debts due under the confederation shall be valid against the United States; that the constitution and treaties made under its powers shall be the supreme law of the land; that public officers shall be required by oath or affirmation to support the constitution of the United States; and that no religious test shall be required as a qualification for office.

The seventh article directs what shall be a sufficient ratification of this constitution by the states.

In pursuance of the fifth article of the constitution, articles in addition to, and amendments of, the constitution, were proposed by congress, and ratified by the legislatures of the several states. These additional articles are to the following import: The first ten were proposed at the first session of the first congress, in accordance with the recommendations of various states in ratifying the constitution, and were adopted in 1791. The dates of the adoption of the subsequent amendments are given below:—

The first relates to religious freedom; the liberty of speech and of the press; and the right of the people to assemble and to petition for redress of grievances.

The second secures to the people the right to bear arms.

The third prohibits the quartering of soldiers except in the manner therein specified.

The fourth regulates the right of search, and the manner of arrest on criminal charges.

The fifth directs the manner of being held to answer for crimes, and provides for the security of the life, liberty, and property of the citizens.

The sixth secures to the accused the right to a fair trial by jury.

The seventh provides for a trial by jury in civil cases.

The eighth directs that excessive bail shall not be required nor excessive fines imposed; nor cruel and unusual punishments inflicted.

The ninth secures to the people the rights retained by them.

The tenth secures to the states respectively, or to the people, the rights they have not granted.

The eleventh (1798) limits the powers of the federal courts as to suits against one of the United States.

The twelfth (1804) provides for the mode of electing president and vice-president.

The thirteenth (1865) abolishes slavery and involuntary servitude, except as a punishment for crimes.

The fourteenth (1868) is composed of five sections. The first defines citizenship and limits the power of the states over citizens of the United States. The second regulates representation; the third disqualification for holding office. The fourth provides for the validity of the public debt, and prohibits the United States or any state from assuming certain debts. The fifth gives congress power to enforce the article.

The fifteenth (1870) prohibits the denial or abridgment of the elective franchise, on account of race, color, or previous condition of servitude, and gives congress power to enforce the article.

CONSTITUTIONAL. That which is consonant to, and agrees with, the constitution.

Laws made in violation of the constitution are null and void, and it is now well established that it is the function of the courts so to declare them in any case coming before the court, which involves the question of their constitutionality. The presumption is always in favor of the constitutionality of a law, and the party alleging the opposite must clearly establish it. A part of a law may be unconstitutional, while there is no such objection to the remaining parts, and in this case all of the law stands, except that part which is unconstitutional. This power of the courts to declare a law unconstitutional can only exist where there is a written constitution. No such power is possessed by the English courts, and an act of parliament is absolutely conclusive and binds everybody when once its meaning is ascertained. But, where a written constitution exists, it is the expression of the will of the sovereign power, and nobody which owes its existence to that constitution (as does the legislature) can violate this fundamental expression of the will of the people. It was originally doubted whether the courts possessed this power, even where a written constitution exists, but it is now established beyond doubt. The question may arise with regard to both state and United States laws considered with reference to the United States constitution, and with regard to state laws also as considered in reference to the state. No important question of law has ever been approached with more caution, examined and discussed with more deliberation and finally determined more conclusively, than that of the existence of this judicial power. It arose as early as 1792, on an act conferring powers upon the judges which were alleged to be not judicial, but a decision was avoided by repeal of the statute; see 2 Dall. 409; but the question arising in another case, the act was declared unconstitutional; see 13 How. 40, 52, n.; the question was again raised in 1798 and not decided: 3 Dall. 386; and later it was stated from the bench as the general sentiment of the bench and bar that the power existed; 4 Dall. 194. But in 1803 the question was directly raised in a famous case recently much discussed in legal periodical literature, and the power and duty of the court to declare an act unconstitutional were declared in an opinion by Marshall, C. J., in what Kent terms "an argument approaching to the precision and certainty of a mathematical demonstration;" 1 Kent 453; in that case the actual decision was against the jurisdiction, and therefore no law was declared unconstitutional, but the reasoning of the opinion is the basis of the rule afterwards applied and firmly settled; the question was next seriously raised and finally settled by the reasoning of Marshall, C. J., in 6 Wheat. 264; Marbury v. Madison, 1 Cra. 137; prior to this decision the question had been raised and decided in favor of the power of the courts in New Jersey, 4 Halst. 427, 440, 444; Virginia, 4 Call 1, 135; 2 Va. Cas. 20; Wythe 211; in South Carolina, 1 Bay 252; 1 Martin, N. C. 42; in Rhode Island, Pamph. J. B. Varnum, Providence, 1787; and it was raised in New York in a case argued by Hamilton; Hamilton's Works, vol. 5, 115; vol. 7, 197.

In 12 S. & R., Gibson, C. J., in a dissenting opinion, was of opinion that the right of the judiciary to declare a legislative act unconstitutional does not exist, unless expressly stated; but that it is expressly given by the clause in the federal constitution which provides that the constitution shall be the supreme law of the land, etc. The same judge in 2 Pa. 281 said to counsel that he had changed his opinion for two reasons:—the late convention of Pennsylvania by their silence sanctioned the pretensions of the court to deal freely with the acts of the legislature; and he was satisfied from experience of the necessity of the case.

The power has been exercised by the supreme court of the United States in the following cases:—2 Dall. 409; 13 How. 40, 52; 1 Cra. 137; 2 Wall. 561; 4 id. 333; 8 id. 603; 9 id. 41, 274; 11 id. 113; 13 id. 128; 17 id. 322; 92 U. S. 214; 95 id. 670; 100 id. 82; 103 id. 168; 106 id. 629; 109 id. 3; 116 id. 616; 27 id. 540; 158 id. 601, the last being the Income Tax cases in 1895. During the same period the power was exercised by that court with respect to state or territorial statutes in one hundred and eighty-two cases.

The discussion of the subject has been recently revived by an article on the Income Tax cases in the Am. L. Rev. for July—August, 1895, characterizing the exercise of the power in question as "without constitutional warrant" and "based only on the plausible sophistries of John Marshall, and another by the same writer on the case of Marbury v. Madison, characterizing the doctrine as an "unconstitutional usurpation of the lawmaking power by the federal courts;" 30 Am. L. Rev. 188. The first of these was followed by an article in the same periodical taking issue with it; id. 55; and one in 34 Am. L. Reg. & Rev. 796. In the last the subject is thoroughly reviewed from the earliest cases down to the Income Tax cases, and it contains much historical matter bearing upon the question not before collected. See also 7 How. L. Rev. 129; Am. L. Rev., March and April, 1885, 177; Coxe on Judicial Power and Unconstitutional Legislation.

In judging what a constitution means, it must be interpreted in the light and by the assistance of the common law; 117 Ind. 477.

Certain fundamental principles govern the courts in passing upon the validity of legislative acts under the constitution; among them are the following:—

It is not usual as a matter of practice for courts to pass upon constitutional questions excepting before a full bench; 8 Pet. 118.

It has been said that inferior courts will not pass upon these questions; 4 Mich. 291; but see, contra, Cooley, Const. Lim.

198, n.; 1 Kan. 116. The contrary rule would seem now to be well settled.

Courts will not draw into consideration constitutional questions collaterally, or unless the consideration is necessary to the determination of the very point in controversy; 9 Ind. 287; 50 Ala. 277; 24 Barb. 446; 5 Tex. App. 579; 20 Mo. 393; 19 Ohio St. 373. If a statute is valid on its face, the court will not look into evidence aliunde to determine whether it violates the constitution; 92 Cal. 605; but where it is plainly invalid for other reasons, courts will not pass on its constitutionality; 8 Ohio Cir. Ct. R. 25; 50 Ala. 276; 30 Mich. 201; 4 Barb. 56.

To justify a court in declaring an act unconstitutional, the case must be so clear that no reasonable doubt can be said to exist; 41 Mo. 63; 17 Abb. Pr. 45; 33 Ark. 17; 16 Pick. 95; 57 N. Y. 473; 68 id. 381; 52 Pa. 477; 44 Ga. 76; 48 Mo. 468; see 130 U. S. 662; 39 N. H. 304; 62 Ill. 268; and every intendment will be made in favor of the constitutionality of the law; 5 Colo. 455.

The courts cannot pronounce void an act within the general scope of legislative powers, merely because contrary to natural justice; 2 Rawle 74; 73 Pa. 370; 4 Nev. 173; 60 Ill. 86; 94 U. S. 113; 52 Miss. 53; 119 Ind. 23; nor because it violates fundamental principles of republican government, unless these principles are protected by the constitution; 5 Wall. 469; 56 N. H. 514; nor because it is supposed to conflict with the spirit of the constitution; 24 Wend. 220; 21 Ohio St. 14; Cooley, Const. Lim., 6th ed. 204. Any legislative act which does not encroach upon the powers vested in the other departments of the government must be enforced by the courts; 62 Ill. 260; 5 W. Va. 22; 6 Cra. 128.

In the discussion of this subject expressions have been used from time to time by courts and legal authors which tend to leave in the mind of the reader an impression that legislative acts have been set aside upon some other or higher ground than that of unconstitutionality. These expressions will be found on examination either to consist of dicta not only entirely obiter, but usually not justified even as dicta by the facts of the cases in which they occur, or to be qualified by a context usually omitted in citing them. A few of them will suffice as examples. Judge Cooley, in the preface to the second edition of his very learned and valuable work on constitutional limitations, says: "There are on all sides definite limitations which circumscribe the legislative authority, independent of the specific restraints which the people impose by their state constitutions." Again, in the work itself it is said that it is not necessary that the courts, before they can set aside a law as invalid must be able to find some specific inhibition which has been disregarded, or some specific command which has been disobeyed; Cooley, Const. Lim. 206. This language has been quoted and interpreted to sustain the idea sometimes hinted at rather than seriously and argumenta-tively advanced, that there is some vague sense of justice and right—some higher law, it might be termed—which may justify a court in holding that a legislative act is invalid, in the absence of an express or implied constitutional objection. And it has been considered that the same view is maintained by Judge Redfield in an article in 10 Am. L. Reg. n. s. 161. So in an early case it has been said that statutes against plain and obvious principles of common right and common reason are void; 1 Bay 98. So also Judge Story made some forcible observations respecting "fundamental maxims of free government," to disregard which no power "lurked under any general grant of legislative authority," 2 Pet. 627, 657, which have been referred to as supporting the view under consideration. Of the like character were the assertions of Hosmer, C. J., that he could not agree "with those judges who assert the omnipotence of the legislature in all cases when the constitution has not interposed an explicit restraint;" 4 Conn. 209, 225; and the language of a New York court which declared that the vested rights of the inhabitants of the city of New York in certain public property rested "not merely upon the constitution, but upon the great principles of eternal justice which lie at the foundation of all free government;" 10 Barb. 223, 241. Commenting on these and similar statements, Mr. C. A. Kent, in an article in 11 Am. L. Reg. n. s. 734, says on this subject: "The judiciary of a state cannot declare a legislative act unconstitutional, unless it conflict, expressly or by implication, with some provision of the state or of the federal constitution." See 118 Ind. 426.

This is a concise and accurate statement of the law of the subject. A careful examination of these and other authorities relied upon for the purpose stated will make it apparent that there is no substantial basis for a doctrine which will permit a court to apply to a legislative act any test of validity other than that of its constitutionality. When there is doubt as to the construction of a law, courts may give to it one consonant with rather than opposed to principles of right and justice, and this was precisely the scope of the South Carolina case. In the New York case the great fundamental principles need not have been referred to by the court, for the reason that they were all protected by the constitution, and in the Connecticut case not only was no law held invalid, but the sole question decided was that an act declaring valid all marriages previously celebrated by a clergyman of any religious denomination according to its forms was constitutional. The note by Judge Redfield, referred to, is directed only to show that there are limitations to the legislative power, and that it does not embrace "judicial decrees or despotic orders or assessments such as a military conqueror might make," under the guise of taxation. But it will be found that the cases put by him, as well as those used by Judge Cooley, to illustrate the expression quoted from his work, and indeed all of those which have given rise to the theory under consideration, are provided for in the American constitutions either by express prohibitions and declarations of rights, or by the distribution of the powers of government and the right of the judicial branch to determine finally whether a given act is an exercise of legislative power. The whole subject is thoroughly discussed by Judge Cooley in his Constitutional Limitations, 6th ed., and upon full consideration of the authorities he concludes that a court cannot "declare a statute unconstitutional and void, solely on the ground of unjust and oppressive provisions, or because it is supposed to violate the natural, social, or political rights of the citizen, unless it be shown that such injustice is prohibited or such rights guaranteed or protected by the constitution (p. 197); . . . that except when the constitution has imposed limits upon the legislative power, it must be considered as practically absolute, whether it operate according to natural justice or not in any particular case" (p. 201), nor because of "apparent injustice or impolicy," or because "they appear to the minds of the judges to violate fundamental principles of republican government, unless it shall be found that those principles are placed beyond legislative encroachment by the constitution" (p. 202). See also Potter, Dwar. Stats. 62.

In the consideration of these questions, the distinction between the federal and state constitutions must be borne in mind: "Congress can pass no laws but such as the constitution authorizes expressly or by clear implication; while the state legislature has jurisdiction of all subjects on which its legislation is not prohibited." Cooley, Const. Lim. 210; see 24 N. Y. 427; 52 Pa. 477; 143 U. S. 657. But it has been held that the decision of congress that certain claims upon the public treasury are founded upon moral and honorable obligations and upon principles of right and justice, and that public money be appropriated in payment of such claims is constitutional, and can rarely, if ever, be the subject of review by the judicial branch of the government; 163 U. S. 427.

No one can attack as unconstitutional an independent provision of a law, who has no interest in and is not affected by such provision; 51 N. W. Rep. (S. D.) 1018; 35 N. E. Rep. (Ind.) 271; 86 Ky. 423; 48 Ala. 540; 51 Me. 449; 32 La. Ann. 726; 89 N. Y. 75.

The judiciary of the United States should not strike down a legislative enactment of a state, especially if it has direct connection with the social order, health and morals of its people, unless such legislation plainly and palpably violates some right granted or secured by the national constitution, or encroaches upon the authority delegated to the United States for the attainment of objects of national concern; 155 U. S. 481.

An act may be declared partly valid and partly void as unconstitutional; 24 Pick.

361; 2 Pet. 526; 41 Md. 446; 93 Mich. 377; 45 Fed. Rep. 175; 143 U. S. 649; 95 id. 80; 103 id. 459; 116 id. 252; 129 N. Y. 643; 83 Pa. 273; 75 N. C. 509.

An act adjudged to be unconstitutional is as if it had never been enacted; 5 Ind. 348; 50 id. 341; 34 Mich. 170; 6 McLean 142; 54 N. Y. 528; 118 U. S. 425; 114 id. 270; though it was held in 56 Pa. 436, that an officer acting under an unconstitutional law was a de facto officer. An unconstitutional law must be deemed to have the force of law so far as to protect an officer acting under it, until it is declared void; 34 Tex. 335, but see 3 McLean 107; 114 U. S. 288. If a decision adjudging a statute unconstitutional is afterwards overruled, the statute is considered to have been in force during the whole period since its enactment; 46 Ind. 86; but see 33 Pa. 495; 5 Phila. 180; 9 Am. L. Rev. 402. An unconstitutional act can under no circumstances be validated by the legislature; 30 S. C. 579.

CONSTITUTIONAL CONVENTION. A convention summoned by the legislature to draw up a new, or amend an old constitution. It is ancillary and subservient to the fundamental law, not hostile and paramount thereto. Jameson, Const. Conv. § 11. It is bound by the act creating it; 75 Pa. 59. See Jameson, Const. Conv. §§ 376-418. The result of its labors, when adopted, must be submitted to a vote of the people, before it can become effective; Jameson, § 479 et seq. Contra, if the legislature does not so provide in the act calling the convention; 42 Mo. 119; 69 Miss. 898; in such case it need not be submitted to vote; 11 So. Rep. (Miss.) 472.

CONSTITUTIONS OF THE FOREST. See FOREST LAWS; CHARTA DE FORESTA.

CONSTITUTOR. In Civil Law.

He who promised by a simple pact to pay the debt of another; and this is always a principal obligation. Inst. 4. 6. 9.

CONSTITUTUM (Lat.). An agreement to pay a subsisting debt which exists without any stipulation, whether of the promisor or another party. It differs from a stipulation in that it must be for an existing debt. Du Cange.

A day appointed for any purpose. A form of appeal. Calvinus, Lex.

CONSTRAINT. In Scotch Law. Duress.

It is a general rule, that when one is compelled into a contract there is no effectual consent, though, ostensibly, there is the form of it. In such case the contract will be declared void. The constraint requisite thus to annul a contract must be a vis aut metus qui cadet in constantem virum (such as would shake a man of firmness and resolution); Erskine, Inst. 3. 1. 16; 4. 1. 26; 1 Bell, Com. b. 3, pt. 1, c. 1, s. 1, art. 1, page 295.

CONSTRAINT. The word constraint is equivalent to the word restraint. 2 Tenn. Ch. 433.

CONSTRUCTION (Lat. construere, to put together).

In Practice. Determining the meaning and application as to the case in question of the provisions of a constitution, statute, will, or other instrument, or of an oral agreement.

Drawing conclusions respecting subjects that lie beyond the direct expression of the term. Lieber, Leg. & Pol. Herm. 20.

Construction and interpretation are generally used by writers on legal subjects, and by the courts, as synonymous, sometimes one term being employed and sometimes the other. Lieber, in his Legal and Political Hermeneutics, distinguishes between the two, considering the province of interpretation as limited to the written text, while construction goes beyond, and includes cases where texts interpreted and to be construed are to be reconciled with rules of law or with compacts or constitutions of superior authority, or where we reason from the aim or object of an instrument or determine its application to cases unprovided for; C. 1, § 8; c. 3, § 2; c. 4 c. 5. This distinction needs no higher authority for its accuracy; but it is convenient to adopt the common usage, and consider some common rules and examples on these subjects, without attempting to distinguish exactly cases of construction from those of interpretation.

Legal rules of construction so called, suggest natural methods of finding and weighing evidence and ascertaining the fact of intention, but do not determine the weight which the evidence has in mind, and do not establish a conclusion at variance with that reached by a due consideration of all the competent proof; 58 N. H. 580, 592.

A strict construction is one which limits the application of the provisions of the instrument or agreement to cases clearly described by the words used. It is called, also, literal.

A liberal construction is one by which the letter is enlarged or restrained so as more effectually to accomplish the end in view. It is called, also, equitable.

The terms strict and liberal are applied mainly in the construction of statutes; and the question of strictness or liberality is considered always with reference to the statute itself, according to whether its application is confined to those cases clearly within the legitimate import of the words used, or is extended beyond though not in violation of (ultra sed non contra) the strict letter. In contracts, a strict construction as to one party would be liberal as to the other.

One leading principle of construction is to carry out the intention of the authors of or parties to the instrument or agreement, so far as it can be done without infringing upon any law of superior binding force.

In regard to cases where this intention is clearly expressed, there is little room for variety of construction; and it is mainly in cases where the intention is indistinctly disclosed, though fairly presumed to exist in the minds of the parties, that any liberty of construction exists.

Words, if of common use, are to be taken in their natural, plain, obvious, and ordinary significations; but if technical words are used, they are to be taken in a technical sense, unless a contrary intention clearly appear in either case, from the context; 9 Wheat. 188; 32 Miss. 678; 49 N. Y. 281; 54 Cal. 111.

All instruments and agreements are to be so construed as to give effect to the whole or as large a portion as possible of the instrument or agreement; and when a court of law is construing an instrument, whether a public law or a private contract, it is legitimate if two constructions are fairly possible to adopt that one which equity would favor; 160 U. S. 77.

Statutes, if penal, are to be strictly, and if remedial, liberally construed; Bish. Writ. L. 193; Dwarrris, Stat. 246; but the rule that penal statutes are to be strictly construed is not violated by allowing their words to have full meaning, or even the more extended of two meanings, where such construction best harmonizes with the context, and most fully promotes the policy and objects of the legislature; 6 Wall. 386. The apparent object of the legislature is to be sought for as disclosed by the act itself, the preamble in some cases, similar statutes relating to the same subject, the consideration of the mischiefs of the old law, and perhaps some other circumstances; Wilberforce, Stat. Law 99.

If the words of a constitutional provision convey a definite meaning which involves no absurdity and no contradiction of other parts of the instrument, then that meaning apparent on the face of the instrument must be accepted; 130 U. S. 662.

All statutes are to be construed with reference to the provisions of the common law, and provisions in derogation of the common law are held strictly; 2 Black 358; 117 Ind. 477; 4 Mich. 322; 5 W. Va. 1.

In the construction of a statute a relative word or clause has reference to its first antecedent only, unless so to restrict its application will manifestly do violence to the plain intent of the language; 17 Co. Ct. Pa. 11.

In construing statutes of the various states or of foreign countries, the supreme court of the United States adopts the construction put upon them by the courts of the state or country by whose legislature the statute was enacted; 92 U. S. 289. See 151 U. S. 556; 98 id. 359; 24 Fed. Rep. 197; but this does not necessarily include subsequent variations of construction by such courts; 5 Pet. 280. If different interpretations are given in different states to a similar law, that law, in effect, becomes by the interpretations, so far as it is a rule for action by this court, a different law in one state from what it is in the other; 4 Wall. 196. So also in state courts the decisions of the tribunals of other states interpreting legislative enactments are considered as if incorporated therein; 44 N. Y. Sup. Ct. 260. See UNITED STATES COURTS.

In construing a statute, if it be of doubtful import, the courts will adopt a long continued construction put upon it by the executive officers charged with its execution; 12 Wheat. 206; 120 U. S. 169; 127 U. S. 607; 41 Ga. 157; 24 Ill. 27; 16 Ohio 599; 33 Wis. 663; 65 Wis. 341; but such construction in order to be binding on the courts must be long-continued and unbroken; 137 U. S. 562. So, the journals of the legislature may be referred to if the meaning of a statute is doubtful or badly expressed; 23 Wall. 307; 70 Ind. 331; but not the statements of individual members; 3 Q. B. D. 707; 2 H. & C. 521; 103 U. S. 243; 20 Cal. 387; 10 Minn. 107; 18 N. J. Eq. 13; 113 Pa. 52.

In construing a tariff act, when it is claimed that the commercial use of a word differs from its ordinary significance, in order that the former may prevail over the latter it must appear that the commercial designation is the result of established usage which was definite, uniform, and general at the time of the passage of the act; 159 U. S. 418.

In contracts, words may be understood in a technical or peculiar sense when such meaning has been stamped upon them by the usage of the trade or place in which the contract occurs. When words are manifestly inconsistent with the declared purpose and object of the contract, they may be rejected; 2 Atk. 32. When words are omitted so as to defeat the effect of the contract, they will be supplied by the obvious sense and inference from the context. When words admit of two senses, that which gives effect to the design of the parties is preferred to that which destroys it; Add. Contr. 45; Cowp. 714.

If a contract when made was valid by the laws of the state, as then expounded by all departments of its government and administered in its courts of justice, its validity and obligation cannot be impaired (in the federal courts) by any subsequent act of the legislature of the state, or decision of its courts altering the construction of the law; 16 How. 432; 1 Wall. 175; 9 Am. L. Rev. 381.

Usages of the trade or place of making the contract are presumed to be incorporated, unless a contrary stipulation occurs. See LEX LOCI.

An action formerly lay for the recovery of customs due, which was commenced by a writ de consuetudinibus et servitiis (of customs and services). This is said by Blount to be "a writ of right close which lies against the tenant that deforceth the lord of the rent and services due him." Blount; Old Nat. Brev. 77; Fitzh. Nat. Brev. 151.

There were various customs: as, consuetudo Anglicana (custom of England), consuetudo curie (practice of a court), consuetudo mercatorum (custom of merchants). See CUSTOM.

CONSUL. A commercial agent appointed by a government to reside in a seaport or other town of a foreign country, and commissioned to watch over the commercial rights and privileges of the nation deputing him. The term includes consuls-general and vice-consuls. Rev. Stat. § 4130.

A vice-consul is one acting in the place of a consul.

Among the Romans, consuls were chief magistrates who were annually elected by the people, and were invested with powers and functions similar to those of kings. During the middle ages the term consul was sometimes applied to ordinary judges; and, in the Levant, maritime judges are yet called consuls. 1 Boulay Paty, Dr. Mar. tit. Prél. s. 2, p. 57. Officers with powers and duties corresponding to those of modern consuls were employed by the ancient Athenians, who had them stationed in commercial ports with which they traded. 3 St. John, Mann. and Cus. of Anc. Greece 283. They were appointed about the middle of the twelfth century by the maritime states of the Mediterranean; and their numbers have increased greatly with the extension of modern commerce.

As a general rule, consuls represent the subjects or citizens of their own nation not otherwise represented; Bee 209; 1 Mas. 14; 3 Wheat. 435; 6 id. 152; 10 id. 66. Their duties and privileges are now generally limited, defined, and secured by commercial treaties, or by the laws of the countries they represent. They are not strictly judicial officers; 3 Taunt. 102; and have no judicial powers except those which may be conferred by treaty and statutes. See 10 Stat. L. 909; 11 id. 723; Ware 367; 91 U. S. 13.

American consuls are nominated by the president to the senate, and by the senate confirmed or rejected. U. S. Const. art. 2, sec. 2. Upon the exercise of this power of appointment by the president, congress can place no limitation; 23 Ct. Cls. 443.

They have the power and are required to perform many duties in relation to the commerce of the United States and towards masters of ships, mariners, and other citizens of the United States. Among these are the authority to receive protests or declarations which captains, masters, crews, passengers, merchants, and others make relating to American commerce; they are required to administer on the estates of American citizens dying within their consular jurisdiction and leaving no legal representatives, when the laws of the country permit it; see 2 Curt. Eccl. 241; to take charge of and secure the effects of stranded American vessels in the absence of the master, owner, or consignee; to settle disputes between masters of vessels and the mariners; to provide for destitute seamen within their consulate, and send them to the United States at the public expense. See Rev. Stat. § 1674 et seq. Also to hear complaints of ill-treatment of seamen; 55 Fed. Rep. 80. The consuls are also authorized to make certificates of certain facts in certain cases, which receive faith and credit in the courts of the United States; 3 Sumn. 27. But these consular certificates are not to be received in evidence, unless they are given in the performance of a consular function; 2 Cra. 187;

Paine 594; 2 Wash. C. C. 478; 1 Litt. 71; nor are they evidence, between persons not parties or privies to the transaction, of any fact, unless, either expressly or impliedly, made so by statute; 2 Sumn. 355; 1 Paine 594; 2 Crabbe 54.

Their rights are to be protected agreeably to the laws of nations, and of the treaties made between the United States and the nation to which they are sent. The act of 18th August, 1856, gives the president power to prescribe and alter from time to time their fees. But by acts passed at various times nearly all consuls now receive an annual salary, and only those not salaried are allowed to take fees for compensation; Rev. Stat. §§ 1690, 1730, 1745. The power to provide for compensation of diplomatic officers is vested in the legislative branch alone, and it may fix or limit the amount; 22 Ct. Cls. 59.

A consul is liable for negligence or omission to perform seasonably the duties imposed upon him, or for any malversation or abuse of power, to any injured person, for all damages occasioned thereby; and for all malversation and corrupt conduct in office a consul is liable to indictment.

Of foreign consuls. Before a consul can perform any duties in the United States, he must be recognized by the president of the United States, and have received his exequatur.

A consul is clothed only with authority for commercial purposes; and he has a right to interpose claims for the restitution of property belonging to the citizens or subjects of the country he represents; 1 Curt. 87; 1 Mas. 14; Bee 209; 6 Wheat. 152; 10 id. 66; see 2 Wall. Jr. 59; but he is not to be considered as a minister or diplomatic agent, intrusted by virtue of his office to represent his sovereign in negotiations with foreign states; 3 Wheat. 435.

Consuls are generally invested with special privileges by local laws and usages, or by international compacts; but by the laws of nations they are not entitled to the peculiar immunities of ambassadors. In civil and criminal cases they are subject to the local laws, in the same manner with other foreign residents owing a temporary allegiance to the state; 1 Op. Atty. Gen. 45, 302; 5 S. & R. 546; 3 M. & S. 284; 2 Dall. 297; Hall, Int. L. 289; Wicquefort, De l'Ambassadeur, liv. 1, § 5; Bynkershoek, cap. 10; Marten, Droit des Gens, liv. 4, c. 3, § 148. See 24 Q. B. Div. 368. In the United States, the act of September 24, 1789, s. 13 (R. S. § 687), gives to the supreme court original but not exclusive jurisdiction of all suits in which a consul or vice-consul shall be a party. See 1 Binn. 143; 2 Dall. 299; 2 N. & M'C. 217; 3 Pick. 80; 1 Green 107; 17 Johns. 10; 7 N. Y. 576.

His functions may be suspended at any time by the government to which he is sent, and his exequatur revoked. In general, a consul is not liable personally on a contract made in his official capacity on account of his government; 3 Dall. 384. A vice-consul of a foreign nation who possesses an unrevoked exequatur issued by the President of the United States, must still be recognized by the courts as the accredited representative of his country and entitled to all its privileges, although the government which sent him has been overthrown and a revolutionary government established in its place; 48 Fed. Rep. 94.

CONSULAR COURTS. Courts held by the consuls of one country within the territory of another, under treaty authority, for the settlement of civil cases between citizens of the country which they represent. They sometimes have also a criminal jurisdiction, subject in the case of certain countries to review by the home courts; U. S. Rev. Stat. § 4095. See Piggott, Extraterritoriality. The United States has such courts in China, Japan, Siam, Madagascar, Persia, Tripoli, Tunis, Morocco, and Muscat; see U. S. Rev. Stat. §§ 4083, 4125, 4126, 4127; and similar jurisdiction is provided for by law in any country of like character with which treaty relations may thereafter be established; id. § 4129. Such courts did exist in Egypt and Turkey, but were suspended pursuant to act of March 23, 1874, U. S. Rev. Stat. 1 Supp. 6, by proclamation of the President, March 27, 1876, accepting the jurisdiction of the tribunals established by those countries; 19 Stat. L. 652. The jurisdiction of the home courts over offences on the high seas is not exclusive of the jurisdiction of the consular court, if the offender is not taken to the United States; In re Ross, 140 U. S. 453. When a treaty gives to the consular courts exclusive jurisdiction of suits against subjects of its own country, and to the territorial courts similar jurisdiction over its countrymen, the consular court cannot entertain a cross suit, or set-off, as against a subject of that country, in a suit properly brought against a citizen of the nation which it represents; [1895] A. C. 646.

CONSULAR OFFICER. This term includes consuls-general, consuls, commercial agents, deputy-consuls, vice-consuls, vice-commercial agents, and consular agents. R. S. § 1674.

CONSULTATION. The name of a writ whereby a cause, being formerly removed by prohibition out of an inferior court into some of the king's courts in Westminster, is returned thither again; for, if the judges of the superior court, comparing the proceedings with the suggestion of the party, find the suggestion false or not proved, and that, therefore, the cause was wrongfully called from the inferior court, then, upon consultation and deliberation, they decree it to be returned, whereupon this writ issues. Termes de la Ley; 3 Bla. Com. 114.

In French Law. The opinion of counsel upon a point of law submitted to them.

CONSUMMATE. Complete; finished; entire.

A marriage is said to be consummate. A right of dower is inchoate when coverture and seisin concur, consummate upon the husband's death. 1 Washb. R. P. 250, 251. A tenancy by the curtesy is initiate upon the birth of issue, and consummate upon the death of the wife. 1 Washb. R. P. 140; 13 Conn. 83; 2 Me. 400; 2 Bla. Com. 123.

A contract is said to be consummated when everything to be done in relation to making it has been accomplished. It is frequently of great importance to know when a contract has been consummated, in order to ascertain the rights of the parties, particularly in the contract of sale. See DELIVERY, where the subject is more fully examined. It is also sometimes of consequence to ascertain where the consummation of the contract took place, in order to decide by what law it is to be governed. See CONFLICT OF LAWS; CONTRACT; LEX LOCI.

CONTAGIOUS DISORDERS. Diseases which are capable of being transmitted by mediate or immediate contact.

Persons sick of such disorders may remain in their own houses; 2 Barb. 104; but are indictable for exposing themselves in a public place endangering the public. See 4 M. & S. 73, 272. Nuisances which produce such diseases may be abated; 15 Wend. 397. See 4 M'Cord 472; 3 Hill, N.Y. 479; 25 Pa. 503; 48 Iowa 15; and a right of action may also be had for injury done to health; 26 Mo. App. 253; 108 Pa. 489. A system of quarantine laws established by a state is a rightful exercise of the police power for the protection of health, which is not forbidden by the constitution; 118 U. S. 455.

CONTANGO. In English Law. The commission received for carrying over or putting off the time of execution of a contract to deliver stocks or pay for them at a certain time. Wharton, Dict.; see Lewis, Stock Exchange.

CONTEK (L. Fr.). A contest, dispute, disturbance, opposition. Britt. c. 42.

CONTEMPLATION OF BANKRUPTCY. An intention or expectation of breaking up business or applying to be decreed a bankrupt. Crabbe 529; 5 B. & Ad. 289; 4 Bing. 20; 9 id. 349; 3 McLean 587.

Contemplation of a state of bankruptcy or a known insolvency and inability to carry on business, and a stoppage of business. Story, J., 5 Bost. L. Rep. 295, 299. See 3 Story 446.

Something more is meant by the phrase than the expectation of insolvency; it includes the making provision against the results of it; 13 How. 150; 8 Bosw. 194. See 1 Dill. 186; id. 203.

A conveyance or sale of property made in contemplation of bankruptcy is fraudulent and void; 2 Bla. Com. 285.

CONTEMPLATION OF INSOLVENCY. This term means something more than expectation of its occurrence; it must include provision against its results so far as the transferee is concerned, and that can only be where he is already a creditor and the object is to take his debt out of the equal ratable distribution of the assets of the company when insolvent. 21 How. Pr. Rep. 409.

CONTEMPT. A wilful disregard or disobedience of a public authority.

By the constitution of the United States, each house of congress may determine the rules of its proceedings, punish its members for disorderly behavior, and, with the concurrence of two-thirds, expel a member. The same provision is substantially contained in the constitutions of the several states.

The power to make rules carries that of enforcing them, and to attach persons who violate them, and punish them for contempts; 1 Kent 236; 37 N. H. 450; 3 Wils. 188; 14 East 1. But see 4 Moore, P. C. 63; 11 id. 347. This power of punishing for contempts is confined to punishment during the session of the legislature, and cannot extend beyond it; 6 Wheat. 204, 230, 231; Rap. Contempt 2; and it seems this power cannot be exerted beyond imprisonment. And it is often regulated by statute; U. S. Rev. St. §§ 101-103. The arrest of the offending party is made by the sergeant-at-arms, acting by virtue of the speaker's warrant, both in England and the United States; 6 Wheat. 204; 10 Q. B. 359. The power of congress to punish for contempt must be found in some express grant in the constitution or be found necessary to carry into effect such powers as are there granted; 103 U. S. 169; 106 id. 220. See CONGRESS.

Courts of justice have an inherent power to punish all persons for contempt of their rules and orders, for disobedience of their process, and for disturbing them in their proceedings; Bac. Abr. Courts (E); Rolle, Abr. 219; 8 Co. 38 b; 11 id. 43 b; 22 Me. 550; 21 id. 550; 5 Ired. 199; 37 N. H. 450; 16 Ark. 334; 25 Ala. N. s. 81; 25 Miss. 883; 1 Woodb. & M. 401; 12 Am. Dec. 178; 29 Ohio 330; 128 U. S. 289; 23 Neb. 848; 7 Cra. 32; 63 N. C. 397; 64 Ill. 195; 65 Ind. 508. See 131 U. S. 267. A court may commit for a period reaching beyond the term at which the contempt is committed; 13 Md. 642. The punishment should not be by piecemeal, but must be entire and final; 49 N. J. Eq. 577.

Contempts of court are of two kinds: such as are committed in the presence of the court, and which interrupt its proceedings, which may be summarily punished by order of the presiding judge; and constructive contempts, arising from a refusal to comply with an order of court; 49 Me. 392. In the court of chancery the failure or refusal to perform an order or decree is a contempt, and the enforcement of such orders and decrees is by attachment. For an exhaustive discussion of the practice in such cases, see note to State v. Livingston, 4 Del. Ch. 265.

A prosecution for contempt of court in order to compel obedience to an order made in a chancery proceeding is a civil action; 140 Ill. 552.

As to proceedings to compel payment of alimony, see note, 24 L. R. A. 433.

The punishment is summary and generally immediate in contempts committed in facie curiæ, and no process or evidence is necessary; 47 Kan. 771; 2 L. R. H. L. 361; 43 Conn. 257; and a party in contempt cannot be heard except to purge himself; 87 N. Y. 262.

In some states, as in Pennsylvania, the power to punish for contempts is restricted to offences committed by the officers of the court, or in its presence, or in disobedience of its mandates, orders, or rules; but no one is guilty of a contempt for any publication made or act done out of court which is not in violation of such lawful rules or orders or in disobedience of its process. Similar provisions, limiting the power of the courts of the United States to punish for contempts, are incorporated in the act of March 2, 1831; Rev. St. § 725; 4 Sharsw. Cont. of Stor. U. S. Laws 2256. See Oswald's Case, 4 Lloyd's Debates 141 et seq. If a newspaper article is per se libellous, making a direct charge against court or jury, or admitting of but one reasonable construction and requiring no innuendo to apply its meaning to the court, then the publisher cannot escape by denying under oath that he intended the plain meaning which the language used conveys; 131 Ind. 599. The question of contempt depends upon the act and not the intention of the party; 22 W. R. 398; Taney 363; 3 Burr. 1329; 3 C. B. 745. A publication in a newspaper, read by the jurors and attendants of the court, which has a tendency to interfere with the unbiased administration of the laws in pending cases, may be adjudged a contempt; 45 La. Ann. 1250.

The power of inferior courts to punish for contempt is usually restricted to contempts committed in the presence of the court; 3 Steph. Com. 342, n. 9; L. R. 8 Q. B. 134. A justice of the peace cannot punish contempts, even committed before him, by summary proceedings; 26 Pa. 99.

It is said that it belongs exclusively to the court offended to judge of contempts and what amounts to them; 37 N. H. 450; 8 Oreg. 487; 26 Am. Rep. 752; 26 Pa. 9; 40 Ia. 207; and no other court or judge can or ought to undertake, in a collateral way, to question or review an adjudication of a contempt made by another competent jurisdiction; 14 East 1; 2 Bay 182; 1 Ill. 266; 1 J. J. Marsh. 575; 1 Blackf. 166; T. U. P. Charl't. 136; 14 Ark. 538, 544; 1 Ind. 161; 6 Johns. 337; 6 Wheat. 204; 8 Utah 20; 93 Cal. 139. But it has been repeatedly held that a court of superior jurisdiction may review the decision of one of inferior jurisdiction on a matter of contempt; 1 Grant, Cas. 453; 7 Cal. 181; 13 Gratt. 40; 15 B. Mon. 607; though not on habeas corpus; 14 Tex. 436; see 53 Cal. 204; 51 Miss. 50; 24 Am. Rep. 624; see 114 Ill. 147. It should be by direct order of the court; 5 Wis. 227. A proceeding for contempt is regarded as a distinct and independent suit; 22 E. L. & Eq. 150; 25 Vt. 680; 21 Conn. 185. See, generally, 1 Abb. Adm. 508; 5 Duer 629; 1 Dutch. 209; 16 Ill. 534; 1 Ind.

96; 8 Blackf. 574; 3 Tex. 360; 1 Greene 394; 18 Miss. 103; and irregularities in the proceedings are immaterial where the result is a sufficient purging of the contempt and a consequent discharge of the rule; 88 Ga. 78.

Though the same act constitute both a contempt and a crime, the contempt may be tried and punished by the court; U. S. v. Debs, 64 Fed. Rep. 724; affirmed by the supreme court, which held that while it was competent for the executive branch of the government to remove forcibly obstructions to the passage of interstate commerce or the carrying of the mails, it is equally competent to invoke the jurisdiction of the courts to remove or restrain them. Such jurisdiction being recognized from ancient times and indubitable authority, is not ousted by the fact that the obstructions are accompanied by or consist of acts in themselves violations of the criminal law, or by the fact that the injunction may be enforced by proceedings in contempt; as the penalty for violation of such an injunction is no substitute for criminal prosecution. The injunction having been served, the circuit court has authority to inquire whether its orders had been disobeyed, and finding that they had been, to enter the order of punishment, and its findings as to the act of disobedience are not open to review on habeas corpus in the supreme court or any other; 158 U. S. 564.

See 20 Am. Law Reg. N. S. 81 et seq., where the whole subject is treated at great length. See Rapalje, Contempt; CONGRESS.

CONTEMPTIBILITER (L. Lat. contemptuously; Lat. contemptus).

In Old English Law. Contempt, contempts. Fleta, lib. 2, c. 60, § 35.

CONTENTIOUS JURISDICTION. In Ecclesiastical Law. That which exists in cases where there is an action or judicial process and matter in dispute is to be heard and determined between party and party. It is to be distinguished from voluntary jurisdiction, which exists in cases of taking probate of wills, granting letters of administration, and the like. 3 Bla. Com. 66.

CONTENTMENT (or, more properly, contentement; L. Lat. contentementum). A man's countenance or credit, which he has together with, and by reason of, his freehold; or that which is necessary for the support and maintenance of men, agreeably to their several qualities or states of life. Whart. Lex.; Cowel; 4 Bla. Com. 379.

CONTENTS UNKNOWN. A phrase contained in a bill of lading, denoting that the goods are shipped in apparently good condition. 12 How. 273.

CONTENTS AND NOT-CONTENTS. The "contents" are those who, in the house of lords, express assent to a bill; the "not" or "non-contents," dissent. May, P. L. c. 12, 357.

CONTESTATIO LITIS. In Civil Law. The statement and answer of the plaintiff and defendant, thus bringing the case before the judge, conducted usually in the presence of witnesses. Calvinus, Lex.

This sense is retained in the canon law. 1 Kaufm. Mackeldey, C. L. 203. A cause is said to be contesta when the judge begins to hear the cause after an account of the claims, given not through pleadings, but by statement of the plaintiff and answer of the defendant. Calvinus, Lex.

In Old English Law. Coming to an issue; the issue so produced. Steph. Pl. App. n. 39; Crabb, Hist. 216.

CONTESTED ELECTION. This phrase has no technical or legally defined meaning. An election may be said to be contested whenever an objection is formally urged against it, which, if found to be true in fact, would invalidate it. This must be true both as to objection founded upon some constitutional provision, as well as upon any mere statutory enactment; 109 Ind. 116.

CONTEXT (Lat. contextum,—con, with texere, to weave,—that which is interwoven). Those parts of a writing which precede and follow a phrase or passage in question; the connection.

It is a general principle of legal interpretation that a passage or phrase is not to be understood absolutely as if it stood by itself, but is to be read in the light of the context, i. e. in its connection with the general composition of the instrument. The rule is frequently stated to be that where there is any obscurity in a passage the context is to be considered; but the true rule is much broader. It is always proper to look at the context in the application of the most ambiguous expression. Thus, if on a sale of goods the vendor should give a written receipt acknowledging payment of the price, and containing, also, a promise not to deliver the goods, the word "not" would be rejected by the court, because it is repugnant to the context. It not unfrequently happens that two provisions of an instrument are conflicting: each is then the context of the other, and they are to be taken together and so understood as to harmonize with each other so far as may be, and to carry out the general intent of the instrument. In the context of a will, that which follows controls that which precedes; and the same rule has been asserted with reference to statutes. Consult, also, CONSTRUCTION; INTERPRETATION; STATUTES.

CONTIGUOUS. In close proximity, in actual close contact. 69 N. Y. 191; as, contiguous proprietors are those whose lands actually touch. Vicinal are not necessarily contiguous proprietors; 32 La. Ann. 435.

CONTINGENCY. The quality of being contingent or casual; the possibility of coming to pass; an event which may occur. Webster.

It is a fortuitous event which comes without design, foresight, or expectation. 39 Barb. 272.

CONTINGENCY WITH DOUBLE ASPECT. If there are remainders so limited that the second is a substitute for the first in case it should fail, and not in derogation of it, the remainder is said to be in a contingency with double aspect. Fearne, Rem. 373; 1 Steph. Com. 328.

CONTINGENT. When applied to a use, remainder, devise, bequest, or other legal right or interest, it means that no present interest exists, and that whether such interest or right ever will exist, depends upon a future uncertain event. The legal definition of the word concurs with its ordinary acceptation in showing that the term contingent implies a possibility; 5 Barb. 692.

CONTINGENT DAMAGES. Those given where the issues upon counts to which no demurrer has been filed are tried, before demurrer to one or more counts in the same declaration has been decided. 1 Stra. 431.

Inaccurately used to describe consequential damages, q. v.

CONTINGENT ESTATE. A contingent estate depends for its effect upon an event which may or may not happen: as, an estate limited to a person not in esse, or not yet born. Crabb, R. P. § 946.

CONTINGENT FEES. See CHAMPERTY.

CONTINGENT INTEREST IN PERSONAL PROPERTY. It may be defined as a future interest not transmissible to the representatives of the party entitled thereto, in case he dies before it vests in possession. Thus, if a testator leaves the income of a fund to his wife for life, and the capital of the fund to be distributed among such of his children as shall be living at her death, the interest of each child during the widow's lifetime is contingent, and in case of his death is not transmissible to his representatives. Moz. & W. Law Dict.

CONTINGENT LEGACY. A legacy made dependent upon some uncertain event. 1 Rep. Leg. 506. Beach, Wills 406.

A legacy which has not vested. Wms. Ex. 1229.

CONTINGENT REMAINDER. An estate in remainder which is limited to take effect either to a dubious and uncertain person, or upon a dubious and uncertain event, by which no present or particular interest passes to the remainderman, so that the particular estate may chance to be determined and the remainder never take effect. 2 Bla. Com. 169.

A remainder limited so as to depend upon an event or condition which may never happen or be performed, or which may not happen or be performed till after the determination of the preceding estate. Fearne, Cont. Rem. 3; 2 Washb. R. P. 224. See 89 Mich. 428; 108 Mo. 267; 152 Pa. 18; [1892] 1 Q. B. 184; REMAINDER.

CONTINGENT USE. A use limited in a deed or conveyance of land which may or may not happen to vest, according to the contingency expressed in the limitation of such use.

Such a use as by possibility may happen in possession, reversion, or remainder. 1 Co. 121; Com. Dig. Uses (K, 6). A use limited to take effect upon the happening of some future contingent event; as, where lands are conveyed to the use of A and B after a marriage had between them. 2 Bla. Com. 334.

A contingent remainder limited by way of uses. Sugd. Uses 175. See, also, 4 Kent 287.

CONTINUAL CLAIM. A formal claim made once a year to lands or tenements of which we cannot, without danger, attempt to take possession. It had the same effect as a legal entry, and thus saved the right of entry to the heir. Cowel; 2 Bla. Com. 316; 3 id. 175. This effect of a continual claim is abolished by stat. 3 & 4 Will. IV. c. 27, § 11. 1 Steph. Com. 509.

CONTINUANCE (Lat. continuere, to continue).

In Practice. The adjournment of a cause from one day to another of the same or a subsequent term.

The postponement of the trial of a cause.

The action of a trial court on an application for continuance is purely a matter of discretion and will not be reviewed unless that discretion has been abused; 159 U. S. 487.

In the ancient practice, continuances were entered upon the record, and a variety of forms adapted to the different stages of the suit were in use. See 1 Chit. Pl. 455; 3 Bla. Com. 316. The object of the continuance was to secure the further attendance of the defendant, who having once attended could not be required to attend again, unless a day was fixed. The entry of continuance became at the time mere matter of form, and is now discontinued in England and most of the states of the United States.

Before the declaration, continuance is by dies datus prece partium; after the declaration, and before issue joined, by importance; after issue joined, and before verdict, by vice-comes non misit breve; and after verdict or demurrer, by curia advisare vult. 1 Chit. Pl. 455, 749; Bac. Abr. Pleas (P), Trial (H); Com. Dig. Pleader (V); Steph. Pl. 64. In its modern use the word has the second of the two meanings given above.

Among the causes for granting a continuance are absence of a material witness; 1 Dall. 270; 4 Munf. 547; 10 Leigh 687; 3 Harr. N. J. 495; 2 Wash. C. C. 159; 40 La. Ann. 745; 26 Tex. App. 69; 82 Va. 264; but he must have been subpoenaed; 1 Const. S. CONTINUANDO (Lat. continuaré, to continue, continuando, continuing).

In Pleading. An averment that a trespass has been continued during a number of days. 3 Bla. Com. 212. It was allowed to prevent a multiplicity of actions; 2 Rolle, Abr. 545; only where the injury was such as could, from its nature, be continued; 1 Wms. Saund. 24, n. 1.

The form is now disused, and the same end secured by alleging divers trespasses to have been committed between certain days. 1 Saund. 24, n. 1. See, generally, Gould, Pl. c. 3, § 86; Hamm. N. P. 90, 91; Bac. Abr. Trespass, I, 2, n. 2.

CONTINUING CONSIDERATION. See CONSIDERATION.

CONTINUING DAMAGES. See MEASURE OF DAMAGES.

CONTINUOUS EASEMENTS.

Easements of which the enjoyment is or may be continual, without the necessity of any actual interference by man, as a water-spout or a right of light or air. Washb. Easem. 21. See EASEMENTS.

CONTRA (Lat.). Over; against; opposite. Per contra. In opposition.

CONTRA BONOS MORES. Against sound morals.

Contracts which are incentive to crime, or of which the consideration is an obligation or engagement improperly prejudicial to the feelings of a third party, offensive to decency or morality, or which has a tendency to mischievous or pernicious consequences, are void, as being contra bonos mores; 2 Wils. 447; Cowp. 729; 4 Campb. 152; 1 B. & Ald. 683; 16 East 150.

CONTRA FORMAM STATUTI (against the form of the statute).

In Pleading. The formal manner of alleging that the offence described in an indictment is one forbidden by statute.

When one statute prohibits a thing and another gives the penalty, in an action for the penalty the declaration should conclude contra formam statutorum; Plowd. 206; 2 East 333; Esp. Pen. Act. 111; 1 Gal. 268. The same rule applies to informations and indictments; 2 Hale, Pl. Cr. 172. But where a statute refers to a former one, and adopts and continues the provisions of it, the declaration or indictment should conclude contra formam statuti; Hale, Pl. Cr. 172. Where a thing is prohibited by several statutes, if one only gives the action and the others are explanatory and restrictive, the conclusion should be contra formam statuti; And. 115; 2 Saund. 377.

When the act prohibited was not an offence or ground of action at common law, it is necessary both in criminal and civil cases to conclude against the form of the statute or statutes; 1 Saund. 135 c; 2 East 333; 1 Chit. Pl. 556; 11 Mass. 280; 1 Gall. 30.

But if the act prohibited by the statute is an offence or ground of action at common law, the indictment or action may be in the common-law form, and the statute need not be noticed even though it prescribe a form of prosecution or of action,—the statute remedy being merely cumulative; Co. 2d Inst. 200; 2 Burr. 803; 3 id. 1418; 4 id. 2351; 2 Wils. 146; 3 Mass. 515.

When a statute only inflicts a punishment on that which was an offence at common law, the punishment prescribed may be inflicted though the statute is not noticed in the indictment; 2 Binn. 332.

If an indictment for an offence at common law only conclude "against the form of the statute in such case made and provided;" or "the form of the statute" generally, the conclusion will be rejected as surplusage, and the indictment maintained as at common law; 1 Saund. 135 n. 3; 16 Mass. 385; 4 Cush. 143. But it will be otherwise if it conclude against the form of "the statute aforesaid," when a statute has been previously recited; 1 Chit. Cr. L. 289. See, further, Com. Dig. Pleader (C.) 76; 5 Viner, Abr. 552, 556; 1 Gall. 26, 257; 5 Pick. 128; 9 id. 1; 1 Hawks 192; 3 Conn. 1; 11 Mass. 280; 5 Me. 79.

CONTRA PACEM (Lat. against the peace).

In Pleading. An allegation in an action of trespass or ejectment that the actions therein complained of were against the peace of the king. Such an allegation was formerly necessary, but has become a mere matter of form and not traversable. See 4 Term 503; 1 Chit. Pl. 163, 402; Arch. Civ. Pl. 155; TRESPASS.

CONTRABAND OF WAR. In International Law. Goods which neutrals may not carry in time of war to either of the belligerent nations without subjecting themselves to the loss of the goods, and formerly the owners, also, to the loss of the ship and other cargo, if intercepted. 1 Kent 138, 143. See 4 Heisk. 345.

Provisions may be contraband of war, and generally all articles calculated to be of direct use in aiding the belligerent powers to carry on the war; and if the use is doubtful, the mere fact of a hostile destination renders the goods contraband; 1 Kent 140; Hall, Int. L. 618.

The classification of goods best supported by authority, English and American, divides all merchandise into three classes: (1) Articles manufactured and primarily or ordinarily used for military purposes in time of war; (2) articles which may be and are used for war or peace according to circumstances; (3) articles exclusively used for peaceful purposes. Articles of the first class destined to a belligerent country are always contraband; articles of the second class are so only when actually destined to the military or naval use of the belligerent; articles of the third class are not contraband, though liable to seizure for violation of blockade or siege. Contraband articles contaminate non-contraband, if belonging to the same owner; in ordinary cases the conveyance of contraband articles attaches only to the freight; it does not subject the vessel to forfeiture; per Chase, C. J., in The Peterhoff, 5 Wall. 28.

The meaning of the term is generally defined by treaty provisions enumerating the things which shall be deemed contraband.

CONTRACUSATOR. A criminal; one prosecuted for a crime. Wharton.

CONTRACT (Lat. contractus, from con, with, and traho, to draw. Contractus ultro utroque obligatio est quam Græci συναλλαγμα vocant. Fr. contrat).

An agreement between two or more parties to do or not to do a particular thing. Taney, C. J., 11 Pet. 420, 572. An agreement in which a party undertakes to do or not to do a particular thing. Marshall, C. J., 4 Wheat. 197. An agreement between two or more parties for the doing or not doing of some specified thing. 1 Pars. Com. 5.

It has been also defined as follows: A compact between two or more parties. 6 Cra. 87, 136. An agreement or covenant between two or more persons, in which each party binds himself to do or forbear some act, and each acquires a right to what the other promises. Encyc. Amer.; Webster. A contract or agreement is where a promise is made on one side and assented to on the other; or where two or more persons enter into an engagement with each other by a promise on either side. 2 Steph. Com. 108, 109.

An agreement upon sufficient consideration to do or not to do a particular thing. 2 Bla. Com. 446; 2 Kent 449.

A covenant or agreement between two parties with a lawful consideration or cause. West, Symbol. lib. 1, § 10; Cowel; Blount.

A deliberate engagement between competent parties upon a legal consideration to do or to abstain from doing some act. Story, Contr. § 1.

An agreement by which two parties reciprocally promise and engage, or one of them singly promises and engages to the other, to give some particular thing or to do or abstain from doing some particular act. Pothier, Contrs. Pt. I, c. 1, § 1; 36 Ch. D. 695.

A mutual promise upon lawful consideration or cause which binds the parties to a performance. The writing which contains the agreement of parties with the terms and conditions, and which serves as a proof of the obligation. The last is a distinct signification. 2 Hill, N. Y. 551.

A voluntary and lawful agreement by competent parties, for a good consideration, to do or not to do a specified thing. 9 Cal. 88.

An agreement enforceable at law, made between two or more persons, by which rights are acquired by one or both to acts or forbearances on the part of the other. Anson, Contr. 9.

A learned writer has said, in discussing the proper definition of contract, that "if we seek to build up a definition of the term 'contract' which shall include all things that have been called contracts and shall exclude all things that have been held not to be contracts, the task is evidently impossible. . . . Any definition of contract therefore must be either arbitrary or inexact." Harriman, Contr. 4.

The consideration is not properly included in the definition of contract, because it does not seem to be essential to a contract, although it may be necessary to its enforcement. See CONSIDERATION. 1 Pars. Contr. 7.

Mr. Stephen, whose definition of contract is given above, thus criticizes the definition of Blackstone, which has been adopted by Chancellor Kent and other high authorities. First, that the word agreement itself requires definition as much as contract. Second, that the existence of a consideration, though essential to the validity of a parol contract, forms properly no part of the idea. Third, that the definition takes no sufficient notice of the mutuality which properly distinguishes a contract from a promise. 2 Steph. Com. 109.

The use of the word agreement (aggregatio mentium) seems to have the authority of the best writers in ancient and modern times (see above) as a part of the definition of contract. It is probably a translation of the civil-law conventio (con and venio), a coming together, to which (being derived from ad and gex) it seems nearly equivalent. We do not think the objection that it is a synonym (or nearly so) a valid one. Some word of the kind is necessary as a basis of the definition. No two synonyms convey precisely the same idea. "Most of them are entirely equivalent, it will soon be determined by accident which shall remain in use and which become obsolete. To one who has no knowledge of a language, it is impossible to define any abstract idea. But to one who understands a language, an abstraction is defined by a synonym properly qualified. By pointing out distinctions and the mutual relations between synonyms, the object of definition is answered. Hence we do not think Blackstone's definition open to the first objection.

As to the idea of consideration, Mr. Stephen seems correct and to have the authority of some of the first legal minds of modern times. Consideration, however, may be necessary to enforce a contract, though not essential to the idea. Even in that class of contracts (by specialty) in which no consideration is in fact required, one is said to be always presumed in law,—the form of the instrument being held to import a consideration. 2 Kent, 450, n. But see CONSIDERATION, where the subject is more fully treated.

The third objection of Mr. Stephen to the definition of Blackstone does not seem one to which it is fairly open. There is an idea of mutuality in con and traheo, to draw together, and it would seem that mutuality is implied in agreement as well. An aggregationem seems impossible without mutuality. Blackstone in his analysis appears to have regarded agreement as implying mutuality; for he defines it (2 Bla. Com. 442) "a mutual bargain or convention." In the above definition, however, all ambiguity is avoided by the use of the words "between two or more parties" following agreement.

In its widest sense, "contract" includes records and specialties (but see infra); but this use as a general term for all sorts of obligations, though of too great authority to be now doubted, seems to be an undue extension of the proper meaning of the term, which is much more nearly equivalent to "agreement" which is never applied to specialties. Mutuality is of the very essence of both,—not only mutuality of assent, but of act. As expressed by Lord Coke, Actus contra actum; 2 Co. 15; 7 M. & G. 993, argument and note.

This is illustrated in contracts of sale, bailment, hire, as well as partnership and marriage; and no other engagements but those with this kind of mutuality would seem properly to come under the head of contracts. In a bond there is none of this mutuality,—no act to be done by the obligee to make the instrument binding. In a judgment there is no mutuality either of act or of assent. It is judicium redditum in invitum. It may properly be denied to be a contract, though Blackstone insists that one is implied. Per Mansfield, 3 Burr. 1545; 1 Cow. 316; per Story, J., 1 Mas. 288. Chitty uses "obligation" as an alternative word of description when speaking of bonds and judgments. Chit. Con. 2. 4. An act of legislature may be a contract; so may a legislative grant with exemption from taxes; 5 Ohio St. 361. So a charter is a contract between a state and a corporation within the meaning of the constitution of the United States, art. 1, § 10, clause 1; 4 Wheat. 518.

At common law, contracts have been divided ordinarily into contracts of record, contracts by specialty, and simple or parol contracts. The latter may be either written (not sealed) or verbal; and they may also be express or implied. Implied contracts may be either implied in law or implied in fact. "The only difference between an express contract and one implied in fact is in the mode of substantiating it. An express agreement is proved by express words, written or spoken . . . ; an implied agreement is proved by circumstantial evidence showing that the parties intended to contract;" Leake, Contr. 11; 1 B. & Ad. 415; 1 Aust. Jur. 356, 377.

Accessory contracts are those made for assuring the performance of a prior contract, either by the same parties or by others, such as suretyship, mortgage, and pledges. Louisiana Code, art. 1764; Poth. Obl. pt. 1, c. 1, s. 1, art. 2, n. 14.

Bilateral contracts are those in which a promise is given in consideration of a promise. Parsons, Contr. 464.

Contracts of beneficence are those by which only one of the contracting parties is benefited: as, loans, deposit, and mandate. Louisiana Code, art. 1767.

Certain contracts are those in which the thing to be done is supposed to depend on the will of the party, or when, in the usual course of events, it must happen in the manner stipulated.

Commutative contracts are those in which what is done, given, or promised by one party is considered as an equivalent to or in consideration of what is done, given, or promised by the other. Louisiana Code, art. 1761.

Consensual contracts were contracts of agency, partnership, sale, and hiring in the Roman law, in which a contract arose from the mere consensus of the parties without other formalities. Maine, Anc. Law 243.

Entire contracts are those the consideration of which is entire on both sides.

Executed contracts are those in which nothing remains to be done by either party, and where the transaction has been completed, or was completed at the time the contract or agreement was made: as, where an article is sold and delivered and payment therefor is made on the spot.

Executory contracts are those in which some act remains to be done: as, when an agreement is made to build a house in six months; to do an act before some future day; to lend money upon a certain interest payable at a future time. 6 Cra. 87, 136.

A contract executed (which differs in nothing from a grant) conveys a chose in possession; a contract executory conveys a chose in action. 2 Bla. Com. 443. As to the importance of grants considered as contracts, see IMPAIRING THE OBLIGATION OF CONTRACTS.

Express contracts are those in which the terms of the contract or agreement are openly and fully uttered and avowed at the time of making: as, to pay a stated price for certain specified goods; to deliver an ox, etc. 2 Bla. Com. 443.

Gratuitous contracts are those of which the object is the benefit of the person with whom it is made, without any profit or advantage received or promised as a consideration for it. It is not, however, the less gratuitous if it proceed either from gratitude for a benefit before received or from the hope of receiving one hereafter, although such benefit be of a pecuniary nature. Louisiana Code, art. 1766. Gratuitous promises are not binding at common law unless executed with certain formalities, viz., by execution under seal.

Illegal contracts are agreements to do acts prohibited by law, as to commit a crime; to injure another, as to publish a libel; H. & N. 73.

Hazardous contracts are those in which the performance of that which is one of its objects depends on an uncertain event. Louisiana Code, art. 1769.

Implied contracts may be either implied in law or in fact. A contract implied in law arises where some pecuniary inequality exists in one party relatively to the other which justice requires should be compensated, and upon which the law operates by creating a debt to the amount of the required compensation; Leake, Contr. 38. See 2 Burr. 1005; 11 L. J. C. P. 99; 8 C. B. 541. The case of the defendant obtaining the plaintiff's money or goods by fraud, or duress, shows an implied contract to pay the money or the value of the goods.

A contract implied in fact arises where there was not an express contract, but there is circumstantial evidence showing that the parties did intend to make a contract; for instance, if one orders goods of a tradesman or employs a man to work for him, without stipulating the price or wages, the law raises an implied contract (in fact) to pay the value of the goods or services. In the former class, the implied contract is a pure fiction, having no real existence; in the latter, it is inferred as an actual fact. See Leake, Contr. 12.

Independent contracts are those in which the mutual acts or promises have no relation to each other either as equivalents or as considerations. Louisiana Code, art. 1762.

Mixed contracts are those by which one of the parties confers a benefit on the other, receiving something of inferior value in return, such as a donation subject to a charge.

Contracts of mutual interest are such as are entered into for the reciprocal interest and utility of each of the parties: as sales, exchange, partnership, and the like.

Onerous contracts are those in which something is given or promised as a consideration for the engagement or gift, or some service, interest, or condition is imposed on what is given or promised, although unequal to it in value.

Oral contracts are simple contracts.

Principal contracts are those entered into by both parties on their own accounts, or in the several qualities or characters they assume.

Real contracts are those in which it is necessary that there should be something more than mere consent, such as a loan of money, deposit, or pledge, which, from their nature, require a delivery of the thing (res).

Reciprocal contracts are those by which the parties expressly enter into mutual engagements, such as sale, hire, and the like.

Contracts of record are those which are evidenced by matter of record, such as judgments, recognizances, and statutes staple.

These have been said to be the highest class of contracts. Statutes, merchant and staple, and other securities of the like nature, are confined to England. They are contracts entered into by the intervention of some public authority, and are witnessed by the highest kind of evidence, viz., matter of record; Poll. Contr. 141; 4 Bla. Com. 465.

Severable (or separable) contracts are those the considerations of which are by their terms susceptible of apportionment or division on either side, so as to correspond to the several parts or portions of the consideration on the other side.

A contract to pay a person the worth of his services as long as he will do certain work, or so much per week as long as he shall work, or to give a certain price per bushel for every bushel of so much corn as corresponds to a sample, would be a severable contract. If the part to be performed by one party consists of several distinct and separate items, and the price to be paid by the other is apportioned to each item to be performed, or is left to be implied by law, such a contract will generally be held to be severable. So when the price to be paid is clearly and distinctly apportioned to different parts of what is to be performed, although the latter is in its nature single and entire. But the mere fact of sale by weight or measure—i. e. so much per pound or bushel—does not make a contract severable.

Simple contracts are those not of specialty or record.

They are the lowest class of express contracts, and answer most nearly to our general definition of contract.

To constitute a sufficient parol agreement to be binding in law, there must be that reciprocal and mutual assent which is necessary to all contracts. They are by parol (which includes both oral and written). The only distinction between oral and written contracts is in their mode of proof. And it is inaccurate to distinguish verbal from written; for contracts are equally verbal whether the words are written or spoken,—the meaning of verbal being—expressed in words. See 3 Burr. 1670; 7 Term 350, note; 11 Mass. 27, 30; 7 Conn. 57; 1 Caines 385.

Specialties are those which are under seal; as, deeds and bonds.

Specialties are sometimes said to include also contracts of record; 1 Pars. Contr. 7; in which case there would be but two classes at common law, viz., specialties and simple contracts. The term specialty is always used substantively.

They are the second kind of express contracts under the ordinary common-law division. They are not merely written, but signed, sealed, and delivered by the party bound. The solemnities connected with these acts, and the formalities of witnessing, gave in early times an importance and character to this class of contracts which implied so much caution and deliberation (consideration) that it was unnecessary to prove the consideration even in a court of equity; Plowd. 305; 7 Term 477; 4 B. & Ad. 652; 3 Bingh. 111; 1 Fonb. Eq. 342, note. Though little of the real solemnity now remains, and a scroll is substituted in most of the states for the seal, the distinction with regard to specialties has still been preserved intact except when abolished by statute. In 13 Cal. 33, it is said that the distinction is now unmeaning and not sustained by reason. See CONSIDERATION; SEAL.

When a contract by specialty is changed by a parol agreement, the whole contract becomes parol; 2 Watts 451; 9 Pick. 298; 13 Wend. 71.

Unilateral contracts are those in which the party to whom the engagement is made makes no express agreement on his part.

They are so called even in cases where the law attaches certain obligations to his acceptance. Louisiana Code, art. 1758. A loan for use and a loan of money are of this kind. Poth. Obl. pt. 1, c. 1, s. 1, art. 2.

Verbal contracts are simple contracts.

Written contracts are those evidenced by writing.

Pothier's treatise on Obligations, taken in connection with the Civil Code of Louisiana, gives an idea of the divisions of the civil law. Poth. Obl. pt. 1, c. 1, s. 1, art. 2, makes the five following classes: reciprocal and unilateral; consensual and real; those of mutual interest, of beneficence and mixed; principal and accessory; those which are subjected by the civil law to certain rules and forms, and those which are regulated by mere natural justice.

It is true that almost all the rights of personal property do in great measure depend upon contracts of one kind or other, or at least might be reduced under some of them; which is the method taken by the civil law; it has referred the greatest part of the duties and rights of which it treats to the head of obligations ex contractu or quasi ex contractu. Inst. 3. 14. 2; 2 Bla. Com. 443.

Quasi-contracts. The usual classification of contracts is objected to by Prof. Keener in his law of Quasi-Contracts. A true contract exists, he says, because the contracting party has willed, in circumstances to which the law attaches the sanction of an obligation, that he shall be bound. His contract may be implied in fact, or express. Which of the two it is, is purely a question of the kind of evidence used to establish the contract. In either case the source of the obligation is the intention of the party. "Contract implied in law" is, however, a term used to cover a class of obligations, where the law, though the defendant did not intend to assume an obligation, imposes an obligation upon him, notwithstanding the absence of intention on his part, and, in many cases, in spite of his actual dissent. Such contracts, according to the work cited, may be termed quasi-contracts, and are not true contracts. They are founded generally:—

1. Upon a record.
2. Upon statutory, official, or customary duties.
3. Upon the doctrine that no one shall be allowed to enrich himself unjustly at the expense of another. The latter is the most important and most numerous class. See also Ans. Contr., 6th ed. 7; 2 Harv. L. Rev. 64; 109 U. S. 285.

A claim for half-pilotage fees under a statute allowing such fees, where a pilot's services are offered and declined, is an instance of a quasi-contract of the second class; 2 Wall. 450. See also 144 Mass. 64. Prof. Keener, in his work above cited, considers the duty of a carrier to receive and carry safely as being of a quasi-contractual nature. Among the third class are also cases of the liability of a husband to pay for necessities furnished to his wife; of a father for those furnished to his child. Also cases of actions to recover money paid under a mistake; actions in assumpsit against a tort-feasor, where the tort is waived; actions to recover compensation for benefits received under a contract which the plaintiff cannot enforce because he has failed to comply with the conditions thereof; actions for benefits conferred by the plaintiff under a contract which the defendant, by reason of the statute of frauds, illegality, impossibility, etc., is not bound to perform; actions for benefits conferred on the defendant at his request, but in the absence of a contract; actions for benefits intentionally conferred, but without the defendant's request; actions for money paid to the use of the defendant; and actions for money paid under compulsion of law and money paid to the defendant under duress, legal or equitable. These are the general classes given in Keener, Quasi-Contracts, to which reference is made, passim. The question to be determined is not the defendant's intention, but what in equity and good conscience the defendant ought to do. The action of indebitatus assumpsit was extended to most cases of quasi-contracts; Harriman, Contr. 24; 2 Harv. L. Rev. 63. The settled tendency of English and American law is toward a new classification of contracts and the treatment of implied contracts upon the lines here indicated. They are lines clearly defined in the Roman law as shown by Maine (Anc. Law, 3d. Am. ed. 332), who is extensively quoted by Keener. See CONTRACTUAL OBLIGATION.

Negotiations preceding a contract. Where there is an agreement between parties to enter into a contract in the future, and any essential part of the contract is left open, the agreement does not constitute a contract in itself; 156 Mass. 273. Such is the case also if the agreement itself shows that it was not intended to bind the parties, but that a formal contract was to be executed; 42 Mo. 113; 70 L. T. 781. But a mere reference to a contract to be drawn up in the future is not conclusive that the parties are not bound by their original agreement, though it tends to show that such is the case; 102 Mo. 309; L. R. 18 Eq. 180. The question is one of intention to be gathered from the original agreement, in view of all the circumstances; 144 N. Y. 209; Harriman, Contr. 52.

Where negotiations are made "subject to the preparation and approval" or "completion of a formal contract," they do not constitute a binding contract, whether the condition is expressed in the offer; [1895] 2 Ch. 1844; or in the acceptance; 7 Ch. D. 29; but "the mere reference to a future contract is not enough to negative the existence of a present one;" 8 Ch. D. 70. Where a baker sold, and a company bought a shop, and the contract seemed complete in two letters, but afterward the company wrote a third letter introducing a new and vital term, viz., a restriction upon the baker's trading in the district, it was held that the three letters read together negated the idea that the two letters constituted the contract; 42 Ch. D. 616. Where the acceptance was "subject to the title being approved by our solicitor" it was held, that this meant no more than the liberty which every purchaser impliedly reserves to himself of breaking off the contract if the vendor breaks it, by not making a good title. The Court of Appeals construed these words as a condition, but Lord Cairns, L. C., pointed out that they would, if so construed, imply that the vendor was free, but the purchaser bound; 4 App. Cas. 311. In 3 App. Cases 1124, in the House of Lords, it was said, in holding that a correspondence between parties constituted a complete contract, "If you can find the true and important ingredients of an agreement in that which has taken place between two parties in the course of a correspondence, then, although the correspondence may not set forth, in a form which a solicitor would adopt if he were instructed to draw an agreement in writing, that which is the agreement between the parties, yet, if the parties to the agreement, the thing to be sold, the price to be paid, and all those matters, be clearly and distinctly stated, although only by letter, an acceptance clearly by letter will not the less constitute an agreement in the full sense between the parties, merely because that letter may say, 'We will have this agreement put in due form by a solicitor.'" In the same case Lord Blackburn said that there must be a complete agreement, "if not there is no contract so long as the parties are only in negotiation. But the mere fact that the parties have expressly stipulated that there shall afterwards be a formal agreement prepared embodying the terms which shall be signed by the parties, does not by itself show that they continue merely in negotiation. It is a matter to be taken into account in construing the evidence and determining whether the parties have really come to a final agreement or not."

Since the judicature acts in England, a tenant holding under an agreement for a lease of which specific performance would be decreed, stands in precisely the same position as if the lease had been executed; 21 Ch. D. 9.

Qualities of contracts. Every agreement should be so complete as to give either party his action upon it; both parties must assent to all its terms; 3 Term 653; 1 B. & Ald. 681; 1 Pick. 278. To the rule that the contract must be obligatory on both parties there are some exceptions: as the case of an infant, who may sue, though he cannot be sued, on his contract; Add. Contr. 380; Stra. 937. See other instances, 6 East 307; 3 Taunt. 169; 5 id. 788; 3 B. & C. 232. There must be a good and valid consideration (q. v.), which must be proved though the contract be in writing; 7 Term 350, note (a); 2 Bla. Com. 444; Fonb. Eq. 335, n. (a). There is an exception to this rule in the case of bills and notes, which are of themselves prima facie evidence of consideration. And in other contracts (written), when consideration is acknowledged, it is prima facie evidence thereof, but open to contradiction by parol testimony. There must be a thing to be done which is not forbidden by law, or one to be admitted which is not enjoined by law. Fraudulent, immoral, or forbidden contracts are void. A contract is also void if against public policy or the statutes, even though the statute be not prohibitory but merely affixes a penalty; Poll. Contr. 259 et seq.; Chitty, Com. L. 215, 217, 222, 238, 250; 1 Binn. 110, 118; 4 Dall. 269, 298; 4 Yeates 24, 84; 28 Ala. 514; 7 Ind. 132; 4 Minn. 278; 30 N. H. 540; 2 Sandf. 146. But see 5 Ala. 250. As to contracts which cannot be enforced from non-compliance with the statute of frauds, see FRAUDS, STATUTE OF.

It was for a long time not fully settled whether a contract between A and B that one of them should do something for the benefit of C did or did not give C a right of action on the contract. See 1 B. & P. 98; 3 id. 149; but it is now distinctly established in England that C cannot sue; 1 B. & S. 393; Poll. Contr. 200; in America the authorities are somewhat conflicting, and it is necessary to examine the authorities critically to deduce the rule governing particular cases.

On specialties most courts do not permit a suit in a third person's name, yet some do; Poll. Contr. 204, citing 3 Gray 484. In his instructive and valuable work on Contracts just published, Professor Harriman, after citing the authorities for the common-law rule that the one not a party to it can enforce a contract, enumerates and discusses the exceptions. The only exception recognized in Massachusetts (the right to recover money in the hands of the defendant which is of right the property of the plaintiff), is considered no real exception, as the liability is not contractual; the right of a son to sue on a promise made to a father is not now recognized in England or in Massachusetts as it formerly was, and it has no foundation in principle. The broad exception existing in most of the states permitting a person for whose benefit a promise is made to sue upon it, he considers not founded on any principle, but a clear case of judicial legislation which, like most arbitrary rules, has led to confusion. He reaches the conclusion that the right of a stranger to sue in certain cases is recognized in New York, Missouri, Indiana, Illinois, Nebraska, New Hampshire, Maine, and Rhode Island, and that in Massachusetts and Michigan, as in England, the common law prevails. In the federal courts he considers the rule not clearly settled, but that the general rules laid down by the supreme court coincide with the common-law rule; Harr. Cont. ch. vii. In 93 U. S. 143, the court (Davis, J.) said that "the right of a party to maintain assumpsit on a promise not under seal made to another for his benefit, although much controverted, is now the prevailing rule in this country." In 98 U. S. 123, it was held that while the common-law rule is that a stranger cannot sue upon it, "there are confessedly many exceptions to it." In Pennsylvania the general rule is recognized; but it is held that where money or property is placed by one in the possession of another, to be paid or delivered to a third person, the latter has a right of action, being regarded as a party to the consideration on which the undertaking rests; 119 Pa. 76; so, also, 6 Watts 182. And a promise to one to pay a debt due by him to another is valid; 2 Watts 104. In some jurisdictions, even including courts adhering to the general common-law rule, a third person has a right to enforce a trust created for his benefit by another person; 95 U. S. 576; 16 Ill. 125; 112 id. 91; 130 Mass. 128; 91 Ind. 595. But see 154 Ill. 627, where it was held that when a contract of sale of land from A to B recited that part of the purchase money was "going to C," the latter could not sue B.

See for a general discussion of the subject, 29 Am. L. Reg. o. s. 596; 4 N. J. L. J. 197, 229; 8 Harv. L. Rev. 93; Harriman, Cont.

Construction and interpretation in reference to contracts. The intention of the parties is the pole-star of construction: but their intention must be found expressed in the contract and be consistent with rules of law. The court will not make a new contract for the parties, nor will words be forced from their real signification.

The subject-matter of the contract and the situation of the parties are to be fully considered with regard to the sense in which language is used.

The legality of the contract is presumed and is favored by construction.

Words are to be taken, if possible, in their ordinary and common sense.

The whole contract is to be considered with relation to the meaning of any of its parts.

The contract will be supported rather than defeated: ut res magis valeat quam pereat.

All parts will be construed, if possible, so as to have effect.

Construction is generally against the grantor—contra proferentem—except in the case of the sovereign. This rule of construction is not of great importance, except in the analogous case of penal statutes; for the law favors and supposes innocence.

Construction is against claims or contracts which are in themselves against common right or common law.

Neither bad English nor bad Latin invalidates a contract ("which perhaps a classical critic may think no unnecessary caution"); 2 Bla. Com. 379; 6 Co. 59. See CONSTRUCTION.

Parties. There is no contract unless the parties assent thereto; and where such assent is impossible from the want, immaturity, or incapacity of mind of one of the parties, there can be no perfect contract. See PARTIES.

Remedy. The foundation of the common law of contracts may be said to be the giving of damages for the breach of contracts. When the thing to be done is the payment of money, damages paid in money are entirely adequate. When, however, the contract is for anything else than the payment of money, the common law knows no other than a money remedy: it has no power to enforce a specific performance of the contract.

The injustice of measuring all rights and wrongs by a money standard, which as a remedy is often inadequate, led to the establishment of the equity power of decreeing specific performance when the remedy has failed at law. For example: contracts for the sale of real estate will be specifically enforced in equity; performance will be decreed, and conveyances compelled.

Where a contract is for the benefit of the contracting party, no action can be maintained by a third person who is a stranger to the contract and the consideration; 173 Pa. 274.

CONTRACTION (Lat. con, together, traho, to draw). A form of a word abbreviated by the omission of one or more letters. This was formerly much practised, but in modern times has fallen into general disuse. Much information in regard to the rules for contraction is to be found in the Instructor Clericalis.

CONTRACTOR. One who enters into a contract. Generally used of those who undertake to do public work or the work for a company or corporation on a large scale, or to furnish goods to another at a fixed or ascertained price. 2 Pard. n. 300. See 5 Whart. 366; 14 Ct. Cl. 59, 280, 289; 13 id. 136, 392. As to liability of a party for the negligence of a contractor employed by him, see INDEPENDENT CONTRACTOR.

CONTRACTUAL. Of the nature of or pertaining to a contract, as, contractual liability or contractual obligation, which see. A term used by writers on the Roman law to designate the class of obligations described in the classification of the civilians as ex contractu, and recently much used in English and American law in connection with the more modern method of classifying contracts referred to in connection with Quasi-Contract. See CONTRACT.

CONTRACTUAL OBLIGATION. The obligation which arises from a contract or agreement.

In the Roman law the expression was a familiar one, and, taking the result of the discussions of the subject by writers on the civil law, and keeping in view both the etymology and the use of the word obligation, we may define it, as there used, to be a tie binding one to the performance of a duty arising from the agreement of parties.

The term is resorted to as a relief from what he considers the misuse of the word contract and the difficulty of defining it, by Prof. E. A. Harriman, who uses it in this sense: "Nevertheless in the case of many 'contracts,' using the word in its broadest sense, we find existing an obligation with certain definite characteristics which can easily be recognized. This obligation we shall venture to call contractual." He divides "the endless variety of obligations which the courts enforce" into irrecusable and recusable obligations. The former are those which are imposed upon the person without his consent and without regard to any act of his own; the latter are the result of a voluntary act on the part of the person on whom they are imposed. These terms are adopted by him from an article by Professor John H. Wigmore in 8 Harv. L. Rev. 200, and he again divides recusable obligations into definite and indefinite, meaning thereby to express whether the extent of the undertaking is determined by the act of the party upon whom the obligation rests or not; and to differentiate still further the precise character of definite recusable obligations, which he terms contractual obligations, Professor Harriman originates the terms unifactoral and bifactoral, as the obligation is created by the act of the party bound, or requires two acts, one by the party bound and the other by the party to be benefited. The term contractual was of constant use by writers on the civil law, and Maine, in his Early Law and Custom, refers to the German Salic law as elaborately discussing contractual obligation. Professor Harriman's definition of this term is "that obligation which is imposed by the law in consequence of a voluntary act, and which is determined as to its nature and extent by that act." Harr. Cont. 27. The idea of contractual obligation he thinks was unknown to our Anglo-Saxon ancestors; id. 15. It is undoubtedly true, as Professor Harriman asserts, that the best considered theory of contract at the present time has been a slow and tedious development; but it is equally true that among the writers who have given most attention to the study of the historical development of the law there remain wide differences of opinion as to the time and manner of its development. It is likewise to be observed that the theories of Professor Harriman and those who have preceded him, in the views which he has so logically and comprehensively treated, do in fact include much that is familiar to the student of the Roman law, while there is exhibited a reluctance to give to that system due credit for the principles which were fully developed in it. In his preface the author here cited quotes with approval the remark of Sir Frederick Pollock, that English speaking lawyers "must seek a genuine philosophy of the common law, and not be put off with a surface dressing of Romanized generalities." It may be suggested that when, after centuries of an unscientific development of the English law of contract (due to causes which Professor Harriman well sketches in Part II. of his introduction), what seems to be not only a better, but the true theory has come to be recognized and developed; the coincidence of that theory with the root idea of the subject, as expressed in so scientific a system as the Roman law, should be acknowledged and utilized, rather than ignored, or characterized as "recasting English ideas and institutions in a Roman mould." It may be safely asserted that neither contract nor contractual obligation is an English idea or institution, but an idea of human civilization. Sir Henry Maine says we have no society disclosed to us destitute of the conception; Anc. Law 303. It is equally creditable to us to have discovered and developed the correct idea of it after it has been overlaid with the misconceptions of the common law, as to its true nature, as it was to the Civilians to have formulated it correctly as part of their scientifically constructed system. That a concurrence is reached by these distinct processes is strong confirmation of the accuracy of the result. The limits of this work forbid the elaboration of this subject to which it is entitled, and the reader is referred to Harriman, Contracts; Keener, Quasi-Contracts; Maine, Ancient Law, ch. ix.; Holmes, Common Law; Sanders, Inst. of Justinian; Howe, Studies in the Civil Law, which latter work contains an admirable statement of the subject of obligations in the Roman law.

CONTRADICT. In Practice. To prove a fact contrary to what has been asserted by a witness.

A party cannot impeach the character of his witness, but may contradict him as to any particular fact; 1 Greenl. Ev. § 443; Bull. N. P. 297; 3 B. & C. 746; 4 id. 25; 5 Wend. 305; 12 id. 105; 21 id. 190; 7 Watts 39; 4 Pick. 179, 194; 17 Me. 19.

CONTRAESCRITURA. In Spanish Law. Counter-letter. An instrument, usually executed in secret, for the purpose of showing that an act of sale, or some other public instrument, has a different purpose from that imported on its face. Acts of this kind, though binding on the parties, have no effect as to third persons.

CONTRAFACTIO (Lat.). Counterfeiting: as, contrafactio sigilli regis (counterfeiting the king's seal). Cowel; Reg. Orig. 42. See COUNTERFEIT.

CONTRAROTULATOR (Fr. contre-rouleur). A controller. One whose business it was to observe the money which the collectors had gathered for the use of the king or the people. Cowel.

CONTRAROTULATOR PIPE. An officer of the exchequer that writeth out summontwice every year to the sheriffs to levy the farms (rents) and debts of the pipe. Blount.

CONTRAVENTION. In French Law. An act which violates the law, a treaty, or an agreement which the party has made. That infraction of the law punished by a fine which does not exceed fifteen francs and by an imprisonment not exceeding three days.

CONTRE-MAITRE. In French Law. The second officer in command of a ship. The officer next in command to the master and under him.

CONTRECTATIO. In Civil Law. The removal of a thing from its place amounting to a theft. The offence is purged by a restoration of the thing taken. Bowy. Com. 268.

CONTREFACON. In French Law. The offence of those who print or cause to be printed, without lawful authority, a book of which the author or his assigns have a copyright. Merlin, Répert.

CONTRIBUTION. Payment by one or more persons who are liable, in company with others, of a proportionate part of the whole liability or loss, to one or more of the parties so liable upon whom the whole loss has fallen or who has been compelled to discharge the whole liability. 1 Bibb 562; 4 Johns. Ch. 545; Pars. Part. 198.

"The principle is that parties having a common interest in a subject-matter shall bear equally any burden affecting it. Qui sentit commodum sentire debet et onus. Equality is equity. One shall not bear a common burden in ease of the rest. Hence, if, (as often may be done), an alien, charge, or burden of any kind, affecting several, is enforced at law against one only, he should receive from the rest what he has paid or discharged on their behalf. This is the doctrine of equitable contribution, resting on as simple a principle of natural justice as can be put." Per Bates, Ch., in 3 Del. Ch. 260. 3 Co. 11 b; 1 Cox, C. C. 318; 1 B. & P. 270; 4 Johns. Ch. 388; 1 Sto. Eq. 477; 1 Wh. & Tud. L. Cas. in Eq. 66. Though its most common application is to sureties and owners of several parcels of land subject to a lien, the application of the principal is said to be universal by Ld. Redesdale in 3 Bligh 59; and it applies equally to dower as to other incumbrances; 3 Del. Ch. 260; Wright, Ohio 285.

A right to contribution exists in the case of debtors who owe a debt jointly which has been collected from one of them; 4 Jones, N. C. 71; 4 Ga. 545; 19 Vt. 59; 3 Denio 130; 7 Humph. 385. See 1 Ohio St. 327. It also exists where land charged with a legacy, or the portion of a posthumous child, descends or is devised to several persons, when the share of each is held liable for a proportionate part; 3 Munf. 29; 1 Johns. Ch. 425; 1 Cush. 107; 8 B. Monr. 419. As to contribution under the maritime law, see GENERAL AVERAGE. See, generally, 4 Gray 75; 34 Me. 205; 11 Pa. 325; 8 B. Monr. 137; 51 Vt. 253; 77 N. Y. 280; 82 N. C. 334; 61 Ala. 440; 53 Cal. 686; 52 Iowa 597; 127 Mass. 396; 16 Blatchf. 122.

Originally this right was not enforced at law, but courts of common law in modern times have assumed a jurisdiction to compel contribution among sureties in the absence of any positive contract, on the ground of an implied assumpsit, and each of the sureties may be sued for his respective quota or proportion; Wh. & Tud. Lead. Cas. 66; 7 Gill 34, 85; 17 Mo. 150. The remedy in equity is, however, much more effective; 12 Ala. N. S. 225; 2 Rich. Eq. 15; Bisp. Eq. § 329. For example, a surety who pays an entire debt can, in equity, compel the solvent sureties to contribute towards the payment of the entire debt; 1 Ch. Cas. 346; Finch 15, 203; while at law he can recover no more than an aliquot part of the whole, regard being had to the number of co-sureties; 2 B. & P. 268; 6 B. & C. 697; 32 Me. 381. See SUBROGATION. See, generally, as to co-sureties, 1 Lead. Cas. Eq. 100; 13 Am. L. Reg. N. S. 529.

There is no contribution, as a general rule, between joint tort-feasors; 8 T. R. 186; 82 Ind. 488; 32 Md. 245; 8 Ohio 81; 11 Paige 18; 10 Cush. 287; 2 Ohio St. 203; 18 Ohio 1; but this rule does not apply when the person seeking redress did not in fact know that the act was unlawful, and is not chargeable with knowledge of that fact; 4 Bing. 72; 26 Ala. 633; 28 Conn. 455; 92 N. C. 148; 66 Pa. 218. See 28 Alb. L. J. 148; 4 A. & E. Encyc. 12, 13.

The rule stated also fails when the injury grows out of a duty resting primarily upon one of the parties, and but for his negligence there would have been no cause of action against the other. A servant is consequently liable to his master for the damages recovered against the latter in consequence of the negligence of the servant; 2 Sm. Lead. Cas. 483. Where a recovery is had against a municipal corporation for an injury resulting from an obstruction to the highway, or other nuisance, occasioned by the act or default of its servant, or even of a citizen, the municipality has a right of action against the wrongdoer for indemnity; 2 Black 418.

In Civil Law. A partition by which the creditors of an insolvent debtor divide among themselves the proceeds of his property proportionably to the amount of their respective credits. La Code, art. 2522, n. 10. It is a division pro rata. Merlin, Répert.

CONTRIBUTORY. A person liable to contribute to the assets of a company which is being wound up, as being a member or (in some cases) a past-member thereof. 3 Steph. Com. 24; Moz. & W. Law Dict.

CONTRIBUTORY NEGLIGENCE. See NEGLIGENCE.

CONTROLLER. A comptroller, which see.

CONTROVER. One who invents false news. Co. 2d Inst. 227.

CONTROVERSY. A dispute arising between two or more persons.

It differs from case, which includes all suits, criminal as well as civil; whereas controversy is a civil and not a criminal proceeding; 2 Dall. 419, 431, 432; 1 Tuck. Bla. Com. App. 420, 421.

By the constitution of the United States, the judicial power extends to controversies to which the United States shall be a party. Art. III, sec. 2. The meaning to be attached to the word controversy in the constitution is that above given.

Presumed contumacy is the act of refusing or declining to appear upon being cited. 3 Curt. Ecc. 1.

CONTUMAX. One accused of a crime who refuses to appear and answer to the charge. An outlaw.

CONTUSION. In Medical Jurisprudence. An injury or lesion, arising from the shock of a body with a large surface, which presents no loss of substance and no apparent wound. If the skin be divided, the injury takes the name of a contused wound. See 4 C. & P. 381, 558, 565; 6 id. 684; Thomas, Med. Dict. sub v.; 2 Beck, Med. Jur. 18, 23.

CONUSOR. A cognizor.

CONVENE. In Civil Law. To bring an action.

CONVENTICLE. A private assembly of a few folks under pretence of exercise of religion. The name was first given to the meetings of Wickliffe, but afterwards applied to the meetings of the non-conformists. Cowel.

The meetings were made illegal by 16 Car. II. c. 4, and the term in its later signification came to denote an unlawful religious assembly.

CONVENTIO (Lat. a coming together). In Canon Law. The act of summoning or calling together the parties by summoning the defendant.

When the defendant was brought to answer, he was said to be convened,—which the canonists called conventio, because the plaintiff and defendant met to contest. Story, Eq. Pl. 402; 4 Bouv. Inst. no. 4121.

In Contracts. An agreement; a covenant. Cowel.

Often used in the maxim conventio vincit legem (the express agreement of the parties supersedes the law). Story, Ag. § 368. But this maxim does not apply, it is said, to prevent the application of the general rule of law. Broom, Max. 690. See MAXIMS.

CONVENTION. In Civil Law. A general term which comprehends all kinds of contracts, treaties, pacts, or agreements. The consent of two or more persons to form with each other an engagement, or to dissolve or change one which they had previously formed. Domat, l. 1, t. 1, s. 1; Dig. lib. 2, t. 14, l. 1; lib. 1, t. 1, l. 1, 4 and 5; 1 Bouvier, Inst. no. 100.

In Legislation. This term is applied to a meeting of the delegates elected by the people for other purposes than usual legislation. It is used to denote an assembly to make or amend the constitution of a state; also an assembly of the delegates of the people to nominate candidates to be supported at an election. As to the former use, see Jameson, Constit. Conv.; Cooley, Const. Lim.; CONSTITUTIONAL CONVENTION.

CONVENTIONAL. Arising from, and dependent upon, the act of the parties, as distinguished from legal, which is something arising from act of law. 2 Bla. Com. 120.

CONVENTAS (Lat. convenire). As assembly. Conventus magnatum vel procerum. An assemblage of the chief men or nobility; a name of the English parliament. 1 Bla. Com. 248.

In Civil Law. A contract made between two or more parties.

A multitude of men, of all classes, gathered together.

A standing in a place to attract a crowd. A collection of the people by the magistrate to give judgment. Calvinus, Lex.

CONVENTUS JURIDICUS. A Roman provincial court for the determination of civil causes.

CONVERSANT. One who is in the habit of being in a particular place is said to be conversant there. Barnes 162.

Acquainted; familiar.

CONVERSION (Lat. con, with, together, vertere, to turn; conversio, a turning to, with, together).

In Equity. The exchange of property from real to personal or from personal to real, which takes place under some circumstances in the consideration of the law, such as, to give effect to directions in a will or settlement, or to stipulations in a contract, although no such change has actually taken place. 1 Bro. C. C. 497; 1 Lead. Cas. Eq. 619; id. 872; 3 Redf. 235; 46 Wis. 70; 32 N. J. Eq. 181.

A qualified conversion is one directed for some particular purpose; 4 Del. Ch. 72. Where the purpose of conversion totally fails no conversion takes place, but the property remains in its original state, but where there is a partial failure of the purpose of conversion of land the surplus results to the heir; 1 Bro. C. C. 503; as money and not as land, and therefore if he be dead it will pass to his personal representatives even if the land were sold in his lifetime; 4 Madd. 492. The English authorities strongly favor the heir, and the authorities are collected by Bispham (Pr. of Eq. pt. ii. ch. v.) and by Bates, Ch. (4 Del. Ch. 72), who held that where there was a qualified conversion by will, if one of the legacies fail, whether it be void ab origine or lapse, that portion of the fund which fails of its object will result to the party who would have been entitled to the real estate unsold. Bispham considers the American authorities less favorable to the heir than the English, citing 3 Wheat. 563, where it was held that if the intent of the testator appears to have been to stamp upon the proceeds of the land described to be sold the character of personality, to all intents and purposes the claim of the heir is defeated and the estate is considered personal (see also 2 Rawle 185). But in the Delaware case cited it was considered that the English doctrine of qualified conversion was fully sustained by the American cases at large as collected in the American note to Ackroyd v. Smithson, 1 Wh. & Tud. L. Cas. in Eq. 590; and the case cited by Bispham from 4 Wheat., as appears from the foregoing statement of it, does not conflict with the English doctrine, as it is expressly limited to cases in which the intention is clear that the heir shall not take.

Land is held to be converted into money, in equity, when the owner has contracted to sell; and if he die before making a conveyance, his executors will be entitled to the money, and not his heirs; 1 W. Bla. 129; 62 Ala. 145.

When land is ordered by a will to be sold, it is regarded as converted into personalty; 3 D. R. Pa. 187; but a mere power of sale will not have that effect until it is exercised; 16 Pa. 65. Lands taken under the right of eminent domain are converted; 29 Atl. Rep. (N. J.) 592.

Money may be held to be converted into land under various circumstances: as where, for example, a man dies before a conveyance is made to him of land which he has bought. 1 P. Wms. 176; 10 Pet. 563; Bouvier, Inst. Index. See 58 How. Pr. 175; 49 Md. 72.

Courts of equity have power to order the conversion of property held in a trust from real estate into personal estate, or vice versa, when such conversion is not in conflict with the will of the testator, expressly or by implication, and is for the interest of the cestui que trust; 4 Del. Ch. 615; 1 Hill, S. C. 112. The English court of chancery largely exercised this jurisdiction; 2 Sto. Eq. Jur. § 1357; 6 Ves. Jr. 6; 6 Madd. 100.

At Law. An unauthorized assumption and exercise of the right of ownership over goods or personal chattels belonging to another, to the alteration of their condition or the exclusion of the owner's rights. 44 Me. 197; 36 N. H. 311; 45 Wis. 262.

A constructive conversion takes place when a person does such acts in reference to the goods or personal chattels of another as amount, in view of the law, to appropriation of the property to himself.

A direct conversion takes place when a person actually appropriates the property of another to his own beneficial use and enjoyment, or to that of a third person, or destroys it, or alters its nature.

Every such unauthorized taking of personal property; Poll. Torts 435; 2 J. J. Mar. 84; 1 Bailey 546; 10 Johns. 172; 92 Ill. 218; and all intermeddling with it beyond the extent of authority conferred, in case a limited authority over it has been given; 1 Metc. Mass. 555; 14 Vt. 367; 72 N. Y. 188; 46 Conn. 109; 75 N. Y. 547; 1 Ga. 381; with intent so to apply or dispose of it as to alter its condition or interfere with the owner's dominion; 18 Pick. 227; 8 M. & W. 540; constitutes a conversion, including a taking by those claiming without right to be assignees in bankruptcy; 3 Brod. & B. 2; using a thing without license of the owner; 6 Vt. 281; 6 Hill 425; 5 Ill. 495; 44 Me. 497; 11 Rich. B. 381; but not including a mere trespass with no further intent; 8 M. & W. 540; 18 Pick. 227; nor an accidental loss by mere omission of a carrier; 2 Greenl. Ev. § 643; 5 Burr. 2825; 1 Pick. 50; 6 Hill 586; see 17 Pick. 1; nor mere non-feasance; 2 B. & P. 438; 12 Johns. 300; 19 Vt. 436. A manual taking is not necessary.

The intention required is simply an intent to use or dispose of the goods, and the knowledge or ignorance of the defendant as to their ownership has no influence in deciding the question of conversion; 3 Ired. 29; 4 Denio 180; 30 Vt. 307; 11 Cush. 11; 17 Ill. 413; 33 N. H. 151.

A license may be presumed where the taking was under a necessity, in some cases; 6 Esp. 81; or, it is said, to do a work of charity; 2 Greenl. Ev. § 643; or a kindness to the owner; 4 Esp. 195; 11 Mo. 219; 8 Metc. 578; without intent, in the last two cases, to injure or convert it; 8 Metc. 578. As to what constitutes a conversion as between joint owners, see 2 Dev. & B. Eq. 252; 1 Hayw. 255; 21 Wend. 72; 2 Murph. 65; 16 Vt. 382; 1 Dutch. 173; and as to a joint conversion by two or more, see 2 N. H. 546; 15 Conn. 384; 2 Rich. 507; 3 E. D. Sm. 555; 40 Me. 574. Y. 549; contra, 27 Vt. 93; 9 Ex. 145; some cases hold that nothing short of the destruction of the plaintiff's property is a conversion, because a sale passes only the vendor's title and the co-tenant continues a co-tenant with the purchaser; Big. Torts 204. It is held also that trover lies, between co-tenants, for a mere withholding of the chattel, or the misuse of it, or for a refusal to terminate the common interest; 17 Pa. 373; 12 Mich. 328.

An original unlawful taking is in general conclusive evidence of a conversion; 1 M'Cord 213; 15 Johns. 431; 13 N. The plaintiff must have at least the right to immediate possession; 127 Mass. 64.

CONVEYANCE. The transfer of the title of land from one person or class of persons to another. 21 Barb. 551; 29 Conn. 356.

The instrument for effecting such transfer. It includes leases; 47 Cal. 242; and mortgages; 46 Cal. 603.

When there is no express agreement to the contrary, the expense of the conveyance falls upon the purchaser; 2 Ves. 155, note; who must prepare and tender the conveyance. But see, contra, 2 Rand. 20; Warville, Vend. 347. The expense of the execution of the conveyance is, on the contrary, usually borne by the vendor; Sugd. Vend. & P. 296; contra, 2 Rand. 20; 2 McLean 495. See 3 Mass. 487; 5 id. 472; Eunom. 2, § 12.

The forms of conveyance have varied widely from each other at different periods in the history of the law, and in the various states of the United States. The mode at present prevailing in this country is by bargain and sale. For a fuller account of this subject, see Sugden, Vendors; Geldart; Preston; Thorn. Conv.; Tiedeman; Washb. R. P.; Dembitz, Land Titles; Bouvier, Institutes, Index.

CONVEYANCE OF VESSELS.

The transfer of the title to vessels.

The act of congress approved the 29th July, 1850, Rev. Stat. § 4192, entitled An act to provide for recording the conveyances of vessels, and for other purposes, enacts that no bill of sale, mortgage, hypothecation, or conveyance of any vessel, or part of any vessel, of the United States, shall be valid against any person other than the grantor or mortgagor, his heirs and devisees, and persons having actual notice thereof, unless such bill of sale, mortgage, hypothecation, or conveyance be recorded in the office of the collector of the customs where such vessel is registered or enrolled. Provided, that the lien by bottomry on any vessel created, during her voyage, by a loan of money or materials necessary to repair or enable such vessel to prosecute a voyage, shall not lose its priority or be in any way affected by the provisions of the act.

The second section enacts that the collectors of the customs shall record all such bills of sale, mortgages, hypothecations, or conveyances, and also all certificates for discharging and cancelling any such conveyances, in a book or books to be kept for that purpose, in the order of their reception,—noting in said book or books, and also on the bill of sale, mortgage, hypothecation, or conveyance, the time when the same was received; and shall certify on the bill of sale, mortgage, hypothecation, or conveyance, or certificate of discharge or cancellation, the number of the book and page where recorded; and shall receive, for so recording such instrument of conveyance or certificate of discharge, fifty cents.

The third section enacts that the collectors of the customs shall keep an index of such records, inserting alphabetically the names of the vendor or mortgagor, and of the vendee or mortgagee; and shall permit said index and books of records to be inspected during office-hours, under such reasonable regulations as they may establish; and shall, when required, furnish to any person a certificate setting forth the names of the owners of any vessel registered or enrolled, the parts or proportions owned by each, if inserted in the register or enrollment, and also the material facts of any existing bill of sale, mortgage, hypothecation, or other incumbrance upon such vessel recorded since the issuing of the last register or enrollment,—viz., the date, amount of such incumbrance, and from and to whom or in whose favor made. The collector shall receive for each such certificate one dollar.

The fourth section provides that the collectors of the customs shall furnish certified copies of such records, on the receipt of fifty cents for each bill of sale, mortgage, or other conveyance.

The fifth section provides that the owner or agent of the owner of any vessel of the United States, applying to a collector of the customs for a register or enrollment of a vessel, shall, in addition to the oath now prescribed by law, set forth, in the oath of ownership, the part or proportion of such vessel belonging to each owner, and the same shall be inserted in the register of enrollment; and that all bills of sale of vessels registered or enrolled shall set forth the part of the vessel owned by each person selling, and the part conveyed to each person purchasing.

CONVEYANCER. One who makes it his business to draw deeds of conveyance of lands for others and to investigate titles of real property. They frequently act as brokers for the sale of real estate and obtaining loans on mortgage, and transact a general real estate business.

CONVEYANCING. A term including both the science and art of transferring titles to real estate from one man to another.

It includes the examination of the title of the alienor, and also the preparation of the instruments of transfer. It is, in England and Scotland, and, to a less extent, in the United States, a highly artificial system of law, with a distinct class of practitioners. A profound and elaborate treatise on the English law of conveyancing is Mr. Preston's. Geldart and Thornton's works are also important; and an interesting and useful summary of the American law is given in Washburn on Real Property. See Clerke; Martindale; Morris; Yeakle, Conveyancing.

CONVEYANCING COUNSEL TO THE COURT OF CHANCERY. Certain counsel, not less than six in number, appointed by the Lord Chancellor, for the purpose of assisting the court of chancery, or any judge thereof, with their opinion in matters of title and conveyancing. Stat. 15 & 16 Vict. c. 80, ss. 40, 41; Moz. & W. Law Dict.

CONVICIUM. In Civil Law. The name of a species of slander or injury uttered in public, and which charged some one with some act contra bonos mores. Vicat; Bac. Abr. Slander, 29.

CONVICT. One who has been condemned by a competent court. One who has been convicted of a crime or misdemeanor.

To condemn. To find guilty of a crime or misdemeanor. 4 Bla. Com. 362.

CONVICTION (Lat. convictio; from con, with, vincire, to bind). In Practice. That legal proceeding of record which ascertains the guilt of the party and upon which the sentence or judgment is founded. 48 Me. 123; 109 Mass. 323; 99 id. 420.

Finding a person guilty by verdict of a jury. 1 Bish. Cr. L. § 228; see 45 Alb. L. J. 1.

A record of the summary proceedings upon any penal statute before one or more justices of the peace or other persons duly authorized, in a case where the offender has been convicted and sentenced. Holt-house, Dict.

The first of the definitions here given undoubtedly represents the accurate meaning of the term, and includes an ascertainment of the guilt of the party by an authorized magistrate in a summary way, or by confession of the party himself, as well as by verdict of a jury. The word is also used in each of the other senses given. It is said to be sometimes used to denote final judgment. Dwar. 2d ed. 683.

Summary conviction is one which takes place before an authorized magistrate without the intervention of a jury.

Conviction must precede judgment or sentence; 1 Cai. 72; 34 Me. 594; see 51 Ill. 311; but it is not necessarily or always followed by it; 1 Den. C. C. 568; 14 Pick. 88; 8 Wend. 204; 3 Park. C. Cas. 567; 4 Ill. 76; 24 How. Pr. 38. Generally, when several are charged in the same indictment, a part may be convicted and the others acquitted; 2 Den. C. C. 86; 4 Hawks 356; 8 Blackf. 205; but not where a joint offence is charged; 14 Ohio 386; 6 Ired. 340. A person cannot be convicted of part of an offence charged in an indictment, except by statute; 7 Mass. 250; 7 Mo. 177; 1 Murph. 134; 13 Ark. 712. A conviction prevents a second prosecution for the same offence; Whart. Cr. Pl. § 456; 1 McLean 429; 7 Conn. 414; 14 Ohio 295; 2 Yerg. 24; 28 Pa. 13. But the recovery in a civil suit, of a fine, part of a penalty under a statute, does not prevent the prosecution of the defendant for the purpose of enforcing the full penalty by imprisonment; 16 Blackf. 9. And see 70 Me. 452; 8 Tex. App. 447; 66 Ind. 223. A conviction of a less offence may be had where the indictment charges a greater offence, which necessarily includes the less; 82 N. C. 621; 8 Tex. App. 71; 8 Baxt. 401; 23 Kan. 244; 52 Ia. 608. As to the rule where the indictment under which the conviction is procured is defective and liable to be set aside, see 1 Bish. Cr. L. §§ 663, 664; 4 Co. 44 a.

At common law conviction of certain crimes when accompanied by judgment disqualifies the person convicted as a witness; 18 Miss. 192. And see 11 Metc. 302. But where a statute making defendants witnesses is without exception, a conviction rendering such defendant infamous will not disqualify him; 5 Lans. 332; 63 Barb. 630. See 107 Mass. 403.

Summary convictions, being obtained by proceedings in derogation of the common law, must be obtained strictly in pursuance of the provisions of the statute; 1 Burr. 613; and the record must show fully that all proper steps have been taken; R. M. Charl. 235; 1 Coxe 392; 2 Bay 105; 19 Johns. 39, 41; 14 Mass. 224; 3 Me. 51; 4 Zab. 142; and especially that the court had jurisdiction; 2 Tyler 167; 4 Johns. 292; 3 Yeates 475.

As to payment of costs upon conviction, see 1 Bish. Cr. Pr. § 1317, n.

CONVIVIVUM. A tenure by which a tenant was bound to provide meat and drink for his lord at least once in the year. Cowel.

CONVOCATION (Lat. con, together, voco, to call).

In Ecclesiastical Law. The general assembly of the clergy to consult upon ecclesiastical matters. See COURT OF CONVOCATION.

CONVOY. A naval force, under the command of an officer appointed by government, for the protection of merchant-ships and others, during the whole voyage, or such part of it as is known to require such protection. Marsh. Ins. b. 1, c. 9, s. 5; Park. Ins. 388:

Warranties are sometimes inserted in policies of insurance that the ship shall sail with convoy. To comply with this warranty, five things are essential: first, the ship must sail with the regular convoy appointed by the government; secondly, she must sail from the place of rendezvous appointed by the government; thirdly, the convoy must be for the voyage; fourthly, the ship insured must have sailing instructions; fifthly, she must depart and continue with the convoy till the end of the voyage, unless separated from it by necessity. Marsh. Ins. b. 1, c. 9, s. 5.

CO-OBLIGOR. Contracts. One who is bound together with one or more others to fulfil an obligation. As to suing co-obligors, see PARTIES; JOINDER.

COOL BLOOD. Tranquillity, or calmness. The condition of one who has the calm and undisturbed use of his reason. In cases of homicide, it frequently becomes necessary to ascertain whether the act of the person killing was done in cool blood or not, in order to ascertain the degree of his guilt. Bacon, Abr. Murder (B); Kel. 56; Sid. 177; Lev. 180.

COOLING-TIME. In Criminal Law. Time for passion to subside and reason to interpose. Cooling-time destroys the effect of provocation, leaving homicide murder the same as if no provocation had been given; 1 Russ. Cr. 667; Whart. Hom. 448; Kerr, Hom. 68; 3 Gratt. 594. See 29 Cent. L. J. 186; HOMICIDE.

COPARCENARY, ESTATES IN. Estates of which two or more persons form one heir. 1 Washb. R. P. 414.

The title to such an estate is always by descent. The shares of the tenants need not be equal. The estate is rare in America, but sometimes exists; 3 Ind. 360; 4 Gratt. 16; 17 Mo. 13; 3 Md. 190. See Watk. Conv. 145.

COPARCENERS. Persons to whom an estate of inheritance descends jointly, and by whom it is held as an entire estate. 2 Bla. Com. 187.

In the old English and the American sense the term includes males as well as females, but in the modern English use is limited to females; 4 Kent 366. But the husband of a deceased coparcener, if entitled as tenant by the curtesy, holds as a coparcener with the surviving sisters of his wife, as does also the heir-at-law of his deceased wife upon his own death; Brown, Dict.

COPARTNER. One who is a partner with one or more other persons; a member of a partnership.

COPARTNERSHIP. A partnership.

COPARTNERY. In Scotch Law. The contract of copartnership. Bell, Dict.

COPULATIVE TERM. One which is placed between two or more others to join them together.

COPY. A true transcript of an original writing.

Exemplifications are copies verified by the great seal or by the seal of a court. 1 Gilb. Ev. 19.

Examined copies are those which have been compared with the original or with an official record thereof.

Office copies are those made by officers intrusted with the originals and authorized for that purpose.

The papers need not be exchanged and read alternately; 2 Taunt. 470; 1 Stark. 183; 4 Campb. 372; 1 C. & P. 578. An examined copy of the books of an unincorporated bank is not evidence per se; 12 S. & R. 256; 2 N. & M'C. 299; 1 Greenl. Ev. § 508.

Copies cannot be given in evidence, unless proof is made that the originals from which they are taken are lost or in the power of the opposite party, and, in the latter case, that notice has been given him to produce the original; 1 Greenl. Ev. § 508; Tayl. Ev. 396.

A translation of a book is not a copy; 2 Wall. Jr. 547; 2 Am. L. Reg. 229; and a copy of a book means a transcript of the entire work; 12 Mo. Law Rep. N. S. 339.

COPYHOLD. A tenure by copy of court-roll. Any species of holding by particular custom of the manor. The estate so held.

A copyhold estate was originally an estate at the will of the lord, agreeably to certain customs evidenced by entries on the roll of the courts baron. Co. Litt. 58 a; 2 Bla. Com. 95; 1 Poll. & M. 351, 357. It is a villenage tenure deprived of its servile incidents. The doctrine of copyhold is of no application in the United States. Wms. R. P. 257, 258, Rawle's note; 1 Washb. R. P. 26.

COPYHOLDER. A tenant by copyhold tenure (by copy of court-roll). 2 Bla. Com. 95.

COPYRIGHT. The exclusive privilege, secured according to certain legal forms, of printing, or otherwise multiplying, publishing, and vending copies of certain literary or artistic productions.

The intellectual productions to which the law extends protection are of three classes. First, writings or drawings capable of being multiplied by the arts of printing or engraving. Second, designs of form or configuration capable of being reproduced upon the surface or in the shape of bodies. Third, inventions in what are called the useful arts. To the first class belong books, maps, charts, music, prints, and engravings; to the second class belong statuary, bas-reliefs, designs for ornamenting any surface, and configurations of bodies; the third class comprehends machinery, tools, manufactures, compositions of matter, and processes or methods in the arts. According to the practice of legislation in England and America, the term copyright is confined to the exclusive right secured to the author or proprietor of a writing or drawing, which may be multiplied by the arts of printing in any of its branches. Property in the other classes of intellectual objects is usually secured by letters-patent, and the interest is called a patent-right. But the distinction is arbitrary and conventional.

The foundation of all rights of this description is the natural dominion which every one has over his own ideas, the enjoyment of which, although they are embodied in visible forms or characters, he may, if he chooses, confine to himself or impart to others. But, as it would be impracticable in civil society to prevent others from copying such characters or forms without the intervention of positive law, and as such intervention is highly expedient, because it tends to the increase of human culture, knowledge, and convenience, it has been the practice of civilized nations in modern times to secure and regulate the otherwise insecure and imperfect right which, according to the principles of natural justice, belongs to the author of new ideas.

This has been done by securing an exclusive right of multiplying copies for a limited period, as far as the municipal law of the particular country extends. But, inasmuch as the original right, founded in the principles of natural justice, is of an imperfect character, and requires, in order to be valuable, the intervention of municipal law, the law of nations has not taken notice of it as it has of some other rights of property; and therefore all copyright is the result of some municipal regulation, and exists only in the limits of the country by whose legislation it is established. The international copyright which is established in consequence of a convention between any two countries is not an exception to this principle; because the municipal authority of each nation making such convention either speaks directly to its own subjects through the treaty itself, or is exerted in its own limits by some enactment made in pursuance of the international engagement.

It was formerly doubtful in England whether copyright, as applied to books, existed at common law, and whether the first statute (8 Anne, c. 19) which undertook to regulate this species of incorporeal property had taken away the unlimited duration which must have existed at common law if that law recognized any right whatever.

The better opinion seems to be that the common law of England, before the statute of Anne, was supposed to admit the exclusive right of an author to multiply copies of his work by printing, and also his capacity to assign that right; for injunctions were granted in equity to protect it. See, on this subject, 4 Burr. 2308, 2408; 2 Bro. P. C. 145; 1 W. Bla. 301; 3 Swans. 673; 2 Ed. Ch. 327; 4 H. L. C. 815; 4 Exch. 145. But it has long been settled that, whatever the common-law right may have been before the statute, it was taken away by the statute, and that copyright exists only by force of some statutory provision; 8 Pet. 591; 17 How. 454; Drone, Copyr. 1; 128 U. S. 244.

In America, before the establishment of the constitution of the United States, it is doubtful whether there was any copyright at common law in any of the states; 8 Pet. 591. But some of the states had passed laws to secure the rights of authors, and the power to do so was one of their original branches of sovereignty, afterwards ceded to congress. By art. 1, sect. 8, of the federal constitution, power was given to congress "to promote the progress of science and the useful arts, by securing for limited times to authors and inventors the exclusive right to their respective writings and discoveries." Under this authority, an act of May 31, 1790, secured a copyright in maps, charts, and books; and an act of April 29, 1802, gave a similar protection to engravings.

The persons entitled to secure a copyright, and what may be protected. The author, inventor, designer, or proprietor of any book, map, chart, dramatic or musical composition, engraving, cut, print, or photograph or negative thereof, or of a painting, drawing, chromo, statue, statuary, and of models or designs intended to be perfected as works of the fine arts, and the executors, administrators, or assigns of any such person, may secure the sole liberty of printing, reprinting, publishing, completing, copying, executing, finishing, and vending the same; and authors or their assigns may reserve the exclusive right of dramatizing the same; and, in the case of a dramatic composition, of publicly performing or representing it, etc., or causing it to be performed or represented by others; R. S. § 4952, as amended March 3, 1891, 1 Supp. 951.

What may be copyrighted. Private letters may be copyrighted by their author; 2 Story 100; and so may abstracts of title; 3 Minn. 94.

The compilations of existing material selected from common sources arranged and combined in original and useful form are the subject of a copyright, whether it consists wholly of selected matter or partly of original composition; Drone, Copyr. 152; Thus: (ibid.) dictionaries; 2 Sim. & Stu. 1; gazetteers; 5 Beav. 6; road and guide books; 1 Drew. 353; directories; L. R. 1 Eq. 697; calendars; 12 Ves. 270; cata-

An abridgment, one not a mere transcript of the part of an original, may be copyrighted; Drone, Copyr. 158; 1 Story 11; so may a digest; Drone, Copyr. 158. One who prepares reports of decided cases may obtain a valid copyright for the parts of which he is the author or compiler; 8 Pet. 591; 2 Blatchf. 165; 13 Wall. 608; but the reporter is not entitled to a copyright in the opinion of the court, even though he took it down from the lips of the judge, nor in the head notes when prepared by the judge; 6 U. S. Pat. Off. Gaz. 932.

The translation of a foreign work may be copyrighted, but this will not prevent the publishing of an independent translation of the same work; 6 Biss. 477.

The collection and arrangement of advertisements in a trade directory are the subject of copyright, though each single advertisement is not; [1893] 1 Ch. 218. A compilation made from voluminous public documents may be copyrighted; 32 Fed. Rep. 202. A compilation of prices and quotations on the stock exchange, printed on sheets and issued daily as a newspaper; 73 Law J. 120.

A photographer, who makes no charge for photographing an actress in her public character, has the right to secure a copyright for his own exclusive benefit; 59 Fed. Rep. 324; and where he produces by an arrangement of lights and shadows, an original effect representing his conception of her in a certain character, he is entitled to the protection of the copyright laws; 57 Fed. Rep. 32. So of an artistic photograph of a woman and child; 111 U. S. 53; 43 Fed. Rep. 678;

A "book" may be printed on one sheet; 2 Paine 383; 1 Bond 540.

A diagram with directions for cutting ladies' garments printed on a single sheet of paper is a "book" within the copyright acts; 1 Bond 540; and so is a cut in an illustrated newspaper; 26 Fed. Rep. 519; information in a time-table may be copyrighted; 1 Eq. 697.

A scene in a play representing a series of dramatic incidents, but with very little dialogue, may be copyrighted; 56 Fed. Rep. 483; s. c. 4 C. C. A. 110; so of the introduction, chorus, and skeleton of a "topical song"; 60 Fed. Rep. 758. See 6 Blatchf. 256.

When a new edition differs substantially from the former one, a new copyright may be acquired, provided the alteration shall materially affect the work; 1 Story 11; 13 Blatchf. 163. New editions of a copyright work are protected by the original copyright, but not new matter; 4 Cliff. 1; 1 Flipp. 228.

What may not be copyrighted. No copyright can be obtained on racing tips published in a copyrighted newspaper; [1895] 2 Ch. 29; nor on a daily price current; 2 Paine 382; nor on a blank; 101 U. S. 99; nor cuts contained in a trade catalogue; 72 Fed. Rep. 168.

Where the judge of a supreme court of a state prepares the opinion or decision of the court, the statement of the case, and the syllabus, and the reporter of the court takes out a copyright in his own name for the state, the copyright is invalid; 128 U. S. 244. Where a reporter is employed on a condition that his reports shall belong to the state, he is not entitled to a copyright; 2 Blatchf. 165; 27 Fed. Rep. 50.

Publications of an improper kind will not be protected by the courts; 1 Deady 223.

An author cannot acquire any right to the protection of his literary products by using an assumed name or pseudonym. Without the protection of a copyright, his work is dedicated to a public when published; 14 Fed. Rep. 725. Where an advertisement solicitor entered into a contract to furnish 60,000 letters in possession of a company, which letters had been received in response to advertisements, it was held, in an action upon the contract for unpaid purchase money, that the writers of the letters retained such a proprietary interest in them that they could not be made the subject of sale without their consent, and the contract was therefore void; 32 Fed. Rep. 437.

The compilation of the statutes of a state may be so original as to entitle the author to a copyright, but he cannot obtain one for the laws alone, and the legislature of the state cannot confer any such exclusive privilege upon him; 27 Fed. Rep. 61. Such a compilation of statutes may be copyrighted as to the manner in which the work was done, but not as to the laws alone; id.

A stage dance illustrating the poetry of motion of a series of graceful movements, etc., is not a dramatic composition within the act; 50 Fed. Rep. 926. The copyright of a book describing a new system of stenography does not protect the system apart from the language by which it is explained; 49 Fed. Rep. 15.

An opinion is not the subject-matter of copyright; nor is a printed expression of it, unless it amount to a literary composition; [1895] 2 Ch. 29; s. c. 12 Reports 381.

The term for which a copyright may be obtained is the period of twenty-eight years from the time of recording the title; and at the expiration of that period the author, inventor, or designer, if living, or his widow and children, if he be dead, may re-enter for an additional or renewed term of fourteen years; upon recording title of the work, or description of the article so secured, a second time, and complying with all other regulations in regard to original copyrights within six months before the expiration of the first term, and, within two months from the date of said renewal, causing a copy of the record thereof to be published in one or more newspapers of the United States for two or more weeks; U. S. Rev. Stat. 1 Supp. 951.

The formalities requisite to the securing of the original term are: 1. The deposit on or before the day of publication in this or any foreign country, in the office of the librarian of congress or in the mail in the United States, addressed to the librarian of congress at Washington, of a printed copy of the title of the book, map, chart, etc., or a description of the painting, etc., and not later than the day of publication thereof, in this or any foreign country, delivering at the said office or so depositing in the mail, two copies of such book, etc., or in case of a painting, etc., a photograph of the same; and the proprietor of every such copyright book or other article must deliver at the said office or so deposit in the mail a copy of every subsequent edition wherein any substantial changes are made; which copies shall be printed from type set, or plate, negative, or drawing on stone, made in the United States, or from transfers made therefrom; U. S. Rev. Stat. § 4956, as amended by act of March 3, 1891, § 3. 2. The printing of a notice that a copyright has been secured on the title-page of every copy, or the page immediately following, if it be a book, or on the face, or front, if it be a map, chart, musical composition, print, cut, engraving, photograph, painting, drawing, chromo, statue, statuary, or model or design intended to be completed as a work of the fine arts, or on the title or frontispiece, if it be a volume of maps, charts, music, or engravings, in the following words:—

“Entered according to Act of Congress, in the year , by A B, in the office of the Librarian of Congress, at Washington,” or at his option, the word “copyright,” together with the year the copyright was entered, and the name of the party by whom it was taken out; Thus:—“Copyright, 18—, by A B.”

In order to maintain an action for infringement on a copyright of a painting, a notice of copyright must have been inscribed on some visible portion thereof, when it was published; 72 Fed. Rep. 54. In the notice of copyright of a photograph the abbreviation “’94,” representing the year, is a substantial compliance with the act; 65 Fed. Rep. 94. The following notice on a map:—“Copyright entered according to Act of Congress, 1889, by T. C. Hefel, Civil Engineer,” is sufficient, since it differs from the prescribed formula only by including words which are surplusage; 54 Fed. Rep. 179. The words “1889. Copyrighted by B. J. Falk, New York,” are sufficient; 48 Fed. Rep. 222, 224. The words “Copyrighted 1891. All rights reserved,” are not a sufficient notice of copyright; 69 Fed. Rep. 291.

It is sufficient, in the case of a separate article of an American author published in a foreign encyclopædia, to deposit the sheets or pages containing the article taken out of the bound volume; 56 Fed. Rep. 764.

Each volume of a book in two or more volumes, when such volumes are published separately, and each number of a periodical shall be considered as an independent publication; Act of March 3, 1891, sec. 11. The initial of the Christian name is sufficient if the full surname be given; 111 U. S. 53. Where the printed title was deposited by E. B. Meyers & Chandler and the printed notice of the entry of the copyright showed that the copyright was entered by E. B. Meyers alone, it was held immaterial; 128 U. S. 657.

A change of title and the filing of such alteration, before the publication of a book and after the filing of the original title, will not affect the validity of the copyright; 56 Fed. Rep. 764.

A copyright may be taken in the name of a trustee for the benefit of some third party who is the author or proprietor; 32 Fed. Rep. 202; 42 id. 618; 56 id. 764.

One who does business under a fictitious partnership name may receive a copyright under that name; 49 Fed. Rep. 854. An author of an article intended for a foreign encyclopædia obtained a copyright therefor under an agreement with the publisher. It was held that the agreement was a license only to use the article, and that the copyright was properly in the author's name; 56 Fed. Rep. 764.

Prior to the act of congress "providing for keeping and distributing all public documents," approved February 5, 1859, the law provided that one copy of each book or other production should be sent to the librarian of the Smithsonian Institution, and one to the librarian of the Congressional Library. This provision is now repealed; and while in existence it was questionable whether a compliance with its conditions was essential to a valid copyright; 1 Blatchf. 618.

As to what will constitute a sufficient publication to deprive an author of his copyright: The public performance of a play is not such publication; 2 Biss. 34; 13 Blatchf. 47; the private circulation of even printed copies of a book is not; 5 McLean 32; 9 Am. L. Reg. 33; 1 Macn. & G. 25; the deposit of a chart with the secretary of the navy with an express agreement that it was not to be published, is not; 2 Paine 393; see, generally, 7 Am. Rep. 488. Publication of a manuscript constitutes a dedication to the public; 25 Fed. Rep. 183; 133 Mass. 32; the sale of a picture unconditionally carries with it the right of making copies of it and the publication thereof; 3 Cliff. 537. A picture which is publicly exhibited without having inscribed upon some visible portion of it, or upon the substance on which it was mounted, the notice required by the statute, is published; 72 Fed. Rep. 54. In this case the artist publicly exhibited his picture in Germany, without any notice of a reservation of his rights. A copyright subsequently taken out by his assignee was held invalid, as against one who made and sold photographs of it in the United States. See also 4 H. L. Cas. 815; 10 Ir. Ch. 121, 510; 8 Pet. 591; 9 Am. L. Reg. 33.

The remedy for an infringement of copyright is threefold. By an action of debt for certain penalties and forfeitures given by the statute. By an action on the case at common law for damages, founded on the legal right and the injury caused by the infringement. The action must be case, and not trespass; 2 Blatchf. 39. By a bill in equity for an injunction to restrain the further infringement, as an incident to which an account of the profits made by the infringer may be ordered by the court; 2 Morg. Lit. 706; 6 Ves. 705; 8 id. 323; 9 id. 341; 1 Russ. & M. 73, 159; 1 Y. & C. 197; 2 Hare 560; though it cannot embrace penalties; 2 Curt. C. C. 200; 2 Blatchf. 39.

The complainant in a bill in equity must make out a prima facie case of a valid copyright. It is sufficient if there be clear color of title founded on long possession; 6 Ves. 689; 8 id. 215; 17 id. 422; Jac. 314, 471; 2 Russ. 385; 2 Phil. 154. As to the objections that may be taken by general demurrer, see 2 Blatchf. 39. The injunction may go against an entire work or a part; 2 Russ. 393; 3 Stor. 768; 17 Ves. 422; 3 M. & C. 737; 11 Sim. 31; 2 Beav. 6; 2 Brown, Ch. 80; though the court will not interfere where the extracts are trifling; 2 Swanst. 428; 1 Russ. & M. 73; 2 id. 247.

An injunction to restrain the infringement of one directory by another will be limited to the extent to which the two books are identical; 30 Fed. Rep. 772.

Where the extracts of a copyrighted work are scattered through the defendant's book in such manner that the two cannot be distinguished and separated, the court may enjoin the defendant's book as a whole, but if the matters can be separated the injunction should extend only to the copyrighted matter; 33 Fed. Rep. 494.

Where the author's pirated paragraphs of a digest can be separated from paragraphs not subject to criticism, the injunction should be restricted to the infringing paragraphs, even though it might consume a decade to examine the paragraphs of the digest and compare them. This will not relieve the complainant from the burden of proving his case; 64 Fed. Rep. 360.

Although the court is not convinced that a compilation which wrongfully appropriates extracts from the plaintiff's copyrighted work will injure its sale, yet an injunction in a proper case may be granted. Actual pecuniary damage is not the sole right to enjoining violation of copyright; 33 Fed. Rep. 494.

The practice of one newspaper copying literary matter from another is no defence to an action for the infringement of a copyright; [1892] 3 Ch. 489, where the cases are collected.

Original jurisdiction in respect to all these remedies is vested in circuit courts of the United States; Rev. Stat. § 629, cl. 9. Rev. Stat. § 4968 limits the action for the penalties and forfeitures to the period of two years after the cause of action arose. The remedy for an unauthorized printing or publishing of any manuscript is by a special action on the case, or by a bill in equity for an injunction. Original jurisdiction in these cases is likewise vested in the circuit courts.

Infringement. The statute provides that any person who shall print, publish, dramatize, translate or import, any copy of a book which is under the protection of a copyright, without the consent of the proprietor of the copyright first obtained in writing, signed in the presence of two or more witnesses, or who shall, knowing the same to be so printed, sell, or expose to sale, any copy of such book, shall forfeit every copy of such book to the proprietor, and shall also forfeit and pay such damages as may be recovered in a civil action brought by the proprietor, etc.; R. S. § 4964, as amended March 3, 1891.

Sec. 4965 provides that any person who, after the recording of the title of any map, chart, dramatic or musical composition, print, cut, engraving or photograph or chromo, etc., shall, without the consent of the proprietor of the copyright first obtained in writing, signed in the presence of two or more witnesses, engrave, etc., either in whole or in part, or knowing the same to be so printed, etc., sell or expose to sale any copy of such map or other article, he shall forfeit to the proprietor all the plates on which the same shall be copied and every sheet thereof either copied or printed, and shall further forfeit one dollar for each sheet of the same found in his possession, etc., and in case of a painting, statue or statuary, ten dollars for every copy of the same in his possession. Provided that in case of a photograph from any object in a work of fine arts, the sum to be recovered shall not be less than one hundred dollars or more than five thousand dollars, and that in case of such infringement of a copyright of a painting, etc., or model, or design of photograph or of a work of the fine arts, the recovery shall be not less than two hundred and fifty dollars and not more than ten thousand dollars. In each case half of the penalty to go to the proprietor of the copyright, and the other half to the use of the United States; § 4965, as amended March 3, 1891. The act is confined to the sheets in the possession of the party who prints or exposes them to sale; 7 How. 798. It has been held to be necessary to the recovery of these statutory penalties and forfeitures that the whole of the book should be reprinted; 23 Bost. Law Rep. 397.

But in order to sustain an action at common law for damages or a bill in equity for an infringement of copyright, an exact reprint is not necessary.

There may be a piracy. 1st. By reprinting the whole or part of a book verbatim. The mere quantity of matter taken from a book is not of itself a test of piracy; 3 M. & C. 737; the court will look at the value or quality more than the quantity taken; 1 Story 11. Extracts and quotations fairly made, and not furnishing a substitute for the book itself, or operating to the injury of the author, are allowable; 17 Ves. 422; 17 Law Jour. 142; 1 Campb. 94; Amb. 694; 2 Swanst. 428; 2 Stor. 100; 2 Russ. 383; 1 Am. Jur. 212; 2 Beav. 6; 11 Sim. 31. A "fair use" of a book, by way of quotation or otherwise, is allowable; 4 Cliff. 1; L.

R. 8 Ex. 1; 31 L. T. N. s. 775; L. R. 18 Eq. 444; L. R. 5 Ch. 251; it may be for purposes of criticism, but so as not to supersede the work itself; 4 Cliff. 1; L. R. 8 Ex. 1; 26 Fed. Rep. 519; or in a later work to the extent of fair quotation; 11 Sim. 31; 31 L. T. N. s. 775; 2 Stor. 100; in compiling a directory, but not so as to save the compiler all independent labor; 30 Fed. Rep. 772; L. R. 1 Eq. 697; 7 id. 34; id. 5 Ch. 279; a descriptive catalogue of fruit, etc.; L. R. 18 Eq. 444; a book on ethnology; L. R. 5 Ch. 251; a dictionary, provided the new book may fairly be considered a new work; 31 L. T. R. 16. See 25 L. R. A. 441 for a full discussion.

2d. By imitating or copying, with colorable alterations and disguises, assuming the appearance of a new work. Where the resemblance does not amount to identity of parallel passages, the criterion is whether there is such similitude and conformity between the two books that the person who wrote the one must have used the other as a model, and must have copied or imitated it; see 5 Ves. 24; 8 id. 215; 12 id. 270; 16 id. 269, 422; 5 Swanst. 672; 2 Brown, Ch. 80; 2 Russ. 385; 2 S. & S. 6; 3 V. & B. 77; 1 Campb. 94; 1 East 361; 4 Esp. 169; 1 Stor. 11; 3 id. 768; 2 W. & M. 497; 2 Paine 393, which was the case of a chart. A fair and bona fide abridgment has in some cases been held to be no infringement of the copyright; 1 Morg. Lit. 319, 343; 2 Atk. 141; Amb. 403; Loft 775; 1 Brown, Ch. 451; 5 Ves. 709; 2 Am. Jur. 491; 3 id. 215; 4 id. 456, 479; 4 Clifford 1; 1 Y. & C. 298; 4 McLean 306; 2 Stor. 105; 2 Kent 382; see 3 Am. L. Reg. 129. But Drone, Copyright 440, maintains the contrary doctrine.

A later writer on any science or art, such as physiognomy, though consulting and using the works of an earlier writer on the subject, will be held not to have pirated, but to have made a fair use of them, it not appearing that they have been drawn from to a substantial degree, notwithstanding there are some errors common to both, and that they have a similar division of systems as a basis, such division being only a somewhat altered form of a division in a work of a previous writer, from which they both had a right to draw material; 75 Fed. Rep. 6.

"The true test of piracy, then, is not whether a composition is copied in the same language or the exact words of the original, but whether in substance it is reproduced; not whether the whole or whether a material part is taken. In this view of the subject it is no defence of piracy that the work entitled to protection has not been copied literally; that it has been translated into another language; that it has been dramatized; that the whole has not been taken; that it has been abridged; that it is reproduced in a new and more useful form. The controlling question always is whether the substance of the work is taken without authority;" Drone, Copyr. 385.

An author may resort with full liberty to the common sources of information and make use of the common materials open to all, but his work must be the result of his own independent labor; 75 Fed. Rep. 6.

A subsequent compiler of a directory is only required to do for himself that which the first compiler has done. He may not use a previous compilation to save himself trouble, though he do so but to a very limited extent, but he may use the former work to verify the spelling of names or the correctness of the addresses; 30 F. R. 772.

The compiler of a digest may compare notes, abstracts, and paragraphs from opinions of the courts and from syllabi prepared by the courts, and may digest such opinions and syllabi from printed copies and published in a copyrighted system of rights, but he may not copy the original work of the reporter, or use his work in any way in order to lighten his labors, though he may use it to verify his own accuracy, to detect errors, etc.; 64 Fed. Rep. 360.

A translation has been held not to be a violation of the copyright of the original; 2 Wall. Jr. 547; S. C. 2 Am. L. Reg. 231. The correctness of this decision is questioned in Drone, Copyr. 453.

When the infringement of a copyright is established the question of intent is immaterial; 53 Fed. Rep. 499.

A copyrighted compilation, comprising lists of trotting and pacing horses with their speed, is infringed by one who uses the table to make up records of horses of 2.30 or better, notwithstanding the fact that the latter compilation might have been made by the defendant from other publications valuable to him; 70 Fed. Rep. 237.

Damages. Where the infringing material is so intermingled with the rest of the contents as to be almost incapable of separation, the infringer is liable for the entire profit realized from the book; 128 U. S. 617; 143 U. S. 488. Where the infringing publication uses only a part of the original matter and is issued in a cheaper form, the measure of damages is the profit realized by the infringer, and not what the copyright owner would have realized by a sale of an equal number of the original copyright work; 50 Fed. Rep. 473.

The title to a copyright is made assignable by that provision of the statute which authorizes it be taken out by the "legal assigns" of the author. An assignment may therefore be made before the entry for copyright; but, as the statute makes a written instrument, signed by the author, etc., and attested by two credible witnesses, necessary to a lawful authority in another to print, publish, and sell, a valid assignment or license, whether before or after the copyright is obtained by entry, must be so made. Whether a general assignment of the first term by the author will carry the interest in the additional or renewed term, see 2 Brown, Ch. 80; Jac. 315. Where A employed B to complete a school book for $500, and took an assignment of the copyright, and A published the book calling B the author, it was held that only the original term of the copyright passed to A; 2 W and M. 23.

The sole right of publicly performing or representing dramatic compositions, which have been entered for copyright under the act of 1831, by a supplemental act, passed March 3, 1891, is now added to the sole right of printing and publishing, and is vested in the author or proprietor, his heirs or assigns, during the whole period of the copyright; and authors may reserve the right to dramatize or translate their own works. These new rights, being made incident to the copyright, follow the latter whenever the formalities for obtaining it have been complied with. For an unlawful representation, the statute gives an action of damages, to be assessed at a sum not less than one hundred dollars for the first and at fifty dollars for every subsequent performance, as to the court shall seem just. The author's remedy in equity is also saved. The statute does not apply to cases where the right of representation has been acquired before the composition has been made the subject of copyright.

The provision of act of March 3, 1891, giving authors the exclusive rights to dramatize and translate their copyrighted works does not prevent the title of a copyrighted work ("Trilby") from being used in connection with a dramatic composition, under that name, which presents no scene, incident, or dialogue from that work; 67 Fed. Rep. 904.

For a discussion of these acts, and of the nature and incidents of dramatic literary property, see 9 Am. Law Rep. 33, and 23 Bost. Law Rep. 397. See also 1 Am. L. Reg. 45; 2 id. 129; 14 id. 213; 2 Biss. 208.

The owner of a copyright who wishes to sell the published work directly and only to individual subscribers, through canvassers employed by him, will be protected from interference by other dealers who have surreptitiously obtained copies without his consent and offered them for sale; 27 Fed. Rep. 914. But it has been held that the owner of a copyright transferring the title of copyrighted books under an agreement restricting their use, cannot, under the copyright statutes, restrain sales of books in violation of the agreement; 61 Fed. Rep. 689; the remedy is confined to the breach of the contract; id.

The words "Webster's Dictionary" are public property by reason of the expiration of the copyright in the dictionary; 47 Fed. Rep. 411.

One who buys copies of a publication which violates copyright and sells them again is liable for the profit on his sales; 24 Fed. Rep. 636.

International Copyright. Prior to the act of March 3, 1891, the benefits of the copyright law were confined to citizens of the United States, but that act provides for an international copyright which gives to a citizen or subject of a foreign state or nation the benefit of copyright on substantially the same basis as its own citizens, provided such foreign state or nation permits the same right to citizens of the United States, or when such foreign state or nation is a party to an international agreement which provides for reciprocity in the granting of copyright, by the terms of which agreement the United States may, at its pleasure, become a party to such agreement. The existence of either of the conditions aforesaid shall be determined by the president of the United States, by proclamation made from time to time as the purposes of this act may require. International copyright now extends to the citizens or subjects of Belgium, France, Great Britain, Switzerland, Germany, Italy, Denmark, Spain, Portugal, Mexico, and Chili.

The act of March 3, 1891, § 3, requiring that copies of a book or lithograph deposited with the Librarian of Congress shall be manufactured in this country, does not apply to mere musical compositions, though published in book form, or made by lithographic processes; 67 Fed. Rep. 905.

A copyright, or an undivided part thereof may be assigned to a non-resident foreigner; 56 Fed. Rep. 764; 42 id. 618.

CORAAGIUM or CORAAGE. Measures of corn. An unusual and extraordinary tribute, arising only on special occasions. They are thus distinguished from services. Mentioned in connection with hidage and carvage. Cowel.

CORAM IPSO REGE (Lat.). Before the king himself. Proceedings in the court of king's bench are said to be coram rege ipso. 3 Bla. Com. 41.

CORAM NOBIS. A writ of error on a judgment in the king's bench is called a coram nobis (before us). 1 Archb. Pr. 234. See CORAM VOBIS.

CORAM NON JUDICE. Acts done by court which has no jurisdiction either over the person, the cause, or the process, are said to be coram non judice. 1 Conn. 40. Such acts have no validity. If an act is required to be done before a particular person, it would not be considered as done before him if he were asleep or non compos mentis; 5 H. & J. 42; 8 Cra. 9; Paine 55; 1 Prest. Conv. 266.

CORAM PARIBUS. In the presence of the peers or freeholders. 2 Bla. Com. 307.

CORAM VOBIS. A writ of error directed to the same court which tried the cause, to correct an error in fact. 3 Md. 325; 3 Steph. Com. 642.

If a judgment in the King's Bench be erroneous in matter of fact only, and not in point of law, it may be reversed in the same court by writ of error coram nobis (before us), or quæ coram nobis residant; so called from its being founded on the record and process, which are stated in the writ to remain in the court of the king before the king himself. But if the error be in the judgment itself, and not in the process, a writ of error does not lie in the same court upon such judgment. 1 Rolle, Abr. 746. In the Common Pleas the record and proceedings being stated to remain before the king's justices, the writ is called a writ of error coram vobis (before you) or quæ coram vobis residant. 3 Chit. Bla. Com. 406, n.

CORD. A measure of wood, containing 128 cubic feet. See 67 Barb. 169.

COREA. A nation of Asia. Its government is an absolute monarchy. The country was subject to the suzerainty of China, but by treaty concluded with Japan in 1895, the claims of China were renounced. The government is under the immediate control of the king, assisted by a cabinet of ministers.

CO-RESPONDENT. Any person called upon to answer a petition or other proceeding, but now chiefly applied to a person charged with adultery with the husband or wife, in a suit for divorce, and made jointly a respondent to the suit. See DIVORCE.

CORN. In its most comprehensive sense, this term signifies every sort of grain, as well as peas and beans; this is its meaning in the memorandum usually contained in policies of insurance. But it does not include rice; Park, Ins. 112; 1 Marsh. Ins. 223, n.; Wesk. Ins. 145. See Com. Dig. Biens (G, 1). In the United States it usually means maize, or Indian corn; 53 Ala. 474.

CORN RENTS. Rents reserved in wheat or malt in certain college leases in England. Stat. 18 Eliz. c. 6; 2 Bla. Com. 322.

CORN-LAWS. Laws regulating the trade in bread-stuffs.

The object of corn laws is to secure a regular and steady supply of the great staples of food; and for this object the means adopted in different countries and at different times widely vary, sometimes involving restriction or prohibition upon the export, and sometimes, in order to stimulate production, offering a bounty upon the export. Of the former character was the famous system of corn laws of England, initiated in 1773 by Burke, and repealed in 1846 under Sir Robert Peel. See Cobden's Life.

CORNAGE. A species of tenure in England, by which the tenant was bound to blow a horn for the sake of alarming the country on the approach of an enemy. Bac. Abr. Tenure (N).

CORNET. A commissioned officer in a regiment of cavalry, abolished in England in 1871, and not existing in the United States army.

CORODY. An allowance of meat, drink, money, clothing, lodging, and such like necessities for sustenance. 1 Bla. Com. 283; 1 Chit. Pr. 225. An allowance from an abbey or house of religion, to one of the king's servants who dwells therein, of meat and other sustenance. Fitzh. N. B. 230.

An assize lay for a corody; Cowel. Corodies are now obsolete; Co. 2d Inst. 630; 2 Bla. Com. 40.

CORONATION OATH. The oath administered to a sovereign in England before coronation. Whart. Law Dic.

CORONATOR (Lat.). A coroner. Spel.

CORONATORE EXONERANDO. A writ for the removal of a coroner, for a cause therein assigned.

CORONER. An officer whose principal duty it is to hold an inquisition, with the assistance of a jury, over the body of any person who may have come to a violent death, or who has died in prison.

It is his duty also, in case of the death of the sheriff or his incapacity, or when a vacancy occurs in that office, to serve all the writs and processes which the sheriff is usually bound to serve; 20 Ga. 336; 10 Humph. 346; 73 N. Y. 45; 1 Bla. Com. 349. See SHERIFF.

The chief justice of the King's Bench was the sovereign or chief coroner of all England; though it is not to be understood that he performed the active duties of that office in any one county; 4 Co. 57 b; Bac. Abr. Coroner; 3 Com. Dig. 242; 5 id. 212.

It was also the coroner's duty to inquire concerning shipwreck, and to find who had possession of the goods; concerning treasure-trove, who were the finders, and where the property was; 1 Bla. Com. 349.

The office has lost much of the honor which formerly appertained to it; but the duties are of great consequence to society, both for bringing murderers to punishment and protecting innocent persons from accusation. It may often happen that the imperfections of the early examination enable one who is undoubtedly a criminal to escape. It is proper in most cases of homicide to procure the examination to be made by a physician, and in many cases it is a coroner's duty so to do; 4 C. & P. 571. See 64 Ind. 524; 49 Ia. 148; 8 Oreg. 170.

Coroners were abolished in Massachusetts by act 1877, c. 200, and the governor given the power to appoint, in their place, medical examiners, "men learned in the science of medicine," whose duties were to make examinations of dead bodies, to hold autopsies upon the same, and in case of death from violence to notify the district attorney and a justice of the district of the fact. See Lee, Coroners; Crock. Sher. & Cor.; 6 Am. L. Reg. 385.

CORPORAL (Lat. corpus, body). Bodily; relating to the body: as, corporal punishment.

A non-commissioned officer of the lowest grade in an infantry, cavalry, or artillery company.

CORPORAL OATH. An oath which the party takes laying his hand on the gospels. Cowel. It is now held to mean solemn oath. 1 Ind. 184.

CORPORAL TOUCH. Actual, bodily contact with the hand.

It was once held that before a seller of personal property could be said to have stopped it in transitu, so as to regain the possession of it, it was necessary that it should come to his corporal touch; but the contrary is now settled. These words were used merely as a figurative expression. 3 Term 464; 5 East 184.

CORPORATION (Lat. corpus, a body). A body, consisting of one or more natural persons, established by law, usually for some specific purpose, and continued by a succession of members.

"An artificial being created by law and composed of individuals who subsist as a body politic under a special denomination with the capacity of perpetual succession and of acting within the scope of its charter as a natural person." 122 Ill. 293.

A corporation aggregate is a collection of individuals united in one body by such a grant of privileges as secures succession of members without changing the identity of the body and constitutes the members for the time being one artificial person or legal being capable of transacting the corporate business like a natural person. Bronson, J., 1 Hill, N. Y. 620.

It is this last characteristic of a corporation, sometimes called its immortality, prolonging its existence beyond the term of natural life, and thereby enabling a long-continued effort and concentration of means to the end which it was designed to answer, that constitutes its principal utility. A corporation is modelled upon a state or nation, and is to this day called a body politic as well as corporate,—thereby indicating its origin and derivation. Its earliest form was, probably, the municipality or city, which necessity exacted for the control or local police of the marts and crowded places of the state or empire. The combination of the commonality in this form for local government became the earliest bulwark against despotic power; and a philosophical historian traces to the remains and remembrance of the Roman municipia the formation of those elective governments of towns and cities in modern Europe, which, after the fall of the Roman empire, contributed so largely to the preservation of order and to the protection of the rights of life and property as to become the foundation of modern liberty. McIntosh, Hist. of Eng. p. 31.

Aggregate corporations are those which are composed of two or more members at the same time.

Civil corporations are those which are created to facilitate the transaction of business.

Ecclesiastical corporations are those which are created to secure the public worship of God.

Eleemosynary corporations are those which are created for the purposes of charities, such as schools, hospitals, and the like.

Lay corporations are those which exist for secular purposes.

Municipal corporations are those created for the purpose of administering some portion of the government in a political subdivision of the state, as a city, county, etc.

Private corporations are those which are created wholly or in part, for purposes of private emolument. 4 Wheat. 668; 9 id. 907.

Public corporations are those which are exclusively instruments of the public interest.

Sole corporations are those which by law consist of but one member at any one time, as a bishop in England.

In the Dartmouth College Case, 4 Wheat. 666, Mr. Justice Story defined the various kinds of corporations as follows:—

"An aggregate corporation at common law is a collection of individuals united into one collective body, under a special name, and possessing certain immunities, privileges, and capacities in its collective character, which do not belong to the natural persons composing it. . . . A great variety of these corporations exist in every country governed by the common law; . . . some of these corporations are, from the particular purposes to which they are devoted, denominated spiritual, and some lay; and the latter are again divided into civil and eleemosynary corporations. Eleemosynary corporations are such as are constituted for the perpetual distribution of the free alms and bounty of the founder. . . . In this class are ranked hospitals, and colleges, etc. Another division of corporations is into public and private. Public corporations are generally esteemed such as exist for public and political purposes only, such as towns, cities, etc. Strictly speaking, public corporations are such only as are founded by the government for public purposes, where the whole interests belong also to the government. If, therefore, the foundation be private, though under the charter of the Government, the corporation is private. . . . For instance, a bank created by the Government for its own uses, whose stock is exclusively owned by the government, is, in the strictest sense, a public corporation. So a hospital created and endowed by the government for general charity. But a bank, whose stock is owned by private persons, is a private corporation. . . . The same doctrine may be affirmed of insurance, canal, bridge, and turnpike companies. In all these cases, the uses may, in a certain sense, be called public, but the corporations are private. . . . This reasoning applies in its full force to eleemosynary corporations. . . . This is the unequivocal doctrine of the authorities; and cannot be shaken but by undermining the most solid foundations of the common law."

Kent divides corporations into ecclesiastical and lay, and lay corporations into eleemosynary and civil; 2 Kent 274.

It has been held that a public corporation is one that cannot carry out the purposes of its organization without certain rights under its charter from the commonwealth, and that mere private corporations are those that need no franchise from the state to carry out such purposes; 123 Pa. 164. But Judge Thompson, in his learned work, doubts as to whether these divisions promote clear conceptions of the law; 1 Thomp. Corp. § 22; he considers that a more practical conception would divide them into three classes: public-municipal corporations, to promote the public interest; corporations technically private but of quasi public character, such as railroads etc.; and corporations strictly private; id. § 37.

The essence of a corporation consists "in a capacity (1) to have perpetual succession in a special and in an artificial form; (2) to take and grant property, contract obligations, sue and be sued by its corporate name as an individual; (3) to receive and enjoy in common grants of privileges and annuities;" 22 Wend. 71.

By both the civil and the common law, the sovereign authority only can create a corporation,—a corporation by prescription, or so old that the license or charter which created it is lost, being presumed, from the long-continued exercise of corporate powers, to have been entitled to them by sovereign grant. In England, corporations are created by royal charter or parliamentary act; in the United States, by legislative act of any state, or of the congress of the United States,—congress having power to create a corporation, as, for instance, a national bank when such a body is an appropriate instrument for the exercise of its constitutional powers; 4 Wheat. 424. As to corporations created by congress see 21 Cent. L. J. 421. In many or most of the states general acts have been passed for the creation of certain classes of some corporations. And some state constitutions have taken from the legislature the power to create them by special act.

All corporations, of whatever kind, are moulded and controlled, both as to what they may do and the manner in which they may do it, by their charters or acts of incorporation, which to them are the laws of their being, which they can neither dispense with nor alter. Subject, however, to such limitations as these, or such as general statute or constitutional law, may impose, every corporation aggregate has, by virtue of incorporation and as incidental thereto, first, the power of perpetual succession, including the admission, and, except in the case of mere stock corporations, the removal for cause, of members; second, the power to sue and be sued, to grant and to receive grants, and to do all acts which it may do at all, in its corporate name; third, to purchase, receive, and to hold lands and other property, and to transmit them in succession; fourth, to have a common seal, and to break, alter, and renew it at pleasure; and, fifth, to make by-laws for its government, so that they be consistent with its charter and with law. Indeed, at this day, it may be laid down as a general rule that a corporation may, within the limits of its charter or act of incorporation express or implied, lawfully do all acts and enter into all contracts that a natural person may do or enter into, so that the same be appropriate as means to the end for which the corporation was created.

A corporation may be dissolved, if of limited duration, by the expiration of the term of its existence, fixed by charter or general law; by the loss of all its members, or of an integral part of the corporation, by death or otherwise, if the charter or act of incorporation provide no mode by which such loss may be supplied; by the surrender of its corporate franchise to, and the acceptance of the surrender by, the sovereign authority; and, lastly, by the forfeiture of its charter by the neglect of the duties imposed or abuse of the privileges conferred by it; the forfeiture being enforced by proper legal process.

In England, a private as well as a public corporation may be dissolved by act of parliament; but in the United States, although the charter of a municipal corporation may be altered or repealed at pleasure, the charter of a quasi public or a private corporation, whether granted by the king of Great Britain previous to the revolution, or by the legislature of any of the states since, is, unless in the latter case express power be for that purpose reserved, within the protection of that clause of the constitution of the United States which, among other things, forbids a state from passing any "law impairing the obligation of contracts." Const. U. S. art. 1, sect. 10; 4 Wheat. 518. Under this clause of the constitution it has been settled that the charter of a quasi public or a private corporation, whether civil or eleemosynary, is an executed contract between the government and the corporation, and that the legislature cannot repeal, impair, or alter it against the consent or without the default of the corporation, judicially ascertained and declared; id. On the other hand, the doctrine is firmly established that only that which is granted in clear and explicit terms passes by a grant of property, franchise, or privileges in which the government or the public has an interest. . . . Statutory grants of that character to be construed strictly in favor of the public, what is not unequivocally granted is withheld, nothing passes by mere implication.

A corporate franchise, however—as, to build and maintain a toll-bridge—may, by virtue of the power of eminent domain, be condemned by a state to public uses, upon just compensation, like any other private property; 6 How. 507.

For the history of corporations before 1800, see 2 Harv. L. Rev. 149.

CORPORATOR. A member of a corporation.

The corporators are not the corporation, for either may sue the other; 4 McLean 547; 19 Vt. 187; 3 Metc. Mass. 44; 97 U. S. 13.

CORPOREAL HEREDITAMENTS. Substantial permanent objects which may be inherited. The term land will include all such. 2 Bla. Com. 17.

CORPOREAL PROPERTY. In Civil Law. That which consists of such subjects as are palpable.

In the common law, the term to signify the same thing is property in possession. It differs from incorporeal property, which consists of choses in action and easements, as a right of way, and the like.

CORPSE. The dead body of a human being. 1 Russ. & R. 366, n.; 2 Term 733; 1 Leach 497; 8 Pick. 370; Dig. 47. 12. 3. 7; 11. 7. 38; Code, 3. 44. 1. Stealing a corpse is an indictable offence, but not larceny at common law; Co. 3d. Inst. 203; 1 Russ. Cr. 629; 28 Alb L. J. 106. See DEAD BODY.

CORPUS (Lat.). A body. The substance. Used of a human body, a corporation, a collection of laws, etc. The capital of a fund or estate as distinguished from the income.

CORPUS COMITATUS. The body of the county; the inhabitants or citizens of a whole county, as distinguished from a part of the county or a part of its citizens. 5 Mas. 290.

CORPUS CUM CAUSA. See HABEAS CORPUS CUM CAUSA.

CORPUS DELICTI. The body of the offence; the essence of the crime.

It is a general rule not to convict unless the corpus delicti can be established, that is, until the fact that the crime has been actually perpetrated has been first proved. Hence, on a charge of homicide, the accused should not be convicted unless the death be first distinctly proved, either by direct evidence of the fact or by inspection of the body; Best, Pres. § 201; 1 Stark. Ev. 575. See 6 C. & P. 176; 2 Hale, P. C. 290; Whart. Cr. Ev. § 324. Instances have occurred of a person being convicted of having killed another, who, after the supposed criminal has been put to death for the supposed offence, has made his appearance alive. The wisdom of the rule is apparent; but it has been questioned whether, in extreme cases, it may not be competent to prove the basis of the corpus delicti by presumptive evidence; 3 Benth. Jud. Ev. 234; Wills, Cir. Ev. 105; Best, Pres. § 204; 3 Greenl. Ev. 30. In cases of felonious homicide, the corpus delicti consists of two fundamental and necessary facts: first, the death; and secondly, the existence of criminal agency as its cause; 43 Miss. 472. A like analysis would apply in the case of any other crime. When the body of a murdered man was burned and mutilated beyond recognition, testimony that a piece of charred cloth found among the ashes with the deceased were like the trousers that the murdered man wore, and that a slate pencil found there was identical with one he carried about him, was competent evidence for the jury to establish the identity of the body; 25 S. E. Rep. (S. C.) 113.

The presumption arising from the possession of the fruits of crime recently after its commission, which in all cases is one of fact rather than of law, is occasionally so strong as to render unnecessary any direct proof of what is called the corpus delicti. Thus, to borrow an apt illustration from Mr. Justice Maule, if a man were to go into the London docks quite sober, and shortly afterwards were to be found very drunk, staggering out of one of the cellars, in which above a million gallons of wine are stowed, "I think," says the learned judge, "that this would be reasonable evidence that the man had stolen some of the wine in the cellar, though no proof were given that any particular vat had been broached and that any wine had actually been missed." Dears. 284; 1 Tayl. Ev. § 122. In this case it was proved that a prisoner indicted for larceny was seen coming out of the lower room of a warehouse in the London docks, in the floor above which a large quantity of pepper was deposited, and where he had no business to be. He was stopped by a constable, who suspected him from the bulky state of his pockets, and said, "I think there is something wrong about you;" upon which the prisoner said, "I hope you will not be hard upon me;" and then threw a quantity of pepper out of his pocket on the ground. The witness stated that he could not say whether any pepper had been stolen, nor that any pepper had been missed; but that which was found upon the prisoner was of like description with the pepper in the warehouse. It was held by all the judges that the prisoner, upon these facts, was properly convicted of larceny.

A confession alone ought not to be considered sufficient proof of the corpus delicti; 26 Miss. 157; 15 Wend. 147.

CORPUS JURIS CANONICI (Lat. the body of the canon law). The name given to the collections of the decrees and canons of the Roman church. See CANON LAW.

CORPUS JURIS CIVILIS. The body of the civil law. The collection comprising the Institutes, the Pandects or Digest, the Code, and the Novels of Justinian. See those several titles, and also CIVIL LAW for fuller information. The name is said to have been first applied to this collection early in the seventeenth century.

CORRECTION. Chastisement, by one having authority, of a person who has committed some offence, for the purpose of bringing him into legal subjection.

It is chiefly exercised in a parental manner by parents, or those who are placed in loco parentis. A parent may therefore justify the correction of the child either corporally or by confinement; and a school-master, under whose care and instruction a parent has placed his child, may equally justify similar correction; but the correction in both cases must be moderate and in a proper manner; Com. Dig. Pleader, (3 M.) 19; Hawk. c. 60, s. 23, c. 62, s. 2, c. 29, s. 5; 2 Humph. 283; 2 Dev. & B. L. 365. See ASSAULT.

The master of an apprentice, for disobedience, may correct him moderately; 1 B. & C. 469; Cro. Car. 179; 2 Show. 289; 10 Mart. La. 38; but he cannot delegate the authority to another. A master has no right to correct his servants who are not apprentices; 10 Conn. 455; 2 Greenl. Ev. § 97; see ASSAULT for cases of undue correction.

Soldiers are liable to moderate correction from their superiors. For the sake of maintaining discipline in the navy, the captain of a vessel, belonging either to the United States or to private individuals, may inflict moderate correction on a sailor for disobedience or disorderly conduct; Ab. Sh. 160; 1 Ch. Fr. 73; 14 Johns. 119; 15 Mass. 365; 1 Bay 3; Bee 161; 1 Pet. Adm. 168; Moll. 209; 1 Ware 88. Such has been the general rule. But flogging and other degrading punishments are now forbidden in the army, navy, merchant service, and military prisons; R. S. §§ 1342, 1624, 4611, 1354.

The husband, by the old law, might give his wife moderate correction; 1 Hawk. P. C. 2. But in later times this power of correction began to be doubted; and a wife may now have security of the peace against her husband, or, in return, a husband against his wife; 1 Bla. Com. 444; Stra. 478, 875, 1207; 2 Lev. 128. See MARRIED WOMEN.

Any excess of correction by the parent, master, officer, or captain, may render the party guilty of an assault and battery and liable to all its consequences; 4 Gray 36. See ASSAULT. In some prisons, the keepers have the right to correct the prisoners.

CORREGIDOR. In Spanish Law. A magistrate who took cognizance of various misdemeanors, and of civil matters. 2 White, New Rec. 53.

CORREI. In Civil Law. Two or more bound or secured by the same obligation.

Correi credendi. Creditors secured by the same obligation.

Correi debendi. Two or more persons bound as principal debtors to pay or perform. Ersk. Inst. 3. 3. 74; Calvinus, Lex.; Bell, Dict.

CORRESPONDENCE. The letters written by one person to another, and the answers thereto. See LETTER; COPYRIGHT.

CORRUPTION. An act done with an intent to give some advantage inconsistent with official duty and the rights of others.

It includes bribery, but is more comprehensive; because an act may be corruptly done though the advantage to be derived from it be not offered by another. Merlin, Rép.

Something against law: as, a contract by which the borrower agreed to pay the lender usurious interest. It is said, in such case, that it was corruptly agreed, etc.

CORRUPTION OF BLOOD. The incapacity to inherit, or pass an inheritance, in consequence of an attainder to which the party has been subject. Abolished by stats. 3 & 4 Will. IV. c. 106, and 33 & 34 Vict. c. 23; 1 Steph. Com. 446.

When this consequence flows from an attainder, the party is stripped of all honors and dignities he possessed, and becomes ignoble.

The constitution of the United States, art. 3, s. 3, n. 2, declares that "no attainder of treason shall work corruption of blood or forfeiture except during the life of the person attainted."

The act of July 17, 1862 (12 Stat. L. 539), for the seizure and condemnation of enemies' estates, with the resolution of the same date, does not conflict with this section, the forfeiture being only during the life of the offender; 9 Wall. 339; 11 id. 268; 18 id. 156, 163; 92 U. S. 202. See 4 Bla. Com. 388; 1 Cruise, Dig. 52; 3 id. 240, 378, 473; 1 Chit. Cr. L. 740.

CORSE-PRESENT. In Old English Law. A gift of the second best beast belonging to a man at his death taken along with the corpse and presented to the priest. Stat. 21 Hen. VIII. cap. 6; Cowel; 2 Bla. Com. 425.

CORSNED. In Old English Law. A piece of barley bread, which, after the pronouncement of certain imprecations, a person accused of crime was compelled to swallow.

A piece of cheese or bread of about an ounce weight was consecrated with an exorcism desiring of the Almighty that it might cause convulsions and paleness, and find no passage, if the man was really guilty, but might turn to health and nourishment if he was innocent. Spelman, Gloss. 439. It was then given to the suspected person, who at the same time received the sacrament. If he swallowed it easily, he was esteemed innocent; if it choked him, he was esteemed guilty. See 4 Bla. Com. 345.

CORTES. The name of the legislative assemblies of Spain and Portugal.

CORVEE. In French Law. Gratuitous labor exacted from the villages or communities, especially for repairing roads, constructing bridges, fortifications, etc.

Corvée seigneuriale are services due the lord of the manor. Guyot, Rép. Univ.; 3 Low. C. 1.

COSBERING. In Feudal Law. A prerogative or seigniorial right of a lord, as to lie and feast himself and his followers at his tenants' houses. Cowel.

COSENING. In Old English Law. An offence whereby anything is done deceitfully, whether in or out of contracts, which cannot be fitly termed by any especial name. Called in the civil law Stellionatus. West, Symb. pt. 2, Indictment, § 68; Blount; 4 Bla. Com. 158.

COSINAGE (spelled, also, Cousinage, Cosenage). A writ to recover possession of an estate in lands when a stranger has entered and abated after the death of the grandfather's grandfather or of certain collateral relations. 3 Bla. Com. *186.

Relationship; affinity. Stat. 4 Hen. III. cap. 8; 3 Bla. Com. 186; Co. Litt. 160 a.

COST. The cost of an article purchased for exportation is the price paid, with all incidental charges paid at the place of exportation. 2 Wash. C. C. 493. Cost price is that actually paid for goods. 18 N. Y. 337.

COST-BOOK. In English Law. A book in which a number of adventurers who have obtained permission to work a lode and have agreed to share the enterprise in certain proportions, enter the agreement and from time to time the receipts and expenditures of the mine, the names of the shareholders, their respective accounts with the mine, and transfers of shares. These associations are called "Cost-book mining companies," and are governed by the general law of partnership. Lindl. Partn. *147.

COSTA RICA. A republic of Central America. The president is elected for four years. The single legislative chamber is elected for four years. The code of law is adopted from the Spanish code.

COSTS. In Practice. The expenses incurred by the parties in the prosecution or defence of a suit at law.

They are distinguished from fees in being an allowance to a party for expenses incurred in conducting his suit; whereas fees are a compensation to an officer for services rendered in the progress of the cause. 11 S. & R. 248.

No costs were recoverable by either plaintiff or defendant at common law. They were first given to plaintiff by the statute of Gloucester, 6 Edw. I. c. 1, which has been substantially adopted in all the United States.

A party can in no case recover costs from his adversary unless he can show some statute which gives him the right.

Statutes which give costs are not to be extended beyond the letter, but are to be construed strictly; 2 Stra. 1006, 1069; 3 Burr. 1287; 4 S. & R. 129; 1 Rich. 4.

They do not extend to the government; and therefore when the United States, or one of the several states, is a party they neither pay nor receive costs, unless it be so expressly provided by statute; 1 S. & R. 505; 8 id. 151; 3 Cra. 73; 2 Wheat. 395; 12 id. 546; 5 How. 29; 23 Ala. 579; 41 N. H. 238; 2 Tyler 44; and in actions of a public nature, conducted solely for the public benefit, costs are rarely given against public officers; 94 Ill. 589; 41 Mich. 182; 19 Wend. 50. This exemption is founded on the sovereign character of the state, which is subject to no process; 3 Bla. Com. 400; Cowp. 366; 3 Pa. 153. The right of the state to costs on conviction in criminal cases is generally declared by statute.

In many cases, the right to recover costs is made to depend, by statute, upon the amount of the verdict or judgment. Where there is such a provision, and the verdict is for less than the amount required by statute to entitle the party to costs, the right to costs, in general, will depend upon the mode in which the verdict has been reduced below the sum specified in the act. In such cases, the general rule is that if the amount be reduced by evidence of direct payment, the party shall lose his costs; but if by set-off or other collateral defence he will be entitled to recover them; 2 Stra. 1911; 4 Dougl. 448; 9 Moore, P. C. 623; 8 East 28, 347; 2 Price 19; 1 Taunt. 60; 4 Bingh. 169; 1 Dall. 308, 457; 13 S. & R. 287; 16 id. 253; 4 Pa. 330.

When a case is dismissed for want of jurisdiction over the person, no costs are allowed to the defendant unless expressly given by statute. The difficulty in giving costs, in such case, is the want of power. If the case be not legally before the court, it has no more jurisdiction to award costs than it has to grant relief; 2 W. & M. 417; 1 Wall. Jr. 187; 9 id. 650; 3 Sumn. 473; 15 Mass. 221; 16 Pa. 200; 3 Litt. 332; 3 N. H. 130; Wright, Ohio 417.

In equity, the giving of costs is entirely discretionary, as well with respect to the period at which the court decides upon them as with respect to the parties to whom they are given.

In the exercise of their discretion, courts of equity are generally governed by certain fixed principles which they have adopted on the subject of costs. It was the rule of the civil law that victus victori in expensis condemnatus est; and this is the general rule adopted in courts of equity as well as in courts of law, at least to the extent of throwing it upon the failing party to show the existence of circumstances to displace the prima facie claim to costs given by success to the party who prevails; 3 Dan. Ch. Pr. 1515.

In patent cases in equity costs will not be allowed a plaintiff where some of the claims are withdrawn at the argument and some adjudged invalid, though others are sustained; 71 Fed. Rep. 886.

An executor or administrator suing at law or in equity in his representative capacity is not personally liable to the opposite party for costs in case he is unsuccessful, if the litigation were carried on in good faith for the benefit of the estate; 11 S. & R. 47; 15 id. 239; 23 Pa. 471. But the rule is otherwise where vexatious litigation is caused by the executor or administrator, and where he has been guilty of fraud or misconduct in relation to the suit; 5 Binn. 138; 1 Wms. Exec. 451; 7 Pa. 136, 137.

See DOUBLE COSTS; TREBLE COSTS. Consult Brightly; Leake; Merrifield; Sayer; Tidd, Costs; and the books of practice adapted to the laws of each state.

COSTS OF THE DAY. Costs incurred in preparing for trial on a particular day. Ad. Eq. 343.

In English practice, costs are ordered to be paid by a plaintiff, who neglects to go to trial according to notice; Mozley & W. Law Dict.; Lush, Pr. 496.

COSTS DE INCREMENTO (increased costs, costs of increase). Costs adjudged by the court in addition to those assessed by the jury. 13 How. 372.

The cost of the suit, etc., recovered originally under the statute of Gloucester is said to be the origin of costs de incremento; Bull. N. P. 328 a. Where the statute requires costs to be doubled in case of an unsuccessful appeal, costs de incremento stand on the same footing as jury costs; 2 Stra. 1048; TAXED COSTS. Costs were enrolled in England in the time of Blackstone as increase of damages; 3 Bla. Com. 399.

COTERELLI. Anciently, a kind of peasantry who were outlaws. Robbers. Blount.

COTERELLUS. A cottager.

Coterellus was distinguished from cotarius in this, that the cotarius held by socage tenure, but the coterellus held in mere villenage, and his person, issue, and goods were held at the will of the lord. Cowel.

COTLAND. Land held by a cottager, whether in socage or villenage. Cowel; Blount.

COTSETUS. A cottager or cottager-holder who held by servile tenure and was bound to do the work of the lord. Cowel.

COTTAGE, COTTAGIUM. In Old English Law. A small house without any land belonging to it, whereof mention is made in stat. 4 Edw. I.

But, by stat. 31 Eliz. cap. 7, no man may build such cottage for habitation unless he lay unto it four acres of freehold land, except in market-towns, cities, or within a mile of the sea, or for the habitation of laborers in mines, shepherds, foresters, sailors, etc. Twenty years' possession of cottage gives good title as against the lord; Bull. N. P. 163 a, 104. By a grant of a cottage the curtilage will pass; 4 Vin. Abr. 582.

COTTIER TENANCY. A species of tenancy in Ireland, constituted by an agreement in writing, and subject to the following terms: That the tenement consist of a dwelling-house with not more than half an acre of land; at a rental not exceeding 5*l.* a year; the tenancy to be for not more than a month at a time; the landlord to keep the house in good repair. Landlord and Tenant Act (Ireland), 23 & 24 Vict. c. 154, s. 81.

COUCHANT. Lying down. Animals are said to have been levant and couchant when they have been upon another person's land, damage feasant, one night at least. 3 Bla. Com. 9.

COUNCIL (Lat. concilium, an assembly). The legislative body in the government of cities or boroughs. An advisory body selected to aid the executive. See 14 Mass. 470; 3 Pick. 517; 4 id. 25.

A governor's council is still retained in some of the states of the United States; 70 Me. 570. It is analogous in many respects to the privy council (q. v.), of the king of Great Britain and of the governors of the British colonies, though of a much more limited range of duties.

Common council is a term frequently applied to the more numerous branch of the legislative bodies in cities.

The British parliament is the common council of the whole realm.

COUNSEL. The counsellors who are associated in the management of a particular cause, or who act as legal advisers in reference to any matter requiring legal knowledge and judgment.

The term is used both as a singular and plural noun, to denote one or more; though it is perhaps more common, when speaking of one of several counsellors concerned in the management of a case in court, to say that he is "of counsel."

Knowledge. A grand jury is sworn to keep secret "the commonwealth's counsel, their fellows', and their own."

COUNSELLOR AT LAW. An officer in the supreme court of the United States, and in some other courts, who is employed by a party in a cause to conduct the same on its trial on his behalf.

He differs from an attorney at law.

In the supreme court of the United States, the two degrees of attorney and counsel were at first kept separate, and no person was permitted to practise in both capacities, but the present practice is otherwise; Weeks, Att. 54. It is the duty of the counsel to draft or review and correct the special pleadings, to manage the cause on trial, and, during the whole course of the suit, to apply established principles of law to the exigencies of the case: 1 Kent 807. In England the term "counsel" is applied to a barrister.

Generally, in the courts of the various states the same person performs the duties of counsellor and attorney at law.

In New York, the rules established by the court of appeals, in September, 1877, provided for an examination and admission as a counsellor after two years' practice as an attorney; Throop's Code § 56. The distinction is also preserved in New Jersey.

In giving their advice to their clients, counsel have duties to perform to their clients, to the public and to themselves. In such cases they have thrown upon them something which they owe to their administration of justice, as well as to the private interests of their employers. The interests propounded for them ought, in their own apprehension, to be just, or at least fairly disputable; and when such interests are propounded, they ought not to be pursued per fas et nefas; 1 Hagg. Adm. 222. An attorney and counsellor is not an officer of the United States, he is an officer of the court. His right to appear for suitors and to argue causes is not a mere indulgence, revocable at the pleasure of the court, or at the command of the legislature. It is a right of which he can be deprived only by the judgment of the court, for moral or professional delinquency; Ex parte Garland, 4 Wall. 333.

See ATTORNEY AT LAW; PRIVILEGE; CONFIDENTIAL COMMUNICATIONS; DISBARMENT OF ATTORNEYS.

COUNT (Fr. comte; from the Latin comes). An earl.

It gave way as a distinct title to the Saxon earl, but was retained in countess, viscount, and as the basis of county. Termes de la ley; 1 Bla. Com. 398. See COMES.

In Pleading (Fr. conte, a narrative). The plaintiff's statement of his cause of action.

This word, derived from the French conte, a narrative, is in our old law-books used synonymously with declaration; but practice has introduced the following distinction. When the plaintiff's complaint embraces only a single cause of action, and he makes only one statement of it, that statement is called, indifferently, a declaration or count; though the former is the more usual term. But when the suit embraces two or more causes of action (each of which, of course, requires a different statement), or when the plaintiff makes two or more different statements of one and the same cause of action, each several statement is called a count, and all of them, collectively, constitute the declaration. In all cases, however, in which there are two or more counts, whether there is actually but one cause of action or several, each count purports, upon the face of it, to disclose a distinct right of action, unconnected with that stated in any of the other counts.

One object proposed in inserting two or more counts in one declaration when there is in fact but one cause of action, is, in some cases, to guard against the danger of an insufficient statement of the cause, where a doubt exists as to the legal sufficiency of one or another of two different modes of declaring; but the more usual end proposed in inserting more than one count in such case is to accommodate the statement to the cause, as far as may be, to the possible state of the proof to be exhibited on trial, or to guard, if possible, against the hazard of the proofs varying materially from the statement of the cause of action; so that, if one or more of several counts be not adapted to the evidence, some other of them may beso; Gould, Pl. c. 4, ss. 2, 3, 4; Steph. Pl. 266; Doctrina Plac. 178; 3 Com. Dig. 291; Dane, Abr. Index. In real actions, the declaration is usually called a count; Steph. Pl. 29. See COMMON COUNTS.

COUNT AND COUNT-OUT. These words refer to the count of the house of commons by the speaker. Forty members, including the speaker, are required to constitute a quorum. Each day after parliament is opened, the speaker counts the house. If forty members are not present he waits till four o'clock, and then counts the house again. If forty members are not then present, he at once adjourns it to the following meeting day. May, Parl. Prac. 219.

COUNTER (spelled, also, Compter). The name of two prisons formerly standing in London, but now demolished. They were the Poultry Counter and Wood Street Counter. Cowel; Whish. L. D.; Coke, 4th Inst. 248.

COUNTER AFFIDAVIT. An affidavit made in opposition to one already made. This is allowed in the preliminary examination of some cases.

COUNTER-BOND. A bond to indemnify. 2 Leon. 90.

COUNTER-CLAIM. A liberal practice introduced by the reformed codes of procedure in many of the United States, and comprehending RECOUPMENT and SET-OFF, q. v., though broader than either.

The New York code thus defines it:

The counter-claim must tend, in some way, to diminish or defeat the plaintiff's recovery, and must be one of the following causes of action against the plaintiff, or, in a proper case, against the person whom he represents, and in favor of the defendant, or of one or more defendants, between whom and the plaintiff a separate judgment may be had in the action:—

1. A cause of action arising out of the contract or transaction, set forth in the complaint as the foundation of the plaintiff's claim, or connected with the subject of the action.

2. In an action on contract, any other cause of action on contract existing at the commencement of the action. N. Y. Code, 1889, § 501. See 21 N. Y. 191; 51 id. 327; 67 id. 48; 77 id. 282; 78 id. 325; 79 id. 575; 80 id. 560; 87 id. 550; 21 Hun 240; 8 How. Pr. 122, 335; 12 id. 310; 35 Wis. 618; 82 N. C. 356; 66 Ind. 498; 25 Minn. 210.

COUNTER-LETTER. An agreement to recovery where property has been passed by absolute deed with the intention that it shall serve as security only. A defeasance by a separate instrument. 11 Pet. 351.

COUNTER-SECURITY. Security given to one who has become security for another, the condition of which is, that if the one who first became surety shall be damnified, the one who gives the counter-security will indemnify him.

COUNTERFEIT. In Criminal Law. To make something false in the semblance of that which is true. It always implies a fraudulent intent. It refers usually to imitations of coin or paper money. See Vin. Abr. Counterfeit; R. M. Charl. 151; 1 Ohio 185; FORGERY.

COUNTERMAND. A change or recalling of orders previously given.

Express countermand takes place when contrary orders are given and a revocation of the prior orders is made.

Implied countermand takes place when a new order is given which is inconsistent with the former order,

When a command or order has been given, and property delivered, by which a right vests in a third person, the party giving the order cannot countermand it. For example, if a debtor should deliver to A a sum of money to be paid to B, his creditor, B has a vested right in the money, and, unless he abandon that right and refuse to take the money, the debtor cannot recover it from A. 1 Rolle, Abr. 32, pl. 13; Yelv. 164; Styles 296. See 3 Co. 26 b; 2 Vent. 298; 10 Mod. 432; Vin. Abr. Countermand (A, 1), Bailment (D); 9 East 49; Bac. Abr. Bailment (D); Com. Dig. Attorney (B, 9), (C, 8); Dane, Abr. Countermand.

COUNTERPART. Formerly, each party to an indenture executed a separate deed: that part which was executed by the grantor was called the original, and the rest the counterparts. It is now usual for all the parties to execute every part; and this makes them all originals. 2 Bla. Com. 296.

In granting lots subject to a ground-rent reserved to the grantor, both parties execute the deeds, of which there are two copies: although both are original, one of them is sometimes called the counterpart. See 12 Vin. Abr. 104; Dane, Abr. Index; 7 Com. Dig. 443; Merlin, Rép. Double Ecrit.

COUNTERPLEA. In Pleading. A plea to some matter incidental to the main object of the suit, and out of the direct line of pleadings. Steph. Pl., Andr. ed. 165; 2 Wms. Saund. 45 h. Thus, counterplea of oyer is the defendant's allegations why oyer of an instrument should not be granted. Counterplea of aid prayer is the demandant's allegation why the vouchee of the tenant in a real action, or a stranger who asks to come in to defend his right, should not be admitted. Counterplea of voucher is the allegation of the vouchee in avoidance of the warranty after admission to plead. Counterpleas are of rare occurrence. Termes de la Ley; Doctrina Plac. 300; Com. Dig. Voucher (B, 1, 2); Dane, Abr.

COUNTRY. A word often used in pleading and practice. Usually signifies a jury, or the inhabitants of a district from which a jury is to be summoned. 3 Bla. Com. 349; 4 id. 349; Steph. Pl. 73, 78, 230.

COUNTY. One of the civil divisions of a country for judicial and political purposes. 1 Bla. Com. 113. Etymologically, it denotes that portion of the country under the immediate government of a count. 1 Bla. Com. 116.

The United States are generally divided into counties. Counties are, in many of the states, divided into townships or towns. In the New England States, however, towns are the basis of all civil divisions, and the counties are rather to be considered as aggregates of towns, so far as their origin is concerned. In Pennsylvania, the state was originally divided into three counties by William Penn. See Proud's Hist. Pa. 234; 2 id. 258.

In some states, a county is considered a corporation; 1 Ill. 115; in others, it is held a quasi corporation; 16 Mass. 87; 9 Me. 88; 8 Johns. 385; 3 Munf. 102. In regard to the division of counties, see 6 J. J. Marsh. 147; 4 Halst. 357; 9 Cow. 640; 89 Pa. 419; 8 Baxt. 74, 141; 100 U. S. 548; 33 Ark. 191, 497; 5 Heisk. 294. A county may be required by act of legislature to build a public work outside the county limits, where it is of special interest to the people of the county; 104 Mass. 236; 50 Md. 245. The terms "county" and "people of the county" are, or may be, used interchangeably; 58 Mo. 175.

In the English law, this word signifies the same as shire,—county being derived from the French, and shire from the Saxon. Both these words signify a circuit or portion of the realm into which the whole land is divided, for the better government thereof and the more easy administration of justice. There is no part of England that is not within some county; and the shire-reeve (sheriff) was the governor of the province, under the comes, earl, or count.

COUNTY COMMISSIONERS. Certain officers generally intrusted with the superintendence of the collection of the county taxes and the disbursements made for the county. They are invested by the local laws with various powers. In some of the states they are called supervisors.

COUNTY CORPORATE. A city or town, with more or less territory annexed constituting a county by itself. 1 Bla. Com. 120. Something similar to this exists in this country in regard to Philadelphia, New York, and Boston. See 4 Mo. App. 347. They differ in no material points from other counties.

COUNTY COURT. In English Law. Tribunals of limited jurisdiction, which as now existing were originally established under the stat. 9 & 10 Vict. c. 95.

They had at their institution jurisdiction of actions for the recovery of debts, damages, and demands, legacies, and balances of partnership accounts where the sum sued for did not exceed twenty pounds. It has since been much extended, especially in cases where the parties gave assent in writing. See 3 Bla. Com. 35. They are now regulated by stat. 51 & 52 Vict. (1888) c. 43.

Tribunals of limited jurisdiction in the county of Middlesex, established under the statute 22 Geo. II. c. 33.

County courts were held in England from the earliest times and were of great importance; Laws of Edward the Elder, A. D. 901-924. The origin of these courts, among the most ancient in England, is somewhat obscure, being ascribed by some writers to the reigning Edgar. This, however, being conjectural, serves to fix the earliest possible date. It is clear that William the Conqueror confirmed the ancient jurisdiction of these courts. They were held under the presidency of the sheriff once in every month. They had jurisdiction in civil, criminal, and ecclesiastical causes, the sheriff associating with himself a bishop or an archdeacon, if necessary, or other ecclesiastical or learned person to aid him. He also heard cases in the nature of appeals from the Hundred, Lathe, and Trithing courts. The judges were the freeholders of the county, summoned by the sheriff, and were called sectatores or suitors of the court. They decided all cases of law and fact, the sheriff not being, for that purpose, a judge. Probably their judgment was not required to be unanimous. Inderwick, The King's Peace. "And so is the county court holden to this day." Coke, 4th Inst. 259. In some cases an appeal lay to the king. See, generally, 3 Steph. Com. 452; 3 Bla. Com. 83; 1 Poll. & Maitl. 515, 521.

In American Law. Courts in many of the states of the United States and in Canada, of widely varying powers.

COUNTY PALATINE. A county possessing certain peculiar privileges.

The owners of such counties have kingly powers within their jurisdictions, as the pardoning crimes, issuing writs, etc. These counties have either passed into the hands of the crown, or have lost their peculiar privileges to a great degree. 1 Bla. Com. 117; 4 id. 431. The name is derived from palatium (palace), and was applied because the earls anciently had palaces and maintained regal state. Cowel; Spel.; 1 Bla. Com. 117. See COURTS OF THE COUNTIES PALATINE.

COUNTY SESSIONS. In England, the Court of General Quarter Sessions of the Peace held in every county once in every quarter of a year. Mozley & W. Law Dict.

COUPONS. Those parts of a commercial instrument which are to be cut, and which are evidence of something connected with the contract mentioned in the instrument. They are generally attached to bonds or certificates of loan, where the interest is payable at particular periods, and, when the interest is paid, they are cut off and delivered to the payor. In England, they are known as warrants or dividend warrants, and the securities to which they belong, debentures. 13 C. B. 372. In the United States they have been decided to be negotiable instruments, if payable to bearer or order, upon which suit may be brought though detached from the bond; 53 Ind. 191; 44 Pa. 63; 21 How. 529; 109 Mass. 88; 22 Gratt. 833; 14 Wall. 282; 20 Wall. 583; 106 U. S. 589; Jones, R. R. Sec. § 320; 43 Me. 232; 22 Am. Rep. 315; 82 N. C. 382; 12 S. C. 200. Otherwise, in 1 Biss. 105, if the bond to which the coupons were attached was not negotiable; see 43 Me. 232; and otherwise if not payable to bearer or order; 66 N. Y. 14; see 26 Conn. 121. In England the question has not been directly decided, but it has been held that they are not promissory notes, and therefore do not require a stamp; 13 C. B. 373. Dividend warrants of the Bank of England made payable to a particular person, but not containing words of transfer, were held not to be negotiable, notwithstanding they had been so by custom for sixty years; 9 Q. B. 396. A purchaser of overdue coupons takes only the title of his vendor; 18 Gratt. 750; 1 Hughes 410. Negotiable coupons are entitled to days of grace; 66 N. Y. 14; Jones, R. R. Sec. § 326; contra, 18 Gratt. 773; 2 Dan. Neg. Instr., 3d ed. § 1490 a.

Interest on coupons may be recovered in a suit on the coupons; 44 Pa. 75; 3 McLean 472; 92 U. S. 502; 96 id. 51; 57 N. H. 397; 65 N. C. 234; 41 Barb. 9; 4 A. & E. Encyc. of Law 439. The rate of interest provided for in the bond continues on the coupon till it is merged in judgment; 96 U. S. 51; 112 Mass. 53; 2 Nev. 199; 25 Ohio St. 621; contra, 23 How. 118; 82 Md. 501; 10 R. I. 223. See Jones, R. R. Sec. § 336. A suit on the coupon is not barred by the Statute of Limitations unless a suit on the bond would be barred; 14 Wall. 282; otherwise, when the coupons have passed into the hands of the party who does not hold the bonds; 20 Wall. 583. As to practice in actions on coupons, see 9 Wall. 477.

See Jones, Railroad Securities; Clemens, Corporate Securities; Cavanaugh, Money Securities; Daniel, Negotiable Instruments.

COUR DE CASSATION. In French Law. The supreme judicial tribunal and court of final resort, established 1790, under the title of Tribunal de Cassation; it received its present name 1802. It is composed of forty-nine counsellors and judges, including a first president and three presidents of chamber, an attorney-general and six advocates-general, one head registrar and four deputy registrars appointed by the head registrar, and a certain number of ushers. Jones, French Bar 22; Guyot, Rép. Univ.

The jurisdiction of the court is only on error shown in the proceedings of the lower courts in matters of law, taking the facts as found by the lower courts.

COURSE. The direction of a line with reference to a meridian.

Where there are no monuments, the land is usually described by courses and distances and those mentioned in the patent or deed will fix the boundaries. But when the lines are actually marked, they must be adhered to though they vary from the course mentioned in the deeds. See BOUNDARY.

COURSE OF TRADE. What is usually done in the management of trade or business. A statute exempting from distress property deposited with a tavern-keeper "in the usual course of business," only includes property deposited by a guest for safekeeping; 5 Blackf. 489. Carriages used for carrying the band and performers of a circus in a street parade, are not carriages "used solely for the conveyance of any goods or burdens in the course of trade;" L. R. 9 Exch. 25.

Men are presumed to act for their own interest, and to pursue the way usually adopted by men generally: hence it is presumed in law that men in their actions will pursue the usual course of trade.

COURSE OF THE VOYAGE. By this term is understood the regular and customary track, if such there be, which a ship takes in going from one port to another, and the shortest way. Marsh. Ins. 185; Phill. Ins. 981.

COURT (Fr. cour, Dutch, koert, a yard). In Practice. A body in the government to which the public administration of justice is delegated.

The presence of a sufficient number of the members of such a body regularly convened in an authorized place at an appointed time, engaged in the full and regular performance of its functions. 20 Ala. 446; 20 Ark. 77.

The place where justice is judicially administered. Co. Litt. 58 a; 3 Bla. Com. 23, 25. See 45 Ia. 501.

The judge or judges themselves, when duly convened.

The term is used in all the above senses, though but infrequently in the third sense given. The application of the term—which originally denoted the place of assembling—to denote the assemblage, strikingly resembles the similar application of the Latin term curia (if, indeed, it be not a mere translation), and is readily explained by the fact that the earlier courts were merely assemblages, in the court-yard of the baron or of the king himself, of those who were qualified and whose duty it was so to appear at stated times or upon summons. Traces of this usage and constitution of courts still remain in the courts baron, the various courts for the trial of impeachments in England and the United States, and in the control exercised by the parliament of England and the legislatures of the various states of the United States over the organization of courts of justice, as constituted in modern times. Indeed, the English parliament is still the High Court of Parliament, and in Massachusetts the united legislative bodies are entitled, as they (and the body to which they succeeded) have been from time immemorial, the General Court.

In England, however, and in those states of the United States which existed as colonies prior to the revolution, most of these judicial functions were early transferred to bodies of a compacter organization, whose sole function was the public administration of justice. The power of impeachment of various high officers, however, is still retained by the legislative bodies both in England and the United States, and is, perhaps, the only judicial function which has ever been exercised by the legislative bodies in the newer states of the United States. These more compact bodies are the courts, as the term is used in its modern acceptance.

The one common and essential feature in all courts is a judge or judges—so essential, indeed, that they are even called the court, as distinguished from the accessory and subordinate officers; 3 Ind. 239; 53 Mo. 173; see 19 Vt. 478. Courts of record are also provided with a recording officer, variously known as clerk, prothonotary, register, etc.: while in all courts there are counsellors, attorneys, or similar officers recognized as peculiarly suitable persons to represent the parties actually concerned in the causes, who are considered as officers of the court and assistants of the judges, together with a variety of ministerial officers, such as sheriffs, constables, bailiffs, tipstaves, criers, etc. For a consideration of the functions of the various members of a court, see the various appropriate titles, as JURY, SHERIFF, etc.

Courts are said to belong to one or more of the following classes, according to the nature and extent of their jurisdiction, their forms of proceeding, or the principles upon which they administer justice, viz.:—

Admiralty. See ADMIRALTY.

Appellate, which take cognizance of causes removed from another court by appeal or writ of error. See APPEAL; APPELLATE JURISDICTION; DIVISION OF OPINION.

Civil, which redress private wrongs. See JURISDICTION.

Criminal, which redress public wrongs, that is, crimes or misdemeanors.

Ecclesiastical. See ECCLESIASTICAL COURTS.

Of equity, which administer justice according to the principles of equity. See EQUITY; COURT OF EQUITY; COURT OF CHANCERY.

Of general jurisdiction, which have cognizance of and may determine causes various in their nature.

Inferior, which are subordinate to other courts. 18 Ala. 521; also, those of a very limited jurisdiction.

Of law, which administer justice according to the principles of the common law.

Of limited or special jurisdiction, which can take cognizance of a few specified matters only.

Local, which have jurisdiction of causes occurring in certain places only, usually the limits of a town or borough, or, in England, of a barony.

Martial. See COURT-MARTIAL.

Not of record, those which are not courts of record.

Of original jurisdiction, which have jurisdiction of causes in the first instance. See JURISDICTION.

Of record. See COURT OF RECORD.

Superior, which are those of immediate jurisdiction between the inferior and supreme courts; also, those of controlling as distinguished from those of subordinate jurisdiction. 4 Bosw. 547. In Pennsylvania a court created in 1895, having jurisdiction of appeals from the lower courts in certain cases of lesser magnitude. In some states, as Delaware, the nisi prius court of first instance for civil cases in the county or other primary judicial district.

Supreme, which possess the highest and controlling jurisdiction; also, in some states, a court of higher jurisdiction than the superior courts, though not the court of final resort.

See COURT OF RECORD; also various titles following.

COURT OF ADMIRALTY. See ADMIRALTY; UNITED STATES COURTS.

COURT OF ANCIENT DEMESNE In English Law. A court of peculiar constitution, held by a bailiff appointed by the king, in which alone the tenants of the king's demesne could be impleaded. 2 Burr. 1046; 1 Spence, Eq. Jur. 100; 2 Bla.

Com. 99; 1 Report Eng. Real Prop. Comm. 28, 29; 1 Steph. Com. 224; 1 Poll. & Maitl. 367; 3 & 4 Will. IV. c. 74, §§ 4, 5, 6.

COURT OF APPEAL, HER MAJESTY'S. In England, one of the two sections of the supreme court of judicature, established by the Judicature Acts of 1873 and 1875 (q. v.).

COURT OF APPEALS. In American Law. An appellate tribunal which, in Kentucky, Maryland, and New York, is the court of last resort. In Delaware and New Jersey, it is known as the court of errors and appeals; in Virginia and West Virginia, the supreme court of appeals; in Texas there is a court of civil appeals, and in Illinois, Indiana, Missouri, Pennsylvania, and the United States there are appellate courts sitting in judicial districts, all of which are inferior to the supreme court.

COURT OF APPRAISERS OF THE UNITED STATES. Nine general appraisers are appointed by the president of the United States with the advice and consent of the senate, who are employed at such ports as the secretary of the treasury shall from time to time direct, who supervise such appraisements and classification for duties as may be deemed needful to secure uniform appraisements at the several ports; U. S. Rev. Stat. 1 Supp. § 12. At ports where there is no appraiser, the dutiable value of imported merchandise is determined by the customs officer to whom is committed the estimation and collection of duties. A board of three general appraisers is stationed at New York, to the decision of which the collector or importer may appeal, if dissatisfied with the decision of the general appraiser, provided, that the owner, importer, consignee, or agent shall give notice to the collector in writing within two days after the decision of the general appraiser; § 12. A further right of appeal is granted from the decision of the collector as to the amount of duties to be collected upon imported merchandise, by giving notice to the collector in writing after payment of charges, setting forth distinctly and specifically the reasons for the objection thereto, which notice, payment, and invoice, and all papers and exhibits connected therewith, the collector transmits to the board of appraisers at New York or to a board of any three general appraisers who may be appointed by the secretary of the treasury. Should the owner, importer, consignee, or agent be dissatisfied with the decision of this board of appraisers, they may, within thirty days after such decision, apply to the circuit court of the United States, within the district in which the matter arises, for a review of the questions of law and of fact involved in the decision. And there is a further right of appeal to the supreme court of the United States whenever the attorney-general shall apply for it within thirty days. See Act June 10, 1890, U. S. Rev. Stat. 1 Supp. p. 744.

COURT OF ARBITRATION OF THE CHAMBER OF COMMERCE OF NEW YORK. Organized in 1874, for the settlement of controversies of a mercantile nature in the city of New York. Where all the parties are regular members of the chamber of commerce, either may summon the opposite party before this court. Other parties may voluntarily submit to its decision such questions arising in the port of New York. An official arbitrator presides, but others may be named by the parties to sit with him, and counsel may be employed. The decision of this court is final, and is in the form of an award by the arbitrator. N. Y. Laws, 1874, c. 278, and 1875, c. 495.

COURT OF ARCHDEACON. The most inferior of the English ecclesiastical courts, from which an appeal generally lies to that of the bishop. 3 Bla. Com. 64; 3 Steph. Com. 305.

COURT OF ARCHES (L. Lat. curia de arcubus). In English Ecclesiastical Law. A court of appeal, and of original jurisdiction.

The most ancient consistory court belonging to the archbishop of Canterbury for the trial of spiritual causes, the judge of which is called the dean of the arches, because he anciently held his court in the church of St. Mary le Bow (Sancta Maria de arcubus,—literally, "St. Mary of arches"), so named from the style of its steeple, which is raised upon pillars built archwise, like so many bent bows. Termes de la Ley. It is now held, as are also the other spiritual courts, in the hall belonging to the College of Civilians, commonly called Doctor's Commons.

Its proper jurisdiction is only over the thirteen peculiar parishes belonging to the archbishop in London; but, the office of dean of the arches having been for a long time united with that of the archbishop's principal official, the judge of the arches, in right of such added office, receives and determines appeals from the sentences of all inferior ecclesiastical courts within the province. 3 Bla. Com. 64; 3 Steph. Com. 306; Whart. Law Dict. Arches Court. Many suits are also brought before him as original judge, the cognizance of which properly belongs to inferior jurisdictions within the province, but in respect of which the inferior judge has waived his jurisdiction under a certain form of proceeding known in the common law by the denomination of letters of request. 3 Steph. Com. 306; 2 Chitty, Gen. Pr. 496; 2 Add. Eccl. 406.

From the court of arches an appeal formerly lay to the pope, and afterwards, by statute 25 Hen. VIII. c. 19, to the king in chancery (that is, to a court of delegates appointed under the king's great seal), as supreme head of the English church, but now, by 2 & 3 Will. IV. c. 92, and 3 & 4 Will. IV. c. 41, to the judicial committee of the privy council; 3 Bla. Com. 65; 3 Steph. Com. 306.

A suit is commenced in the ecclesiastical court by citing the defendant to appear, and exhibiting a libel containing the complaint against him, to which he answers. Proofs are then adduced, and the judge pronounces a decree upon hearing the arguments of advocates, which is then carried into effect.

Consult Burn, Humphrey, Phill., Smith, Eccl. Law; Brett, Com. book xii.; Reeve, Eng. Law; 3 Bla. Com. 65; 3 Steph. Com. 306.

COURTS OF ASSIZE AND NISI PRIUS. In English Law. Courts composed of two or more commissioners, called judges of assize (or of assize and nisi prius), who are twice in every year sent by the queen's special commission on circuits all round the kingdom, to try, by a jury of the respective counties, the truth of such matters of fact as are then under dispute in the courts of Westminster Hall; there being, however, as to London and Middlesex, this exception, that, instead of their being comprised within any circuit, courts of nisi prius are held there for the same purpose, in and after every term, at what are called the London and Westminster sittings.

These judges of assize came into use in the room of the ancient justices in eyre (justiciarii in itinere), who were regularly established, if not first appointed, by the Parliament of Northampton, A. D. 1176 (22 Hen. II.), (the first of these of whom we have any record, were appointed in 1170), with a delegated power from the king's great court or aula regis, being looked upon as members thereof; though the present justices of assize and nisi prius are more immediately derived from the stat. Westm. 2, 13 Edw. I. c. 30, and consist principally of the judges of the superior courts of common law, being assigned by that statute out of the king's sworn justices, associating to themselves one or two discreet knights of each county. By stat. 27 Edw. I. c. 4 (explained by 12 Edw. II. c. 3), assizes and inquests are allowed to be taken before any one justice of the court in which the plea is brought, associating with him one knight or other approved man of the county: by stat. 14 Edw. III. c. 16, inquests of nisi prius may be taken before any justice of either bench (though the plea be not depending in his own court), or before the chief baron of the exchequer, if he be a man of the law, or, otherwise, before the justices of assize, so that one of such justices be a judge of the king's bench or common pleas, or the king's sergeant sworn; and, finally, by 2 & 3 Vict. c. 22, all justices of assize may, on their respective circuits, try causes pending in the court of exchequer, without issuing (as it had till then been considered necessary to do) a separate commission from the exchequer for that purpose. 3 Steph. Com. 353; 3 Bla. Com. 57, 58.

There are eight circuits (formerly seven), viz.: the Home, Midland, Norfolk, Oxford, Northern, Western, North Wales, and South Wales. A general commission was issued twice a year to the judges mentioned (of the superior courts of common law at Westminster), two of whom were assigned to every circuit. The judges had four several commissions, viz.: of the peace; of oyer and terminer; of gaol delivery; and of nisi prius. There were formerly five, including the commission of assize; but the abolition of assizes and other real actions has thrown that commission out of force. The commission of nisi prius was directed to the judges, the clerks of assize, and others; and by it civil causes in which issue had been joined in any one of the superior courts were tried in circuit by a jury of twelve men of the county in which the venire was laid, and on return of the verdict to the court above—usually on the first day of the term following—the court gave judgment on the fifth day after, allowing the four intermediate days to either party, if dissatisfied with the verdict, to move for a new trial. 3 Steph. Com. 514, 515; 3 Bla. Com. 58, 59. Where courts of this kind exist in the United States, they are instituted by statutory provision. 4 W. & S. 404. See OYER and TERMINER; GAOL DELIVERY; COURTS OF OYER AND TERMINER AND GENERAL GAOL DELIVERY; NISI PRIUS; COMMISSION OF THE PEACE.

COURT OF ATTACHMENTS.

The lowest of the three courts held in the forests. It has fallen into total disuse.

The highest court was called Justice in Eyre's Seat, or familiarly Justice Seat; the middle, the Swanimote; and the lowest, the Attachment. Wharton, Law Dict. Attachment of the Forest.

The Court of Attachments was to be held before the verderers of the forest once in every forty days, to inquire of all offenders against vert and venison, by receiving from the foresters or keepers their attachments or presentments de viridi et venatione, enrolling them, and certifying them under their seals to the court of justice-seat, or Swanimote; for this court could only inquire of offenders; it could not convict them; 3 Bla. Com. 171; FOREST LAWS.

COURT OF AUGMENTATION.

A court established by 27 Hen. VIII. c. 27, for managing the revenues and possessions of all monasteries whose income was under two hundred pounds a year (which by an act of parliament of the same session had been given to the king), and for determining suits relating thereto.

It was called "The Court of the Augmentations of the Revenues of the King's Crown" (from the augmentation of the revenues of the crown derived from the suppression of the monasteries), and was a court of record, with one great seal and one privy seal,—the officers being a chancellor, who had the great seal, a treasurer, a king's attorney and solicitor, ten auditors, seventeen receivers, with clerk, usher, etc.

All dissolved monasteries under the above value, with some exceptions, were in survey of the court, the chancellor of which was directed to make a yearly report of their revenues to the king. The court was dissolved in the reign of queen Mary, but the Office of Augmentation remained long after; and the records of the court are now at the Public Record Office, in the keeping of the master of the rolls, stat. 1 & 2 Vict. c. 94, and may be searched on payment of a fee. Eng. Cyclopædia; Cowel.

COURT, BAIL. See BAIL COURT.

COURT OF BANKRUPTCY.

A court of record, in England, with jurisdiction in bankruptcy, primary and appellate, and which is declared a court of law and equity for that purpose. The nature of its constitution may be learned from the early sections of the Bankrupt Law Consolidation Act, 1849. The judgments of this court may be examined, on appeal, by a vice-chancellor, and successively by the lord-chancellor and the house of lords, if he deem the question of sufficient difficulty or importance; 3 Bla. Com. 423. There is a court of bankruptcy in London, established by 1 & 2 Will. IV. c. 56, and 5 & 6 Will. IV. c. 29, s. 21; and courts of bankruptcy for different districts are established by 5 & 6 Vict. c. 122, which are branches of the London court. 2 Steph. Com. 199, 200; 3 id. 426. The Bankruptcy Act of 1869 constitutes two distinct jurisdictions: the London district, and the country district, comprising the rest of England. The former has all the powers of the superior courts of common law and equity, and the judge may reverse, vary, or affirm any order of a local bankruptcy court; Brown; Robson, Bkey.

By the judicature acts, 1873 and 1875 (q. v.) the court of bankruptcy was consolidated into the supreme court of judicature. It has a court with officers and offices of its own.

COURT BARON. A domestic court, incident to every manor, to be held by the steward within the manor, for redressing misdemeanors and nuisances therein, and for settling disputes among the tenants relating to property. It is not a court of record. 1 Poll. & M. 580.

Customary court baron is one appertaining entirely to copyholders. See CUSTOMARY COURT BARON.

Freeholders' court baron is one held before the freeholders who owe suit and service to the manor. It is the court-baron proper.

These courts have now fallen into great disuse in England; and their jurisdiction is practically abolished by the County Courts Act, 30 and 31 Vict. c. 142, s. 28; 3 Steph. Com. 279-281. In the state of New York such courts were held while the state was a province. See charters in Bolton's Hist. of New Chester. The court has derived its name from the fact that it was the court of the baron or lord of the manor. 3 Bla. Com. 33, n.; see Fleta, lib. 2, c. 53; though it is explained by some as being the court of the freeholders, who were in some instances called barons. Co. Litt. 58 a.

COURT OF CHANCERY, or CHANCERY. A court formerly existing in England and still existing in several of the United States, which possesses an extensive equity jurisdiction.

The name is said by some to be derived from that of the chief judge, who is called a chancellor; others derive both names directly from the cancelli (bars) which in this court anciently separated the press of people from the officers. See 3 Bla. Com. 46, n.; Story, Eq. Jur. 40; CANCELLARIUS.

In American Law. A court of general equity jurisdiction.

The terms equity and chancery, court of equity and court of chancery, are constantly used as synonymous in the United States. It is presumed that this custom arises from the circumstance that the equity jurisdiction which is exercised by the courts of the various states is assimilated to that possessed by the English courts of chancery. Indeed, in some of the states it is made identical therewith by statute, so far as conformable to our institutions.

Separate courts of chancery or equity exist in a few of the states; in others, the courts of law sit also as courts of equity; in others, equitable relief is administered under the forms of the common law; and in others, the distinction between law and equity has been formally abolished or never existed. The federal courts exercise an equity jurisdiction as understood in the English courts at the time of the revolution; Miller, Const. U. S. 318; independent of local state law; id.; 2 Sumn. 401; and the remedies are not according to state practice but as distinguished and defined in that country from which we derive our knowledge of those principles; 3 Wheat. 211. whether the state courts in the district are courts of equity or not; 2 McLean 568; 15 Pet. 9; 11 How. 669.

In English Law. Formerly the highest court of judicature next to parliament. Prior to the judicature acts it was the superior court of chancery, called distinctively "The High Court of Chancery," and consisted of six separate tribunals, viz.: the court of the lord high chancellor of Great Britain; the court of the master of the rolls, or keeper of the records in chancery; the court of appeal in chancery; the three separate courts of the vice-chancellors.

The jurisdiction of this court was fourfold.

The common-law or ordinary jurisdiction. By virtue of this the lord-chancellor was a privy councillor and prolocutor of the house of lords. The writs for a new parliament issued from this department. The Petty Bag Office was in this jurisdiction. It was a common-law court of record, in which pleas of scire facias to repeal letters-patent were exhibited, and many other matters were determined, and whence all original writs issued. See 11 & 12 Vict. c. 94; 12 & 13 Vict. c. 109.

The statutory jurisdiction included the power which the lord-chancellor exercised under the habeas corpus act, and by which he inquired into charitable uses, but did not include the equitable jurisdiction.

The specially delegated jurisdiction included the exclusive authority which the lord-chancellor and lords justices of appeal had over the persons and property of idiots and lunatics.

The equity or extraordinary jurisdiction was either assistant or auxiliary to the common law, including discovery for the promotion of substantial justice at the common law, preservation of testimony of persons not litigants relating to suits or questions at law, removal of improper impediments and prevention of unconscionable defences at common law, giving effect to and relieving from the consequences of common-law judgments; concurrent with the common law, including the remedial correction of fraud, the prevention of fraud by injunction, accident, mistake, account, dower, interpleader, the delivery up of documents and specific chattels, the specific performance of agreements; or exclusive, relating to trusts, infancy, the equitable rights of wives, legal and equitable mortgages, the assignment of choses in action, partition, the appointment of receivers, charities, or public trusts. Whart. Law Dict.

By the Judicature Acts (q. v.) this court was merged in the supreme court of judicature, and all its jurisdiction vested therein.

The inferior courts of chancery are the equity courts of the Palatine Counties, the courts of the Two Universities, the lord-mayor's courts in the city of London, and the court of chancery in the Isle of Man. See 18 & 19 Vict. c. 48, and the titles of these various courts. Consult Story, Eq. Jur.; Dan. Ch. Pr.; Spence, Eq. Jur.; COURTS OF EQUITY; EQUITY.

COURT OF THE CHIEF JUSTICE IN EYRE. The highest of the courts of the Forest, held every three years, by the chief justices, to inquire of purprestures or encroachments, assorts, or cultivation of forest land, claims to franchises, parks, warrens, and vineyards in the forest, as well as claims of the hundred, claims to the goods of felons found in the forest, and any other civil questions that might arise within the forest limits. But it had no criminal jurisdiction, except of offences against the forest laws. In the exercise of this, he passed sentences upon offenders convicted by the verderers in Swanimote (q. v.) and performed all the duties of a justice in eyre (q. v.). Forty days' notice was given of the holding of this court. It was called also the court of justice seat (q. v.). Inderwick, The King's Peace 152.

COURT OF CHIVALRY. In English Law. An ancient military court, possessing both civil and criminal jurisdiction touching matters of arms and deeds of war.

As a court of civil jurisdiction, it was held by the lord high constable of England while that office was filled, and the earl-marshal, jointly, and subsequently to the attainder of Stafford, duke of Buckingham, in the time of Henry VIII., by the earl-marshal alone. It had cognizance, by statute 13 Ric. II. c. 2, "of contracts and other matters touching deeds of arms and war, as well out of the realm as within it." This jurisdiction was of importance while the English kings held territories in France.

As a court of criminal jurisdiction, it could be held only by the lord high constable and earl-marshal jointly. It had jurisdiction over "pleas of life and member arising in matters of arms and deeds of war, as well out of the realm as within it."

It was not a court of record, could neither fine nor imprison, 7 Mod. 137, and has fallen entirely into disuse; 3 Bla. Com. 68; 4 id. 268.

COURTS CHRISTIAN. Ecclesiastical courts, which see.

COURTS OF THE CINQUE PORTS. In English Law. Courts of limited local jurisdiction, formerly held before the mayor and jurats (aldermen) of the Cinque Ports; from which a writ of error lay to the lord-warden in his court of Shepway, and from this court to the king's bench. By the 18 & 19 Vict. c. 48, and 20 & 21 Vict. c. 1, the jurisdiction and authority of the lord-warden of the Cinque Ports and constable of Dover Castle, in or in relation to the administration of justice in actions, suits, or other civil proceedings, at law or in equity, are abolished; but a jurisdiction in cases of salvage is still retained; 57 and 58 Vict. c. 60; 2 Steph. Com. 499, n.; 3 Bla. Com. 79; 3 Steph. Com. 347, n.; and an appeal lies in admiralty causes from the county courts to the court of admiralty of the Cinque Ports, by 31 & 32 Vict. c. 71. See CINQUE PORTS.

COURT OF CLAIMS. See UNITED STATES COURTS.

COURT OF THE CLERK OF THE MARKET. In English Law. A tribunal incident to the market held in the suburbs of the king's court. The clericus mercati hospitii regis was the incumbent of an honorable office pertinent to the ancient custom of holding such markets. The clerk in early times witnessed verbal contracts; later he adjudicated on prices of corn, bread, and wine and other commodities as fixed by the justices of the peace; inquired as to the correctness of weights and measures in every city, town, or borough, subject to appeal to the lord high steward, who could fine him for extortion and send him to the tower for a third offence. The clerk also measured land in case of dispute, and he had power to send bakers, brewers, and others to the pillory for unlawful dealings. See Inderwick, The King's Peace 104.

The jurisdiction over weights and measures formerly exercised by the clerk of the market was taken from him by stat. 5 & 6 Will. IV. c. 63; 9 M. & W. 747; 4 Steph. Com. 323.

COURT OF COMMISSIONERS OF SEWERS. See COMMISSIONERS OF SEWERS.

COURT OF COMMON PLEAS. In American Law. A court of original and general jurisdiction for the trial of issues of fact and law according to the principles of the common law.

Courts of this name exist in some of the states of the United States, and frequently have a criminal as well as civil jurisdiction. They are, in general, courts of record, being expressly made so by statute in Pennsylvania, April 14, 1834, § 18. In Pennsylvania they exercise an equity jurisdiction also, as well as that at common law. Courts of substantially similar powers to those indicated in the definition exist in all the states, under various names.

In English Law. Formerly one of the three superior courts of common law at Westminster.

This court, which is sometimes called, also, Bancus Communis, Bancus, and Common Bench, was a branch of the curia regis, and was at its institution ambulatory, following the household of the king. In the eleventh clause of Magna Charta, it is provided that it shall be held at some fixed place, which is Westminster. The establishment of this court at Westminster, and the consequent construction of the Ins of Court and gathering together of the common-law lawyers, enabled the law itself to withstand the attacks of the canonists and civilians. It derived its name from the fact that the causes of common people were heard there. It had exclusive jurisdiction of real actions as long as those actions were in use, and had also an extensive and, for a long time, exclusive jurisdiction of all actions between subjects. This latter jurisdiction, however, was gradually encroached upon by the king's bench and exchequer, with which it afterwards had a concurrent jurisdiction in many matters. Formerly none but sergeants at law were admitted to practise before this court in banc; 6 Bingham, n. c. 235; but, by statutes 6 & 7 Vict. c. 18, § 61, 9 & 10 Vict. c. 54, all barristers at law have the right of "practice, pleading, and audience."

It consisted of one chief and four puisne or associate justices.

It had a civil, common-law jurisdiction, concurrent with the king's bench and exchequer, of personal actions and actions of ejectment, and a peculiar or exclusive jurisdiction of real actions, actions under the Railway and Canal Traffic Act, 17 & 18 Vict. c. 31, the registration of judgments, annuities, etc., 1 & 2 Vict. c. 110; 2 & 3 Vict. c. 11; 3 & 4 Vict. c. 82; 18 Vict. c. 15; respecting fees for conveyances under 3 & 4 Will. IV. c. 74; the examination of married women concerning their conveyances, 11 & 12 Vict. c. 70; 17 & 18 Vict. c. 75; 19 & 20 Vict. c. 108, § 73; and of appeals from the revising barristers' court, 6 & 7 Vict. c. 18. Whart. Law Dict.

Appeals formerly lay from this court to the king's bench; and by statutes 11 Geo. IV. and 1 Will. IV. c. 70, appeals for errors in law were afterwards taken to the judges of the king's bench and barons of exchequer in the exchequer chambers, from whose judgment an appeal lay only to the house of lords. 3 Bla. Com. 40.

The Judicature Act transferred the jurisdiction of this court to the Common Pleas division of the High Court of Justice; 3 Steph. Com. 333; and it was to be exercised by five of the judges of that division at least, whereof the Lord Chief Justice of England, or the Lord Chief Justice of the Common Pleas, or the Lord Chief Baron of the Exchequer, should be one; ibid. But by order in council, made in 1880 under § 32 of that act, the Common Pleas division was merged in the Queen's Bench division. See JUDICATURE ACTS.

COURTS OF CONSCIENCE. See COURTS OF REQUESTS.

COURT FOR CONSIDERATION OF CROWN CASES RESERVED.

A court established by stat. 11 & 12 Vict. c. 78, composed of such of the judges of the superior courts of Westminster as were able to attend, for the consideration of questions of law reserved by any judge in a court of oyer and terminer, gaol delivery, or quarter sessions, before which a prisoner had been found guilty by verdict; such question being stated in the form of a special case. Moz. & W. Dict.; 4 Steph. Com. 442.

COURT, CONSISTORY. See CONSISTORY COURT.

COURT OF CONVOCATION. In English Ecclesiastical Law. A convocation or ecclesiastical synod, which is in the nature of an ecclesiastical parliament.

There is one for each province. They are composed respectively of the archbishop, all the bishops, deans, and archdeacons of their province, with one proctor, or representative, from each chapter, and, in the province of Canterbury, two proctors for the beneficed parochial clergy in each diocese, while in the province of York there are two proctors for each archdeaconry. In York the convocation consists of only one house; but in Canterbury there are two houses, of which the archbishop and bishops form the upper house, and the lower consists of the remaining members of the convocation. In this house a prolocutor, performing the duty of president, is elected. These assemblies meet at the time appointed in the queen's writ. The convocation has long been summoned pro forma only, but is still, in fact, summoned before the meeting of every new parliament, and adjourns immediately afterwards, without proceeding to the dispatch of any business.

The purpose of the convocation is stated to be the enactment of canon law, subject to the license and authority of the sovereign, and consulting on ecclesiastical matters.

In their judicial capacity, their jurisdiction extends to matters of heresy, schisms, and other mere spiritual or ecclesiastical causes,—an appeal lying from their judicial proceedings to the queen in council, by stat. 2 & 3 Will. IV. c. 92.

COURT OF THE CORONER. In English Law. A court of record, to inquire, when any one dies in prison, or comes to a violent or sudden death, by what manner he came to his end. 4 Steph. Com. 323; 4 Bla. Com. 274; now generally known as an inquest. In England, it is regulated by stat. 50 & 51 Vict. (1887) c. 71. See CORONER.

COURT FOR THE CORRECTION OF ERRORS. See SOUTH CAROLINA.

COURTS OF THE COUNTIES PALATINE. In English Law. A species of private court which appertains to the counties palatine of Lancaster and Durham.

They are local courts, which formerly had exclusive jurisdiction in law and equity of all cases arising within the limits of the respective counties. The judges who held these courts sat by special commission from the owners of the several franchises and under their seal, and all process was taken in the name of the owner of the franchise, though subsequently to the 27 Hen. VIII. c. 24 it ran in the king's name. See COUNTY PALATINE.

The Judicature Act of 1873 transfers the jurisdiction of the court of common pleas of Lancaster and the court of pleas of Durham to the High Court of Justice. See JUDICATURE ACTS. But the chancery court at Lancaster is expressly retained by § 95 of the act. 1 Steph. Com. 133; 3 id. 634. The jurisdiction of the Durham chancery court is now regulated by stat. 52 & 53 Vict. (1889) c. 47; and that of the Lancaster chancery court by stat. 13 & 14 Vict. (1850) c. 43, 17 & 18 Vict. (1854) c. 82, and 52 & 53 Vict. (1890) c. 23.

COURT OF DELEGATES. In English Law. A court of appeal in ecclesiastical and admiralty suits, formerly the great court of appeal in ecclesiastical causes, now abolished by 2 & 3 Will. IV. c. 92, and its functions transferred to the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council. Cowel; 3 Bla. Com. 66, 67; 3 Steph. Com. 307, 308.

COURT FOR DIVORCE AND MATRIMONIAL CAUSES. In English Law. A court which had the jurisdiction formerly exercised by the ecclesiastical courts in respect of divorces a mensa et thoro, suits of nullity of marriage, suits of jactitation of marriage, suits for restitution of conjugal rights, and all suits, causes, and matters matrimonial.

It consisted of the lord chancellor and the justices of the queen's bench, the common pleas, the exchequer, and the judge of the court of probate, who was entitled judge ordinary.

The judge ordinary exercised all the powers of the court, except petitions for dissolving or annulling marriages and applications for new trials of matters of fact, bills of exception, special verdict and special cases, for hearing which excepted cases he must be joined by two of the other judges. Provision was made for his absence by authorizing the lord chancellor to appoint one of certain judicial persons to act in such absence. Juries were summoned to try matters of fact, and such trials were conducted in the same manner as jury trials at common law. See stat. 20 & 21 Vict. c. 85; 21 & 22 Vict. c. 108; 22 & 23 Vict. c. 61. It is now merged in the High Court of Justice by the Judicature Act, q. v.

COURT OF THE DUCHY OF LANCASTER. In English Law. A court of special jurisdiction, which has jurisdiction of all matters of equity relating to lands holden of the king in right of the duchy of Lancaster.

It is held by the chancellor or his deputy, is a court of equity jurisdiction and not of record. It is to be distinguished from the court of the county palatine of Lancaster. 3 Bla. Com. 78. See COURTS OF THE COUNTIES PALATINE.

COURT OF EQUITY. A court which administers justice according to the principles of equity.

As to the constitution and jurisdiction of such courts, see COURT OF CHANCERY.

Such courts are not, strictly speaking, courts of record except when made so by statute; Yelv. 226; 9 S. & R. 252. Their decrees touch the person only; 3 Cai. 36; but are conclusive between the parties; 8 Conn. 268; 1 Stock. 302; 6 Wheat. 109. See 2 Bibb 149. And as to the personalty, their decrees are equal to a judgment; 2

Madd. 355; 2 Salk. 507; 1 Vern. 214; 3 Cai. 35; and have preference according to priority; 3 P. Wms. 401, n.; Cas. temp. Talb. 217; 4 Bro. P. C. 287; 4 Johns. Ch. 638. See Chase, Bla. Com. 843, n. 3. They are admissible in evidence between the parties; 2 Leigh 474; 13 Miss. 783; 1 Fla. 409; 10 Humphr. 610; and see 3 Litt. 248; 8 B. Monr. 493; 5 Ala. 254; 2 Gill 21; 12 Mo. 112; 2 Ohio 551; 9 Rich. 454; when properly authenticated; 2 A. K. Marsh. 290; and come within the provisions of the constitution for authentication of judicial records of the various states for use as evidence in other states; Pet. C. C. 352.

An action may be brought at law on a decree of a foreign court of chancery for an ascertained sum; 1 Campb. 253; Hempst. 197; but not for an unascertained sum; 3 Cai. 37, n.; but nil debet or nul tiel record is not to be pleaded to such an action; 9 S. & R. 252. See EQUITY.

COURT OF ERROR. An expression applied especially to the court of exchequer chamber and the house of lords, as taking cognizance of error brought. Moz. & W. Dict. 3 Steph. Com. 333. It is applied in some of the United States to the court of last resort in the state.

COURT OF EXCHEQUER. In English Law. A superior court of record, administering justice in questions of law and revenue.

It was the lowest in rank of three superior common-law courts of record, and had jurisdiction originally only of cases of injury to the revenue by withholding or non-payment. The privilege of suing and being sued in this court in personal actions was extended to the king's accountants, and then, by a fiction that the plaintiff was a debtor of the king, to all personal actions. It had formerly an equity jurisdiction and there was then an equity court; but, by statute 5 Vict. c. 5, this jurisdiction was transferred to the court of chancery.

It consisted of one chief and four puisne judges or barons,

As a court of revenue, its proceedings were regulated by 22 & 23 Vict. c. 1, § 9.

As a court of common law, it administered redress between subject and subject in all actions whatever, except real actions.

The appellate jurisdiction from this court was to the judge of the king's bench and common pleas sitting as the court of exchequer chamber, and from this latter court to the house of lords; 3 Steph. Com. 338-340; 3 Bla. Com. 44-46. The jurisdiction of this court is transferred by the Judicature Act of 1873 to the exchequer division of the high court of justice. See JUDICATURE ACTS.

In Scotch Law. A court which formerly had jurisdiction of matters of revenue, and a limited jurisdiction over cases between the crown and its vassals where no questions of title were involved.

This court was established by the statute 6 Anne, c. 26, and its processes resembled those in the English court of exchequer. It is now merged in the court of sessions; but the name is still applied to this branch of the latter court, which is held by two of the judges acting in rotation. Pat. Com. 1055, n. The proceedings are regulated by stat. 19 & 20 Vict. c. 36.

COURT OF EXCHEQUER CHAMBER. In English Law. A court for the correction and prevention of errors of law in the three superior common-law courts of the kingdom.

A court of exchequer chamber was first erected by statute 31 Edw. III. c. 12, to determine causes upon writs of error from the common-law side of the exchequer court. It consisted of the lord chancellor, lord treasurer, and the justices of the king's bench and common pleas. A second court of exchequer chamber was instituted by statute 27 Eliz. c. 8, consisting of the justices of the common pleas and the exchequer, which had jurisdiction in error of cases commenced in the king's bench. By statutes 11 Geo. IV. and 1 Will. IV. c. 70, these courts were abolished and the court of exchequer chamber substituted in their place. It is now merged in the Court of Appeals, under the Judicature Acts, q. v.

As a court of debate, it was composed of the judges of the three superior courts of law, to whom is sometimes added the lord chancellor. To this court questions of unusual difficulty or moment were referred before judgment from either of the three courts.

As a court of appeals, it consisted of the judges of two of the three superior courts of law (common bench, king's bench, and exchequer) sitting to decide writs of error from the other two courts. 3 Bla. Com. 56, 57; 3 Steph. Com. 333, 356.

From the decisions of this court a writ of error lay to the House of Lords; but no such appeal lies from the court of appeal under the new act.

COURT OF FACULTIES. In Ecclesiastical Law. A tribunal in England, belonging to the archbishop.

It does not hold pleas in any suits, but creates rights to pews, monuments, and other mortuary matters. It has also various other powers under 25 Hen. VIII. c. 21, in granting licenses, faculties, dispensations, etc., of different descriptions; as, a license to marry, a faculty to erect an organ in a parish church, to level a churchyard, to remove bodies previously buried; and it may also grant dispensations to eat flesh on days prohibited, or to ordain a deacon under age, and the like. The archbishop's office in this tribunal is called magister ad facultates; Co. 4th Inst. 337; 2 Chit. Gen. Pr. 507.

COURTS OF THE FOREST. Courts held for the enforcement of the forest laws. The lowest of these was the Woodmote, or Court of Attachments (q. v.), held every forty days by the Verderers, to receive presentments and bind over the accused. The next was the Swanimote (q. v.), held thrice a year, to inquire of presentments and charges, and convict offenders, but without power to punish them. It was composed of the Verderers and presided over by the Steward of the Forest. The highest was the Court of the Chief Justice (q. v.), held once in three years, to decide all claims to franchises, etc., in the forest as well as of purprestures and the like, and to pass sentence on those convicted by the Verderers in Swanimote. There was also a Court of Survey of Dogs (v. Court of Regard), held by the Regarders of the Forest every three years for the lawing of dogs. Inderwick, The King's Peace, c. 4. See FOREST LAWS.

COURT OF GENERAL QUARTER SESSIONS OF THE PEACE. In American Law. A court of criminal jurisdiction, so-called in many states.

In English Law. A court of criminal jurisdiction, in England, held in each county once in every quarter of a year, but in the county of Middlesex twice a month. 4 Steph. Com. 317-320.

It is held before two or more justices of the peace, one of whom was a justice of the quorum.

The stated times of holding sessions are fixed by stat. 11 Geo. IV. and 1 Will. IV. c. 70, § 35. When held at other times than quarterly, the sessions are called "general sessions of the peace."

As to the jurisdiction of the various sessions, see 5 & 6 Vict. c. 38; 7 & 8 Vict. c. 71; 9 & 10 Vict. c. 25; 4 Bla. Com. 271.

COURT OF GREAT SESSIONS IN WALES. A court formerly held in Wales; abolished by 11 Geo. IV. and 1 Will. IV. c. 70, and the Welsh judicature incorporated with that of England. 3 Bla. Com. 77; 3 Steph. Com. 317, n.

COURT OF HIGH COMMISSION. See HIGH COMMISSION COURT.

COURT-HOUSE. The building occupied for the purposes of a court of record. The term may be used of a place temporarily occupied for the sessions of a court, though not the regular court-house; as, a church used when the court-house was occupied by troops; 55 Mo. 181; and see 59 Mo. 52; and where the court-house was burned down, sales required by law to be at its door must be held at the ruins of the door; 71 Ill. 350.

COURT, HUNDRED. See HUNDRED COURT.

COURT OF HUSTINGS. In English Law. The county court in the city of London.

It is held nominally before the lord mayor, recorder, and aldermen; but the recorder is practically the sole judge. It has an appellate jurisdiction of causes in the sheriff's court of London. A writ of error lies from the decisions of this court to certain commissioners (usually five of the judges of the superior courts of law), from whose judgment a writ of error lies to the house of lords. No merely personal actions can be brought in this court. See 3 Bla. Com. 80, n.; 3 Steph. Com. 293, n.; Madox, Hist. Exch. c. 20; Co. 2d Inst. 327; Calth. 131. Since the abolition of all real and mixed actions except ejectment, the jurisdiction of this court has fallen into comparative desuetude. Pulling on Cust. Lond.; Moz. & W. Dict.

In American Law. A local court in some parts of the state of Virginia. 6 Gratt. 696.

COURT FOR THE TRIAL OF IMPEACHMENTS. A tribunal for determining the guilt or innocence of any person properly impeached. In England, the House of Lords, and in this country, generally, the more select branch of the legislative assembly, constitutes a court for the trial of impeachments. A peer could always be impeached for any crime, and although Blackstone lays it down that a commoner cannot be impeached for a capital offence, but only for a high misdemeanor, the opinion seems to have prevailed that he could be impeached for high treason; 4 Bla. Com. 260; 4 Steph. Com. 299; May, Parl. Prac. c. 23. See IMPEACHMENT.

COURT FOR THE RELIEF OF INSOLVENT DEBTORS IN ENGLAND. In English Law. A local court which had its sittings in London only, which received the petitions of insolvent debtors and decided upon the question of granting a discharge.

It was held by the commissioners of bankruptcy; and its decisions, if in favor of a discharge, were not reversible by any other tribunal. See 3 Steph. Com. 426; 4 id. 287, 288.

This court was abolished by the Bankruptcy Act of 1861, which was repealed in 1869, and all the former powers of the court were vested in the court of bankruptcy in London, which was merged in the high court of justice by the Judicature Act of 1873, § 16. 3 Steph. Com. 346; 32 & 33 Vict. c. 83.

COURT OF INQUIRY. In English Law. A court sometimes appointed by the crown to ascertain the propriety of resorting to ulterior proceedings against a party charged before a court-martial. See 2 Steph. Com. 590, note (z); 1 Coler. Bla. Com. 418, n.; 2 Brod. & B. 130. Also a court for hearing the complaints of private soldiers. Moz. & W. Dict.; Simmons, Cts. Mart. § 341.

In American Law. A court constituted by authority of the articles of war, invested with the power to examine into the nature of any transaction, accusation, or imputation against any officer or soldier. The said court shall consist of one or more officers, not exceeding three, and a judge-advocate, or other suitable person, as a recorder, to reduce the proceedings and evidence to writing; all of whom shall be sworn to the performance of their duty. It exists also in the navy; U. S. Rev. Stat. §§ 1342, 1624.

COURT OF JUSTICE SEAT. In English Law. The principal of the forest courts.

It was held before the chief justice in eyre, or his deputy, to hear and determine all trespasses within the forest, and all claims of franchises, liberties, privileges, and all pleas and causes whatsoever, therein arising. It might also try presentments in the inferior courts of the forests, and give judgment upon conviction of the Swanimote. After presentment made or indictment found, the chief justice might issue his warrant to the officers of the forest to apprehend the offenders. It might be held every third year; and forty days' notice was to be given of its sitting.

It was a court of record, and might fine and imprison for offences within the forest. A writ of error lay from it to the court of queen's bench to rectify and redress any maladministration of justice; or the chief justice in eyre might adjourn any matter of law into that court.

These justices in eyre were instituted by King Henry II., in 1184.

These courts were formerly very regularly held; but the last court of justice seat of any note was held in the reign of Charles I., before the earl of Holland. After the restoration another was held, pro forma only, before the earl of Oxford. But since the era of the revolution of 1688 the forest-laws have fallen into total disuse; 3 Steph. Com. 439-441; 3 Bla. Com. 71-73; Co. 4th Inst. 291. See FOREST LAWS.

COURT OF JUSTICIARY. In Scotch Law. A court of general criminal and limited civil jurisdiction.

It consists of the lord justice general, the lord justice clerk, and five other members of the court of sessions. The kingdom is divided into three circuits, in each of which two sessions, of not less than three days each, are to be held annually. A term may be held by any two of the justices, or by the lord justice general alone, or in Glasgow, by a simple justice; except in Edinburgh, where three justices constitute a quorum, and four generally sit in important cases.

Its criminal jurisdiction extends to all crimes committed in any part of the kingdom; and it has the power of reviewing the sentences of all inferior criminal courts, unless excluded by statute. Alison, Pr. 25.

Its civil jurisdiction on circuits is appellate and final in cases involving not more than twelve pounds sterling. See Paterson, Comp. § 940, n. et seq.; Bell, Dict.; Alison, Pr. 25; 20 Geo. II. c. 43; 23 Geo. III. c. 45; 30 Geo. III. c. 17; 1 Will. IV. c. 69, § 19; 11 & 12 Vict. c. 70, § 8. For amendments to the procedure of this court see 31 & 32 Vict. c. 95. See 35 Am. Law Reg. 619.

COURT OF KING'S BENCH. In English Law. The supreme court of common law in the kingdom, now merged in the High Court of Justice under the Judicature Act of 1873, § 16. See JUDICATURE ACTS.

It was one of the successors of the aula regis and received its name, it is said, because the king formerly sat in it in person, the style of the court being coram rege ipso (before the king himself). During the reign of a queen it was called the Queen's Bench, and during Cromwell's protectorate it was called the Upper Bench. Its jurisdiction was originally confined to the correction of crimes and misdemeanors which amounted to a breach of the peace, including those trespasses which were committed with force (vi et armis), and in the commission of which there was, therefore, a breach of the peace. By aid of a fiction of the law, the number of actions which might be alleged to be so committed was gradually increased, until the jurisdiction extended to all actions of the case, of debt upon statutes or where fraud was alleged, and, finally, included all personal actions whatever, and the action of ejectment. See ASSUMPSIT; ARREST; ATTACHMENT. It was, from its constitution, ambulatory and liable to follow the king's person, all process in this court being returnable "ubicunque fuerimus in Anglia" (wherever in England we the sovereign may be), but has for some centuries been held at Westminster.

It consisted of a lord chief justice and four puisne or associate justices, who were, by virtue of their office, conservators of the peace and supreme coroners of the land.

The civil jurisdiction of the court was either formal or plenary, including personal actions and mixed action of ejectment; summary, applying to annuities and mortgages, 15 & 16 Vict. cc. 55, 76, 219, 220, arbitrations and awards, cases under the Habeas Corpus Act, 31 Car. II. c. 2; 56 Geo. III. c. 100, cases under the Interpleader Act, 1 & 2 Will. IV. c. 58, officers of the court, warrants of attorney, cognovits, and judges' orders for judgment; auxiliary, including answering a special case, enforcing judgments of inferior courts of record, prerogative, mandamus to compel inferior courts or officers to act, 17 & 18 Vict. c. 125, §§ 75-77, prohibition, quo warranto, trying an issue in fact from a court of equity or a feigned issue; or appellate, including appeals from decisions of justices of the peace giving possession of deserted premises to landlords, 11 Geo. II. c. 19, §§ 16, 17, writs of false judgment from inferior courts not of record, but proceeding according to the course of the common law, appeals by way of a case from the summary jurisdiction of justices of the peace on questions of law, 20 & 21 Vict. c. 43; Order of Court of Nov. 25, 1857. See Whart. Law Dict.; Crabb, Hist.

Its criminal jurisdiction extended to all crimes and misdemeanors whatever of a public nature, it being considered the custos morum of the realm. Its jurisdiction was so universal that an act of parliament appointing that all crimes of a certain denomination should be tried before certain judges did not exclude the jurisdiction of this court, without negative words. It might also proceed on indictments removed into that court out of the inferior courts by certiorari.

COURT LANDS. See DEMESNE.

COURT LEET. In English Law. A court of record for a particular hundred, lordship, or manor, holden therein before the steward of the leet, for the punishment of petty offences and the preservation of the peace. Kitchin, Courts Leet.

These courts were established as substitutes for the sheriff's tourn in those districts which were not readily accessible to the sheriff on the tourn. The privilege of holding them was a franchise subsisting in the lord of the manor by prescription or charter, and might be lost by disuse. The court leet took cognizance of a wide variety of crimes, ranging from the very smallest misdemeanors to, but excluding, treason. For some of these offences of a lower order, punishment by fines, amercements, or other means might be inflicted. For the higher crimes, they either found indictments which were to be tried by the higher courts, or made presentment of the case to such higher tribunals. They also took view of frank-pledge. Among other duties for the keeping of the peace, the court assisted in the election of, or, in some cases, elected certain municipal officers in the borough to which the leet was appended.

This court has fallen almost totally into disuse. Its duties were mainly, however, those of the trial of the smaller offences or misdemeanors, and presentment of the graver offences. These presentments might be removed by certiorari to the king's bench and an issue there joined; 4 Bla. Com. 273; Greenw. County Courts 308 et seq.; Kitchin, Courts Leet; Powell, Courts Leet; 1 Reeve, Hist. Eng. Law 7. See Inderwick, The King's Peace 11; 1 Poll. & Maitl. 568; 4 Steph. Com., 11th ed. 306.

COURT OF THE LORD HIGH STEWARD. In English Law. A court instituted for the trial of peers or peeresses indicted for treason, felony, or misprision of either.

This court can be held only during a recess of parliament, since the trial of a peer for either of the above offences can take place, during a session of that body, only before the High Court of Parliament. It consists of a lord high steward (appointed in modern times pro hac vice merely) and as many of the temporal lords as may desire to take the proper oath and act. And all the peers qualified to sit and vote in parliament are to be summoned at least twenty days before the trial; Stat. 7 Will. III. c. 3.

The lord high steward, in this court, decides upon matters of law, and the lords triers decide upon the questions of fact.

The course of proceedings is to obtain jurisdiction of the cause by a writ of certiorari removing the indictment from the queen's bench or court of oyer and terminer where it was found, and then to go forward with the trial before the court composed as above stated. The guilt or innocence of the peer is determined by a vote of the court, and a majority suffices to convict; but the number voting for conviction must not be less than twelve. The manner of proceeding is much the same as in trials by jury; but no special verdict can be rendered.

A peer indicted for either of the above offences may plead a pardon on the queen's bench, but can make no other plea there. If indicted for any less offence, he must be tried by a jury before the ordinary courts of justice; 4 Bla. Com. 261-265. See HIGH COURT OF PARLIAMENT.

COURT OF THE LORD HIGH STEWARD OF THE UNIVERSITIES. In English Law. A court constituted for the trial of scholars or privileged persons connected with the university at Oxford or Cambridge who are indicted for treason, felony, or mayhem.

The court consists of the lord high steward, or his deputy nominated by the chancellor of the university and approved of by the lord high chancellor of England. The steward issues a precept to the sheriff, who returns a panel of eighteen freeholders, and another to the university bedels, who return a panel of eighteen matriculated laymen. From these panels a jury de medietate is selected, before whom the cause is tried. An indictment must first have been found by a grand jury, and cognizance claimed thereof at the first day. 3 Bla. Com. 83; 4 id. 277; 1 Steph. Com. 67; 3 id. 299; 4 id. 325. See CHANCELLORS' COURTS OF THE UNIVERSITIES.

COURT OF THE STEWARD OF THE KING'S HOUSEHOLD. In English Law. A court which had jurisdiction of all cases of treason, misprision of treason, murder, manslaughter, bloodshed, and other malicious striking where-by blood is shed, occurring in or within the limits of any of the palaces or houses of the king, or any other house where the royal person is abiding.

It was created by statute 33 Hen. VIII. c. 12, but long since fell into disuse. 4 Bla. Com. 276, 277, and notes.

COURT OF MAGISTRATES AND FREEHOLDERS. In American Law. The name of a court in South Carolina for the trial of slaves and free persons of color for criminal offences. Now abolished.

COURT OF THE MARSHALSEA. In English Law. A court which had jurisdiction of causes to which the domestic servants were parties.

It was held by the steward of the king's household, as judge, and the marshal was the ministerial officer, and held pleas of trespasses committed within twelve miles of the sovereign's residence (called the verge of the court), where one of the parties was a servant of the king's household, and of all debts, contracts, and covenants, where both parties were servants as above. Where one of the parties only was of the king's household, a jury of the country was summoned; in the other case, the inquest was composed of men of the household only. This court was merged, in the time of Charles I., in the Palace Court, and abolished by 12 & 13 Vict. c. 101, § 13; 3 Steph. Com. 317, n. See PALACE COURT.

COURT-MARTIAL. A military or naval tribunal, which has jurisdiction of offences against the law of the service, military or naval, in which the offender is engaged.

The original tribunal, for which courts-martial are a partial substitute, was the Court of Chivalry, which title see. These courts exist and have their jurisdiction by virtue of the military law, the court being constituted and empowered to act in each instance by authority from a commanding officer. The general principles applicable to courts-martial in the army and navy are essentially the same; and for consideration of the exact distinctions between them reference must be had to the works of writers upon these subjects. Courts-martial for the regulation of the militia are held in the various states under local statutes, which resemble in their main features those provided for in the army of the United States; and when in actual service the militia, like the regular troops, are subject to courts-martial, composed, however, of militia officers.

As to their constitution and jurisdiction, these courts may belong to one of the following classes:—

General, which have jurisdiction over every species of offence of which courts-martial have jurisdiction. They are to be composed in the United States of not less than five nor more than thirteen commissioned officers of suitable rank, according to the exigencies of the service (U. S. R. S. 237, art. 75), and in England of not less than thirteen commissioned officers, except in special cases, and usually do consist of more than that number.

Regimental, which have jurisdiction of offences not capital, occurring in a regiment or corps. They consist in the United States of three commissioned officers; and are appointed by the commanding officer. In England they consist of not less than three commissioned officers and may be summoned by any commanding officer, without regard to rank; Stat. 44 & 45 Vict. (1881) c. 58. The jurisdiction of this class of courts-martial extends only to offences less than capital committed by those below the rank of commissioned officers, and their decision is subject to revision by the commanding officer of the division, regiment, or detachment, by the officer who appointed them, or by certain superior officers.

Garrison, which have jurisdiction of some offences not capital, occurring in a garrison, fort, or barracks. They are of the same constitution as to number and qualifications of members as regimental courts-martial. Their limits of jurisdiction in degree are the same, and their decisions are in a similar manner subject to revision.

The U. S. Rev. Stat. § 1342, contain the rules and articles of war governing the army and, inter alia, provide:—

Art. 72. Any general officer, commanding an army, a territorial division, or a department, or colonel commanding a separate department, may appoint general courts-martial whenever necessary either in time of peace or in time of war. But when any such commander is the accuser or prosecutor of any officer under his command, the court shall be appointed by the president; and its proceedings and sentence shall be sent directly to the secretary of war, by whom they shall be laid before the president for his approval or orders in the case. (As amended by act of 1884, July 5; U. S. Rev. St. 1 Suppl. 463, c. 224.)

Art. 73. In time of war the commander of a division or of a separate brigade of troops, shall be competent to appoint a general court-martial. But when such commander is the accuser or prosecutor of any person under his command, the court shall be appointed by the next higher commander.

Art. 74. Officers who may appoint a court-martial shall be competent to appoint a judge-advocate for the same.

U. S. Rev. Stat. § 1624 contain the articles governing the navy and, inter alia, it is provided:—

Art. 26. "Summary courts-martial may be ordered upon petty officers and persons of inferior ratings by the commander of any vessel, or by the commandant of any navy-yard, naval station, or marine barracks to which they belong, for the trial of offences which such officer may deem deserving of greater punishment than such commander or commandant is authorized to inflict, but not sufficient to require trial by a general court-martial." A paymaster's clerk in the navy, regularly appointed and assigned to duty on a receiving ship, is subject to trial and conviction, and sentence and imprisonment by general court-martial, for a violation of section 1624 of the Revised Statutes; 158 U. S. 109.

Art. 27. A summary court-martial shall consist of three officers not below the rank of ensign, as members, and of a recorder. The commander of a ship may order any officer under his command to act as such recorder.

Art. 38. General courts-martial may be convened by the president, the secretary of the navy, or the commander-in-chief of a fleet or squadron; but no commander of a fleet or squadron in the waters of the United States shall convene such court without express authority from the president.

Art. 39. A general court-martial shall consist of not more than thirteen nor less than five commissioned officers as members; and as many officers, not exceeding thirteen, as can be convened without injury to the service, shall be summoned on every such court. But in no case, where it can be avoided without injury to the service, shall more than one-half, exclusive of the president, be junior to the officer to be tried. The senior officer shall always preside, and the others shall take place according to their rank.

The decision of the commanding officer as to the number that can be convened without injury to the service is conclusive; 12 Wheat. 19.

By act of 1890, October 1, U. S. Rev. Stat. 1 Supp. 878, c. 1259, any enlisted man guilty of an offence, cognizable by a garrison or regimental court-martial shall be brought within twenty-four hours before a summary court, composed of the line officers second in rank of the post or station or of the command of the alleged offender; but the offender may, if he chooses, object to a hearing by the summary court, and request a trial by court-martial. Where a person accused under article 43 of the articles for the government of the Navy (R. S. § 1624) is already in custody to await the result of a court of inquiry, the article is sufficiently complied with by delivering a copy of the charges against him immediately after the secretary of the Navy has informed him of that result and has ordered a court-martial to convene to try him; 158 U. S. 109.

The jurisdiction of such courts is limited to offences against the military law (which title see) committed by individuals in the service; 12 Johns. 257; see De Hart, Courts-Mart. 28; Ives, Mil. L. 37; 3 Wheat. 212; 3 Am. Jur. 281; which latter term includes sutlers, retainers to the camp, and persons serving with the army in the field; 60th Art. of War; De Hart, Courts-Mart. 24, 25. See V. Kennedy, Courts-Mart. 3. But while a district is under martial law, by proclamation of the executive, as for rebellion, they may take jurisdiction of offences which are cognizable by the civil courts only in time of peace; 11 Op. Att.-Gen. 137; V. Kennedy, Courts-Mart. 14. This rule is said by American writers to apply where the army passes into a district where there are no civil courts in existence; Benet, Mil. Law 15.

The act of March 3, 1863, did not make the jurisdiction of military tribunals exclusive of that of the state courts in the loyal states; but otherwise in the rebellious states when in the military occupation of the United States; 97 U. S. 509.

Military commissions organized during the late war, in a state not invaded and not engaged in rebellion, in which the federal courts were open and not obstructed in the exercise of their judicial functions, had no jurisdiction to convict, for a criminal offence, a citizen, who was neither a resident of a rebellious state, nor a prisoner of war, nor a person in the military or naval service; and congress could not invest them with any such power; Ex parte Milligan, 4 Wall. 2. Cases arising in the land and naval forces, or in the militia in time of war or public danger, are excepted from the right of trial by jury; ibid.

In regard to the jurisdiction of naval courts-martial over civil crimes committed at sea, see 1 Term 548; 3 Wheat. 212; 10 id. 159; 7 Hill 95; 1 Kent 341, n. Naval courts-martial in England are now governed by the Naval Discipline Act of 1866 (29 & 30 Vict. c. 109) and its amendments of 1884 (47 & 48 Vict. c. 39); 2 Steph. Com. 589-598.

The court must appear from its record to have acted within its jurisdiction; Ives, Mil. L. 35; 3 S. & R. 590; 1 Rawle 143; 11 Pick. 442; 19 Johns. 7; 25 Me. 168; 1 M'Mull. 69; 13 How. 134. A want of jurisdiction either of the person, 1 Brock. 324, or of the offence, will render the members of the court and officers executing its sentence trespassers; 3 Cra. 331. See MILITARY LAW; MARTIAL LAW. So, too, the members are liable to a civil action if they admit or reject evidence contrary to the rules of the common law; 2 Kent 10; V. Kennedy, Courts-Mart. 13; or award excessive or illegal punishment; V. Kennedy, Courts-Mart. 13.

The decisions of general courts-martial are subject to revision by the commanding officer, the officer ordering the court, or by the president or sovereign, as the case may be; 11 Johns. 150. No sentence extending to the loss of life or to the dismissal of a commissioned or warrant officer shall be carried into effect until confirmed by the president; U. S. R. S. § 1624, art. 53. The decision and sentence of a court martial, having jurisdiction of the person accused and of the offence charged, and acting within the scope of its lawful powers, cannot be reviewed or set aside by writ of habeas corpus; 158 U. S. 109. Consult Encyc. Brit. sub voc.; Benét; De Hart, and also Adye; Defalon; Hough; J. Kennedy; V. COURT OF NISI PRIUS. In American Law. A court of original civil jurisdiction in the city and county of Philadelphia, held by one of the judges of the supreme court of the state. Abolished by the constitution of 1874; art. 5, § 1. See NISI PRIUS; COURTS OF ASSIZE AND NISI PRIUS.

COURT OF ORDINARY. In American Law. A court which has jurisdiction of the probate of wills and the regulation of the management of decedents' estates.

Such a court exists in Georgia (see Code Ga. 1882, §§ 318-340), and formerly existed in New Jersey, South Carolina, and Texas, but has been replaced by the court of probate or district court, q. v. See 2 Kent 409; ORDINARY.

COURT OF ORPHANS. In English Law. The court of the lord mayor and aldermen of London, which had the care of those orphans whose parents died in London and were free of the city.

By the custom of London this court was entitled to the possession of the person, lands, and chattels of every infant whose parent was free of the city at the time of his death and who died in the city. The executor or administrator of such deceased parent was obliged to exhibit inventories of the estate of the deceased, and give security to the chamberlain for the orphan's part or share. It is now said to be fallen into disuse. 2 Steph. Com. 313; Pull. Cust. Lond. 196, Orphans' Court.

COURT OF OYER AND TERMINER. In American Law. The name of courts of criminal jurisdiction in several of the states of the American Union, as in Delaware and Pennsylvania.

They were abolished in New York Dec. 31, 1895, and in New Jersey by acts of March 14 and 22, 1895. In Pennsylvania they are held at the same time with the court of quarter sessions, as a general rule, and by the same judges. In Delaware they are specially called by a precept from the judges when there are capital felonies to be tried, and consist of the chief justice and three associate judges of the state.

COURTS OF OYER AND TERMINER AND GENERAL GAOL DELIVERY.

In English Law. Tribunals for the examination and trial of criminals.

They are held before commissioners selected by the queen, among whom are usually two justices of the superior courts at Westminster, twice in every year in all the counties of England except the four northern, where they are held once only, and Middlesex and parts of other counties, over which the central criminal court has jurisdiction.

Under the commission of oyer and terminer the justices try indictments previously found at the same assizes for treason, felony, or misdemeanors. Under the commission of general gaol delivery they may try and deliver every prisoner who is in gaol when the judges arrive at the circuit town, whenever or before whomsoever indicted or for whatsoever crime committed. These commissioners are joined with those of assize and nisi prius and the commission of the peace. 3 Steph. Com. 352. See COURTS OF ASSIZE AND NISI PRIUS.

In American Law. Courts of criminal jurisdiction in some states. See COURT OF OYER AND TERMINER.

COURT OF PALACE AT WESTMINSTER. This court had jurisdiction of personal actions arising within twelve miles of the palace at Whitehall. Abolished by 12 & 13 Vict. c. 101; 3 Steph. Com. 317, n.

COURT OF PECULIARS. In English Law. A branch of the court of arches, to which it is annexed.

It has jurisdiction of all ecclesiastical causes arising in the peculiars of Canterbury or other dioceses which are exempt from the ordinary's jurisdiction and subject to that of the metropolitan only. The court of arches has an appellate jurisdiction of causes tried in this court. 3 Bla. Com. 65; 3 Steph. Com. 306. See PECULIARS.

COURT OF PIE-POWDER, PY-POWDERS, or PIEPOUDRE (Fr. pied, foot, and poudre, dust, or puldreux, old French pedler). In English Law. A court of special jurisdiction in every fair or market, said to have been so called because the several disputes which arose were adjudged with a dispatch that suited the convenience of transitory suitors,—the men with "dusty feet."

The word piepoudre, spelled also piedpoudre and yypowder, has been considered as signifying dusty feet, pointing to the general condition of the feet of the suitors therein; Cowel; Blount; or as indicating the rapidity with which justice is administered, as rapidly as dust can fall from the foot; Co. 4th Inst. 472; or pedler's feet, as being the court of such chapmen or petty traders as resorted to fairs. It was not confined to fairs or markets, but might exist, by custom, in cities, boroughs, or villages for the collection of debts and the like; Cro. Jac. 313; Cro. Car. 46; 2 Salk. 604. It was held before the steward of him who was entitled to the tolls from the market. It has fallen into disuse.

In an enumeration of common-law institutions which he claims were derived from the Roman law, Mr. Semmes claims that these courts owe both their origin and their name to the Roman law, "as will be seen by referring to the code l. 3, tit. 3, De Pedaneis Judicibus." Address, Am. Bar. Assn. Rep. 1886, p. 197.

The civil jurisdiction extended to all matters of contract arising within the precinct of the fair or market during the continuance of the particular fair or market at which the court was held, the plaintiff being obliged to make oath as to the time and place. The cases were mostly trade disputes, and accordingly the decisions were law made by merchants, and a good deal of interest attached to them as decisions by juries of experts; 1 Social England 464. Disputes only could be determined which arose in the fair and in fair time; Inderwick, King's Peace 105.

The criminal jurisdiction embraced all offences committed at the particular fair or market at which the court was held. An appeal lay to the courts at Westminster. See Barrington, Stat. 337; 3 Bla. Com. 32; 3 Steph. Com. 317, n.; Skene, de verb. sig. Pede pulverosus; Bracton 334.

COURT OF POLICIES OF INSURANCE. A court of special jurisdiction which took cognizance of cases involving claims made by those insured upon policies in the city of London.

It was organized by a commission issued yearly by the lord chancellor, by virtue of 43 Eliz. c. 12, and 13 & 14 Car. II. c. 23, to the judge of the admiralty, the recorder of London, two doctors of the civil law, two common-law lawyers, and eight merchants, empowering any three of them (one being a civilian or barrister) to determine in a summary way all causes concerning policies in the city of London. The jurisdiction was confined to actions brought by assured persons upon policies of insurance on merchandise; and an appeal lay by way of a bill to the court of chancery. The court has been long disused, and was formally abolished by stat. 26 & 27 Vict. c. 125. 3 Bla. Com. 74; 3 Steph. Com. 317, n.; Crabb, Hist. Eng. Law 503.

COURT PREROGATIVE. See PREROGATIVE COURT.

COURT OF PROBATE. In American Law. A court which has jurisdiction of the probate of wills and the regulation of the management and settlement of decedents' estates, as well as a more or less extensive control of the estates of minors and other persons who are under the especial protection of the law. In some states, this court has also a limited jurisdiction in civil and criminal actions. For the states in which such courts exist, and the limits of their jurisdiction, see the articles on the various states.

In English Law. A court in England, established under the Probate Act of 1857, having exclusive jurisdiction of testamentary causes or proceedings relating to the validity of wills and the succession to the property of persons deceased intestate. 2

Steph. Com. 192; 3 id. 346. See stat. 20 & 21 Vict. c. 77; 21 & 22 Vict. c. 95. This court is now merged in the High Court of Justice under the Judicature Act of 1873. See JUDICATURE ACTS.

COURT OF PYPOWDER. See COURT OF PIE-POWDER.

COURT OF QUARTER SESSIONS OF THE PEACE. In American Law. A court of criminal jurisdiction in the state of Pennsylvania.

There is one such court in each county of the state. Its sessions are, in general, held at the same time and by the same judges as the court of oyer and terminer and general gaol delivery.

COURT OF QUEEN'S BENCH. See COURT OF KING'S BENCH.

COURT OF RECORD. A judicial organized tribunal having attributes and exercising functions independently of the person of the magistrate designated generally to hold it, and proceeding according to the course of the common law. 8 Metc. 171, per Shaw, C. J.

A court where the acts and proceedings are enrolled in parchment for a perpetual memorial and testimony. 3 Bla. Com. 24.

A court which has jurisdiction to fine and imprison, or one having jurisdiction of civil causes above forty shillings, and proceeding according to the course of the common law. 37 Me. 29.

All courts are either of record or not of record. The possession of the right to fine and imprison for contempt was formerly considered as furnishing decisive evidence that a court was a court of record; Co. Litt. 117 b, 260 a; 1 Salk. 144; 12 Mod. 388; 2 Wms. Saund. 101 a; Viner, Abr. Courts; and it is said that the erection of a new tribunal with this power renders it by that very fact a court of record; 1 Salk. 200; 12 Mod. 388; 1 Woodd. Lect. 98; 3 Bla. Com. 24, 25; but every court of record does not possess this power; 1 Sid. 145; 3 Sharsw. Bla. Com. 25, n. The mere fact that a permanent record is kept does not, in modern law, stamp the character of the court; since many courts, as probate courts and others of limited or special jurisdiction, are obliged to keep records and yet are held to be courts not of record. See 11 Mass. 510; 22 Pick. 430; 1 Cow. 212; 3 Wend. 268; 10 Pa. 158; 5 Ohio 545; 7 Ala. 351; 25 id. 540. The definition first given above is taken from the opinion of Shaw, C. J., in 8 Metc. 171, with an additional element not required in that case for purposes of distinction, and is believed to contain all the distinctive qualities which can be said to belong to all courts technically of record at modern law.

Courts may be at the same time of record for some purposes and not of record for others; 23 Wend. 376; 6 Hill 590; 8 Metc. 168.

Courts of record have an inherent power, independently of statutes, to make rules for the transaction of business; but such rules must not contravene the law of the land; 1 Pet. 604; 3 S. & R. 253; 8 id. 336; 2 Mo. 98. They can be deprived of their jurisdiction by express terms of denial only; 9 S. & R. 298; 2 Burr. 1042; 1 W. Bla. 285. Actions upon the judgments of such courts may, under the statutes of limitations of some of the states of the United States, be brought after the lapse of the period of limitation for actions on simple contracts; and this provision has given rise to several determinations of what are and what are not courts of record. See 22 Pick. 430; 6 Gray 515; 6 Hill 590; 1 Cow. 212; 25 Ala. N. S. 540; 37 Me. 29.

Under the naturalization act of the United States, "every court of record in a state having common-law jurisdiction and a seal and a clerk or prothonotary" has certain specified powers. As to what the requirements are to constitute a court of record under this act, see 8 Pick. 168; 23 Wend. 375.

A writ of error lies to correct erroneous proceedings in a court of record; 3 Bla. Com. 407; 18 Pick. 417; but will not lie unless the court be one, technically, of record; 11 Mass. 510. See WRIT OF ERROR.

COURT OF REGARD. In English Law. One of the forest courts, in England, held every third year, for the lawing or expeditation (q. v.) of dogs, to prevent them from running after deer. It is now obsolete. 3 Steph. Com. 440; 3 Bla. Com. 71, 72; Inderwick, King's Peace 151.

COURTS OF REQUESTS (called otherwise courts of conscience). In English Law. Courts of special jurisdiction, constituted by act of parliament in the city of London and other towns, for the recovery of small debts.

They were courts not of record, and proceeded in a summary way to examine upon oath the parties and other witnesses, without the aid of a jury, and made such order as is consonant to equity and good conscience.

They had jurisdiction of causes of debt generally to the amount of forty shillings, but in many instances to the amount of five pounds sterling.

The courts of requests in London consisted of two aldermen and four common councilmen, and was formerly a court of considerable importance, but was abolished, as well as all other courts of request, by the Small Debts Act, 9 & 10 Vict. c. 95, and the order in council of May 9, 1847, and their jurisdiction transferred to the county courts.

The court of requests before the king in person was virtually abolished by 16 Car. I. c. 10. See 3 Steph. Com. 449, and note (j); Bacon, Abr. Courts in London; COUNTY COURTS.

COURT ROLLS. The rolls of a manor, containing all acts relating thereto. While belonging to the lord of the manor, they are not in the nature of public books for the benefit of the tenant. Scriven on Copyholds. See COPYHOLD.

COURT OF SESSION. In Scotch Law. The supreme court of civil jurisdiction in Scotland.

The full title of the court is council and session. It was first established in 1425. In 1469 its jurisdiction was transferred to the king's council, which in 1503 was ordered to sit in Edinburgh. In 1532 the jurisdiction of both courts and the joint title were transferred to the present court. The regular number of judges was fifteen; but an additional number of justices might be appointed by the crown to an unlimited extent. This privilege was renounced by 10 Geo. I. c. 19.

It consists of thirteen judges, formerly of fifteen, and is divided into an inner and an outer house.

The inner house is composed of two branches or chambers, of co-ordinate jurisdiction, each consisting of four judges, and called respectively the first division and the second division. The first division is presided over by the lord president or lord justice general, the second by the lord justice clerk. The outer house is composed of five separate courts, each presided over by a single judge, called a lord ordinary.

All causes commence before a lord ordinary, in general; and the party may select the one before whom he will bring his action, subject to a removal by the lord president in case of too great an accumulation before any one or more lords ordinary. See Bell, Dict.; Erskine, Prin. L. Scoll. (18th ed.); Paterson, Comp. § 1055, n. et seq.

COURT OF SESSIONS. In American Law. A court of criminal jurisdiction existing in some of the states of the United States.

COURT OF SHERIFF'S TOURN. See SHERIFF'S TOURN.

COURT OF STANNERIES. See STANNARY COURTS.

COURT OF STAR-CHAMBER. In English Law. A court which was formerly held by divers lords spiritual and temporal, who were members of the privy council, together with two judges of the courts of common law.

It was of very ancient origin, was new-modelled by the 3 Hen. VII. c. 1 and 21 Hen. VIII. c. 20, and was finally abolished, after having become very odious to the people, by the 16 Car. I. c. 10. The name star-chamber is of uncertain origin. It has been thought to be from the Saxon steoran, to govern, alluding to the jurisdiction of the court over the crime of cosenage; and has been thought to have been given because the hall in which the court was held was full of windows, Lambard, Eiren. 148; or because the roof was originally studded with gilded stars, Coke, 4th Inst. 66; or, according to Blackstone, because the Jewish covenants (called starrs or stars, and which, by a statute of Richard I., were to be enrolled in three places, one of which was near the exchequer) were originally kept there, 4 Bla. Com. 266, n. The derivation of Blackstone receives confirmation from the fact that this location (near the exchequer) is assigned to the star-chamber the first time it is mentioned. The word star acquired at some time the recognized signification of inventory or schedule. Stat. Acad. Cont. 32; 4 Sharsw. Bla. Com. 266, n.

The legal jurisdiction of this court extended originally to riots, perjuries, misbehavior of sheriffs, and other notorious misdemeanors. It acted without the assistance of a jury. See Hudson, Court of Star Chamber (printed at the beginning of the second volume of the Collectanea Juridica); 4 Bla. Com. 266, and notes; 4 Steph. Com. 308-310; 12 Amer. Law Rev. 21.

COURT OF THE STEWARD AND MARSHAL. See COURT OF MARSHAL-SEA.

COURT OF SWANIMOTE or SWEINMOTE (spelled, also, Swainmote, Swain-gemote; Saxon, swang, an attendant, a freeholder, and mote or gemote, a meeting).

In English Law. One of the forest courts, now obsolete, held before the verderers, as judges, by the steward, thrice in every year.—the sweins or freeholders within the forest composing the jury.

This court had jurisdiction to inquire into grievances and oppressions committed by the officers of the forest, and also to receive and try presentments certified from the court of attachments, certifying the cause, in turn, under the seals of the jury, in case of conviction, to the court of justice seat for the rendition of judgment. Cowel; 3 Bla. Com. 71, 72; 3 Steph. Com. 317, n. See Ind. King's Peace 150; FOREST LAWS.

COURTS OF THE TWO UNIVERSITIES. In English Law. See CHANCELLOR'S COURTS OF THE TWO UNIVERSITIES.

COURTS OF THE UNITED STATES. See UNITED STATES COURTS.

COURT OF WARDS AND LIVERIES. In English Law. A court of record in England, which had the supervision and regulation of inquiries concerning the profits which arose to the crown from the fruits of tenure, and to grant to heirs the delivery of their lands from the possession of their guardians.

The Court of the King's Wards was instituted by stat. 32 Hen. VIII. c. 46, to take the place of the ancient inquisitio post mortem, and the jurisdiction of the restoration of lands to heirs on their becoming of age (livery) was added by statute 33 Hen. VIII. c. 24, when it became the Court of Wards and Liveries. It was abolished by statute 12 Car. II. c. 24.

The jurisdiction extended to the superintendence of lunatics and idiots in the king's custody, granting licenses to the king's widows to marry, and imposing fines for marrying without license; 4 Reeve, Hist. Eng. Law 259; Crabb, Hist. Eng. Law 468; 1 Steph. Com. 183, 192; 4 id. 40; 2 Bla. Com. 68, 77; 3 id. 258.

COURTESY. See CURTESY.

COUSIN. The son or daughter of the brother or sister of one's father or mother.

The issue, respectively, of two brothers or two sisters, or of a brother and a sister.

Those who descend from the brother or sister of the father of the person spoken of are called paternal cousins; maternal cousins are those who are descended from the brothers or sisters of the mother. See 2 Brown, Ch. 125; 1 Sim. & S. 301; 3 Russ. 140; 9 Sim. 386, 457. The word is still applied in Devonshire to a nephew. 1 Ves. Jr. 73.

COUSINAGE. See COSINAGE.

COUSTUM (Fr.). Custom; duty; toll. 1 Bla. Com. 314.

COUSTUMIER (Fr.). A collection of customs and usages in the old Norman law. See GRAND COUTUMIER.

COUTHUTLAUGH. He that willingly receives an outlaw and cherishes or conceals him. In ancient times he was subject to the same punishment as the outlaw. Blount.

COVENABLE (L. Fr.). Convenient; suitable. Anciently written convenable.

COVENANT (Lat. convenire, to come together; conventio, a coming together. It is equivalent to the factum conventum of the civil law).

In Contracts. An agreement between two or more persons, entered into by deed, whereby one of the parties promises the performance or non-performance of certain acts, or that a given state of things does or shall, or does not or shall not, exist.

A contract under seal; a deed.

Affirmative covenants are those in which the covenantor declares that something has been already done, or shall be done in the future.

Affirmative covenants do not operate to deprive covenantees of rights enjoyed independently of the covenants; Dyer 19 b; 1 Leon. 251.

Covenants against incumbrances. See COVENANT AGAINST INCUMBRANCES.

Alternative covenants are disjunctive covenants.

Auxiliary covenants are those which do not relate directly to the principal matter of contract between the parties, but to something connected with it. Those the scope of whose operations is in aid or support of the principal covenant. If the principal covenant is void, the auxiliary is discharged; Anstr. 256; Prec. Chanc. 475.

Collateral covenants are those which are entered into in connection with the grant of something, but which do not relate immediately to the thing granted: as, to pay a sum of money in gross, that the lessor shall distrain for rent on some other land than that which is demised, to build a house on the land of some third person, or the like. Platt, Cov. 69; Shepp. Touchst. 161; 4 Burr. 2439; 3 Term 393; 2 J. B. Moore 164; 5 B. & Ald. 7; 2 Wils. 27; 1 Ves. 56.

Concurrent covenants are those which are to be performed at the same time. When one party is ready and offers to perform his part, and the other refuses or neglects to perform his, he who is ready and offers has fulfilled his engagement, and may maintain an action for the default of the other, though it is not certain that either is obliged to do the first act; Platt, Cov. 71; 2 Selw. N. P. 443; Dougl. 698; 18 E. L. & Eq. 81; 4 Wash. C. C. 714; 16 Mo. 450.

Declaratory covenants are those which serve to limit or direct uses. 1 Sid. 27; 1 Hob. 224.

Dependent covenants are those in which the obligation to perform one is made to depend upon the performance of the other. Covenants may be so connected that the right to insist upon the performance of one of them depends upon a prior performance on the part of the party seeking enforcement. Platt, Cov. 71; 2 Selw. N. P. 443; Steph. N. P. 1071; 1 C. B. N. s. 646; 6 Cow. 296; 2 Johns. 209; 2 W. & S. 227; 8 S. & R. 268; 4 Conn. 3; 24 id. 624; 11 Vt. 549; 17

Me. 232; 3 Ark. 581; 1 Blackf. 175; 6 Ala. 60; 3 Ala. N. S. 330. To ascertain whether covenants are dependent or not, the intention of the parties is to be sought for and regarded, rather than the order or time in which the acts are to be done, or the structure of the instrument, or the arrangement of the covenant; 2 Pars. Contr. 645; 1 Wms. Saund. 320, n.; 7 Term 130; 5 B. & P. 223; 36 E. L. & Eq. 358; 4 Wash. C. C. 714; 4 Rawle 26; 2 W. & S. 227; 2 Johns. 145; 5 N. Y. 247; 1 Root 170; 4 Rand. 352. See note to Cutter v. Powell, Smith Lead. Cas.

Disjunctive covenants. Those which are for the performance of one or more of several things at the election of the covenantor or covenantee, as the case may be. Platt, Cov. 21; 1 Duer N. Y. 209.

Executory covenants are those whose performance is to be future. Shepp. Touchst. 161.

Express covenants are those which are created by the express words of the parties to the deed declaratory of their intention; Platt, Cov. 25. The formal word covenant is not indispensably requisite for the creation of an express covenant; 2 Mod. 268; 5 Q. B. 683; 8 J. B. Moore 546; 12 East 182, n.; 1 Bibb 379; 3 Johns. 44; 4 Conn. 508; 1 Harr. Del. 233. The words "I oblige," "agree," 1 Ves. 516; 2 Mod. 266, "I bind myself," Hardr. 178; 3 Leon. 119, have been held to be words of covenant, as are the words of a bond; 1 Ch. Cas. 194. Any words showing the intent of the parties to do or not to do a certain thing, raise an express covenant; 13 N. H. 513. But words importing merely an order or direction that other persons should pay a sum of money, are not a covenant; 6 J. B. Moore 202, n. (a).

Covenants for further assurance. See COVENANT FOR FURTHER ASSURANCE.

Covenants for quiet enjoyment. See COVENANT FOR QUIET ENJOYMENT.

Covenants for title are those covenants in a deed conveying land which are inserted for the purpose of securing to the grantee and covenantee the benefit of the title which the grantor and covenantor professes to convey.

Those in common use in England are four in number—of right to convey, for quiet enjoyment, against incumbrances, and for further assurance—and are held to run with the land; the covenant for seisin has not been generally in use in modern conveyances in England; Rawle, Cov. § 24. In the United States there is, in addition, a covenant of warranty, which is more commonly used than any of the others. In the United States what are "often called 'full covenants' are the covenants for seisin, for right to convey, against incumbrances, for quiet enjoyment, sometimes for further assurance, and, almost always, of warranty—this last often taking the place of the covenant for quiet enjoyment;" Rawle, Cov. § 27. The covenants of seisin, for right to convey, and against incumbrances, are generally held to be in presenti; if broken at all, they are broken as soon as made; Rawle, Cov. 318; 4 Kent 471; 6 Cush. 128; 3 Washb. R. P. 478; see Mitch. R. P. 448; 36 Me. 170; and the various titles below for a fuller statement of the law relative to the different covenants for title.

Implied covenants or covenants in law are those which arise by intendment and construction of law from the use of certain words having a known legal operation in the creation of an estate, so that after they have had their primary operation in the creation of the estate, the law gives them a secondary force, by implying an agreement on the part of the grantor to protect and preserve the estate so by these words already created; 1 C. B. 429; Bacon. Abr. Covenant, B; Rawle, Cov. § 270, n. In Co. Litt. 139 b, it is said that "of covenants there be two kinds: a covenant personal and a covenant real; a covenant in deed and a covenant in law." In a conveyance of lands in fee, the words "grant, bargain, and sell," imply certain covenants; see 4 Kent 473; and the word "give" implies a covenant of warranty during the life of the feoffor; 10 Cush. 134; 2 Caines 193; 9 N. H. 222; 7 Ohio 394; (but this covenant and that implied from the word "grant" are abolished in England by 8 & 9 Vict. c. 106, § 14); and in a lease the use of the words "grant and demise;" Co. Litt. 384; 4 Wend. 502; "grant;" Freem. 367; Cro. Eliz. 214; 1 P. & D. 360; "demise;" 4 Co. 80; 10 Mod. 162; 9 N. H. 222; 15 N. Y. 327; "demisement;" 1 Show. 79; 1 Salk. 137; raise an implied covenant on the part of the lessor, as do "yielding and paying;" 9 Vt. 151; on the part of the lessee. In regard to the covenants arising to each grantee by implication on sale of an estate with conditions, in parcels to several grantees, see 23 Barb. 153.

Covenants in deed. Express covenants.

Covenants in gross. Such as do not run with the land.

Covenants in law. Implied covenants.

Illegal covenants are those which are expressly or impliedly forbidden by law. Covenants are absolutely void when entered into in violation of the express provisions of statutes; 5 H. & J. 193; 5 N. H. 96; 4 S. & R. 159; 4 Halst. 252; or if they are of an immoral nature; 3 Burr. 1568; 1 B. & P. 340; 3 T. B. Monr. 35; against public policy; 4 Mass. 370; 7 Me. 113; 5 Halst. 87; 3 Day 145; 5 W. & S. 315; 6 Miss. 769; 2 McLean 464; 4 Wash. C. C. 297; 11 Wheat. 258; in general restraint of trade; 21 Wend. 166; 7 Cow. 307; 6 Pick. 206; or fraudulent as between the parties; 4 S. & R. 483; 5 Mass. 16; or as to third persons; 3 Day 450; 14 S. & R. 214; 3 Caines 213; 2 Johns. 286; 15 Pick. 49.

Independent covenants are those the necessity of whose performance is determined entirely by the requirements of the covenant itself, without regard to other covenants between the parties relative to the same subject-matter or transactions or series of transactions.

Covenants are generally construed to be independent; Platt, Cov. 71; 2 Johns. 145;

10 id. 204; 21 Pick. 438; 3 Bingh. N. S. 355; unless the undertaking on one side is in terms a condition to the stipulation of the other, and then only consistently with the intention of the parties; 3 Maule & S. 308; 10 East 295, 530; or unless dependency results from the nature of the acts to be done, and the order in which they must necessarily precede and follow each other in the progress of performance; Willes 496; or unless the non-performance on one side goes to the entire substance of the contract, and to the whole consideration; 1 Seld. 247. If once independent, they remain so; 19 Barb. 416.

Inherent covenants are those which relate directly to the land itself, or matter granted. Shepp. Touchst. 161. Distinguished from collateral covenants.

If real, they run with the land; Platt, Cov. 66.

Intransitive covenants are those the duty of performing which is limited to the covenantee himself, and does not pass over to his representative.

Joint covenants are those by which several parties agree to do or perform a thing together, or in which several persons have a joint interest as covenantees. 26 Barb. 63; 16 How. 580; 1 Gray 376; 10 B. Monr. 291. They may be in the negative; 35 Me. 260.

Negative covenants are those in which the party obliges himself not to do or perform some act. Courts are unwilling to construe a negative covenant a condition precedent, inasmuch as it cannot be said to be performed till a breach becomes impossible; 2 Wms. Saund. 156; 1 Mod. 64; 2 Kebl. 674. Obligatory covenants are those which are binding on the party himself. 1 Sid. 27; 1 Kebl. 337. They are distinguished from declaratory covenants.

Personal Covenants. See PERSONAL COVENANT.

Principal covenants. Those which relate directly to the principal matter of the contract entered into between the parties. They are distinguished from auxiliary.

Real covenants. See REAL COVENANT.

Covenants of rights to convey. See COVENANT OF RIGHT TO CONVEY.

Covenants of seisin. See COVENANT OF SEISIN.

Covenants to stand seized, etc. See COVENANT TO STAND SEIZED TO USES.

Transitive covenants are those personal covenants the duty of performing which passes over to the representatives of the covenantor.

Covenants of warranty. See COVENANT OF WARRANTY.

Covenants are subject to the same rules as other contracts in regard to the qualifications of parties, the assent required, and the nature of the purpose for which the contract is entered into. See PARTIES; CONTRACTS.

No peculiar words are needed to raise an express covenant; 12 Ired. 145; 1 C. & M. 657; 5 Q. B. 683; 3 Ex. 237, per Parke, B.; and by statute in Alabama, Arkansas, Delaware, Illinois, Indiana, Mississippi, Missouri, Montana, Nevada, New Mexico, Pennsylvania, and Texas, the words grant, bargain, and sell, in conveyances in fee, unless specially restricted, amount to covenants that the grantor was seized in fee, freed from incumbrances done or suffered by him, and for quiet enjoyment against his acts; 4 Kent 473; 2 Binn. 95; 23 Mo. 151, 174; 17 Ala. N. S. 198; 1 Sm. & M. 611; 19 Ill. 235; 15 Ark. 289; but do not imply any general warranty of title in Alabama, Arkansas, Pennsylvania, and North Carolina; 4 Kent 474; 22 Ark. 72; 1 Murph. 343; 2 Ala. N. S. 535. In Iowa, by the statute of 1843, the same rule was authorized, and upon this it was held that all covenants were express; 2 Green 525; but no such provisions are to be found in the revised code of 1884. In Ohio the statute of 1795 was almost exactly copied from the Pennsylvania statute, but was repealed in 1824 and reenacted in substance, and entirely repealed in 1831, and the latest Revised Statutes (1884), like those of Iowa, are silent on the subject. The Wisconsin statute, providing that no covenant shall be implied, makes an exception in the case of the short form of conveyance provided by statute, and declares that such a deed shall have the effect of a conveyance in fee simple to the grantee, his heirs and assigns, etc.; Rev. Stat. 1878. In Tennessee there is no statutory provision as to implied covenants, but a statutory short form of conveyance was held to authorize the broadest construction of the granting words unless their effect was specially limited by the instrument itself; 5 Lea 100. In California and North and South Dakota the same rule substantially is prescribed by statute in the first-named state, the implied covenants do not run with the land; 37 Cal. 183. In Georgia a covenant of general warranty is held to include covenants of a right to convey, quiet enjoyment, and freedom from incumbrances; 64 Ga. 632. See generally on this subject, Rawle, Cov. § 286.

Describing lands in a deed as bounded on a street of a certain description raises a covenant that the street shall be of that description; 7 Gray 563; and that the purchaser shall have the use thereof; 5 Md. 314; 23 N. H. 261; which binds subsequent purchasers from the grantor; 7 Gray 83.

In New York it is provided by statute that no covenants can be implied in any conveyance of real estate; 4 Kent 469; but this provision does not extend to leases for years; 11 Paige 566; 42 N. Y. 174.

The New York statute has been enacted in Michigan, Minnesota, Oregon, Wisconsin, and Wyoming, and no covenants for title seem to be implied in states other than those above named. In some cases where the covenants relate to lands, the rights and liabilities of the covenantor, or covenantee, or both, pass to the assignee of the thing to which the covenant relates. In such cases the covenant is said to run with the land. If rights pass the benefit is said to run; if liabilities, the burden. Only real covenants run with the land, and these only when the covenant has entered into the consideration for which the land, or some interest therein to which the covenant is annexed, passed between the covenantor and the covenantee; 2 Sugd. Vend. 468, 484; 2 M. & K. 535; 19 Pick. 449, 464; 24 Barb. 366; 45 Me. 474; See 1 Washb. R. P. 526; and they die with the estate to which they are annexed; 3 Jones, N. C. 12; 13 Ired. 193; but an estoppel to deny passage of title is said to be sufficient; 3 Metc. Mass. 124; and the passage of mere possession, or defeasible estate without possession, enables the covenant to run; 23 Mo. 151, 174.

It is said by some authorities that the benefit of a covenant to do acts upon land of the covenantee, made with the 'covenantee and his assigns,' will run with the land though no estate passed between the covenantor and covenantee; Rawle, Cov. 335; Year B. 42 Edw. III. 13; 3 Den. 301; 8 Gratt. 403; but the weight of authority is otherwise; 2 Sugd. Vend. 468; Platt, Cov. 461. Covenants concerning title generally run with the land; 3 N. J. 260; except those that are broken before the land passed; 4 Kent 473; 30 Vt. 692. See COVENANT OF SEISIN, etc. "Until breach, covenants for title, without distinction between them, run with the land to heirs and assigns. But while this is well settled, a strong current of American authority has set in favor of the position that the covenants for seisin, for right to convey, and, perhaps, against incumbrances, are what are called covenants in præsenti,—if broken at all, their breach occurs at the moment of their creation. . . . These covenants, it is held, are then turned into a mere right of action, which is not assignable at law and can neither pass to an heir, a devisee, or a subsequent purchaser. A distinction is considered, by this class of cases, to exist, in this respect, between the covenants first named, and those for quiet enjoyment, of warranty, and for further assurance, which are held to be prospective in their character;" Rawle, Cov. §§ 204, 205. See also 2 Johns. 1.

Covenants in leases, by virtue of the statute 32 Hen. VIII. c. 34, which has been reenacted in most of the states, are assignable as respects assignees of the reversion and of the lease. The lessee continues liable on express covenants after an assignment by him, but not on implied ones; 4 Term 98; but he is liable to the assignee of the lessor on implied covenants, at common law; Platt, Cov. 532; 2 Sugd. Vend. 466; Burton, R. P. § 855. See 1 Washb. R. P. 526.

In case of the assignment of lands in parcels, the assignees may recover pro rata, and the original covenantee may recover according to his share of the original estate remaining; 2 Sugd. Vend. 508; Rawle, Cov. § 215; 36 Me. 170; 27 Pa. 288; 3 Metc. Mass. 87; 8 Gratt. 407; 9 B. Monr. 58. But covenants are not, in general, apportionable; 27 Pa. 288.

See Spencer's case, 1 Sm. Lead. Cas. 206.

In Practice. A form of action which lies to recover damages for breach of a contract under seal. It is one of the brevia formata of the register, and is sometimes a concurrent remedy with debt, though never with assumpsit, and is the only proper remedy where the damages are unliquidated in nature and the contract is under seal; Fitzh. N. B. 340; Chit. Pl. 112, 113; 2 Steph. N. P. 1058.

The action lies, generally, where the covenantor does some act contrary to his agreement, or fails to do or perform that which he has undertaken; 4 Dane, Abr. 115; or does that which disables him from performance; Cro. Eliz. 449; 15 Q. B. 88; 23 Pick. 455.

To take advantage of an oral agreement modifying the original covenant in an essential point, the covenant must be abandoned and assumpsit brought; 27 Pa. 429; 24 Vt. 347.

The venue is local when the action is founded on privity of estate; 2 Steph. N. P. 1148; 1 Wms. Saund. 241 b, n.; and transitory when it is founded upon privity of contract. As between original parties to the covenant, the action is transitory; and, by the statute 32 Hen. VIII. c. 34, an action of covenant by an assignee of the reversion against a lessor, or by a lessee against the assignee of the reversion, is also transitory; 1 Chit. Pl. 274.

The declaration must, at common law, aver a contract under seal; 2 Ld. Raym. 1536; and either make profert thereof or excuse the omission; 3 Term 151; at least of such part as is broken; 4 Dall. 436; 4 Rich. 196; and a breach or breaches; 15 Ala. 201; 5 Ark. 263; 4 Dana 381; 6 Miss. 229; which may be by negating the words of the covenant in actions upon covenants of seisin and right to convey; Rawle, Cov. § 176; or according to the legal effect; but must set forth the incumbrance in case of a covenant against incumbrances; id. § 86; and must allege an eviction in case of warranty; id. § 155. The disturbance must be averred to have been under lawful title; id. No consideration need be averred or shown, as it is said to be implied from the seal; but performance of an act which constitutes a condition precedent to the defendant's covenant, if there be any such, must be averred; 1 Chit. Pl. 116; 2 Greenl. Ev. § 235; 26 Ala. n. s. 748. The damages laid must be large enough to cover the real amount sought to be recovered; 3 S. & R. 364, 567.

There is no plea of general issue in this action. Under non est factum, the defendant may show any facts contradicting the making of the deed; 1 Seld. 422; 1 Mich. 438; as, personal incapacity; 2 Campb. 272; that the deed was fraudulent; Lofft 457; was not delivered; 4 Esp. 255; or was not executed by all the parties; 6 Maule & S. 341.

Non infregit conventionem and nil debet have both been held insufficient; Com. Dig. Pleader, 2 V, 4. As to the effect of covenant performed, see COVENANTS PERFORMED. In respect to the damages to be recovered, see DAMAGES.

The judgment is that the plaintiff recover a named sum for the damages which he has sustained by reason of the breach or breaches of covenant, together with costs.

COVENANT TO CONVEY. A covenant by which the covenantor undertakes to convey to the covenantee the estate described in the covenant, under certain circumstances.

This form of conditional alienation of lands is in frequent use in several of the United States; 14 Pa. 308; 19 Barb. 639; 4 Md. 498; 11 Ill. 194; 19 Ohio 347. Substantially the same effect is secured as by a conveyance and a mortgage back for the purchase-money, with this important difference, however, that the title of course remains in the covenantor until he actually executes the conveyance.

The remedy for breach may be by action on the covenant; 29 Pa. 264; but the better remedy is said to be in equity for specific performance; 1 Grant 230.

It is satisfied only by a perfect conveyance of the kind bargained for; 19 Barb. 639; otherwise where an imperfect conveyance has been accepted; 4 Md. 498.

COVENANT FOR FURTHER ASSURANCE. One by which the covenantor undertakes to do such reasonable acts in addition to those already performed as may be necessary for the completion of the transfer made, or intended to be made, at the requirement of the covenantee. It relates both to the title of the vendor and to the instrument of conveyance to the vendee, and operates as well to secure the performance of all acts for supplying any defect in the former, as to remove all objections to the sufficiency and security of the latter. Platt Cov. 341.

The covenant is of frequent occurrence in English conveyances; but its use in the United States seems to be limited to some of the middle states; 2 Washb. R. P. 648; 10 Me. 91; 4 Mass. 627; 10 Cush. 134. It is customary in railroad and other corporation mortgages.

The covenantor, in execution of his covenant, is not required to do unnecessary acts; Yelv. 44; 9 Price 43. He must in equity grant a subsequently acquired title; 2 Ch. Cas. 212; 1 Eq. Cas. Abr. 26; 2 P. Wms. 630; must levy a fine; 16 Ves. 366; 5 Taunt. 427; 4 Maule & S. 188; must remove a judgment or other incumbrance; 5 Taunt. 427; but a mortgagor with such covenant need not release his equity; 1 Ld. Raym. 36. It may be enforced by a bill in equity for specific performance, or an action at law to recover damages for the breach; 2 Co. 3 a; 6 Jenk. Cas. 24; Platt, Cov. 353; Rawle, Cov. § 362; 2 Washb. R. P. 666.

COVENANT AGAINST INCUMBRANCES. One which has for its object security against those rights to, or interests in, the land granted which may subsist in third persons to the diminution of the value of the estate, though consistently with the passing of the fee by the deed of conveyance. For what constitutes an incumbrance, see INCUMBRANCE.

The mere existence of an incumbrance constitutes a breach of this covenant; 2 Washb. R. P. 658; 20 Ala. 137; without regard to the knowledge of the grantee; 2 Greenl. Ev. § 242; 27 Vt. 739; 8 Ind. 171; 10 id. 424.

Such covenants, being in presenti, do not run with the land in Massachusetts and most of the other states; but the rule is otherwise, either by statute or decision in Maine, 1883, p. 697, tit. 9, § 18; 72 Me. 369; Colorado, R. S. 1883, 172; Georgia, Code 1882, 672; New York, 13 Johns. 105; 29 Barb. 339; Ohio, 10 Ohio 327; Minnesota, 25 Minn. 496; Missouri, 44 Mo. 512; 2 McCrary 356; Indiana, 5 Blackf. 232; Wisconsin, 22 Wis. 495 (reversing the rule adopted in 5 Wis. 17); Iowa, 36 Ia. 232; South Carolina, 1 N. & McC. 104; Vermont, 52 Vt. 639; and possibly in Michigan. See Rawle, Cov. § 212. If the covenant is so linked with another covenant as to have a prospective operation it runs with the land; id. This covenant is usually coupled with that of seisin in considering this question, but it was not treated as running with the land in this country so readily as the latter; Rawle, Cov. § 212.

Yet the incumbrance may be of such a character that its enforcement may constitute a breach of the covenant of warranty; as in case of a mortgage; 4 Mass. 349; 17 id. 586; 8 Pick. 547; 22 id. 494.

The measure of damages is the amount of injury actually sustained; 7 Johns. 358; 5 Me. 94; 12 Mass. 304; 3 Cush. 201; 20 N. H. 369; 25 id. 229; Rawle, Cov. § 188.

The covenantee may extinguish the incumbrance and recover therefor, at his election, in the absence of agreement; 4 Ind. 533; 19 Mo. 480; 25 N. H. 229. See COVENANT; REAL COVENANT.

COVENANT OF NON-CLAIM. A covenant sometimes employed, particularly in the New England States, and in deeds of extinguishment of ground rents in Pennsylvania, that neither the vendor, nor his heirs, nor any other person, etc., shall claim any title in the premises conveyed. Rawle, Cov. § 22. It is substantially the same as the covenant of warranty, q. v.; ibid. § 231.

COVENANT NOT TO SUE. One entered into by a party who has a cause of action at the time of making it, by which he agrees not to sue the party liable to such action.

A perpetual covenant not to sue is one by which the covenantor agrees not to sue the covenantee at any time. Such a covenant operates as a release to the covenantee, and may be pleaded as such. Cro. Eliz. 623; 12 Mod. 415; 7 Mass. 153; 17 id. 623; 3 Ind. 473; 34 L. J. Q. B. 25. And see 11 S. & R. 149.

A covenant of this kind with one of several, jointly and severally bound, will not protect the others so bound; 12 Mod. 551; 6 Munf. 6; 1 Conn. 139; 4 Me. 421; 2 Dana 107; 17 Mass. 623. It is equivalent to a release with a reserve of remedies, and hence is properly used in composition deeds in preference to a release, which discharges all sureties and co-debtors; 3 B. & C. 361.

A covenant by one of several partners not to sue cannot be set up as a release in an action by all; 3 P. & D. 149.

A limited covenant not to sue, by which the covenantor agrees not to sue for a limited time, does not operate a release; and a breach must be taken advantage of by action; Carth. 63; 1 Show. 46; 2 Salk. 573; 11 Q. B. 852; 6 Wend. 471; 5 Cal. 501. See 29 Ala. N. S. 322, as to requisite consideration.

See Leake, Contr. 928.

COVENANT FOR QUIET ENJOYMENT.

An assurance against the consequences of a defective title, and of any disturbances thereupon. Platt, Cov. 312; 11 East 641; Rawle, Cov. § 91. By it, when general in its terms, the covenantor stipulates at all events; 1 Mod. 101; to indemnify the covenantee against all acts committed by virtue of a paramount title; Platt, Cov. 313; 4 Co. 80 b; Cro. Car. 5; 3 Term 584; 6 id. 66; 3 Duer, N. Y. 464; 2 Jones, N. C. 203; Busb. 384; 3 N. J. 260; not including the acts of a mob; 19 Miss. 87; 2 Strobb. 366; nor a mere trespass by the lessor; 10 N. Y. 151.

But this rule may be varied by the terms of the covenant: as where it is against acts of a particular person; Cro. Eliz. 212; 5 Maule & S. 374; 1 B. & C. 29; or those "claiming or pretending to claim;" 10 Mod. 383; 1 Vent. 175; or molestation by any person. See 21 Miss. 87.

It has practically superseded the ancient doctrine of warranty as a guaranty of title, in English conveyances; 2 Washb. R. P. 661; but the latter is more common in conveyances in America; Rawle, Cov. § 91.

It occurs most frequently in leases; 1 Washb. R. P. 325; Rawle, Cov. § 91; and is usually the only covenant used in such cases; it is there held to be raised by the words grant, demise, lease, yielding and paying, give, etc.; 1 P. & D. 360; 9 N. H. 222; 15 N. Y. 327; 6 Bingh. 656; 4 Kent 474, n.; and exists impliedly in a parol lease; 20 E. L. & Eq. 374; 3 N. J. 260; see 1 Duer, N. Y. 176. It is usual in ground-rent deeds in Pennsylvania; Rawle, Cov. § 91.

COVENANT OF RIGHT TO CONVEY.

An assurance by the covenantor that the grantor has sufficient capacity and title to convey the estate which he by his deed undertakes to convey.

In modern English conveyancing, this covenant has taken the place of the covenant of seisin; 2 Washb. R. P. 648. It is said to be the same as a covenant of seisin; 10 Me. 91; 4 Mass. 627; but is not necessarily so, as it includes the capacity of the grantor; T. Jones 195; 2 Bulstr. 12; Cro. Jac. 358.

The breach takes place on execution of the deed, if at all; Freem. 41; 5 Halst. 20; and the covenantee need not wait for a disturbance to bring suit; 5 Taunt. 426; but a second recovery of damages cannot be had for the same breach; Platt, Cov. 310; 1 Maule & S. 365; 4 id. 53.

COVENANT OF SEISIN. An assurance to the grantee that the grantor has the very estate, both in quantity and quality, which he professes to convey. Platt, Cov. 306. It has given place in English conveyancing to the covenant of right to convey, but is in use in several states of the United States. 2 Washb. R. P. 648.

In England; 1 Maule & S. 355; 4 id. 53; and in several states of the United States; e. g. Colorado, Georgia, New York, Ohio, Minnesota and other states (see Rawle, Cov. § 211); by decisions; 5 Blackf. 232; 17 Ohio 52; 22 Wis. 495; 32 Ia. 317; 40 Mo. 512; or by statute; 2 Washb. R. P. 650; this covenant runs with the land, and may be sued on for breach by an assignee; in other states it is held that a mere covenant of lawful seisin does not run with the land, but is broken, if at all, at the moment of executing the deed; 4 Mass. 408, 439, 627; 10 Cush. 134; 2 Barb. 303; 2 Me. 269; 2 Dev. 30; 8 Gratt. 396; 5 Sneed 119; 7 Ind. 673; 27 Ill. 482; 37 Cal. 188; 23 Ark. 590. See discussion of this subject with authorities cited in COVENANT AGAINST INCUMBRANCES.

A covenant for indefeasible seisin is everywhere held to run with the land; 2 Vt. 328; 2 Dev. 30; 4 Dall. 439; 5 Sneed 123; 14 Johns. 248; 14 Pick. 128; 10 Mo. 467; and to apply to all titles adverse to the grantor's; 2 Washb. R. P. 656.

A covenant of seisin or lawful seisin, in England and most of the states, is satisfied only by an indefeasible seisin; Rawle, Cov. § 41; 7 C. B. 310; 22 Vt. 106; 15 N. H. 176; 6 Conn. 374; 23 id. 349; while in other states possession under a claim of right is sufficient; 3 Vt. 403; 10 Cush. 134; 4 Mass. 408; 2 id. 439; 51 Me. 567; 69 id. 510; 27 Ill. 229; 4 Neb. 133; 26 Mo. 92; 3 Ohio 211, 525.

A covenant of seisin, of whatever form, is broken at the time of the execution of the deed if the grantor has no possession either by himself or another; and no rights can pass to the assignee of the grantee; 2 Johns. 1; 2 Vt. 327; 5 Conn. 497; 14 Pick. 170; 17 Ohio 60; 8 Gratt. 397; 4 Cra. 430; 36 Me. 170; 24 Ala. N. S. 189; 4 Kent 471; 2 Washb. R. P. 656.

The existence of an outstanding life-estate; 22 Vt. 106; a material deficiency in the amount of land; 1 Bay 256; see 24 Miss. 597; non-existence of the land described; 16 Pick. 68; the existence of fences or other fixtures on the premises belonging to other persons, who have a right to remove them; 1 N. Y. 564; 7 Pa. 122; 30 Vt. 752; 19 Ia. 427; or of a paramount right in another to divert a natural spring; 38 Vt. 471; or to prevent the grantee from damming water to a certain height when that right is reserved to him by his deed; 20 Wis. 293; 29 Ind. 96; concurrent seisin of another as tenant in common; 12 Me. 389; 43 id. 567; adverse possession of a part by a stranger; 7 Johns. 376; a conveyance by one of two tenants in common of the entire estate (so far as his half is concerned); 38 Vt. 464; constitute a breach of this covenant. But the existence of such easements or incumbrances as do not affect the seisin of the purchaser does not constitute a breach of the covenant: Rawle, Cov. § 59. For instance, the existence of a highway over a part of the land; 15 Johns. 449; 1 Pa. 336; 1 Conn. 103; 16 Ind. 340; or of a judgment, mortgage, or right of dower; Rawle, Cov. § 59; 2 J. J. Marsh. 430; 10 Ohio 383; 7 Johns. 380; (otherwise if the mortgagee has entered: Rawle, Cov. § 59); the removal of fixtures; 45 N. Y. 792. But see 6 Cush. 124.

In the execution of a power, a covenant that the power is subsisting and not revoked is substituted; Platt, Cov. 309.

COVENANT TO STAND SEISED TO USES. A covenant by means of which under the statute of uses a conveyance of an estate may be effected. Burton, R. P. §§ 136, 145.

Such a covenant cannot furnish the ground for an action of covenant broken, and in this respect resembles the ancient real covenants.

The consideration for such a covenant must be relationship either by blood or marriage; 2 Washb. R. P. 129; Chal. R. P. 383. See 2 Seld. 342.

As a mode of conveyance it has fallen into disuse; though the doctrine is often resorted to by courts in order to give effect to the intention of the parties who have undertaken to convey lands by deeds which are insufficient for the purpose under the rules required in other forms of conveyance; 2 Washb. R. P. 155; 2 Sand. Uses 79, 83; 4 Mass. 136; 18 Pick. 397; 5 Me. 232; 11 Johns. 351; 5 Yerg. 249.

COVENANT OF WARRANTY. An assurance by the grantor of an estate that the grantee shall enjoy the same without interruption by virtue of paramount title. 2 Jones, N. C. 203; 3 Duer, N. Y. 464; 58 Barb. 36; 3 Hill, S. C. 304.

It is not in use in English conveyances, but is in general use in the United States; 2 Washb. R. P. 659; and in several states is the only covenant in general use; Rawle, Cov. § 21; 4 Ga. 593; 8 Gratt. 353; 6 Ala. 60.

A special warranty is not a covenant against incumbrances; 83 Va. 157. See 4 Dall. 436.

The form in common use is as follows:—
“And I the said [grantor], for myself, my heirs, executors, and administrators, do covenant with the said [grantee], his heirs and assigns, that I will, and my heirs, executors, and administrators shall, warrant and defend the same to the said [grantee], his heirs and assigns forever, against the lawful claims and demands of all persons [or, of all persons claiming by, through, or under me, but against none other],” [or other special covenant, as the case may be]. When general, it applies to lawful adverse claims of all persons whatever; when special, it applies only to certain persons or claims to which its operation is limited or restricted; 2 Washb. R. P. 665. See a form in Rawle, Cov. § 21, n.

This limitation may arise from the nature of the subject-matter of the grant; 8 Pick. 547; 19 id. 341; 5 Ohio 190; 9 Cow. 271.

Such covenants give the covenantee and grantee the benefit of subsequently acquired titles; 11 Johns. 91; 9 Cow. 271; 6 Watts 60; 9 Cra. 43; 13 N. H. 389; 1 Ohio 190; 3 Pick. 52; 24 id. 324; 3 Metc. 121; 13 Me. 281; 20 id. 260; to the extent of their terms; 12 Vt. 39; 3 Metc. 121; 9 Cow. 271; 34 Me. 483; but not if an interest actually passes at the time of making the conveyance upon which the covenant may operate; 3 McLean 56; 9 Cow. 271; 12 Pick. 47; 5 Gratt. 157; in case of terms for years, as well as conveyances of greater estates; Wms. R. P. 229; 2 Washb. R. P. 478; 4 Kent 261, n.; Cro. Car. 109; 4 Wend. 502; 1 Johns. Cas. 90; as against the grantor and those claiming under him; 2 Washb. R. P. 479; including purchasers for value; 14 Pick. 224; 5 N. H. 533; 5 Me. 231; 12 Johns. 201; 9 Cra. 53; but see 4 Wend. 619; 18 Ga. 192. And this principle does not operate to prevent the grantee's action for breach of the covenant, if evicted by such title; 1 Gray 195; 25 Vt. 635; 12 Me. 499. See 33 Me. 346. A deed of land is not void as between the parties because of a want of consideration, and such want is no answer to an action upon a breach of covenant of warranty; 154 Mass. 389.

In case of a release of right and title, covenants limited to those claiming under the grantor do not prevent the assertion by the grantor of a subsequently acquired title; 26 N. H. 401; 4 Wend. 300; 5 Gray 328; 11 Ohio 475; 14 Me. 351; 43 id. 432; 14 Cal. 472.

It is a real covenant, and runs with the estate in respect to which it is made, into the hands of whoever becomes the owner; 2 Washb. R. P. 659; Chal. R. P. 279; 4 Sneed 52; 82 Va. 702; 40 La. Ann. 827; against the covenantor and his personal representatives; 27 Pa. 288; 3 Zab. 260; see 142 N. Y. 78; to the extent of assets received, and cannot be severed therefrom; 13 Ired. 193.

The covenant of warranty and that of seisin or of right to convey are not equivalent covenants. Defect of title will sustain an action upon the latter, while disturbance of possession is requisite to recover upon the former; 131 U. S. 75. Grantors having made an express contract of warranty, cannot set up knowledge of vice in their title, to exonerate themselves from the obligation of their contract; 138 U. S. 595.

The action for breach should be brought by the owner of the land and, as such, assignee of the covenant at the time it is broken; 4 Johns. 89; 19 Wend. 334; 2 Mass. 455; 7 id. 444; 3 Cush. 219; 10 Me. 81; 5 T. B. Monr. 357; 12 N. H. 413; but may be by the original covenantee, if he has satisfied the owner; 5 Cow. 137; 3 Cush. 222; 5 T. B. Monr. 357; 1 Conn. 244; 1 Dev. & B. 94; 10 Ga. 311; 26 Vt. 279.

To constitute a breach there must be an eviction by paramount title; Rawle, Cov. § 131; 6 Barb. 165; 5 Harr. Del. 162; 11 Rich. 80; 13 La. Ann. 390, 499; 5 Cal. 262; 4 Ind. 174; 6 Ohio St. 525; 26 Mo. 92; 17 Ill. 185; 36 Me. 455; 14 Ark. 309; 35 Neb. 521; 26

S. W. Rep. (Tex.) 443; 41 Vt. 296; which may be constructive; 12 Me. 499; 17 Ill. 185; 36 id. 69; and it is sufficient if the tenant yields to the true owner, or if, the premises being vacant, such owner takes possession; 5 Hill 599; 4 Mass. 349; 8 Ill. 162; 5 Ired. 393; 40 Minn. 94; 98 N. C. 239; 40 La. Ann. 827; 39 Cal. 360; 33 N. J. L. 328. See 4 Halst. 139. But in such case the grantee must prove the existence and assertion of such paramount, outstanding, hostile title; 16 Or. 333; 51 Ill. 377; 47 Ind. 256; 66 Me. 557; 103 Mass. 276; 40 Vt. 43; and assume the burden of proof with as much particularity as if suing in ejectment; Rawle, Cov. § 136; 32 Ia. 76; 51 Tex. 178; unless the adverse right has been established by a judgment or decree in a suit of which the covenantor had been properly notified; Rawle, Cov. § 136; in which case the judgment or decree will be conclusive evidence of the validity of the paramount title; id. See id. § 123 et seq.

Exercise of the right of eminent domain does not render the covenantee liable; 31 Pa. 37; 71 id. 83; 25 Cal. 452; 10 Cush. 134; 3 Wheat. 452.

When the covenantee is threatened with eviction, it is usual and proper for him to give notice to the covenantor to appear and defend the suit. If it appears on the record that the covenantor received the notice or if he defends the suit, recovery therein will be conclusive against him in an action by the covenantee; otherwise the question of notice will go to the jury on the facts. If no notice was given, the record of the adverse suit is not even prima facie evidence that the adverse title was paramount. Notice of the adverse suit is not indispensable to a recovery against the covenantor; Rawle, Cov. § 125.

As to the measure of damages for an eviction, see MEASURE OF DAMAGES.

COVENANTS PERFORMED. In Pleading. A plea to an action of covenant, in use in the state of Pennsylvania, whereby the defendant, upon proper notice to the plaintiff, may give anything in evidence which he might have pleaded. 4 Dall. 439; 2 Yeates 107; 15 S. & R. 105. And this evidence, it seems, may be given in the circuit court without notice, unless called for; 2 Wash. C. C. 456.

COVENANTEE. One in whose favor a covenant is made. Shepp. Touch. 150.

COVENANTOR. One who becomes bound to perform a covenant.

COVENTRY ACT. The common name for the statute 22 & 23 Car. II. c. 1,—it having been enacted in consequence of an assault on Sir John Coventry in the street, and slitting his nose, in revenge, as was supposed, for some obnoxious words uttered by him in parliament.

By this statute it is enacted that if any person shall, of malice aforethought, and by lying in wait, unlawfully cut or disable the tongue, put out an eye, slit the nose, cut off the nose or lip, or cut off or disable any limb or member, of any other person, with intent to maim or disfigure him, such person, his counsellors, aiders, and abettors, shall be guilty of felony without benefit of clergy. The act was repealed in England by the 9 Geo. IV. c. 31. The provision now in force on this subject is the 24 & 25 Vict. c. 100, § 18; 4 Steph. Com. 80, n.

COVERT BARON. A wife. So called from being under the protection of her husband, baron, or lord. 1 Bla. Com. 442.

COVERTURE. The condition or state of a married woman.

During coverture the civil existence of the wife is, for many purposes, merged in that of her husband; 2 Steph. Com. 263-272. See ABATEMENT; PARTIES; MARRIED WOMEN.

COVIN. A secret contrivance between two or more persons to defraud and prejudice another in his rights. Co. Litt. 357 b; Comyns, Dig. Covin, A: 1 Viner, Abr. 473; 28 Conn. 166. See COLLUSION; DECEIT; FRAUD.

COW. In a penal statute which mentions both cows and heifers, it was held that by the term cow must be understood one that had had a calf. 2 East, Pl. Cr. 616; 1 Leach 105. See 6 Hunph. 285.

COWARDICE. Pusillanimity; fear; misbehavior through fear in relation to some duty to be performed before an enemy. O'Brien, Court M. 142.

By both the army and navy regulations of the United States this is an offence punishable in officers or privates with death, or such other punishment as may be inflicted by a court-martial; Rev. Stat. §§ 1342, 1624.

CRAFT. Art or skill; dexterity in particular manual employment, hence the occupation or employment itself; manual art; a trade. Webster.

This word is also now applied to all kinds of sailing vessels. 21 Gratt. 693. See 23 L. J. Rep. 156; 3 El. & Bl. 888.

CRANAGE. A toll paid for drawing merchandise out of vessels to the wharf: so called because the instrument used for the purpose is called a crane. 8 Co. 46.

CRANK. Some strange action; a caprice; a whim; a crotchet; a vagary.

Violent of temper; subject to sudden cranks. Carlyle. The word has no necessarily defamatory sense; 29 Fed. Rep. 827.

CRASTINUM, CRASTINO (Lat. tomorrow). On the day after. The return day of writs is made the second day of the term, the first day being some saint's day, which gives its name to the term. In the law Latin, crastino (the morning, the day after) would then denote the return day. 2 Reeve, Hist. Eng. Law 56. In the United States the return day is the first day of the term.

CRAVE. To ask; to demand. The word is frequently used in pleading: as, to crave oyer of a bond on which the suit is brought: and in the settlement of accounts the accountant-general craves a credit or an allowance. 1 Chit. Pr. 520. See OYER.

CRAVEN. A word denoting defeat, and begging the mercy of the conqueror.

It was used (when used) by the vanquished party in trial by battle. Victory was obtained by the death of one of the combatants, or if either champion proved recreant,—that is, yielded, and pronounced the horrible word "craven." Such a person became infamous, and was thenceforth unfit to be believed on oath. 3 Bla. Com. 340. See WAGER OF BATTLE.

CREANCE. In French Law. A claim; a debt; also belief, credit, faith. 1 Bouvier, Inst. n. 1040.

CREANSOR. A creditor. Cowel.

CREATE. To create a charter is to make an entirely new one, and differs from renewing, extending, or continuing an old one. 21 Pa. 188; 1 Gilin. 672; 16 Barb. 188. See 65 Me. 500; 45 Vt. 154.

CREDENTIALS. In International Law. The instruments which authorize and establish a public minister in his character with the state or prince to whom they are addressed. If the state or prince receive the minister, he can be received only in the quality attributed to him in his credentials. They are as it were his letter of attorney, his mandate patent, mandatum manifestum. Vattel, liv. 4, c. 6, § 76.

CREDIBILITY. Worthiness of belief. The credibility of witnesses is a question for the jury to determine, as their competency is for the court; Best, Ev. § 76; 1 Greenl. Ev. §§ 49, 425; Tayl. Ev. 1257.

CREDIBLE WITNESS. One who, being competent to give evidence, is worthy of belief. 5 Mass. 229; 17 Pick. 154; 2 Curt. Eccl. 336.

In deciding upon the credibility of a witness, it is always pertinent to consider whether he is capable of knowing thoroughly the thing about which he testifies; whether he was actually present at the transaction; whether he paid sufficient attention to qualify himself to be a reporter of it; and whether he honestly relates the affair fully as he knows it, without any purpose or desire to deceive, or to suppress or add to the truth.

In some of the states, wills must be attested by credible witnesses. In several of the states, credible witness is used, in certain connections, as synonymous with competent witness, and in Connecticut, in a statute providing for the certification of copies of records, it refers to a witness giving testimony under the sanction of the witness's oath; 26 Conn. 416; 18 Ga. 40; 2 Bail. 24; 9 Pick. 350; 12 Mass. 358; 88 Ky. 350; 58 N. H. 8; Jarm. Wills 124.

CREDIT. The ability to borrow, on the opinion conceived by the lender that he will be repaid.

A debt due in consequence of a contract of hire or borrowing of money.

The time allowed by the creditor for the payment of goods sold by him to the debtor.

That which is due to a merchant, as distinguished from debit, that which is due by him.

That influence connected with certain social positions. 20 Toullier, n. 19.

In a statute making credits the subject of taxation, the term is held to mean the excess of the sum of all legal claims and demands, whether for money or other valuable thing, or for labor or services, due or to become due to the person liable to pay taxes thereon, when added together (estimating every such claim or demand at its true value in money) over and above the sum of all legal bona fide debts owing by such person; 37 Ohio St. 123.

See, generally, 5 Taunt. 338; 3 N. Y. 344; 24 id. 64, 71; 51 Cal. 243.

As to the "full faith and credit" to be given in one state to the records, etc., of another state, see FOREIGN JUDGMENTS; CONFLICT OF LAWS.

CREDIT, BILL OF. See BILL OF CREDIT.

CREDITOR. He who has a right to require the fulfilment of an obligation or contract.

A person to whom any obligation is due. 37 N. J. L. 300. See 2 Root 261.

Preferred creditors are those who, in consequence of some provision of law, are entitled to some special privilege in the order in which their claims are to be paid.

CREDITOR, JUDGMENT. One who has obtained a judgment against his debtor, under which he can enforce execution.

CREDITORS' BILL. A bill in equity, filed by one or more creditors, for the purpose of collecting their debts out of assets, or under circumstances as to which an execution at law would not be available. They are usually filed by and on behalf of him or themselves and all other creditors who shall come in under the decree. They may be either against the debtor in his lifetime or for an account of the assets and a due settlement of the estate of a decedent.

They are divided by Bispham into two classes, numbered in the order here stated. In bills of what he terms the second class, or those which in effect seek for the administration of a decedent's estate, the usual decree against the executor or administrator is quod computet; that is to say, it directs the master to take the accounts between the deceased and all his creditors, and to cause the creditors, upon due public notice, to come before him to prove their debts at a certain place and within a limited time; and it also directs the master to take an account of all the personal estate of the deceased in the hands of the executor or administrator, and the same to be applied in payment of the debts and other charges in a due course of administration; 1 Story, Eq. Jur. 546-549.

Generally speaking, this jurisdiction has been transferred to probate courts in most of the states, but in some states the original jurisdiction of equity over the administration of estates remains unabridged by the statutes and concurrent with that of probate courts. These states are Alabama, Illinois, Iowa, Kentucky, Maryland, Mississippi, New Jersey, North Carolina, Rhode Island, Virginia, and the District of Columbia, and this rule also applies in the federal courts. In certain other states the jurisdiction of the probate courts is virtually exclusive. These states are Connecticut, Indiana, Maine, Massachusetts, Michigan, Nebraska, Nevada, New Hampshire, Oregon, and Pennsylvania. In some other states the equitable jurisdiction is ancillary and corrective. These states are Arkansas, California, Georgia, Kansas, Missouri, New York, Ohio, South Carolina, Tennessee, Texas, Vermont, and Wisconsin. This classification, which is given in 3 Pom. Eq. Jur. § 1154, is said to be a rough grouping with still considerable diversity among the individuals composing each class.

Creditors' suits of the other class are brought while the debtor is living and for the collection of a debt against him. This jurisdiction had its origin in the inadequacy of common-law remedies by writs of execution. These writs at common law often did not extend to estates and interests which were equitable in their nature, and creditors' suits were therefore permitted to be brought where the relief at common law by execution was ineffectual, as for the discovery of assets, to reach equitable and other interests not subject to levy and sale at law, and to set aside fraudulent conveyances.

Statutes in England and America have extended the common-law remedies and provided adequate legal relief in many cases where formerly a resort to equity was necessary; Pom. Eq. Jur. § 1415.

The jurisdiction of a court of chancery in suits brought by judgment creditors to enforce the collection of their judgments, after having exhausted their remedy at law, although it may have previously existed, is in some states expressly declared and particularly defined by statutes.

Before a creditor can resort to the equitable estate of his debtor, he must first obtain judgment and seek to collect the debt by execution; exhausting his remedy at law; 140 U. S. 106; 99 id. 398; 111 id. 110; 52 Ill. 98; 80 id. 79; 44 Ga. 466; and it must appear that a judgment has been recovered, execution issued thereon and returned "nulla bona;" 117 Ill. 477; 111 U. S. 110; but this rule is said to be too general; 3 Pom. Eq. Jur. § 1415; it probably would not apply where the judgment was a lien; id.; 54 Miss. 79. A judgment cannot be questioned upon a creditor's bill brought to secure its payment; 8 Wall. 370.

Creditors cannot attack the interest of third parties, alleged to have been obtained by fraud, until they have gained a standing in court by legal proceedings; 62 Mich. 532; 75 Iowa 713; 78 Ga. 194; 86 Ky. 206.

Judgments of the federal court cannot be made the basis of a creditor's bill in a state court; 128 Ill. 304; contra, 42 Neb. 350; 39 Pac. Rep. (Kan.) 727. The plaintiff in a creditor's bill is not concluded by sworn answers of defendant; 40 Ill. App. 405.

A creditor's bill is not maintainable against a debtor and his fraudulent grantee, after the return of an execution satisfied; 80 Me. 461. A judgment creditor's bill may be framed for the double purpose of aiding an execution and to reach property not open to execution; 71 Mich. 431. Where other creditors are permitted to intervene on a creditor's bill, all are entitled to share pro rata in the fund available for payment of debts; 153 Pa. 189. See Puterbaugh, Pl. & Pr. A creditor's bill will lie against municipal corporation, though the same be not subject to garnishment. See 28 Chicago Leg. News 356.

State statutes authorizing suits in the nature of creditors' bills against corporations do not give the federal courts jurisdiction to entertain such suits when the creditor has not first exhausted his legal remedy, since the equity jurisdiction of those courts cannot be enlarged by a state statute; 60 Fed. Rep. 341; 8 C. C. A. 652; nor will such a bill lie to obtain the seizure of the property of an insolvent corporation which has failed to collect stock subscriptions and executed an illegal trust deed, as these facts do not change the rule of those courts that simple contract creditors cannot obtain the aid of equity to effect the seizure of the debtor's property and its application to their claims; 150 U. S. 371. But see 35 Cent. L. J. 207.

See Bisph. Eq. 525-528; 121 U. S. 44; 4 Harv. L. Rev. 99; 5 id. 101; Ad. Eq. 250.

CREEK. In Maritime Law. Such little inlets of the sea, whether within the precinct or extent of a port or without, as are narrow passages, and have shore on either side of them. Callis, Sew. 56; 5 Taunt. 705.

Such inlets that though possibly for their extent and situation they might be ports, yet they are either members of or dependent upon other ports.

In England the name arose thus. The king could not conveniently have a customer and comptroller in every port or haven. But such custom-officers were fixed at some eminent port; and the smaller adjacent ports became by that means creeks, or appendants of that port where these custom-officers were placed. 1 Chit. Com. Law, 726; Hale, de Portibus Maris, pt. 2, c. 1, vol. 1, p. 46; Comyns, Dig. Navigation (C); Callis, Sew. 34.

A small stream, less than a river. 12 Pick. 184; Cowp. 86; 38 N. Y. 103.

A creek passing through a deep level marsh and navigable by small craft, may, under legislative authority, be obstructed by a dam, or wholly filled up and converted into house-lots,—such obstructions not being in conflict with any act of congress regulating commerce; 2 Pet. 245; 1 Pick. 180; 21 id. 344; 3 Metc. Mass. 202; 2 Stockt. 211. See 4 B. & Ald. 589.

CREMATION. The act or practice of reducing a corpse to ashes by means of fire. Act Pa. 1891, June 8; P. L. 212.

To burn a dead body instead of burying it is not a misdemeanor unless it is so done as to amount to a public nuisance. If an inquest ought to be held upon a dead body it is a misdemeanor so to dispose of the body as to prevent the coroner from holding an inquest; L. R. 12 Q. B. D. 247. In L. R. 20 Ch. D. 659, it was doubted as to whether it is lawful to burn a body, but the question was not decided. See 43 Alb. L. J. 140. See DEAD BODY.

CREMENTUM COMITATUS. The increase of the county. The increase of the king's rents above the old vicontiel rents for which the sheriffs were to account. Wharton, Dict.

CREPUSCULUM. Daylight; twilight. The light which immediately precedes or follows the rising or setting of the sun. 4 Bla. Com. 224. Housebreaking during the period in which there is sunlight enough to discern a person's face (crepusculum) is not burglary; Co. 3d Inst. 63; 1 Russell, Cr. 820; 3 Greenl. Ev. § 75.

CRETIO. Time for deliberation allowed an heir (usually 100 days), to decide whether he would or would not take an inheritance. Calvinus, Lex.; Taylor, Gloss.

CREW. The word crew used in a statute in connection with master, includes officers as well as seamen. 3 Sumn. 209-212; 1 Law Rep. 63. Sometimes also the master is included; 6 Rob. (La.) 534; but a passenger would not be; 1 W. & M. 231.

CRIER (Norman, to proclaim). An officer whose duty it is to make the various proclamations in court, under the direction of the judges. The office of crier in chancery is now abolished, in England. Wharton.

CRIM. CON. An abbreviation for criminal conversation, of very frequent use, denoting adultery; unlawful sexual intercourse with a married woman. Bull. N. P. 27; Bacon, Abr. Marriage (E) 2; 4 Blackf. 157; 3 Bla. Com. 139.

The term is used to denote the act of adultery in a suit brought by the husband of the married woman with whom the act was committed, to recover damages of the adulterer. That the plaintiff connived at or assented to his wife's infidelity, or that he prostituted her for gain, is a complete answer to the action. But the fact that the wife's character for chastity was bad before the plaintiff married her, that he lived with her after he knew of the criminal intimacy with the defendant, that he had connived at her intimacy with other men, or that the plaintiff had been false to his wife, only go in mitigation of damages; 4 N. H. 501; 55 Pa. 77; as will the fact that the wife willingly consented or threw herself in the way of her paramour; 70 Ind. 520.

The wife cannot maintain an action for criminal conversation with her husband; and for this, among other reasons, because her husband, who is particeps criminis, must be joined with her as plaintiff. But the husband may maintain the action after a divorce granted; 2 Bish. Marr. Div. & Sep. § 727; 1 Hill, N. Y. 63. This action is rare in the United States, and has been abolished in England by the Divorce Act, 20 & 21 Vict. c. 85, s. 59. The husband may, however, in suing for a divorce, claim damages from the adulterer; 3 Steph. Com. 437. The right to an action for damages is not barred by the fact that the act was done by violence, and that a criminal action will lie; 44 Mich. 245. See article 15 Am. L. Reg. N. S. 451.

Where a wife sought a divorce and obtained a decree, for cruelty, the husband making no defense, but he subsequently sued another man for criminal conversation with her, alleging an act as known to him before the divorce suit, the court held that this would have been a perfect defense to the suit for divorce, and the decree therefor was conclusive against its existence and a complete bar to the civil action; 56 Mich. 291. See CASE.

CRIME. An act committed or omitted in violation of a public law forbidding or commanding it.

A wrong which the government notices as injurious to the public, and punishes in what is called a criminal proceeding in its own name. 1 Bish. Cr. Law § 43. See 4 Denio 260; 6 Ark. 187, 461; Clark, Cr. Law 1.

The word crime generally denotes an offence of a deep and atrocious dye. When the act is of an inferior degree of guilt, it is called a misdemeanor; 4 Bla. Com. 4. Crime, however, is often used as comprehending misdemeanor and even as synonymous therewith, and also with offence; in short, as embracing every indictable offence; T. U. P. Charl. 235; 60 Ill. 168; 31 Wis. 383; 9 Wend. 212; 24 How. 102; 32 N. J. L. 139, 144; 39 Hun 510; 102 N. Y. 583; but it is not synonymous with felony; 113 Pa. 379.

Crimes are defined and punished by statutes and by the common law. Most common-law offences are as well known and as precisely ascertained as those which are defined by statutes; yet, from the difficulty of exactly defining and describing every act which ought to be punished, the vital and preserving principle has been adopted that all immoral acts which tend to the prejudice of the community are punishable criminally by courts of justice; 2 East 5, 21; 7 Conn. 386; 5 Cow. 258; 3 Pick. 26.

There are no common-law offences against the United States; 144 U. S. 677. See COMMON LAW.

There can be no constructive offences, and before a man can be punished, his case must be plainly and unmistakably within the statute; 134 U. S. 624; 158 U. S. 282.

Deliberation and premeditation to commit crime need not exist in the criminal's mind for any fixed period before the commission of the act; 159 U. S. 510.

A crime malum in se is an act which shocks the moral sense of the community as being grossly immoral and injurious. With regard to some offences, such as murder, rape, arson, burglary, and larceny, there is but one sentiment in all civilized countries, which is that of unqualified condemnation. With regard to others, such as adultery, polygamy, and drunkenness, in some communities they are regarded as mala in se; while in others they are not even mala prohibita.

An offence is regarded as strictly a malum prohibitum only when, without the prohibition of a statute, the commission or omission of it would in a moral point of view be regarded as indifferent. The criminality of the act or omission consists not in the simple perpetration of the act, or the neglect to perform it, but in its being a violation of a positive law.

It is not only just, but it has been found necessary, to have the severity of punishment proportioned to the enormity of crimes. Different opinions are entertained as to what should be the highest in degree. In England, there are at present only two crimes for which the death penalty is enforced; namely, treason and murder. In Scotland, by act of 1887, 50 and 51 Vic. chap. 38, it is enacted that capital sentences shall be abolished, except on conviction of murder or offences against the act 10 Geo. IV. chap. 38, by which a variety of attempts to commit murder are considered capital. In the United States the death penalty is enforced by statutes of the different states as follows:—

In Alabama, Delaware, Georgia, Maryland, and West Virginia, for treason, murder, arson, and rape.

In Alaska, Arizona, Kansas, New Jersey, Mississippi, Montana, New York, North Dakota, Oregon, and South Dakota, for treason and murder.

In Colorado, Idaho, Illinois, Iowa, Massachusetts, Minnesota, Nebraska, New Hampshire, New Mexico, Nevada, Ohio, Oklahoma, Pennsylvania, Utah, and Washington, for murder.

In Kentucky and Virginia, for murder, rape, and treason.

In Vermont, arson, treason, and murder. In Florida, Missouri, South Carolina, Texas, and Tennessee, for murder and rape.

In North Carolina, for arson, rape, burglary, and murder.

In Indiana, for treason, murder, and arson, if death result.

In California, treason, murder, and train-wrecking.

Capital punishment has been abolished in Maine, Rhode Island (except where a person shall commit murder while imprisoned for life, when he shall be hanged), Wisconsin, and except for treason in Michigan. R. I. Pub. Stat. (1882), 667; Wis. Act of 1853, n. 100; Mich. Rev. Stat. 1846; Maine Laws (1887), p. 104. In 1888, the legislature of New York substituted electricity as the means of executing criminals, instead of hanging, and a recent act has been passed in Ohio for the same purpose.

There are three degrees of murder according to the statute laws of Minnesota and Wisconsin, and two degrees in Alabama, Arkansas, California, Connecticut, Delaware, Indiana, Iowa, Maine, Maryland, Massachusetts, Michigan, Missouri, New Hampshire, New Jersey, Ohio, Oregon, Pennsylvania, Tennessee, Texas, and Virginia. In some of the other states murder remains as at common law, and in some it is somewhat modified by statute.

Crimes are sometimes classified according to the degree of punishment incurred by the commission of them.

They are more generally arranged according to the nature of the offence.

The following is, perhaps, as complete a classification as the subject admits:—

CRIME AGAINST NATURE. Sodomy or buggery. 10 Ind. 355.

CRIMEN FALSI. In Civil Law. A fraudulent alteration, or forgery, to conceal or alter the truth, to the prejudice of another. This crime may be committed in three ways, namely: by forgery; by false declarations or false oath,—perjury; by acts, as by dealing with false weights and measures, by altering the current coin, by making false keys, and the like; see Dig. 48. 10. 22; 34. 8. 2; Code 9. 22; 2. 5. 9. 11. 16. 17. 23. 24; Merlin, Répert.; 1 Bro. Civ. Law 426; 1 Phill. Ev. 26; 2 Stark. Ev. 715.

At Common Law. Any crime which may injuriously affect the administration of justice, by the introduction of falsehood and fraud. 1 Greenl. Ev. § 373; 13 Ga. 97; 29 Ohio 351, 358; 55 Ala. 239; 4 Sawy. 211.

The meaning of this term at common law is not well defined. It has been held to include forgery; 5 Mod. 74; perjury, subornation of perjury; Co. Litt. 6 b; Comyns, Dig. Testmoigne (A 5) : suppression of testimony by bribery or conspiracy to procure the absence of a witness : Ry. & M. 434 ; conspiracy to accuse of crime : 2 Hale, Pl. Cr. 277 ; 2 Leach 496 ; 3 Stark. 21 ; 2 Dods. 191 ; barratry : 2 Salk. 690. The effect of a conviction for a crime of this class is infamy, and incompetence to testify ; 80 Va. 288. Statutes sometimes provide what shall be such crimes.

CRIMEN LÆSÆ MAJESTATIS.

See LÆSA MAJESTAS.

CRIMINAL CONVERSATION. See CRIM. CON.

CRIMINAL INFORMATION. A criminal suit brought, without interposition of a grand jury, by the proper officer of the king or state. Cole. Cr. Inf. ; 4 Bla. Com. 398. See INFORMATION.

CRIMINAL INTENT. The intent to commit a crime ; malice, as evidenced by a criminal act. Black, Dict.

CRIMINAL LAW. That branch of jurisprudence which treats of crimes and offences.

From the very nature of the social compact on which all municipal law is founded, and in consequence of which every man, when he enters into society, gives up part of his natural liberty, result those laws which, in certain cases, authorize the infliction of penalties, the privation of liberty, and even the destruction of life, with a view to the future prevention of crime and to insuring the safety and well-being of the public. Salus populi suprema lex.

The extreme importance of a knowledge of the criminal law is evident. For a mistake in point of law, which every person of discretion not only may know but is bound and presumed to know, is in criminal cases no defence. Ignorantia eorum quæ quis scire tenetur non excusat. This law is administered upon the principle that every one must be taken conclusively to know it without proof that he does know it ; per Tindal, C. J., in 10 Cl. & F. 210. See 11 Blatchf. 200 ; 59 Ala. 57 ; 65 Me. 30 ; 39 N. J. L. 402. And this is true though the statute making an act illegal is of so recent promulgation as to make it impossible to know of its existence ; 8 Ala. 119 ; 8 Ga. 380 ; 1 Gall. C. C. 62. This doctrine has been carried so far as to include the case of a foreigner charged with a crime which was no offence in his own country ; 1 E. & B. 1 ; Dears. 51 ; 7 C. & P. 456 ; Russ. & R. 4. See 50 Ind. 341. And, further, the criminal law, whether common or statute, is imperative with reference to the conduct of individuals ; so that, if a statute forbids or commands a thing to be done, all acts or omissions contrary to the prohibition or command of the statute are offences at common law, and ordinarily indictable as such ; Hawk. Pl. Cr. bk. 2, c. 25, § 4 ; 8 Q. B. 883. See 15 M. & W. 404. An offence which may be the subject of criminal procedure is an act committed or omitted in violation of a public law either forbidding or commanding it ; 144 U. S. 677.

In seeking for the sources of our law upon this subject, when a statute punishes a crime by its legal designation, without enumerating the acts which constitute it, then it is necessary to resort to the common law for a definition of the crime with its distinctions and qualifications. So if an act is made criminal, but no mode of prosecution is directed or no punishment provided, the common law furnishes its aid, prescribing the mode of prosecution by indictment, and as a mode of punishment, fine, and imprisonment. This is generally designated the common law of England ; but it might now be properly called the common law of this country. It was adopted by general consent when our ancestors first settled here. So far, therefore, as the rules and principles of the common law are applicable to the administration of criminal law and have not been altered and modified by legislative enactments or judicial decisions, they have the same force and effect as laws formally enacted ; 5 Cush. 303, 304 ; 4 Metc. Mass. 358 ; 13 id. 69, 70. "The common law of crimes," says an able writer, "is at present that jus vagum et incognitum against which jurists and vindicators of freedom have strenuously protested. It is to be observed that the definitions of crimes, the nature of punishments, and the forms of criminal procedure originated, for the most part, in the principles of the most ancient common law, but that most of the unwritten rules touching crimes have been modified by statutes which assume the common-law terms and definitions as if their import were familiar to the community. The common law of crimes has, partly from humane and partly from corrupt motives, been pre-eminently the sport of judicial constructions. In theory, indeed, it was made for the state of things that prevailed in this island and the kind of people that inhabited it in the reign of Richard I. ; in reality, it is the patchwork of every judge in every reign, from Cœur de Lion to Victoria." Ruins of Time Exemplified in Hale's Pleas of the Crown, by Amos, Pref. x.

Some of the leading principles of the English and American system of criminal law are—First. Every man is presumed to be innocent until the contrary is shown ; and if there is any reasonable doubt of his guilt, he is entitled to the benefit of the doubt. See 123 U. S. 623. Second. In general, no person can be brought to trial until a grand jury on examination of the charge has found reason to hold him for trial. 121 U. S. 1. Third. The prisoner is entitled to trial by a jury of his peers, who are chosen from the body of the people with a view to impartiality, and whose decision on questions of fact is final. Fourth. The question of his guilt is to be determined without reference to his general character. By the systems of continental Europe, on the contrary, the tribunal not only examines the evidence relating to the offence, but looks at the probabilities arising from the prisoner's previous history and habits of life. Fifth. The prisoner cannot be required to criminate himself. (The general rule, however, now seems to be in jurisdictions where there is no statutory prohibition, that an accused person testifying in his own behalf may be cross-examined like any other witness; 131 N. Y. 651; 50 id. 240; 73 Mich. 10; 105 Ind. 469; 122 id. 527; 36 Kan. 90; 11 Nev. 17; 105 Ill. 413. See for a full discussion of this question, Rice, Ev. § 223 and note; 142 U. S. 547.) Sixth. He cannot be twice put in jeopardy for the same offence. See 142 U. S. 148; 131 id. 176. Seventh. He cannot be punished for an act which was not an offence by the law existing at the time of its commission; nor can a severer punishment be inflicted than was declared by law at that time.

CRIMINAL LAW AMENDMENT ACT. This act was passed in 1871, 34 & 35 Vict. c. 32, to prevent and punish any violence, threats, or molestation, on the part either of master or workmen, in the various relations arising between them. 4 Steph. Com. 241.

CRIMINAL LAW CONSOLIDATION ACTS. The stats. 24 & 25 Vict. cc. 94-100, passed in 1861, for the consolidation of the criminal law of England and Ireland. 4 Steph. Com. 227. These important statutes amount to a codification of the modern criminal law of England. See Bruce's Archb. Pl. & Ev. in Cr. Ca. 1875.

CRIMINAL LETTERS. In Scotch Law. A summons issued by the lord advocate or his deputies as the means of commencing a criminal process. It differs from an indictment, and is like a criminal information at common law.

CRIMINAL PROCEDURE. The method pointed out by law for the apprehension, trial, or prosecution, and fixing the punishment of those persons who have broken or violated, or are supposed to have broken or violated, the laws prescribed for the regulation of the conduct of the people of the community, and who have thereby laid themselves liable to fine or imprisonment, or both. A. & E. Encyc. Law. See PROCEDURE.

CRIMINAL PROCESS. Process which issues to compel a person to answer for a crime or misdemeanor. 1 Stew. 26.

CRIMINALITER. Criminally; on criminal process.

CRIMINATE. To exhibit evidence of the commission of a criminal offence.

It is a rule that a witness cannot be compelled to answer any question which has a tendency to expose him to a penalty, or to any kind of punishment, or to a criminal charge; 4 St. Tr. 6; 6 id. 649; 10 How. St. Tr. 1090; 1 Cra. 144; 2 Yerg. 110; 5 Day 260; 8 Wend. 598; 12 S. & R. 284; 18 Me. 272; 13 Ark. 307. Such a statement cannot be used to show guilt and a confession must be free and voluntary; 107 Mass. 180. If a defendant offers himself as a witness to disprove a criminal charge, he cannot excuse himself from answering on the ground that by so doing he may criminate himself; 122 Ill. 235. See CRIMINAL LAW.

An accomplice admitted to give evidence against his associates in guilt is bound to make a full and fair confession of the whole truth respecting the subject-matter of the prosecution; 10 Pick. 477; 2 Stark. Ev. 12, note; but he is not bound to answer with respect to his share in other offences, in which he was not concerned with the prisoner; 9 Cow. 721, note(a); 2 C. & P. 411.

CRIMP. One who decoys and plunders sailors under cover of harboring them. Wharton.

CRITICISM. The art of judging skillfully of the merits or beauties, defects or faults, of a literary or scientific composition, or of a production of art. When the criticism is reduced to writing, the writing itself is called a criticism.

Liberty of criticism must be allowed, or there would be neither purity of taste nor of morals. Fair discussion is essentially necessary to the truth of history and the advancement of science. That publication, therefore, is not a libel which has for its object not to injure the reputation of an individual, but to correct misrepresentations of facts, to refute sophistical reasoning, to expose a vicious taste for literature, or to censure that which is hostile to morality; 1 Campb. 351. As every man who publishes a book commits himself to the judgment of the public, any one may comment on his performance. If the commentator does not step aside from the work, or introduce fiction for the purpose of condemnation, he exercises a fair and legitimate right. The critic does a good service to the public who writes down any such rapid or useless publication as should never have appeared; and, although the author may suffer a loss from it, the law does not consider such loss an injury; because it is a loss which the party ought to sustain. It is the loss of fame and profit to which he was never entitled; 1 Campb. 358, n. See 1 Esp. 28; Stark. Lib. and Sl. 228-234; 4 Bingham. N. S. 92; 3 Scott 340; 1 Mood. & M. 74. 187; Cooke, Def. 52; 20 Q. B. D. 275. See LIBEL; SLANDER.

CROFT. A little close adjoining a dwelling-house, and enclosed for pasture and tillage or any particular use. Jacob, Law Dict. A small place fenced off in which to keep farm-cattle. Spelman, Gloss. The word is now entirely obsolete.

CROP. See EMBLEMENTS; A WAY-GOING CROP.

CROPPER. One who, having no interest in the land, works it in consideration of receiving a portion of the crop for his labor. 2 Rawle 12; 71 N. C. 7.

CROSS. A mark made by persons who are unable to write, instead of their names.

When properly attested, and proved to have been made by the party whose name is written with the mark, it is generally admitted as evidence of the person's signature.

The word intersect ordinarily means the same as to cross; literally to cut into or between. 45 Conn. 344.

CROSS-ACTION. An action by a defendant in an action, against the plaintiff in the same action, upon the same contract, or for the same tort. Thus, if Peter bring an action of trespass against Paul, and Paul bring another action of trespass against Peter, the subject of the dispute being an assault and battery, it is evident that Paul could not set off the assault committed upon him by Peter, in the action which Peter had brought against him; therefore a cross-action becomes necessary. 10 Ad. & E. 643.

CROSS-APPEAL. Where both parties to a judgment appeal therefrom, the appeal of each is called a cross-appeal as regards that of the other. 3 Steph. Com. 581.

CROSS-BILL. In Equity Practice. One which is brought by a defendant in a suit against a plaintiff in or against other defendants in the same suit, or against both, touching the matters in question in the original bill. Story, Eq. Pl. § 389; Mitf. Eq. Pl. 80. It is brought either to obtain a discovery of facts, in aid of the defence to the original bill, or to obtain full and complete relief to all parties, as to the matters charged in the original bill; 17 How. 595.

It is considered as a defence to the original bill, and is treated as a dependency upon the original suit; 1 Eden, Inj. 190; 3 Atk. 312; 19 E. L. & Eq. 325; 14 Ark. 346; 14 Ga. 674; 14 Vt. 208; 15 Ala. 501; 35 N. H. 251. It is usually brought either to obtain a necessary discovery, as, for example, where the plaintiff's answer under oath is desired; 3 Swanst. 474; 3 Y. & C. 594; 2 Cox, Ch. 109; or to obtain full relief for all parties, since the defendant in a bill could originally only pray for a dismissal from court, which would not prevent subsequent suits; 1 Ves. 284; 2 Sch. & L. 9, 11, n., 144, n. (z); 2 Stockt. 107; 14 Ill. 229; 20 Ga. 472; or where the defendants have conflicting interests; 9 Cow. 747; 1 Sandf. 108; 2 Wis. 299; but may not introduce new parties; 17 How. 130; unless affirmative relief is demanded and justice so requires; 37 W. Va. 376. It is also used for the same purpose as a plea pais darrein continuance at law; 2 Ball & B. 140; 2 Atk. 177, 553; 1 Stor. 218.

It should state the original bill, and the proceedings thereon, and the rights of the party exhibiting the bill which are necessary to be made the subject of a cross-litigation, on the grounds on which he resists the claims of the plaintiff in the original bill, if that is the object of the new bill; Mitf. Eq. Pl. 81; and it should not introduce new and distinct matters; 8 Cow. 361.

It should be brought before publication; 1 Johns. Ch. 62; 13 Ga. 478; and not after, —to avoid perjury; 7 Johns. Ch. 250; Nelson 103.

In England it need not be brought before the same court; Mitf. Eq. Pl. 81 et seq. For the rule in the United States, see 11 Wheat 446; Story, Eq. Pl. § 401; Dan. Ch. Pl. & Pr. 1549.

It is error to dismiss a cross-bill on demurrer in vacation without affording an opportunity to amend; 94 Ala. 236.

CROSS-COMPLAINT. This is allowed when a defendant has a cause of action against a co-defendant, or a person not a party to the action, and affecting the subject-matter of the action. The only real difference between a complaint and a cross-complaint, is, that the first is filed by the plaintiff and the second by the defendant. Both contain a statement of the facts, and each demands affirmative relief upon the facts stated. The difference between a counter-claim and a cross-complaint is that in the former the defendant's cause of action is against the plaintiff; and the latter, against a co-defendant, or one not a party to the action; 32 Ark. 290.

CROSS-DEMAND. A demand is so called which is preferred by B, in opposition to one already preferred against him by A.

CROSS-ERRORS. Errors assigned by the respondent in a writ of error.

CROSS-EXAMINATION. In Practice. The examination of a witness by the party opposed to the party who called him, and who examined, or was entitled to examine, him in chief. See 4 Alb. L. J. 100.

In England and some of the states of the United States, when a competent witness is called and sworn, the other party is ordinarily entitled to cross-examine him as to matters not covered by the direct examination; 1 Esp. 357; 17 Pick. 490; 2 Wend. 166, 483; 23 Ga. 154; 32 Miss. 405; see 3 C. & P. 16; 2 M. & R. 273; 23 Ga. 154; but see 122 Mass. 578; but it is held in other states and in the federal courts that the cross-examination is confined to facts and circumstances connected with matters stated in the direct examination; 3 Wash. C. C. 580; 14 Pet. 448; 16 S. & R. 77; 6 W. & S. 75; 2 Dutch. 463; 5 Cal. 450; 4 Iowa 477; 4 Mich. 67; 95 id. 360; 145 Ill. 538; 127 id. 652; 96 Cal. 113; 23 Neb. 706; 92 Pa. 112; 96 id. 436. But see 12 La. Ann. 826; 2 Pat. & H. 616. In Pennsylvania, a party who is a witness on his own behalf may be fully cross-examined on any relevant matter.

Inquiry may be made in regard to collateral facts in the discretion of the judge; 7 C. & P. 389; 5 Wend. 305; 97 Ala. 681; but not merely for the purpose of contradicting the witness by other evidence; 1 Stark. Ev. 164; 7 East 108; 2 Lew. C. C. 154, 156; 7 C. & P. 789; 16 Pick. 157; 8 Me. 42; 2 Gall. 51. And see 1 Exch. 91; 7 Cl. & F. 122; 4 Denio 502; 2 Ired. 346; 14 Pet. 461; 67 Hun 648. Considerable latitude should be allowed in cross-examining witnesses as to value, in order that the ground of their opinion may appear; 148 Mass. 326.

As to whether a witness not cross-examined after the close of his examination in chief may be recalled and cross-examined see 1 Greenl. Ev. § 447; 1 Stark. Ev. 164; 16 S. & R. 77; 17 Pick. 498; 104 Pa. 117.

A written paper identified by the witness as having been written by him may be introduced in the course of a cross-examination as a part of the evidence of the party producing it, if necessary for the purposes of the cross-examination; 16 Jur. 103; 8 C. & P. 369; 2 Brod. & B. 289.

A cross-examination as to matters not otherwise admissible in evidence entitles the party producing the witness to re-examine him as to those matters; 3 Ad. & E. 554; 17 Tex. 417. If the defendant be permitted on cross-examination to lead out new matter, constituting his own case, which he had not opened to the jury, to the injury of the plaintiff, it is ground for reversal; 114 Pa. 35; 104 id. 207.

Leading questions may be put in cross-examination; 1 Stark. Ev. 96; 1 Phill. Ev. 210; Tayl. Ev. 1233; 6 W. & S. 75. For some suggestions as to the propriety of cross-examination in various cases and the most expedient manner of conducting it, see 2 Pothier, Obl. Evans ed. 233; 1 Stark. Ev. 160, 161; Archb. Cr. Pl. 111.

The trial court has not such a discretion with regard to the extent and scope of the cross-examination of the defendant in a criminal cause as it is permitted to exercise in the examination of other witnesses; 96 Cal. 171. See 40 La. Ann. 589.

CROSS-REMAINDER. Where a particular estate is conveyed to several persons in common, or various parcels of the same land are conveyed to several persons in severalty, and upon the termination of the interest of either of them his share is to remain over to the rest, the remainders so limited over are said to be cross-remainders. In deeds, such remainders cannot arise without express limitation. In wills, they frequently arise by implication; 1 Prest. Est. 94; 2 Hilliard, R. P. 44; 4 Kent 201; Chal. R. P. 241.

CROSS-RULES. Rules entered where each of the opposite litigants obtained a rule nisi, as the plaintiff to increase the damages, and the defendant to enter a nonsuit. Wharton.

CROSSED-CHECK. See CHECK.

CROSSING. The intersection at grade of a public highway by another or by a railroad, or of one railroad by another.

It is generally the duty of a railroad company to construct, maintain, and repair the crossing where it intersects a public highway at grade; 42 Ia. 234. It is bound to keep the approaches in a safe condition; 52 Mich. 108. And it must so construct, repair, and improve the crossing as to meet the increasing wants of the people; 133 Mass. 185; 32 Conn. 241. The obligation to maintain the crossing begins when the railroad is located over it; 101 Pa. 192; 60 Wis. 264; and it is a continuing duty; 56 Pa. 280; 75 Ill. 524; 51 Me. 313. Having crossed a highway the railroad company must restore it to such a condition that its usefulness will not be unnecessarily impaired; 89 N. Y. 266; and it is liable for a failure to construct and maintain suitable crossings at all points where it intersects a public highway at grade; 42 Ia. 234; A. & E. Encyc. See, generally, 14 R. I. 108; GRADE-CROSSINGS.

CRUDE. In its natural state; not cooked or prepared by fire or heat; undressed; not altered, refined or prepared for use by any artificial process; raw. 102 U. S. 198.

CRUEL AND UNUSUAL PUNISHMENT. See PUNISHMENT.

CRUELTY. As between husband and wife. Those acts which affect the life, the health, or even the comfort, of the party aggrieved, and give a reasonable apprehension of bodily hurt, are called cruelty. What merely wounds the feelings is seldom admitted to be cruelty, unless the act be accompanied with bodily injury, either actual or menaced. Mere austerity of temper, petulance of manners, rudeness of language, a want of civil attention and accommodation, even occasional outbreaks of passion, will not amount to legal cruelty; 17 Conn. 189; à fortiori, the denial of such indulgences and particular accommodations, as are ordinarily considered necessities, is not cruelty. The negative descriptions of cruelty are perhaps best adapted, under the infinite variety of cases that may occur, to illustrate what is not cruelty; 1 Hagg. Cons. 35; 4 Eccl. 238, 311, 312; 1 Hagg. Eccl. 733, 768, n.; 1 Add. Eccl. 29; 11 Jur. 490; 1 Hagg. Cons. 37, 458; 2 id. 154; 1 Phill. Eccl. 111, 132; 1 M'Cord 205; 2 J. J. Marsh. 324; 8 N. As instances of physical cruelty may be noted: an attempt to kill; 14 Cal. 512; 32 La. Ann. 644; an attempt to poison; 34 Ark. 37; 76 Iowa 443; 66 Pa. 494; choking; 114 Ind. 558; 79 Mich. 124; 57 Miss. 330; kicking; 19 Ala. 307; 116 Ill. 509; 88 Iowa 210; 83 Va. 806; whipping; 31 Ga. 625; 65 Md. 104; spitting in the face; 1 N. J. Eq. 474; Wright 557; communicating venereal disease; 94 Cal. 225; 16 R. I. 92; inexcusable neglect during sickness; 78 Iowa 691; 116 Ill. 509; 114 Ind. 558.

As instances of cruelty producing mental suffering: a false charge of adultery; 69 Ala. 84; 110 N. Y. 183; 130 Pa. 6; the commission of certain crimes, such as rape; 95 Cal. 430; keeping a mistress; [1891] Prob. 189; religious opinions, in certain cases; 74 Tex. 414; may be mentioned. See DIVORCE; LEGAL CRUELTY.

Cruelty towards weak and helpless persons takes place where a party bound to provide for and protect them either abuses them by whipping them unnecessarily, or by neglecting to provide for them those necessities which their helpless condition requires. Exposing a person of tender years, under one's care, to the inclemency of the weather; 2 Campb. 650; keeping such a child, unable to provide for himself, without adequate food; 1 Leach 137; Russ. & R. 20; or an overseer neglecting to provide food and medical care to a pauper having urgent and immediate occasion for them; Russ. & R. 46, 47, 48; are examples of this species of cruelty.

The improper treatment and employment of children has of late years attracted much attention, and in many of the principal cities, beginning with New York, in April, 1875, societies for the prevention of cruelty to children have been formed, authorized to prosecute persons who maltreat children, or force them to pursue improper and dangerous employments; N. Y. Act of April 21, 1875; Delafield on Children, 1876. Stat. 42 & 43 Vict. c. 34 regulates certain employments for children. By the act of Congress of February 13, 1885, the association for the prevention of cruelty to animals for the District of Columbia, was authorized to extend its operation, under the name of the Washington Humane Society, to the protection of children as well as animals from cruelty and abuse, and the agents of the society have power to prefer complaints for the violation of any law relating to or affecting the protection of children. They may also bring before the court any child who is subjected to cruel treatment, abuse or neglect, or any child under sixteen years of age found in a house of ill-fame, and the court may commit such child to an orphan asylum or other public charitable institution, and any person wilfully or cruelly maltreating, or wrongfully employing such child, is liable to punishment. 23 Stat. L. 302.

Cruelty to animals is an indictable offence. A defendant was convicted of a misdemeanor for tying the tongue of a calf so near the root as to prevent its sucking, in order to sell the cow at a greater price, by giving to her udder the appearance of being full of milk while affording the calf all it needed; 6 Rog. Rec. N. Y. 62. A man may be indicted for cruelly beating his horse; 3 Rog. Rec. N. Y. 191; 4 Cra. 483; 3 Campb. 143; 9 L. T. R. N. s. 175; 7 Allen 579; 1 Aik. 226; 3 B. & S. 382; 44 N. II. 392; 4 Tex. App. 12, 234, 486; 4 Mo. App. 215; 52 id. 520; 85 Ill. 457; 150 Mass. 509. See 101 Mass. 34; 2 Curt. C. C. 194; 112 N. C. 887; 22 S. W. Rep. (Tex.) 39.

The treatment of animals has been the subject of much recent legislation, and, beginning with New York, societies have been organized in the United States and Europe for their protection, similar in their scope and power to those above referred to for children.

Under 12 and 13 Vict. c. 92, § 2, dishorning cattle is not an offence where the operation is skilfully performed; 16 Cox, Cr. Cas. 101. This practice is allowed in Pennsylvania; Act Pa. 1895, June 25, P. L. 286. In Massachusetts it was held that a fox is an animal in the sense of the statute, and a person letting loose a captive fox to be subjected to unnecessary suffering (for the purpose of being hunted by dogs) was liable to punishment; 145 Mass. 296. A common carrier by land or water from one state to another is liable to punishment for confining cattle, sheep, swine or other animals for a longer period than twenty-eight hours, without unloading them for rest, water and feeding, for at least five consecutive hours; U. S. Rev. Stat. §§ 4386-89.

CRUISE. A voyage or expedition in quest of vessels or fleets of the enemy which may be expected to sail in any particular track at a certain season of the year. The region in which these cruises are performed is usually termed the rendezvous, or cruising-latitude.

When the ships employed for this purpose, which are accordingly called cruisers, have arrived at the destined station, they traverse the sea backwards and forwards, under an easy sail, and within a limited space, conjectured to be in the track of their expected adversaries. Wesk. Ins.; Lex Merc. Red. 271, 284; Dougl. 509; Marsh. Ins. 196, 199, 520; 2 Gall. 268, 526.

CRY DE PAYS, CRY DE PAIS. A hue and cry raised by the country. This was allowable in the absence of the constable when a felony had been committed.

CRYER. See CRIER.

CUCKING-STOOL. An engine or machine for the punishment of scolds and unquiet women, Called also a trebucket, tumbrell, and castigatory. Bakers and brewers were formerly also liable to the same punishment. Being fastened in the machine, they were immersed over head and ears in some pool; Blount; Co. 3d Inst. 219; 4 Bla. Com. 168.

CUI ANTE DIVORTIUM (L. Lat. The full phrase was, Cui ipsa ante divortium contradicere non potuit, whom she before the divorce could not gainsay). In Practice. A writ which anciently lay in favor of a woman who had been divorced from her husband, to recover lands and tenements which she had in fee-simple, fee-tail, or for life, from him to whom her husband had aliened them during marriage, when she could not gainsay it; Fitzh. N. B. 240; 3 Bla. Com. 183, n.; Stearns, Real Act. 143; Booth, Real Act. 188. Abolished in 1833 by stat. 3 & 4 Will. IV. c. 27.

CUI IN VITA (L. Lat. The full phrase was, Cui in vita sua, ipsa contradicere non potuit, whom in his lifetime she could not gainsay). In Practice. A writ of entry which lay for a widow against a person to whom her husband had in his lifetime aliened her lands. Fitzh. N. B. 193. The object of the writ was to avoid a judgment obtained against the husband by confession or default. It is now of no use in England by force of the provisions of the statute 32 Hen. VIII. c. 28, § 6. See 6 Co. 8, 9; Booth, Real Act. 186. As to its use in Pennsylvania, see 3 Binn. Appx.; Rep. Comm. on Penn. Civ. Code, 1835, 90, 91. Abolished in England by 3 & 4 Will. IV. c. 27.

CUL DE SAC (Fr. bottom of a bag). A street which is open at one end only.

It seems not to be settled whether a cul de sac is to be considered a highway; but the authorities are generally to the contrary. See 11 East 376, note; 5 Taunt. 137; 5 B. & Ald. 456; Hawk. Pl. Cr. b. 1, c. 76, s. 1; Dig. 50. 16. 43; 43. 12. 1. § 13; 47. 10. 15. § 7.

In order to become a public highway by dedication, a way must be a thoroughfare, which a cul de sac could not be; Washb. Easements 182, 213.

CULPA. A fault; negligence. Jones, Bailm. 8.

Culpa is to be distinguished from dolus, the latter being a trick for the purpose of deception, the former merely a negligence. There are three degrees of culpa: lata culpa, gross fault or neglect; levis culpa, ordinary fault or neglect; levissima culpa, slight fault or neglect; and the definitions of these degrees are precisely the same as those in our law. Story, Bailm. § 18; 8 Allen 121; 49 N. H. 887. See NEGLIGENCE.

CULPABLE. This means not only criminal but censurable; and when the term is applied to the omission by a person to preserve the means of enforcing his own rights, censurable is more nearly equivalent. As he has merely lost a right of action which he might voluntarily relinquish, and has wronged nobody but himself, culpable neglect would seem to convey the idea of neglect for which he was to blame and is ascribed to his own carelessness, improvidence or folly. 8 Allen, 122.

CULPRIT. A person who is guilty, or supposed to be guilty, of a crime.

When a prisoner is arraigned, and he pleads not guilty, in English practice, the clerk, who arraigns him on behalf of the crown, replies that the prisoner is guilty, and that he is ready to prove the accusation. This is done by writing two monosyllabic abbreviations,—cul. prit. 4 Bla. Com. 339; 1 Chit. Cr. Law 416. See Christian's note to Bla. Com. cited; 3 Sharsw. Bla. Com. 340, n. 9. The technical meaning has disappeared, and the compound is used in the popular sense as above given.

CULTIVATED. A field may be cultivated ground, though lying fallow. 13 Ired. L. 36. See 4 Cow. 190.

CULVERTAGE. A base kind of slavery. The confiscation or forfeiture which takes place when a lord seizes his tenant's estate. Blount; Du Cange.

CUM ONERE (Lat.). With the burden; subject to the incumbrance; subject to the charge. A purchaser with knowledge of an incumbrance takes the property cum onere. Co. Litt. 231 a; 7 East 164; Paley, Ag. 175.

CUM TESTAMENTO ANNEXO (Lat.). With the will annexed. The term is applied to administration when there is no executor named in a will, or if he is named is incapable of acting, or where the executor named refuses to act.

CUMULATIVE EVIDENCE. That which goes to prove what has already been established by other evidence. 20 Conn. 305; 28 Me. 379; 24 Pick. 246; 43 Barb. 203; 43 Iowa 175.

Newly discovered evidence, if cumulative merely, is not sufficient ground for a new trial; 33 Neb. 731; 87 Ga. 244; 35 W. Va. 418; 3 Wyo. 680; 69 Miss. 152; 43 Ill. App. 301.

CUMULATIVE LEGACY. See LEGACY.

CUMULATIVE SENTENCES. See ACCUMULATIVE SENTENCES.

CUMULATIVE REMEDY. A remedy created by statute in addition to one which still remains in force.

CUNEATOR. A coiner. Du Cange. Cuneare, to coin. Cuneus, the die with which to coin. Cuneata, coined. Du Cange; Spelman, Gloss.

CURATE. One who represents the incumbent of a church, parson or vicar, and takes care of the church and performs divine services in his stead. An officiating temporary minister in the English church who represents the proper incumbent. Burn, Eccl. Law; 1 Bla. Com. 393. See CURE OF SOULS.

CURATIO (Lat.). In Civil Law. The power or duty of managing the property of him who, either on account of infancy or some defect of mind or body, cannot manage his own affairs. The duty of a curator or guardian. Calvinus, Lex.

CURATOR. In Civil Law. One legally appointed to take care of the interests of one who, on account of his youth, or defect of his understanding, or for some other cause, is unable to attend to them himself ; a guardian.

There are curators ad bona (of property), who administer the estate of a minor, take care of his person, and intervene in all of his contracts ; curators ad litem (of suits), who assist the minor in courts of justice, and act as curators ad bona in cases where the interests of the curator are opposed to the interests of the minor. There are also curators of insane persons, and of vacant successions and absent heirs.

In Missouri the term has been adopted from the civil law and it is applied to the guardian of the ward's estate, as distinct from the guardian of his person ; 49 Mo. 117.

Under the Roman law, the guardian of a minor, both as to person or property, was called a tutor (q. v.) ; and if, after being of an age to exercise his rights, he needed a person to look after his rights, such person was called a curator. Sanders, Inst. Just. Introd. xl. A person who had attained the age of puberty was not required to have a curator, but if he had much property he was almost certain to have one, as it was part of his tutor's duty to urge him to do so ; id. 74 ; Dig. xxvi. 7. 5. 5.

Interim Curator. In England. A person appointed by justices of the peace to take care of the property of a felon convict until the appointment by the crown of an administrator for the same purpose ; Stat. 33 & 34 Vict. c. 23 ; 4 Steph. Com. 402 ; Mozl. & W. Diet.

CURATOR BONIS (Lat.). In Civil Law. A guardian to take care of the property. Calvinus, Lex.

In Scotch Law. A guardian for minors, lunatics, etc. Halkers, Tech. Terms ; Bell, Diet.

CURATOR AD HOC. A guardian for this special purpose.

A curator ad hoc can be appointed to proceed against the tutor for an accounting or his removal only when there is no undertutor ; 45 La. Ann. 1062.

CURATOR AD LITEM (Lat.). Guardian for the suit. In English law, the corresponding phrase is guardian ad litem.

CURATORSHIP. The office of a curator.

Curatorship differs from tutorship (q. v.) in this, that the latter is instituted for the protection of property in the first place, and secondly, of the person ; while the former is intended to protect, first, the person, and, secondly, the property. 1 Leçons Elem. du Droit Civ. Rom. 241.

CURATRIX. A woman who has been appointed to the office of a curator.

CURE BY VERDICT. See AIDER BY VERDICT.

CURE OF SOULS. The ordinary duties of an officiating clergyman.

Curate more properly denotes the incumbent in general who hath the cure of souls ; but more frequently it is understood to signify a clerk not instituted to the cure of souls, but exercising the spiritual office in a parish under the rector or vicar. 2 Burn, Eccl. Law 54 ; 1 H. Bla. 424.

CURFEW (French, couvre, to cover, and feu, fire). This is generally supposed to be an institution of William the Conqueror, who required, by ringing of the bell at eight o'clock in the evening, that all lights and fires in dwellings should then be extinguished. But the custom is evidently older than the Norman ; for we find an order of King Alfred that the inhabitants of Oxford should at the ringing of that bell cover up their fires and go to bed. And there is evidence that the same practice prevailed at this period in France, Normandy, Spain, and probably in most of the other countries of Europe. Henry, Hist. of Britain, vol. 3, 567. It was doubtless intended as a precaution against fires, which were very frequent and destructive when most houses were built of wood.

That it was not intended as a badge of infamy is evident from the fact that the law was of equal obligation upon the nobles of court and upon the native-born serfs. And yet we find the name of curfew law employed as a by-word denoting the most odious tyranny.

The curfew is spoken of by a recent writer in 1 Social England 373, as having been ordained by William I. in order to prevent nightly gatherings of the people of England.

It appears to have met with so much opposition that in 1103 we find Henry I. repealing the enactment of his father on the subject ; and Blackstone says that, though it is mentioned a century afterwards, it is rather spoken of as a time of night than as a still subsisting custom. Shakespeare frequently refers to it in the same sense. This practice is still pursued, in many parts of England and of this country, as a very convenient mode of apprising people of the time of night.

CURIA. In Roman Law. One of the divisions of the Roman people. The Roman people were divided by Romulus into three tribes and thirty curia : the members of each curia were united by the tie of common religious rites, and also by certain common political and civil powers. Dion. Hal. l. 2, p. 82 ; Liv. l. 1, cap. 13 ; Plut. in Romulo, p. 30 ; Festus Brisson, in verb.

In later times the word signified the senate or aristocratic body of the provincial cities of the empire. Brisson, in verb. ; Ortolan, Histoire, no. 25, 408 ; Ort. Inst. no. 125.

The senate-house at Rome ; the senate-house of a provincial city. Cod. 10. 31. 2 ; Spelman, Gloss.

In English Law. The king's court ; the palace ; the royal household. The residence of a noble ; a manor or chief manse ; the hall of a manor. Spelman, Gloss.

A court of justice, whether of general or special jurisdiction. Fleta. lib. 2, l. 72, § 1 ; Feud. lib. 1, 2, 22 ; Spelman ; Cowel ; 3 Bla. Com. c. iv. See COURT.

A court-yard or enclosed piece of ground ; a close. Stat. Edw. Conf. 1, 6 ; Bracton, 76, 222 b, 335 b, 356 b, 358 ; Spelman, Gloss. See CURIA CLAUDENDA.

The civil or secular power, as distinguished from the church. Spelman, Gloss.

CURIA ADVISARE VULT (Lat.). The court wishes to consider the matter.

In Practice. The entry formerly made upon the record to indicate the continuance of a cause until a final judgment should be rendered.

It is commonly abbreviated thus : cur. adv. vult, or c. a. v. Thus, from amongst many examples, in Clement v. Chivis, 2 B. & C. 172, after the report of the argument we find "cur. adv. vult," then, "on a subsequent day judgment was delivered," etc.

CURIA CLAUDENDA (Lat.). In Practice. A writ which anciently lay to compel a party to enclose his land. Fitzh. N. B. 297.

CURIA REGIS (Lat.). The king's court. See AULA REGIA.

CURIALITY. In Scotch Law. Curtesy.

CURRENCY. This term is commonly used for whatever passes among the people for money, whether gold or silver coin or bank notes. 32 Ill. 74; 9 Mo. 697; 1 Ohio 115, 119; 1 Hask. 385; 16 Ia. 323; 47 Wis. 560. See 9 Cent. L. J. 488.

CURRENT MONEY. That which is in general use as a medium of exchange.

It means the same thing as currency of the country. 5 Lea 96.

The adjective "current," when qualifying money, is not the synonym of "convertible." It is employed to describe money which passes from hand to hand, from person to person, and circulates through the community and is generally received. Money is current which is received in the common business transactions, and is the common medium in barter and trade; 41 Ala. 321.

Current money means that money which is commonly used and recognized as such; current bank notes, such as are convertible into specie at the counter where they were issued. 1 Dall. 124; 7 Ark. 282; see 20 La. Ann. 368; 14 Mich. 501; 1 Yeates 349; 28 Ill. 332, 388; 32 id. 75; 9 Ind. 135; 3 T. B. Monr. 166; 21 La. Ann. 624; 64 N. C. 381; 41 Ala. 321.

CURSITOR. A junior clerk in the court of chancery, whose business it formerly was to write out from the register those forms of writs which issued of course. 1 Poll. & M. Hist. Engl. Law 174.

Such writs were called writs de cursu (of course), whence the name, which had been acquired as early as the reign of Edward III. The body of cursitors constituted a corporation, each clerk having a certain number of counties assigned to him. Coke, 2d Inst. 670; 1 Spence, Eq. Jur. 238. The office was abolished by 5 & 6 Will. IV. c. 82.

CURSITOR BARON. An officer of the court of exchequer, who is appointed by patent under the great seal to be one of the barons of the exchequer. The office was abolished by stat. 19 & 20 Vict. c. 86. Wharton, Dict., 2d Lond. ed.

CURTESY. The estate to which by common law a man is entitled, on the death of his wife, in the lands or tenements of which she was seised in possession in fee simple or in tail during their coverture, provided they have had lawful issue born alive which might have been capable of inheriting the estate. Chal. R. P. 314.

An estate for life which a husband takes at the death of his wife, having had issue by her born alive during coverture, in all lands of which she was seised in fact of an inheritable estate during coverture.

The right of the husband to enjoy during his life land of which his wife is at any time during coverture seised in fee simple (absolute or defeasible) or in fee tail, provided there was issue born alive to the marriage. Demb. Land Tit. § 109.

It is a freehold estate for the term of his natural life. 1 Washb. R. P. 127. In the common law the word is used in the phrases tenant by curtesy, or estate by curtesy, but seldom alone; while in Scotland of itself it denotes the estate. The phrase "tenant by the law of England" was also used, and is said to have been of earlier origin; 2 Poll. & M. Hist. of Engl. Law 412.

Some question has been made as to the derivation both of the custom and its name. It is said that the term is derived from curtis, a court, and that the custom, in England at least, is of English origin, though a similar custom existed in Normandy, and still exists in Scotland. 1 Washb. R. P. 128, n.; Wright, Ten. 192; Co. Litt. 30 a; 2 Bla. Com. 126; Ersk. Inst. 380; Grand Cout. de Normandie, c. 119. But a recent work considers this derivation "more ingenious than satisfactory," and suggests that it is possible to explain the phrase by "some royal concession," as "being reasonable enough." 2 Poll. & M. Hist. Engl. Law 412.

In Pennsylvania, by act of April 8, 1833, issue of the marriage is no longer necessary, so that the husband gains a freehold by the marriage itself; 10 Pa. 399; but the law applies only when the estate is devisable, not to an estate tail or defeasible fee; 152 Pa. 303. Ohio, Illinois, Kentucky, and Maine reduce the husband's life estate to one-third, calling it "dower," and dispense with birth of issue alive, while dower remains unchanged. In South Carolina and Georgia, curtesy has gone out of use, the husband having under the law greater benefits. Demb. Land Tit. § 109. Louisiana, Texas, California, Nevada, Washington, and Idaho, and Arizona and New Mexico have the "community" system and there is no curtesy; id. § 111. And in Indiana, Iowa, Minnesota, the Dakotas, Kansas, Colorado, Wyoming, and Mississippi, dower is applied by a forced lienship of the widow and there is no curtesy; id. § 108. See DESCENT AND DISTRIBUTION.

CURTLAGE. The enclosed space immediately surrounding a dwelling-house, contained within the same enclosure.

It is defined by Blount as a yard, backside, or piece of ground near a dwelling-house, in which they sow beans, etc., yet distinct from the garden. Blount; Spelman. By others it is said to be a waste piece of ground so situated. Cowel.

It has also been defined as "a fence or enclosure of a small piece of land around a dwelling-house, usually including the buildings occupied in connection with the dwelling-house, the enclosure consisting either of a separate fence or partly of a fence and partly of the exterior of buildings so within this enclosure." 10 Cush. 480.

It usually includes the yard, garden, or field which is near to and used in connection with the dwelling. 83 Ala. 62. See 61 Ala. 58.

The term is used in determining whether the offence of breaking into a barn or warehouse is burglary. See 4 Bla. Com. 224; 1 Hale, Pl. Cr. 558; 2 Russell, Cr. 13; Russ. & R. 289; 1 C. & K. 84.

In Michigan the meaning of curtilage has been extended to include more than an enclosure near the house. 2 Mich. 230. See 31 N. J. L. 485; 17 N. Y. Sup. Ct. 151; 31 Me. 522; 140 Mass. 289.

CURTILLUM. The area or space within the enclosure of a dwelling-house. Spelman, Gloss.

CURTIS. The area about a building; a garden; a hut or farmer's house; a farmer's house with the land enrolled with it.

A village or a walled town containing a small number of houses.

The residence of a nobleman; a hall or palace.

A court; a tribunal of justice. 1 Washb. R. P. 120; Spelman, Gloss.; 3 Bla. Com. 320.

CUSTODES. Keepers; guardians; conservators.

Custodes pacis (guardians of the peace). 1 Bla. Com. 349.

Custodes libertatis Angliæ auctoritate parlamenti (guardians of the liberty of England by authority of parliament). The style in which writs and all judicial process ran during the grand rebellion, from the death of Charles I. till Cromwell was declared Protector. Jacob, Law Dict.

CUSTODIA LEGIS. In the custody of the law.

When property is lawfully taken, by virtue of legal process, it is in the custody of the law, and not otherwise; 7 Wis. 334.

Where a sheriff has taken under attachment more than enough property to satisfy it, the property is not in custodia legis in a sense that will prevent a levy by a U. S. marshal in a suit in the federal court, so as to give the latter creditor a lien on the excess after satisfying the first attachment; 57 Ark. 450. Nor are executions issued on void judgments and their returns admissible against subsequent attaching creditors, to show that the goods were in custodia legis; 51 Mo. App. 470.

For a collection of cases on property and funds in the custody of the courts not subject to attachment or garnishment, see 10 Lawy. Rep. Ann. 529, note.

CUSTODY. The detainer of a person by virtue of a lawful authority. 3 Chit. Pr. 355.

The care and possession of a thing.

Custody has been held to mean nothing less than actual imprisonment; 59 Pa. 320; 82 id. 306. See CUSTODIA LEGIS.

CUSTOM. Such a usage as by common consent and uniform practice has become the law of the place, or of the subject-matter, to which it relates.

Custom is a law established by long usage. 9 Wend. 349.

It differs from prescription, which is personal and is annexed to the person of the owner of a particular estate; while the other is local, and relates to a particular district. An instance of the latter occurs where the question is upon the manner of conducting a particular branch of trade at a certain place; of the former, where a certain person and his ancestors, or those whose estates he has, have been entitled to a certain advantage or privilege, as to have common of pasture in a certain close, or the like. 2 Bla. Com. 263. The distinction has been thus expressed: "While prescription is the making of a right, custom is the making of a law;" Laws. Us. & Cust. 15, n. 2.

General customs are such as constitute a part of the common law of the country and extend to the whole country.

Particular customs are those which are confined to a particular district; or to the members of a particular class; the existence of the former are to be determined by the court, of the latter, by the jury. Laws. Us. & Cust. 15, n. 3; see 23 Me. 90.

In general, when a contract is made in relation to matter about which there is an established custom, such custom is to be understood as forming part of the contract, and may always be referred to for the purpose of showing the intention of the parties in all those particulars which are not expressed in the contract; 2 Pars. Contr. 652, 663; 1 Hall 602; 2 Pet. 138; 5 Binn. 285; 19 Wend. 339; 1 M. & W. 476; L. R. 17 Eq. 358; 25 Me. 401; 7 D. C. 105.

Evidence of a usage is admissible to explain technical or ambiguous terms; 3 B. & Ad. 728; 3 Ind. App. 299; 156 Mass. 331. But evidence of a usage contradicting the terms of a contract is inadmissible; 2 Cr. & J. 244; 113 Mass. 136; 74 N. Y. 586; 1 W. Va. 69; 114 Ill. 28; 1 Misc. Rep. 399; 44 Minn. 153. Nor can a local usage affect the meaning of the terms of a contract unless it is known to both contracting parties; 144 U. S. 476; nor can it affect a contract made elsewhere; 140 U. S. 565.

"Merely that it varies the apparent contract is not enough to exclude the evidence, for it is impossible to add any material incident to the written terms of a contract, without altering its effect more or less. To fall within the exception of repugnancy the incident must be such as, if expressed in the written contract, would make it insensible or inconsistent;" Per cur. in 3 E. & B. 715. See Leake, Contr. 197; 7 E. & B. 274.

In order to establish a custom, it will be necessary to show its existence for so long a time that "the memory of man runneth not to the contrary," and that the usage has continued without any interruption of the right; for, if it has ceased for a time for such a cause, the revival gives it a new beginning, which will be what the law calls within memory. It will be no objection, however, that the exercise of the right has been merely suspended; 1 Bla. Com. 76; 2 id. 31; 14 Mass. 488; 3 Q. B. 581; 6 id. 383; L. R. 7 Q. B. 214; 80 Me. 500. See 32 Mo. App. 298.

It must also have been peaceably acquiesced in and not subject to dispute; for, as customs owe their origin to common consent, their being disputed, either at law or otherwise, shows that such consent was wanting; 2 Wend. 501; 3 Watts 178. In addition to this, customs must be reasonable and certain. A custom, for instance, that land shall descend to the most worthy of the owner's blood is void; for how shall this be determined? But a custom that it shall descend to the next male of the blood, exclusive of females, is certain, and therefore good; 2 Bla. Com. 78; Browne, Us. & Cust. 21. See 43 Fed. Rep. 777.

Evidence of usage is never admissible to oppose or alter a general principle or rule of law so as, upon a given state of facts, to make the legal right and liabilities of the parties other than they are by law; Browne, Us. & Cust. 135, n; 2 Term 327; 19 Wend. 252; 6 Binn. 416; 16 C. B. N. S. 646; 10 Wall. 333; 104 Mass. 518; 85 Ala. 565; 112 N. Y. 530; but the rule is said by Mr. Lawson to extend no further than to usages which "conflict with an established rule of public policy, which it is not to the general interest to disturb." Laws. Us. & Cust. 486. With respect to a usage of trade, however, it is sufficient if it appears to be known, certain, uniform, reasonable, and not contrary to law; 3 Wash. C. C. 150; 7 Pet. 1; 5 Binn. 287; 8 Pick. 360; 4 B. & Ald. 210; 1 C. & P. 59; 87 Tenn. 350. See 159 Mass. 522. But if not directly known to the parties to the transaction, it will still be binding upon them if it appear to be so general and well established that knowledge of it may be presumed; 1 Cai. 43; 4 Stark. 452; 1 Dougl. 510. A usage of trade is sufficiently long continued if it has existed so long as to show that the parties to a contract meant to employ the expression in the sense defined by it; 32 Mo. App. 298. And one who seeks to avoid the effect of a notorious and uniform usage of trade must show that he was ignorant of it; 139 N. Y. 416. A local custom cannot supersede or modify a statute; 109 N. C. 539; 76 Hun 181.

See 26 L. J. Ex. 219; 9 Pick. 198; 2 Caines 219; 2 F. & F. 131; 14 Gray 210; 9 Wheat. 582; 8 S. & R. 533; s. c. 11 Am. Dec. 632; Dougl. 201; 4 Taunt. 848; 49 Ala. 465; 7 Mass. 36; L. R. 2 Ex. 101; 19 Wend. 386; 41 Md. 158; s. c. 20 Am. Rep. 66. See Lawson; Browne; Us. & Cust.; note to Wigglesworth v. Dallison, Sm. Lead. Cas.; [1892] Prob. 411; 91 Ga. 466. See USAGE.

CUSTOM OF MERCHANTS. A system of customs acknowledged and taken notice of by all nations, and which are, therefore, a part of the general law of the land. See LAW MERCHANT; 1 Chit. Bla. Com. 76, n. 9.

CUSTOM-HOUSE. A place appointed by law, in ports of entry, where importers of goods, wares, and merchandise are bound to enter the same, in order to pay or secure the duties or customs due to the government.

CUSTOM-HOUSE BROKER. A person authorized to act for parties, at their option, in the entry or clearance of ships and the transaction of general business. Wharton. See act of July 13, 1866, § 9, 14 U. S. Stat. L. 117.

CUSTOMARY COURT BARON. A court baron at which copyholders might transfer their estates, and where other matters relating to their tenures were transacted. 3 Bla. Com. 33.

This court was held on the manor, the lord or his steward sitting as judge. 1 Crabb, R. P. § 633. It might be held anywhere in the manor, at the pleasure of the judge, unless there was a custom to the contrary. It might exist at the same time with a court baron proper, or even where there were no freeholders in the manor.

A recent work doubts if there was a court for free men and a separate court for unfree men, though in Coke's day it was said that the lord of a manor had "a court baron" for free men and "a customary court" for his copyholders. The court rolls and manuals for stewards of the 13th and 14th centuries do not appear to show two courts; 1 Poll. & M. Hist. Engl. Law 580.

CUSTOMARY ESTATES. Estates which owe their origin and existence to the custom of the manor in which they are held. 2 Bla. Com. 149.

CUSTOMARY FREEHOLD. A class of freeholds held according to the custom of the manor, derived from the ancient tenure in villein socage. Holders of such an estate have a freehold interest, though it is not held by a freehold tenure. 2 Bla. Com. 149. In reference to customary freehold, outside the ancient demesne all the tenures of the non-freeholding peasantry are in law one tenure, tenure in villeinage; 1 Poll. & M. Hist. Engl. Law 384.

CUSTOMARY SERVICE. A service due by ancient custom or prescription only. Such is, for example, the service of doing suit at another's mill, where the persons resident in a particular place, by usage, time out of mind have been accustomed to grind corn at a particular mill. 3 Bla. Com. 234.

CUSTOMARY TENANTS. Tenants who hold by the custom of the manor. 2 Bla. Com. 149.

CUSTOMS. Taxes levied upon goods and merchandise imported or exported. Story, Const. § 949; Bacon, Abr. Smuggling.

The duties, toll, tribute, or tariff payable upon merchandise exported or imported. These are called customs from having been paid from time immemorial. Expressed in law Latin by custuma, as distinguished by consuetudines, which are usages merely. 1 Bla. Com. 314.

CUSTOMS OF LONDON. Particular regulations in force within the city of London, in regard to trade, apprentices, widows and orphans, etc., which are recognized as forming part of the English common law. 1 Bla. Com. 75; 3 Steph. Com. 588, and note. See DEAD MAN'S PART. The custom of London, as regards intestate succession, was abolished by 19 & 20 Vict. c. 94; as regards foreign attachment, it was extended to all England and Wales by the Common Law Procedure Act of 1854, ss. 60-67; and is the basis of the law on that subject in this country. See ATTACHMENT.

CUSTOM OF YORK. A custom of intestacy in the Province of York similar to that of London. Abolished by 19 & 20 Vict. c. 94.

CUSTOS BREVIUM (Lat.). Keeper of writs. An officer of the court of common pleas whose duty it is to receive and keep all the writs returnable to that court and put them upon file, and also to receive of the prothonotaries all records of nisi prius, called postcas. Blount. An officer in the king's bench having similar duties. Cowel: Termes de la Ley. The office is now abolished.

CUSTOS MARIS (Lat.). Warden or guardian of the seas. Among the Saxons, an admiral. Spelman, Gloss. Admiralius.

CUSTOS MOREUM. Applied to the court of queen's bench, as "the guardian of the morals" of the nation. 4 Steph. Com. 377.

CUSTOS PLACITORUM CORONÆ (Lat.). Keeper of the Pleas of the Crown (the criminal records). Said by Blount and Cowel to be the same as the Custos Rotulorum.

CUSTOS ROTULORUM (Lat.). Keeper of the rolls. The principal justice of the peace of a county, who is the keeper of the records of the county. 1 Bla. Com. 349. He is always a justice of the peace and quorum, is the chief civil officer of the king in the county, and is nominated under the king's sign-manual. He is rather to be considered a minister or officer than a judge. Blount; Cowel; Lambard, Eiren. lib. 4, cap. 3, p. 373; 4 Bla. Com. 272; 3 Steph. Com. 37.

CUSTUMA ANTIQUA SIVE MAGNA (Lat. ancient or great duties). The duties on wool, sheepskin or wool-pelts and leather exported were so called, and were payable by every merchant, stranger as well as native, with the exception that merchant strangers paid one-half as much again as natives. 1 Bla. Com. 314.

CUSTUMA PARVA ET NOVA (Lat.). An impost of threepence in the pound sterling on all commodities exported or imported by merchant strangers. Called at first the alien's duty, and first granted by stat. 31 Edw. I. Maddox, Hist. Exch. 526, 532; 1 Bla. Com. 314.

CUT. A wound made with a sharp instrument. 3 La. Ann. 512; 1 Russ. & R. 104. See 12 How. 9, 20.

CYNEBOTE. A mulct anciently paid, by one who killed another, to the kindred of the deceased. Spelman; Gloss.

CY PRES (L. Fr. as near as). The rule of construction applied to a will (but not to a deed) by which, where the testator evinces a general intention to be carried into effect in a particular mode which cannot be followed, the words shall be so construed as to give effect to the general intention. 3 Hare 12; 2 Term 254; 2 Bligh 49; Sugd.

Pow. 60; 1 Spence, Eq. Jur. 532; Bisph. Eq. § 126; McGrath, Cy Pres.

The principle is applied to sustain wills in which perpetuities are attempted to be created, so that, if it can possibly be done, the devise is not regarded as utterly void, but is expounded in such a manner as to carry the testator's intention into effect as far as the law respecting perpetuities will allow. This is called a construction cy pres. Its rules are vague, and depend chiefly upon judicial discretion applied to the particular case. Sedgwick, Stat. Law 265; Story, Eq. Jur. §§ 1167 et seq. A limitation void because it offends the doctrine of perpetuity will be void altogether, and cannot be held under the cy pres rule of construction to be good as to that part which keeps within the period of perpetuity, and void only as to the excess; 142 Ill. 606.

See Tiedman, Real Property.

It is also applied to sustain devises and bequests for charities (q. v.). In its origin the doctrine was applied, in the exercise of the royal prerogative, delegated to the Lord Chancellor under the sign manual of the crown. Where there was a definite charitable purpose which was illegal and could not take place, the chancellor would substitute another. The judicial doctrine under this name is that if charity be the general substantial intention, though the mode provided for its execution fails, the English chancery will find some means of effectuating it, even by applying the fund to a different purpose from that contemplated by the testator, but as near to it as possible, provided only it be charitable; Bisph. Eq. § 129; Boyle, Char. 147, 155; Shelf. Mortm. 601; Beach, Wills 250; 3 Bro. Ch. 379; 4 Ves. 14; 7 id. 69, 82. Where a legacy is given to a charitable institution which exists at the testator's death, but ceases to exist before the legacy is paid over, it becomes the property of the charity on the death of the testator, and upon the charity ceasing to exist it is applicable to charitable purposes according to the doctrine of cy pres; [1891] 2 Ch. 236. Most of the cases carry the doctrine beyond what is allowed where private interests are concerned, and have in no inconsiderable degree to draw for their support on the prerogative of the crown and the statute of charitable uses; 43 Eliz. c. 4. This doctrine does not universally obtain in this country to the disinherison of heirs and next of kin. See CHARITABLE USES; 14 Allen 580; 1 Am. Law Reg. 538; 2 How. 127; 17 id. 369; 24 id. 465; 6 Wall. 337; 4 Wheat. 1; 8 N. Y. 548; 14 id. 380; 22 id. 70.

Where the perpetuity is attempted to be created by deed, all the limitations based upon it are void; Cruise, Dig. t. 38, c. 9, § 34. See, generally, 1 Vern. 250; 2 Ves. 336, 337, 364, 380; 3 id. 141, 220; 4 id. 13; Comyns, Dig. Condition (L. 1); 1 Roper, Leg. 514; Swinb. Wills pl. 4, § 7, a. 4, ed. 1590, p. 31; Dane, Abr. The cypres doctrine has been repudiated by the states of North Carolina, Connecticut, Indiana, Iowa, Alabama, Maryland, Virginia, New York, South Carolina, and Pennsylvania, though in the last state it has been partially introduced by statute. But the doctrine has been approved in all the New England states except Connecticut; in Mississippi and Illinois, and in some states the question has not been decided; Bisph. Eq. § 130; 1 Dev. 276; 22 Conn. 81; 35 Ind. 198; 17 S. & R. 88; 63 Pa. 465; 93 id. 165; 34 N. Y. 584; 33 N. H. 296; 40 Me. 302; 50 Mo. 165; 5

CYROGRAPHARIUS. In Old English Law. A cyrographer. An officer of the common pleas court.

CYROGRAPHUM. A chirograph, which see.

D.

DACION. In Spanish Law. The real and effective delivery of an object in the execution of a contract.

DAILY. Every day; day by day. Web. Where a statute requires an advertisement to be published in a daily newspaper it is such if it uses the term "daily newspaper" in contradistinction to the term "weekly," "semi-weekly," or "tri-weekly" newspaper. The term was used and is to be understood in its popular sense, and in this sense it is clear that a paper which, according to its usual custom, is published every day of the week except one, is a daily newspaper; otherwise a paper which is published every day except Sunday would not be a daily newspaper. 45 Cal. 30.

DAM. A construction of wood, stone, or other materials, made across a stream of water for the purpose of confining it; a mole. See 23 Mich. 93; 19 N. J. Eq. 245.

It is an instrument for turning the water of a stream to the use of a mill, but it may not in fact have been used for that purpose at all, or if at all, in such a way as to affect the original rights of riparian owners on either hand. 44 N. H. 78.

The owner of a stream not navigable may erect a dam across it, provided he do not thereby materially impair the rights of the proprietors above or below to the use of the water in its accustomed flow; Gould, Waters 110, n.; 4 Mas. 401; 13 Johns. 212; 20 id. 90; 9 Pick. 528; 15 Conn. 366; 6 Pa. 32; 14 S. & R. 71; 3 N. H. 321; 127 Mass. 534; 69 Me. 19; 31 Gratt. 86; 49 Ia. 490; 28 Am. L. Reg. 147, n. He may even detain the water for the purposes of a mill, for a reasonable time, to the injury of an older mill,—the reasonableness of the detention in each particular case being a question for the jury; 12 Pa. 248; 17 Barb. 654; 28 Vt. 459; 25 Conn. 321; 2 Gray 394; 38 Me. 243; 64 id. 171; 99 Mass. 474; 38 Mich. 77; 53 N. H. 552. But he must not unreasonably detain the water; 6 Ind. 324; and the jury may find the constant use of the water by night and a detention of it by day to be an unreasonable use, though there be no design to injure others; 10 Cush. 367; see 77 N. Y. 525. Nor has such owner the right to raise his dam so high as to cause the stream to flow back upon the land of supra-riparian proprietors; 1 B. & Ald. 258; 1 S. & S. 203; 12 Ill. 201; 24 N. H. 364; 8 Cush. 595; 19 Pa. 134; 25 id. 519; 38 Me. 237; 59 Ga. 286; 124 Mass. 461. And see BACK-WATER. These rights may, of course, be modified by contract or prescription. See WATERCOURSE. If there be no license or act from which a license will necessarily follow, a person erecting a dam so as to flood the land of another, is a trespasser and acts at his peril; 77 Ga. 809.

When one side of the stream is owned by one person and the other by another, neither, without the consent of the other, can build a dam which extends beyond the filum aquæ, thread of the river, without committing a trespass; Cro. Eliz. 269; Holt 499; 12 Mass. 211; 4 Mas. 397; Angell, Waterc. 14, 104, 141; 69 Pa. 93. See Lois des Bât. p. 1, c. 3, s. 1, a. 3; Pothier, Traité du Contrat de Société, second app. 236; Hillier, Abr. Index; 7 Cow. 266; 2 Watts 327; 3 Rawle 90; 5 Pick. 175; 4 Mass. 401; 17 id. 289; 70 Me. 243.

On the ground of public policy many of the states have enacted statutes enabling persons to build dams on their own land, although in so doing the land of a higher riparian owner may be overflowed; and in some cases this permission is given although the party may own the land on one side only. In all these instances, however, a remedy is provided for assessing the damages resulting from such dam. See Angell, Waterc. §§ 482, 484.

The degree of care which a party who constructs a dam across a stream is bound to use, is in proportion to the extent of injury which will be likely to result to third persons provided it should prove insufficient. It is not enough that the dam is sufficient to resist ordinary floods; for if the stream is occasionally subject to great freshets, these must likewise be guarded against; and the measure of care required in such cases is that which a discreet person would use if the whole risk were his own; 5 Vt. 371; 3 Hill 531; 3 Denio 433; Ang. Waterc. 336; 107 Mass. 492; Washb. Easem. *288, *289; 67 Ind. 236; 51 Conn. 137.

If a mill-dam be so built that it causes a watercourse to overflow the surrounding country, where it becomes stagnant and unwholesome, so that the health of the neighborhood is sensibly impaired, such dam is a public nuisance, for which its owner is liable to indictment; 4 Wis. 387. So it is an indictable nuisance to erect a dam so as to overflow a highway; 4 Ind. 515; 6 Mete. 433; see 12 R. I. 27; or so as to obstruct the navigation of a public river; 1 Stockt. 754; 3 Blackf. 136; 2 Ind. 591; 18 Barb. 277; 4 Watts 437; 38 Mich. 77; 57 Miss. 227; 32 Gratt. 684. See IRRIGATION.

DAMAGE. The loss caused by one person to another, or to his property, either with the design of injuring him, or with negligence and carelessness, or by inevitable accident.

He who has caused the damage is bound to repair it; and if he has done it maliciously he may be compelled to pay beyond the actual loss. When damage occurs by accident without blame to any one, the loss is borne by the owner of the thing injured: as, if a horse run away with his rider, without any fault of the latter, and injure the property of another person, the injury is the loss of the owner of the thing. When the damage happens by the act of God, or inevitable accident, as by tempest, earthquake, or other natural cause, the loss must be borne by the owner. See Comyns. Dig.; Sedgwick; Mayne; Field, Damages; 1 Rutherf. Inst. 399; see COMPENSATION; DAMAGES; MEASURE OF DAMAGES.

DAMAGE CLEER. The tenth part in the common pleas, and the twentieth part in the king's bench and exchequer courts, of all damages beyond a certain sum, which was to be paid the prothonotary or chief officer of the court in which they were recovered before execution could be taken out. At first it was a gratuity, and of uncertain proportions. Abolished by stat. 17 Car. II. c. 6. Cowel; Termes de la Ley.

DAMAGE FEASANT (French, faisant dommage, doing damage). A term usually applied to the injury which animals belonging to one person do upon the land of another, by feeding there, treading down his grass, corn, or other production of the earth. 3 Bla. Com. 6; Co. Litt. 142, 161; Com. Dig. Pleader (3 M. 26). By the common law, a distress of animals or things damage feasant is allowed. Gilb. Distr. 21; Poll. Torts 473, 478. It was also allowed by the ancient customs of France. 11 Toullier 402; Merlin, Répert. Fourriere; 1 Fournel, Abandon.

DAMAGED GOODS. Goods subject to duties, which have received some injury either in the voyage home, or while bonded in warehouse.

DAMAGES. The indemnity recoverable by a person who has sustained an injury, either in his person, property, or relative rights, through the act or default of another.

The sum claimed as such indemnity by a plaintiff in his declaration.

The injury or loss for which compensation is sought.

Compensatory damages. Those allowed as a recompense for the injury actually received.

Consequential damages. Those which, though directly, are not immediately, consequential upon the act or default complained of.

Double or treble damages. See MEASURE OF DAMAGES.

Exemplary damages. Those allowed for torts committed with fraud, actual malice, or deliberate violence or oppression, as a punishment to the defendant, and as a warning to other wrong doers. 22 S. E. Rep. (W. Va.) 58; Hale, Dam. 200; MEASURE OF DAMAGES.

General damages. Those which necessarily and by implication of law result from the act or default complained of.

Liquidated damages. See MEASURE OF DAMAGES.

Nominal damages. See MEASURE OF DAMAGES.

Punitive damages. See MEASURE OF DAMAGES.

Special damages. Such as arise directly, but not necessarily or by implication of law, from the act or default complained of.

These are either superadded to general damages, arising from an act injurious in itself, as when some particular loss arises from the uttering of slanderous words, actionable in themselves, or are such as arise from an act indifferent and not actionable in itself, but injurious only in its consequences, as when the words become actionable only by reason of special damage ensuing.

Unliquidated damages. See MEASURE OF DAMAGES.

Vindictive damages. See MEASURE OF DAMAGES.

In modern law, the term damages is not used in a legal sense to include the costs of the suit; though it was formerly so used. Co. Litt. 267 a; Dougl. 751.

The various classes of damages here given are those commonly found in the text-books and in the decisions of courts of common law. Other terms are of occasional use (as resulting, to denote consequential damages), but are easily recognizable as belonging to some one of the above divisions. The question whether damages are to be limited to an allowance compensatory merely in its nature and extent, or whether they may be assessed as a punishment upon a wrong-doer in certain cases for the injury inflicted by him upon the plaintiff, received much attention from the courts and was very fully and vigorously discussed by Greenleaf and Sedgwick, the latter of whom, though supporting the doctrine admitted that it was exceptional and anomalous and could not be logically supported; Sedgwick, Dam. § 353. He attributes the origin of the principle to the rule making juries the judges of the damages; id. § 354. In cases of aggravated wrong there were large verdicts and the courts were powerless, although the early cases consisted mainly of setting them aside. Originating in the unrestrained expressions of judges in justifying verdicts, there grew up this doctrine of exemplary damages characterized as "a sort of hybrid between a display of ethical indignation, and the imposition of a criminal fine." The current of authorities set strongly (in numbers, at least) in favor of allowing punitive damages; 13 How. 363, and that rule of decision has prevailed in most of the states, though in some it is repudiated entirely; 53 Mich. 280; 114 Mass. 518; 11 Colo. 345; 11 Nev. 261; 56 N. H. 455; and in others the doctrine is also denied but exemplary damages were permitted on the ground that they were compensatory merely for mental suffering; 11 Nev. 350; 1 Wyo. 27. This rule prevailed in West Virginia; 31 W. Va. 220, 450; but was recently over-ruled; 22 S. E. Rep. (W. Va.) 58. The argument against such damages was based on the objection that it admits of the infliction of pecuniary punishment to an almost unlimited extent by an irresponsible jury, a view which is theoretically more obnoxious (supposing that there is no practical difference) than that which considers damages merely as a compensation, of the just amount of which the jury may well be held to be proper judges. It also seemed to savor somewhat of judicial legislation in a criminal department to extend such damages beyond those cases where an injury is committed to the feelings of an innocent plaintiff. See 2 Greenl. Ev. § 253; 2 Sedgw. Dam. 323; 1 Kent 630; 91 U. S. 465; Hale, Dam. 200; MEASURE OF DAMAGES.

It is, perhaps, hardly necessary to add that direct is here used in opposition to remote, and immediate to consequential.

In Pleading. In personal and mixed actions (but not in penal actions, for obvious reasons), the declaration must allege, in conclusion, that the injury is to the damage of the plaintiff, and must specify the amount of damages; Com. Dig. Pleader (C, 84); 10 Co. 116 b.

In personal actions there is a distinction between actions that sound in damages and those that do not; but in either of these cases it is equally the practice to lay damages. There is, however, this difference: that, in the former case, damages are the main object of the suit, and are, therefore, always laid high enough to cover the whole demand; but in the latter, the liquidated debt, or the chattel demanded, being the main object, damages are claimed in respect of the detention only of such debt or chattel, and are, therefore, usually laid at a small sum. The plaintiff cannot recover greater damages than he has laid in the conclusion of his declaration: Com. Dig. Pleader (C, 84); 10 Co. 117 a, b; Viner, Abr. Damages (R.); 1 Bulstr. 49; 2 W. Bla. 1300; 17 Johns. 111; 4 Denio 311; 8 Humphr. 530; 1 Ia. 336; 2 Dutch. 60. Where the jury returns a verdict for larger damages than are alleged or proved, it should be set aside; 66 Tex. 133.

In real actions no damages are to be laid, because in these the demand is specially for the land withheld, and damages are in no degree the object of the suit; Steph. Pl. 426; 1 Chit. Pl. 397-400.

General damages need not be averred in the declaration; nor need any specific proof of damages be given to enable the plaintiff to recover. The legal presumption of injury in cases where it arises is sufficient to maintain the action. Whether special damage be the gist of the action, or only collateral thereto, it must be particularly stated in the declaration, as the plaintiff will not otherwise be permitted to go into evidence of it at the trial, because the defendant cannot also be prepared to answer it. See 2 Sedgw. Dam. 606; 4 Q. B. 493; 11 Price 19; 7 C. & P. 804; 22 Pa. 471; 32 Me. 379; 23 N. H. 83; 21 Wend. 144; 4 Cush. 104, 408; 121 Mass. 393; 38 Cal. 689; 43 Conn. 563; 64 Vt. 442; 92 Mich. 304; 6 Wall. 578; 42 Ala. 176.

In Practice. To constitute a right to recover damages, the party claiming damages must have sustained a loss; the party against whom they are claimed must be chargeable with a wrong; the loss must be the natural and proximate consequence of the wrong.

There is no right to damages, properly so called, where there is no loss. A sum in which a wrong-doer is mulcted simply as punishment for his wrong, and irrespective of any loss caused thereby, is a "fine," or a "penalty," rather than damages. Damages are based on the idea of a loss to be compensated, a damage to be made good; 11 Johns. 136; 2 Tex. 460; 11 Pick. 527; 15 Ohio 726; 3 Sumn. 192; 4 Mass. 115; 91 Pa. 302; 104 Mass. 353; 16 Q. B. D. 613. See 142 N. Y. 391; Hale, Dam. 3. This loss, however, need not always be distinct and definite, capable of exact description or of measurement in dollars and cents. A sufficient loss to sustain an action may appear from the mere nature of the case itself. The law in many cases presumes a loss where a wilful wrong is proved; and thus also damages are awarded for injured feelings, bodily pain, grief of mind, injury to reputation, and for other sufferings which it would be impossible to make subjects of exact proof and computation in respect to the amount of the loss sustained; 2 Day 259; 3 H. & M'H. 510; 5 Ired. 545; 2 Humphr. 140; 15 Conn. 267; 8 B. Monr. 432; 94 Mich. 119; 112 N. C. 323; 39 Ill. App. 495; 82 Tex. 33. The rule is not that a loss must be proved by evidence, but that one must appear, either by evidence or by presumption, founded on the nature of the case.

There is no right to damages where there is no wrong. It is not necessary that there should be a tort, strictly so called,—a wilful wrong, an act involving moral guilt. The wrong may be either a wilful, malicious injury, as in the case of assault and battery, libel, and the like, or one committed through mere motives of interest, as in many cases of conversion of goods, trespasses on land, etc.; or it may consist in a mere neglect to discharge a duty with suitable skill or fidelity, as where a surgeon is held liable for malpractice, a sheriff for the escape of his prisoner, or a carrier for the neglect to deliver goods; or a simple breach of contract, as in case of refusal to deliver goods sold, or to perform services under an agreement; or it may be a wrong of another person for whose act or default a legal liability exists, as where a master is held liable for an injury done by his servant or apprentice, or a railroad company for an accident resulting from the negligence of its engineer. But there must be something which the law recognizes as a wrong, some breach of a legal duty, some violation of a legal right, some default or neglect, some failure in responsibility, sustained by the party claiming damages. For the sufferer by accident or by the innocent or rightful acts of another cannot claim indemnity for his misfortune. It is called damnum absque injuria,—a loss without a wrong, for which the law gives no remedy; Poll. Torts 22, 175; 15 Ohio 659; 11 Pick. 527; 11 M. & W. 755; 10 Metc. 371; 51 N. Y. 476; 38 N. J. L. 339; 53 N. H. 442; 60 Me. 175; 50 Barb. 316; 42 Md. 119. See 106 Mass. 194; L. R. 3 H. L. 330; 45 La. Ann. 1358; 140 N. Y. 267.

The obligation violated must also be one owed to the plaintiff. The neglect of a duty which the plaintiff had no legal right to enforce gives no claim to damages. Thus, where the postmaster of Rochester, New York, was required by law to publish lists of letters uncalled for in the newspaper having the largest circulation, and the proprietors of the "Rochester Daily Democrat" claimed to have the largest circulation and to be entitled to the advertising, but the postmaster refused to give it to them, it was held that no action would lie against him for loss of the profits of the advertising. The duty to publish in the paper having the largest circulation was not a duty owed to the publisher of that paper. It was imposed upon the postmaster not for the benefit of publishers of newspapers, but for the advantage of persons to whom letters were addressed; and they alone had a legal interest to enforce it; 11 Barb. 135. See also, 17 Wend. 554; 11 Pick. 526.

Whether when the law gives judgment on a contract to pay money—e. g. on a promissory note—this is to be regarded as enforcing performance of the promise, or as awarding damages for the breach of it, is a question on which juriconsults have differed. Regarded in the latter point of view, the default of payment is the wrong on which the award of damages is predicated.

The loss must be the natural and proximate consequence of the wrong; 2 Greenl. Ev. § 256; 2 Sedgw. Dam. 362; Field, Dam. 42; Hale, Dam. 4. Or, as others have expressed the idea, it must be the "direct and necessary," or "legal and natural," consequence. It must not be "remote" or "consequential." The loss must be the natural consequence. Every man is expected—and may justly be—to foresee the usual and natural consequences of his acts, and for these he may justly be held accountable; but not for consequences that could not have been foreseen; 17 Pick. 78; 3 Tex. 324; 13 Ala. N. S. 490; 28 Me. 361; 2 Wis. 427; 1 Sneed 515; 4 Blackf. 277; 6 Q. B. 928; 63 Hun 624; 62 Conn. 503; 134 N. Y. 471. See 152 Pa. 390, 394; 39 Fed. Rep. 440. It must also be the proximate consequence. Vague and indefinite results, remote and consequential, and thus uncertain, are not embraced in the compensation given by damages. It cannot be certainly known that they are attributable to the wrong, or whether they are not rather connected with other causes; 4 Jones, N. C. 163; 1 Sm. L. Cas. 302. See 64 Hun 209; 69 id. 202; 98 Cal. 45; 9 C. C. App. 134.

In cases of tort the rule has been thus stated: "The question is not what cause was nearest in time or place to the catastrophe. This is not the meaning of the maxim causa proxima non remota spectatur. The proximate cause is the efficient cause, the one that sets the other causes in operation. The causes that are merely incidental, or instruments of a superior or controlling agency, are not the proximate causes, and the responsible ones, though they may be nearer in time to the result. It is only when the causes are independent of each other that the nearest is, of course, to be charged with the disaster;" 95 U. S. 117. See CAUSA PROXIMA NON REMOTA SPECTATUR.

"The true inquiry is, whether the injury sustained was such as, according to common experience and the usual course of events, might reasonably be anticipated;" 118 Mass. 131. See L. R. 10 Q. B. 111; 4 Col. 344; S. C. 34 Am. Rep. 89, and note; 5 Ind. App. 444.

The foregoing are the general principles on which the right to recover damages is based. Many qualifying rules have been established, of which the following are among the more important instances. In an action for damages for an injury caused by negligence, the plaintiff must himself appear to have been free from fault; for if his own negligence in any degree contributed directly to produce the injury, he can recover nothing. The law will not attempt to apportion the loss according to the different degrees of negligence of the two parties; 1 C. & P. 181; 11 East 60; 7 Me. 51; 1 Ia. 407; 17 Pick. 284; 3 Barb. 49; 14 Ohio 364; 3 La. Ann. 441; 60 Mich. 403; though this rule has in some cases been relaxed in favor of the plaintiff; L. R. 1 Ap. Ca. 754; e. g., if the injury would have occurred although the plaintiff had been free from negligence; 5 C. B. N. S. 585; 35 Ind. 463; 52 Mo. 434; 45 Vt. 72; or if the injury is wilful; 67 Ala. 533; 95 Ind. 263; 139 Ill. 596. See NEGLIGENCE. There is no right of action by an individual for damages sustained from a public nuisance, so far as he only shares the common injury inflicted on the community; 5 Co. 72. For any special loss occurred by himself alone, he may recover; 4 Maule & S. 101; 2 Bingh. 263; 1 Bingh. N. C. 222; 2 id. 281; 3 Hill, N. Y. 612; 22 Vt. 114; 7 Metc. 276; 1 Pa. 309; 17 Conn. 372; but in so far as the whole neighborhood suffer together, resort must be had to the public remedy; 7 Q. B. 339; 7 Metc. 276; 1 Bibb 293. Judicial officers are not liable in damages for erroneous decisions.

Where the wrong committed by the defendant amounted to a felony, the English rule was that the private remedy by action was stayed till conviction for the felony was had. This was in order to stimulate the exertions of private persons injured by the commission of crimes to bring offenders to justice. This rule has, however, been changed in some of the United States. Thus, in New York it is enacted that when the violation of a right admits of both a civil and criminal remedy, one is not merged in the other. And see 15 Mass. 336; 2 Stor. 59; Ware 78. A criminal prosecution and conviction for an assault and battery is not a bar to the recovery of punitive damages in a civil action for the same offence; but it may be shown in mitigation of damages; 151 Pa. 634; but see 64 Vt. 593. When a servant is injured through the negligence of a fellow-servant employed in the same enterprise or avocation, the common employer is not liable for damages. The servant, in engaging, takes the risk of injury from the negligence of his fellow-servants; McKinn. Fellow-Serv. 18; 4 Metc. Mass. 49; 6 La. An. 495; 23 Pa. 384; 5 N. Y. 493; 15 Ga. 349; 15 Ill. 550; 3 Ohio St. 201; 5 Exch. 343. But this rule does not exonerate the master from liability for negligence of a servant in a different employment. See MASTER AND SERVANT. By the common law, no action was maintainable to recover damages for the death of a human being; 1 Campb. 493; 1 Cush. 475; 69 Tex. 192. But in England, by the 9 & 10 Vict. c. 93, known as Lord Campbell's Act, it has been provided that whenever the death of a person shall be caused by a wrongful act which would, if death had not ensued, have entitled the party injured to maintain an action, the party offending shall be liable notwithstanding the death. Similar statutes have been passed in several of the United States. See 15 N. Y. 432; 18 Mo. 162; 97 id. 253; 18 Q. B. 93; 77 Ga. 393; 39 Fed. Rep. 18.

Excessive or inadequate damages. Even in that large class of cases in which there is no fixed measure of damages, but they are left to the discretion of the jury, the court has a certain power to review the verdict, and to set it aside if the damages awarded are grossly excessive or unreasonably inadequate. The rule is, however, that a verdict will not be set aside for excessive damages unless the amount is so large as to satisfy the court that the jury have been misled by passion, prejudice, ignorance, or partiality; Field, Dam. 683; 19 Barb. 461; 9 Cush. 228; 16 B. Monr. 577; 22 Conn. 74; 27 Miss. 68; 10 Ga. 37; 6 Rich. 419; 1 Cal. 33, 363; 11 Gratt. 697; 2 Misc. Rep. 303; 69 Hun 346; 52 Fed. Rep. 87; 74 Ind. 520; 8 id. 165; 76 N. Y. 594; 85 Tenn. 400. But this power is very sparingly used; and cases are numerous in which the courts have expressed themselves dissatisfied with the verdict, but have refused to interfere, on the ground that the case did not come within this rule. See 3 Abb. Pr. 104; 23 Barb. 87; 20 Mo. 272; 15 Ark. 345; 6 Tex. 352; 16 Ill. 405; 2 Stor. 661; 1 Zab. 183; 5 Mas. 197; 85 Wis. 102; 53 Minn. 341.

As a general rule, in actions of tort the court will not grant a new trial on the ground of the smallness of damages; 12 Mod. 150; 2 Stra. 940; 24 E. L. & Eq. 406; 23 Conn. 74. But they have the power to do so in a proper case; and in a few instances in which the jury have given no redress at all, when some was clearly due, the verdict has been set aside; 1 Cal. 450; 2 E. D. Sm. 349; 4 Q. B. 917.

An important case sustaining this view is reported in 5 Q. B. D. 78; s. c. 21 Alb. L. J. 62; there two verdicts of £7,000 and £16,000, respectively, were successively set aside as inadequate.

In the cases in which there is a fixed legal rule regulating the measure of damages, it must be stated to the jury by the presiding judge upon the trial. His failure to state it correctly is ground of exception; and if the jury disregard the instructions of the court on the subject, their verdict may be set aside. In so far, however, as the verdict is an honest determination of questions of fact properly within their province, it will not, in general, be disturbed. Sedgw. Dam. 604. See CONSEQUENTIAL DAMAGES; MEASURE OF DAMAGES. Consult Greenl. Ev.; Wood's Mayne; Field; Harris; Smith; Sutherland; T. Sedgwick and D. H. Sedgwick, Damages.

DAMNA (Lat. damnum). Damages, both inclusive and exclusive of costs.

DAMNATUS. In Old English Law. Condemned; prohibited by law; unlawful. Damnatus coitus, an unlawful connection. Black, L. Dict.

DAMNI INJURIAE ACTIO (Lat.). In Civil Law. An action for the damage done by one who intentionally injured the beast of another. Calvinus, Lex.

DAMNOSA HÆREDITAS. A name given by Lord Kenyon to that species of property of a bankrupt which, so far from being valuable, would be a charge to the creditors: for example, a term of years where the rent would exceed the revenue.

The assignees are not bound to take such property; but they must make their election, and having once entered into possession they cannot afterwards abandon the property; 7 East 342; 3 Campb. 340.

DAMNUM (Lat.). That which is taken away; loss; damage; legal hurt or harm. Anderson, L. Dict.

DAMNUM ABSQUE INJURIA (Lat. injury without wrong). A wrong done to a man for which the law provides no remedy. Broom, Max. 1.

Injuria is here to be taken in the sense of legal injury; and where no malice exists, there are many cases of wrong or suffering inflicted upon a man for which the law gives no remedy; 2 Ld. Raym. 595; 11 M. & W. 755; 11 Pick. 527. Thus, if the owner of property, in the prudent exercise of his own right of dominion, does acts which cause loss to another, it is damnum absque injuria; 2 Barb. 168; 10 Metc. 371; 83 Pa. 144; see 119 id. 126; 10 M. & W. 100. A railroad company which exercises due care in blasting on its own land, in order to lay its tracks, is not liable for injury to adjoining property arising merely from the incidental jarring; 140 N. Y. 267.

So, too, acts of public agents within the scope of their authority, if they cause damage, cause simply damnum absque injuria; Sedgw. Dam. 29, 111; 8 W. & S. 85; 1 Pick. 418; 23 id. 360; 2 B. & Ald. 646; 1 Gale & D. 589; 4 Rawle 9; 2 Hill N. Y. 466; 14 Pa. 214; 9 Conn. 436; 4 N. Y. 195; 25 Vt. 49; 109 U. S. 395; 119 id. 284; 193 Mass. 489; 71 Me. 171. See 2 Zab. 243; 1 Smith, Lead. Cas. 244; and Weeks on Doc. of Dam. Abs. Inj.

The state, in locating its public levees, acts in the exercise of its police powers, and private injury resulting therefrom is damnum absque injuria; 45 La. Ann. 1358.

DAMNUM FATALE. In Civil Law. Damages caused by a fortuitous event or inevitable accident; damages arising from the act of God.

Among these were included losses by shipwreck, lightning, or other casualty; also losses by pirates, or by vis major, by fire, robbery, and burglary; but theft was not numbered among these casualties. In general, bailees are not liable for such damages; Story, Bailm. 471.

DANEGELT. A tax or tribute imposed upon the English when the Danes got a footing in their island.

DANELAGE. The laws of the Danes which obtained in the eastern counties and part of the midland counties of England in the eleventh century. 1 Bla. Com. 65.

DANGERS OF THE RIVER. In a bill of lading this term means only the natural accidents incident to river navigation, and does not embrace such as may be avoided by the exercise of that skill, judgment, and foresight which are demanded from persons in a particular occupation. 35 Mo. 213. See 17 Fed. Rep. 478.

DANGERS OF THE SEA. See PERILS OF THE SEA.

DANGEROUS WEAPON. One dangerous to life. This must often depend upon the manner of using it, and the question should go to the jury. A distinction is made between a dangerous and a deadly weapon; 2 Curt. 241. A jackknife may be a dangerous weapon in fact, but whether it was such as matter of law was not decided; 119 Mass. 342. A heavy oak stick, three feet long and an inch thick, is a dangerous weapon but not a "deadly" weapon in the sense that from the use of it alone an attack would be as matter of law an aggravated assault under a Texas statute; 23 Tex. 579. See ARMS; CONCEALED WEAPONS.

DARREIN (Fr. dernier). Last. Darrein continuance, last continuance. See PUIS DARREIN CONTINUANCE; CONTINUANCE.

DARREIN PRESENTMENT. See ASSIZE OF DARREIN PRESENTMENT.

DARREIN SEISIN (L. Fr. last seisin). A plea which lay in some cases for the tenant in a writ of right. 3 Metc. Mass. 184; Jackson, Real Act. 285. See 1 Roscoe, Real Act. 206; 2 Prest. Abstr. 345.

DATE. The designation or indication in an instrument of writing of the time and place when and where it was made.

When the place is mentioned in the date of a deed, the law intends, unless the contrary appear, that it was executed at the place of the date; Plowd. 7 b. The word is derived from the Latin datum (given); because when the instruments were in Latin the form ran datum, etc. (given the — day of, etc.).

A date is necessary to the validity of policies of insurance; but where there are separate underwriters, each sets down the date of his own signing, as this constitutes a separate contract; Marsh. Ins. 336; 2 Pars. Marit. Law 27. Written instruments generally take effect from the day of their date, but the actual date of execution may be shown, though different from that which the instrument bears; and it is said that the date is not of the essence of a contract, but is essential to the identity of the writing by which it is to be proved; 2 Greenl. Ev. §§ 12, 489, n.; Tayl. Ev. 186; 4 Cush. 403; 3 Wend. 233; 31 Me. 243; 32 N. J. L. 513; 70 Pa. 387; 91 id. 17; 17 E. L. & Eq. 548; 2 Greenl. Cruise, Dig. 618, n. See 100 Ill.

573; 19 L. J. Q. B. 435. And if the written date is an impossible one, the time of delivery must be shown; Shepp. Touchst. 72; Cruise, Dig. c. 2, s. 61.

A date in a note or bill is required only for the purpose of fixing the time of payment. If the time of payment is otherwise indicated, no date is necessary; 1 Ames, Bills and Notes 145, citing 8 Wend. 478; 4 Whart. 252. When a note payable at a fixed period after date has no date, a holder may fill the date with the day of issue; ibid. • It is usually presumed that a deed was delivered on the day of its date; but proof of the date of delivery must be given if the circumstances were such that collusion might be practised; Steph. Dig. Ev. 138; 77 Va. 92; 33 Gratt. 497; 112 Mo. 1. See 6 Bing. 296; 34 N. J. L. 93; 18 Me. 190. But this presumption does not hold in respect to deeds in fee, unattested and unacknowledged; 31 Barb. 155. Parol evidence is admissible to show that the date stated in the in testimonium clause of a mortgage deed of personal property is not its true date; 130 Mass. 355; 134 id. 52. There is a presumption as to a note that it was delivered on the day of its date; 107 Mass. 439.

In general, it is sufficient to insert the day, month, and year; but in recording deeds, and other recordable instruments, in Pennsylvania, in noting the receipt of a fi. fa., or other writ of execution, the hour of reception must be given; 44 Pa. 438.

Where a date is given, both as a day of the week and a day of the month, and the two are inconsistent, the day of the month governs. Walk. 27.

In public documents, it is usual to give not only the day, the month, and the year of our Lord, but also the year of the United States, when issued by authority of the general government, or of the commonwealth, when issued under its authority.

DATION. In Civil Law. The act of giving something. It differs from donation, which is a gift; dation, on the contrary, is giving something without any liberality; as, the giving of an office.

DATION EN PAIEMENT. In Civil Law. A giving by the debtor and receipt by the creditor of something in payment of a debt instead of a sum of money.

It is somewhat like the accord and satisfaction of the common law. 16 Toullier, n. 45; Pothier, Vente, n. 601. Dation en paiement resembles in some respects the contract of sale; dare in solutum est quasi vendere. There is, however, a very marked difference between a sale and a dation en paiement. First. The contract of sale is complete by the mere agreement of the parties; the dation en paiement requires a delivery of the thing given. Second. When the debtor pays a certain sum which he supposed he was owing, and he discovers he did not owe so much, he may recover back the excess; not so when property other than money has been given in payment. Third. He who has in good faith sold a thing of which he believed himself to be the owner, is not precisely required to transfer the property of it to the buyer; and while he is not troubled in the possession of the thing, he cannot pretend that the seller has not fulfilled his obligations. On the contrary, the dation en paiement is good only when the debtor transfers to the creditor the property in the thing which he has agreed to take in payment; and if the thing thus delivered be the property of another, it will not operate as a payment. Pothier, Vente, nn. 602, 603, 604. See 1 Low. C. 53; 43 La. Ann. 952.

DATIVE. A word derived from the Roman law, signifying "appointed by public authority." Thus, in Scotland, an executor-dative is an executor appointed by a court of justice, corresponding to an English administrator. Mozley & W. Dict.

DAUGHTER. A female child; an immediate female descendant.

DAUGHTER-IN-LAW. The wife of one's son.

DAY. The space of time which elapses while the earth makes a complete revolution on its axis.

A portion of such space of time which, by usage or law, has come to be considered as the whole for some particular purpose.

The space of time which elapses between two successive midnights. 2 Bla. Com. 141.

That portion of such space of time during which the sun is shining.

Generally, in legal signification, the term included the time elapsing from one midnight to the succeeding one; 2 Bla. Com. 141; 89 Pa. 522; see 65 Ind. 539; but it is also used to denote those hours during which business is ordinarily transacted (frequently called a business day); 5 Hill 437; as well as that portion of time during which the sun is above the horizon (called, sometimes, a solar day), and, in addition, that part of the morning or evening during which sufficient of its light is above for the features of a man to be reasonably discerned; Co. 3d Inst. 63; 9 Mass. 154. Where a party is required to take action within a given number of days in order to secure or assert a right, the day is to consist of twenty-four hours, that is the popular and legal sense of the term; 107 Ill. 631.

By custom, the word day may be understood to include working-days only; 3 Esp. 121; 2 C. C. App. 650. In a similar manner only, a certain number of hours less than the number during which the work actually continued each day. 5 Hill 437.

Sundays and other public holidays falling within the number of days specified by a statute for the performance of an act, are often omitted from the computation, as not being judicial days; 1 Rob. (Va.) 676; 17 Gratt. 109; 12 Ga. 93; 46 Mo. 17; 92 Mich. 626; 145 Ill. 614; 55 Fed. Rep. 49; 2 C. C. App. 650. But see 31 Cal. 271. Where the last day of the six months within which an appeal or writ of error may be taken to review in the Circuit Court of Appeals, the judgment or decree of a lower court, falls on Sunday, the appeal cannot be taken or the writ sued out on any subsequent day; 4 C. C. App. 399. When the day of performance of contracts, other than instruments upon which days of grace are allowed, falls on Sunday, or other public holiday, it is not counted, and the contract may be performed on Monday; 20 Wend. 205; 27 N. J. L. 68; 50 Minn. 303. See 1 Sandf. 664.

The time for completing commercial contracts is not limited to banking hours; 5 La. Ann. 514.

A day is generally, but not always, regarded in law as a point of time; and fractions will not be recognized; 2 B. & Ald. 586; 20 Vt. 653; 11 Mass. 204; 150 id. 158; 12 Colo. 285; 25 Fla. 371. And see 11 Conn. 17; 3 Op. Att. Gen. 82; 11 How. Pr. 193; 64 Pa. 240. See FRACTION OF A DAY.

It is said that there is no general rule in regard to including or excluding days in the computation of time from the day of a fact or act done, but that it depends upon the reason of the thing and the circumstances of the case; 9 Q. B. 141; 6 M. & W. 55; 15 Mass. 193; 19 Conn. 376; 5 Dak. 335; 12 Colo. 285. And see, also, 5 Co. 1 a; Dougl. 463; 4 Nev. & M. 378; 5 Metc. 439; 9 Wend. 346; 9 N. H. 304; 5 Ill. 420; 24 Pa. 272; 28 Atl. Rep. (N. J.) 578. Perhaps the most general rule is to exclude the first day and include the last; 153 Pa. 465; 54 Mo. App. 627; 150 Mass. 159; 12 A. & E. 635; 43 Conn. 56; 23 Mich. 1; 3 Den. 12. Such is the rule as to negotiable paper; 1 Dan. Neg. Instr. 496; 1 Pars. Bills & N. 385; 4 Am. L. Reg. N. s. 224 and note; 40 Pa. 372. See, generally, 2 Sharsw. Bla. Com. 141, n.

The rule now generally followed seems to be that not only in mercantile contracts, but also in wills and other instruments, and in the construction of statutes, the day of the date, or the day of the act from which a future time is to be ascertained, is to be excluded; 19 Conn. 376; 28 Barb. 284; 37 Mo. 574; 23 Ind. 48.

A statutory rule for computing time does not apply to ascertain the day, or the last day, on which a thing may be done, where such day is expressed by its date; 53 Minn. 269.

DAY BOOK. In Mercantile Law. An account-book in which merchants and others make entries of their daily transactions. This is generally a book of original entries, and, as such, may be given in evidence to prove the sale and delivery of merchandise or of work done.

DAY RULE. In English Practice. A rule or order of the court by which a prisoner on civil process, and not committed, is enabled, in term-time, to go out of the prison and its rule or bounds. Tidd. Pr. 961. Abolished by 5 & 6 Vict. c. 22.

DAYS IN BANK. In English Practice. Days of appearance in the court of common pleas, usually called bancum. They are at the distance of about a week from each other, and are regulated by some festival of the church.

By the common law, the defendant is allowed three full days in which to make his appearance in court, exclusive of the day of appearance or return-day named in the writ; 3 Bla. Com. 278. Upon his appearance, time is usually granted him for pleading; and this is called giving him day, or, as it is more familiarly expressed, a continuance. 3 Bla. Com. 316. When the suit is ended by discontinuance or by judgment for the defendant, he is discharged from further attendance, and is said to go thereof sine die, without day. See CONTINUANCE.

DAYS OF GRACE. Certain days allowed to the acceptor of a bill or the maker of a note in which to make payment, in addition to the time contracted for by the bill or note itself.

They are so called because formerly they were allowed as a matter of favor; but, the custom of merchants to allow such days of grace having grown into law, and been sanctioned by the courts, all bills of exchange are by the law merchant entitled to days of grace as of right. The statute of Anne making promissory notes negotiable confers the same right on those instruments. This act has been generally adopted throughout the United States : and the days of grace allowed are three : 6 W. & S. 179 ; Chitty, Bills ; Byles, Bills. Bank checks are due on presentation and are not entitled to days of grace : 36 Neb. 744. In Arkansas a bill payable at sight is entitled to grace : 53 Ark. 513 ; and on "demand" drafts in Arizona, Mississippi, Nebraska, Nevada, New Mexico, and South Dakota, grace is allowed.

The principle deducible from all the authorities is, that, as to every bill not payable on demand, the day on which payment is to be made to prevent dishonor is to be determined by adding three days of grace, where the bill itself does not otherwise provide, to the time of payment as fixed by the bill. This principle is formulated into a statutory provision in England in the bills of exchange act, 1882, 45 & 46 Vict. c. 61, § 14 ; 115 U. S. 383 ; 1 Pet. 31.

Where there is an established usage of the place where the bill is payable to demand payment on the fourth or other day instead of the third, the parties to it will be bound by such usage ; 5 How. 317 ; 9 Wheat. 582 ; 1 Smith, Lead. Cas. 417. When the last day of grace happens on Sunday or a general holiday, as the Fourth of July, Christmas day, etc., the bill is due on the day previous, and must be presented on that day in order to hold the drawer and indorsers ; Big. Bills & N. 90 ; 7 Wend. 460 ; 4 Dall. 127 ; 5 Binn. 541 ; 4 Yerg. 210 ; 10 Ohio 507 ; 1 Ala. 295 ; 3 N. H. 14 ; contra, 33 Neb. 646 ; unless changed by statute as in some states. Days of grace are, for all practical purposes, a part of the time the bill has to run, and interest is charged on them ; 2 Cow. 712 ; 14 La. Ann. 265 ; 1 Dan. Neg. Instr. 489. According to the usage and custom of merchants to fix the liability of the indorser of negotiable paper, it should be protested on the last day of grace ; 86 Tex. 299.

In computing the days of grace allowed in a bond for the payment of interest, the day when the interest became payable will not be counted ; 49 N. J. Eq. 385. A bill payable in thirty days having been drawn and accepted on February 11th, of a leap year, the last day of grace falls on March 15th, the 29th of February being counted as a distinct day ; 65 Ind. 582.

Our courts always assume that the same number of days are allowed in other countries ; and a person claiming the benefit of a foreign law or usage must prove it ; 13 N. Y. 290 ; 2 Vt. 129 ; 7 Gill & J. 78 ; 9 Pet. 33 ; 4 Metc. Mass. 203. When properly proved, the law of the place where the bill or note is payable prescribes the number of days of grace and the manner of calculating them ; 1 Denio 367 ; Story, Pr. Notes §§ 216, 247. The tendency to adopt as laws local usages or customs has been materially checked ; 8 N. Y. 190. By tacit consent, the banks in New York city have not claimed days of grace on bills drawn on them ; but the courts refused to sanction the custom as law or usage ; 25 Wend. 673.

According to law and usage, days of grace are allowed on bills payable at the places and in the countries following :—

United States of America, three days, except California, Connecticut, Idaho, Illinois, Maine, Maryland, Massachusetts, Montana, New Jersey, New York, North Dakota, Ohio, Oregon, Pennsylvania, Utah, Vermont, Wisconsin, and the District of Columbia, where no grace is allowed on time paper although in some of them three days are given on sight drafts.

Great Britain and Ireland, and Australia, three days.

France, none, protest one day after due date (Bordeaux, formerly ten days).

Germany, none, protest within two working days after due date (in Berlin, Altona, Bremen, Frankfort, and Hamburg, a different usage formerly prevailed, but not as to the last, within recent years).

Spain, none, protest within one day (in Cadiz it was formerly different).

Russia, ten days (but banks do not usually avail themselves of it) ; protest last day of grace.

Austria, Belgium, Denmark, Italy, Sweden, Switzerland, none, protest up to second day after due date.

Holland, Portugal, Turkey, Poland, India, Japan, Argentina, Mexico, none, protest one day after due date.

Brazil, none, protest on due date.

China, under consular jurisdiction.

The information as to foreign countries has been compiled for this work by the secretary of the London Institute of Bankers. As to the cities named, special inquiry is advised, when necessary.

Bankers' checks and demand notes or bills are payable on demand without grace. See 12 Am. L. Reg. n. s. 8 ; 36 Neb. 744.

DAYS OF THE WEEK. The courts will always take judicial notice of the days of the week ; for example, when a writ of inquiry was stated in the pleadings to have been executed on the fifteenth of June, and upon an examination it was found to be Sunday, the proceeding was held to be defective ; Fortesc. 373 ; Stra. 387.

DAYSMAN. An arbitrator, umpire, or elected judge. Cowel.

DAYWERE. As much arable land as could be ploughed in one day's work. Cowel.

DE ADMENSURATIONE. Of admeasurement.

Used of the writ of admeasurement of dower, which lies where the widow has had more dower assigned to her than she is entitled to. It is said by some to lie where either an infant heir or his guardian made such assignment at suit of the infant heir whose rights are thus prejudiced. 2 Bla. Com. 136 ; Fitzh. N. B. 348. It seems, however, that an assignment by a guardian binds the infant heir, and that after such assignment the heir cannot have his writ of admeasurement ; 2 Ind. 388 ; 1 Pick. 314 ; 37 Me. 509 ; 1 Washb. R. P. 226.

Used also of the writ of admeasurement of pasture, which lies where the quantity of common due each one of several having rights thereto, has not been ascertained ; 8 Bla. Com. 38. See ADMEASUREMENT OF DOWER.

DE ÆTATE PROBANDA (Lat. for proving age). A writ which lay to summon a jury for the purpose of determining the age of the heir of a tenant in capite who claimed his estate as being of full age. Fitzh. N. B. 257.

It was directed to the treasurer and barons of the exchequer.

DE ANNUA PENSIONE (Lat. of annual pension). A writ by which the king, having due unto him an annual pension from any abbot or prior for any of his chaplains which he will name who is not provided with a competent living, demands it of the said abbot or prior for the one that is named in the writ. Fitzh. N. B. 231; Termes de la Ley, Annua Pensione.

DE ANNUO REDITU (Lat. for a yearly rent). A writ to recover an annuity, no matter how payable. 2 Reeve, Hist. Eng. Law 258.

Fitzh. N. B. 233; Termes de la Ley, Apostata Capiendo.

DE AVERIIS RETORNANDIS (Lat. for returning cattle). Used of the pledges in the old action of replevin. 2 Reeve, Hist. Eng. Law 177.

DE BENE ESSE (Lat. formally; conditionally; provisionally). A technical phrase applied to certain acts deemed for the time to be well done, or until an exception or other avoidance. It is equivalent to provisionally, with which meaning the phrase is commonly employed. For example, a declaration is filed or delivered, special bail is put in, a witness is examined, etc., de bene esse, or provisionally; 3 Bla. Com. 383.

The examination of a witness de bene esse takes place where there is danger of losing the testimony of an important witness from death by reason of age or dangerous illness, or where he is the only witness to an important fact; 1 Bland, Ch. 238; 3 Bibb 204; 16 Wend. 601; 13 Ves. 261; 28 Ala. 141. In such case, if the witness be alive at the time of trial, his examination is not to be used; 2 Dan. Ch. Pr. 1111. See Haynes, Eq. 183; Mitf. Eq. Pl. 52, 149.

To declare de bene esse is to declare in aailable action subject to the contingency of bail being put in; and in such case the declaration does not become absolute till this is done; Grah. Pr. 191.

When a judge has a doubt as to the propriety of finding a verdict, he may direct the jury to find one de bene esse; which verdict, if the court shall afterwards be of opinion that it ought to have been found, shall stand. Bac. Abr. Verdict (A). See, also, 11 S. & R. 84.

When an executor or administrator has been guilty of a devastavit, he is responsible for the loss which the estate has sustained de bonis propriis. He may also subject himself to the payment of a debt of the deceased de bonis propriis by his false plea when sued in a representative capacity: as, if he plead plene administravit and it be found against him, or a release to himself when false. In this latter case the judgment is de bonis testatoris si, et si non, de bonis propriis. 1 Wms. Saund. 336 b, n. 10; Bacon, Abr. Executor (B, 3).

DE BONIS TESTATORIS (Lat. of the goods of the testator). A judgment rendered against an executor which is to be satisfied out of the goods or property of the testator: distinguished from a judgment de bonis propriis.

DE BONIS TESTATORIS AC SI (Lat. from the goods of the testator, if he has any, and, if not, from those of the executor). A judgment rendered where an executor falsely pleads any matter as a release, or, generally, in any case where he is to be charged in case his testator's estate is insufficient. 1 Wms. Saund. 366 b; Bacon, Abr. Executor (B, 3); 2 Archb. Pr. 148.

DE BONO ET MALO (Lat. for good or ill). A person accused of crime was said to put himself upon his country de bono et malo. The French phrase de bien et de mal has the same meaning.

DE DONIS, THE STATUTE (more fully, De Donis Conditionalibus; concerning conditional gifts). The statute of Westminster the Second. 13 Edw. I. c. 1.

The object of the statute was to prevent the alienation of estates by those who held only a partial interest in the estate in such a manner as to defeat the estate of those who were to take subsequently. This was effected by providing that, in grants to a man and the heirs of his body or the heirs male of his body, the will of the donor should be observed according to the form expressed in the deed of gift (per formam doni); that the tenements so given should go, after the grantee's death, to his issue (or issue male), if there were any, and if none, should revert to the donor. This statute was the origin of the estate in fee tail, or estate tail, and by introducing perpetuities, it built up great estates and strengthened the power of the barons. See Bac. Abr. Estates Tail; 1 Cruise, Dig. 70; 1 Washb. R. P. 271. See CONDITIONAL FEE TAIL.

Com. 199. Originally lying to recover damages only, it came to be used to recover the rest of the term, and then generally the possession of lands. Involving, in the question of who should have possession, the further question of who had the title, it gave rise to the modern action of ejectment. Brooke, Abr.; Adams, Ejectm.; 3 Bla. Com. 199 et seq.

DE ESTOVERIIS HABENDIS (Lat. to obtain estovers). A writ which lay for a woman divorced a mensa et thoro to recover her alimony or estovers. 1 Bla. Com. 441.

DE FACTO. Actually; in fact; in deed. A term used to denote a thing actually done.

An officer de facto is one who performs the duties of an office with apparent right, and under claim and color of an appointment, but without being actually qualified in law so to act. 37 Me. 423.

Where there is an office to be filled, and one acting under color of authority fills the office and discharges its duties, his actions are those of an officer de facto, and are binding on the public; 159 U. S. 596.

An officer in the actual exercise of executive power would be an officer de facto, and as such distinguished from one who, being legally entitled to such power, is deprived of it,—such a one being an officer de jure only. An officer holding without strict legal authority; 2 Kent 295. An officer de facto is frequently considered an officer de jure, and legal validity allowed his official acts; 10 S. & R. 250; 1 Coxe 318; 10 Mass. 290; 25 Conn. 278; 28 Wis. 364; 24 Barb. 587; 85 Me. 301; 19 N. H. 115; 2 Jones, N. C. 124; 55 Pa. 468; 45 Miss. 151; 8 How Pr. 363; 99 U. S. 20; 86 Ill. 283; 38 Conn. 449 (a very fully considered case); s. c. 9 Am. Rep. 409; 73 N. C. 546; 111 Id. 729; 35 S. C. 192; 68 Mich. 273; 7 L. R. H. L. 894. But this is so only so far as the rights of the public and third persons are concerned. In order to sue or defend in his own right as a public officer, he must be so de jure; 89 Ill. 347. An officer de facto incurs no liability by his mere omission to act; 77 N. Y. 378; 59 How. Pr. 404; but see 108 Mass. 523; 101 U. S. 192.

An officer acting under an unconstitutional law, acts by color of title, and is an officer de facto; 56 Pa. 436. When a special judge is duly elected, qualifies, and takes possession of the office according to law, he becomes judge de facto, though his official oath is not filed as required by law; and the proceedings of the court, if unchallenged during his incumbency, cannot afterwards be questioned collaterally; 111 Mo. 542. See 65 Vt. 399; 49 Ark. 439; 96 Pa. 344; 86 Ill. 283.

Contracts and other acts of de facto directors of corporations are valid; Green's Brice, Ultra Vires, 522, n. c.; 70 N. C. 348; 35 Mo. 13; 21 Pa. 131.

An officer de facto is prima facie one de jure; 21 Ga. 217.

When the inspectors of an election fail to issue a certificate of election, one who has received the highest number of legal votes cast, and holding over as the present incumbent, has sufficient apparent authority or color of title to be considered an officer de facto; 67 Hun 169.

A government de facto signifies one completely, though only temporarily, established in the place of the lawful government; 42 Miss. 651, 703; 43 Ala. 204. See DE JURE; Austin, Jur. Lect. vi. p. 336.

A wife de facto only is one whose marriage is voidable by decree; 4 Kent 36.

Blockade de facto is one actually maintained; 1 Kent 44.

For a consideration of the validity of the acts of officers de facto see 34 Cent. Law J. 212.

DE FAIRE ECHELLE. In French Law. A clause commonly contained in the French policies of insurance, which is equivalent to a license for a vessel to touch and trade at intermediate ports. 14 Wend. 491.

DE HÆRETICO COMBURENDO (Lat. for burning a heretic). A writ which lay where a heretic had been convicted of heresy, had abjured, and had relapsed into heresy. It is said to be very ancient. 4 Bla. Com. 46.

DE HOMINE CAPTO IN WITHERNAM (Lat. for taking a man in withernam). A writ to take a man who had carried away a bondman or bondwoman into another country beyond the reach of a writ of replevin. 3 Bla. Com. 129.

DE HOMINE REPLEGIANDO (Lat. for replevying a man). A writ which lies to replevy a man out of prison, or out of the custody of a private person, upon giving security to the sheriff that the man shall be forthcoming to answer any charge against him. Fitzh. N. B. 66; 3 Bla. Com. 129. The statute—which had gone nearly out of use, having been superseded by the writ of habeas corpus—has been revived within a few years in some of the United States in an amended and more effectual form. It can be used only for the benefit of the person imprisoned. 1 Kent 404, n.; 34 Me. 136.

DE IDIOTA INQUIRENDO. An old common-law writ, long obsolete, to inquire whether a man be an idiot or not. 2 Steph. Com. 509.

DE INCREMENTO (Lat. of increase). Costs de incremento, costs of increase—that is, which the court assesses in addition to the damages established by the jury. See COSTS DE INCREMENTO.

DE INJURIA (Lat. The full term is, de injuria sua propria absque tali causa, of his own wrong without such cause; or, where part of the plea is admitted, absque residuo causæ, without the rest of the cause).

In Pleading. The replication by which in an action of tort the plaintiff denies the effect of excuse or justification offered by the defendant.

It can only be used where the defendant pleads matter merely in excuse and not in justification of his act. It is confined to those instances in which the plea neither denies the original existence of the right which the defendant is charged with having violated, nor alleges that it has been released or extinguished, but sets up some new matter as a sufficient excuse or cause for that which would otherwise and in its own nature be wrongful. It cannot, therefore, be properly used when the defendant's plea alleges any matter in the nature of title, interest, authority, or matter of record; 8 Co. 66; 1 B. & P. 76; 4 Johns. 159, note; 1 Wend. 126; 25 Vt. 328; 12 Mass. 506; 38 N. J. L. 98; Steph. Pl. 276; Pep. Pl. 35.

The English and American cases are at variance as to what constitutes such legal authority as cannot be replied to by de injuria. Most of the American cases hold that this replication is bad whenever the defendant insists upon a right, no matter from what source it may be derived; and this seems to be the more consistent doctrine.

If the plea in any sense justifies the act, instead of merely excusing it, de injuria cannot be used; 4 Wend. 577; 1 Hill, N. Y. 78; 13 Ill. 80. The English cases, on the other hand, hold that an authority derived from a court not of record may be traversed by the replication de injuria; 3 B. & Ad. 2.

The plaintiff may confess that portion of a plea which alleges an authority in law or an interest, title, or matter of record, and aver that the defendant did the act in question de injuria sua propria absque residuo causæ, of his own wrong without the residue of the cause alleged; 1 Hill, N. Y. 78; 2 Am. Law Reg. 246; Steph. Pl. 276.

The replication de injuria puts in issue the whole of the defence contained in the plea; and evidence is, therefore, admissible to disprove any material averment in the whole plea; McKelv. Pl. 50; 8 Co. 66; 11 East 451; 10 Bingh. 157; 8 Wend. 129; 14 Wall. 613. See 2 Cr. M. & R. 338. In England, however, by a uniform course of decisions in their courts, evidence is not admissible under the replication de injuria to a plea, for instance, of moderate castigavit or moliter manus imposuit, to prove that an excess of force was used by the defendant; but it is necessary that such excess should be specially pleaded. There must be a new assignment; 2 Cr. M. & R. 338; 1 Bingh. 317; 1 Bingh. N. c. 380; 3 M. & W. 150.

In this country, on the other hand, though some of the earlier cases followed the English doctrine, later cases decide that the plaintiff need not plead specially in such a case. It is held that there is no new cause to assign when the act complained of is the same that is attempted to be justified by plea. Therefore the fact of the act being moderate is a part of the plea, and is one of the points brought in issue by de injuria; and evidence is admissible to prove an excess; 15 Mass. 351; 25 Wend. 371; 2 Vt. 474; 24 id. 218; 1 Zab. 183.

Though a direct traverse of several points going to make up a single defence in a plea will be bad for duplicity, yet the general replication de injuria cannot be objected to on this ground, although putting the same number of points in issue; 3 B. & Ad. 1; 25 Vt. 330; 2 Bingh. N. c. 579; 3 Tyrwh. 491. Hence this mode of replying has a great advantage when a special plea has been resorted to, since it enables the plaintiff to traverse all the facts contained in any single point, instead of being obliged to rest his cause on an issue joined on one fact alone.

In England it is held that de injuria may be replied in assumption; 2 Bingh. N. c. 579.

In this country it has been held that the use of de injuria is limited to actions of tort; 2 Pick. 357. But in New Jersey it may be used in actions ex contractu wherever a special plea in excuse of the alleged breach of contract can be pleaded, as a general traverse to put in issue every material allegation in the plea; 38 N. J. L. 98. Whether de injuria can be used in actions of replevin seems, even in England, to be a disputed question. The following cases decide that it may be so used; 9 Bingh. 756; 3 B. & Ad. 2; contra, 1 Chit. Pl. 622.

The improper use of de injuria is held to be only a ground of general demurrer; 6 Dowl. 502; but see 3 M. & W. 230; 2 Pick. 357. Where it is improperly employed, the defect will be cured by a verdict; 5 Johns. 112; Hob. 76; 1 T. Raym. 50. See, generally, 11 Am. L. Reg. 577; Crogate's Case, 1 Sm. Lead. Cas. 247.

The term is variously applied; as, a king or officer de jure, or a wife de jure.

A government de jure, but not de facto, is one deemed lawful, which has been supplanted; a government de jure and also de facto is one deemed lawful, which is present or established; a government de facto is one deemed unlawful, but which is present or established. Any established government, be it deemed lawful or not, is a government de facto. Austin, Jur. sec. vi. 336. See DE FACTO.

It was connected with the military tenures, and was abolished, with them, by stat. 12 Car. II. cap. 24. Littleton § 48; 2 Bla. Com. 132, 135; Scrib. Dower 18; 1 Washb. R. P. 149, n.

DE LUNATICO INQUIRENDO (Lat.). The name of a writ directed to the sheriff, directing him to inquire by good and lawful men whether one therein named is a lunatic or not. See 4 Rawle 234; 5 Halst. 217; 6 Wend. 497; 19 Hun 292; 7 Abb. N. Cas. 425; 31 N. J. Eq. 203.

An inquisition in lunacy proceedings must show that the imbecility of the mind is such as to render the imbecile unfit for the government of himself and his property; 44 N. J. Eq. 564.

The English practice is now regulated by the Lunacy Acts (16 & 17 Vict. c. 70, and 25 & 26 Vict. c. 86), under which the lord chancellor, upon petition or information, grants a commission in the nature of this writ; 2 Steph. Com. 511. In the United States the practice is similar, and a commission of lunacy is appointed. In New York there is a state commissioner of lunacy. See Ray's Med. Jur. Ins.; Ordon. Jud. Asp. Ins. 225; 3 Abb. N. C. 187.

Ridley, Civ. & Eccl. Law, pt. 1, c. 1, 8.

DE NOVO (Lat.). Anew; afresh. When a judgment upon an issue in part is reversed on error for some mistake made by the court in the course of the trial, a venire de novo is awarded, in order that the case may again be submitted to a jury.

DE ODIO ET ATIA (Lat. of hatred and ill will). A writ directed to the sheriff, commanding him to inquire whether a person charged with murder was committed upon just cause of suspicion, or merely propter odium et atiam (through hatred and ill will); and if upon the inquisition due cause of suspicion did not appear, then there issued another writ for the sheriff to admit him to bail. 3 Bla. Com. 128. This was one of the many safeguards by which the English law early endeavored to protect the innocent against the oppression of the powerful through a misuse of its forms. The writ was to issue of course to any one, without denial, and gratis. Bracton, l. 3, tr. 2, ch. 8; Magna Charta, c. 26; Stat. Westm. 2 (13 Edw. I.), c. 29. It was restrained by stat. Gloucester (6 Edw. I.), c. 9, and abolished by 28 Edw. III. c. 9, but revived, however, on the repeal of this statute, by the 42 Edw. III. c. 1; Co. 2d Inst. 43, 55, 315. It has now passed out of use. 3 Bla. Com. 129. See ASSIZE.

DE PRÆROGATIVA REGIS (Lat. of the king's prerogative). The statute 17 Edw. I. st. 1, c. 9, defining the prerogatives of the crown on certain subjects, but especially directing that the king shall have ward of the lands of idiots, taking the profits without waste and finding them necessities. 2 Steph. Com. 509.

DE PROPRIETATE PROBANDA (Lat. for proving property). A writ which issues in a case of replevin, when the defendant claims property in the chattels replevied and the sheriff makes a return accordingly. The writ directs the sheriff to summon an inquest to determine on the validity of the claim; and, if they find for the defendant, the sheriff merely returns their finding. The plaintiff is not concluded by such finding: he may come into the court and traverse it. Hamm. N. P. 456.

This writ has been superseded in England by the "summons to interplead;" in Pennsylvania and Delaware the "claim property bond" is a convenient substitute for the old practice, and similar to this is the practice under the New York Code. Morr. Repl. 304.

DEAD BODY. A corpse.

There is no right of property, in the ordinary sense of the word, in a dead human body ; Co. Inst. 202 ; 4 Bla. Com. 235 ; 99 Mass. 281 ; 10 R. I. 227 ; 31 Leg. Int. 268 ; 3 Edw. Ch. 155 ; 10 Cent. L. J. 303 ; 5 W. R. 318 ; 2 Wms. on Ex., 7th Am. ed. 165 n. ; but there are rights attached to it which the law will protect ; 10 Cent. L. J. 304 ; and for the health and protection of society, it is a rule of the common law, and this has been confirmed by statutes in civilized states and countries, that public duties are imposed upon public officers, and private duties upon the husband or wife and the next of kin of the deceased, to protect the body from violation and see that it is properly interred, and to protect it after it is interred ; 1 Witthaus & Becker's Med. Jur. 297. The executors have a right to possession of it and it is their duty to bury it. 2 Wms. on Ex., 7th Am. ed. 165 n. ; 10 Pick. 154 ; 42 Pa. 293. It was held in an English case that a direction by will as to the disposition of the testator's body cannot be enforced. In this case it was doubted as to whether it is lawful to burn a body, but the point was not decided ; 20 L. R. Ch. D. 659 ; s. c. 21 Am. L. Reg. N. S. 508 ; but subsequently it was held that it was no misdemeanor to burn a body unless it was done in such a manner as to amount to a nuisance ; 12 Q. B. D. 247.

The right to make testamentary direction concerning the disposal of the body has been conferred by statute in several states ; e. g. New York, Maine, Oklahoma, and Minnesota. The question of the right of disposal of the body is ably discussed by Mr. R. S. Guernsey in 10 Cent. L. J. 303, 325, and he concludes upon the authorities that in the absence of testamentary disposition the right and duty of burial devolves upon relatives "as follows: 1. Husband or wife. 2. Children. 3. If none—(1) Father. (2) Mother. 4. Brothers and sisters. 5. Next of kin according to the course of the common law, according to the law of descent of personal property ;" id. 327. Probably the rule may be fairly stated that there be no husband or wife of the deceased, the nearest of kin in order of right to administration is charged with the duty of burial.

Where a widow ordered a funeral of her husband, it was held, that she was liable for the expense, although she was an infant at the time, the court holding that the expenses fell under the head of necessities, for which infants' estates are liable ; 13 M. & W. 252.

The leaving unburied the corpse of a person for whom the defendant is bound to provide Christian burial, as a wife or child, is an indictable misdemeanor, if he is shown to have been of ability to provide such burial ; 2 Den. 325. And every householder in whose house a dead body lies is bound by the common law, if he has the means to do so, to inter the body decently ; and this principle applies where a person dies in the house of a parish or a union ; 12 A. & E. 773. The expense for such burial may be paid out of the effects of deceased ; 3 Camp. 298.

To disinter a dead body without lawful authority, even for the purpose of dissection, is a misdemeanor, for which the offender may be indicted at common law ; 1 Russ. Cr. 414 ; 1 D. & R. 13 ; R. & R. 366, n. b ; 4 Blackf. 328 ; 19 Pick. 304 ; 1 Greenl. 226. This offence is punished by statute in New Hampshire, in Vermont, in Massachusetts, in Wisconsin, in New York. See 1 Russ. 414, n. A. There can be no larceny of a dead body ; 2 East, Pl. Cr. 652 ; 12 Co. 106 ; but may be of the clothes or shroud upon it ; 13 Pick. 402 ; 12 Co. 113 ; Co. 3d Inst. 110 ; 1 Greenl. 226 ; 68 Mo. 208.

After the right of burial has once been exercised by the person charged with the duty of burial, or where such person has consented to the burial by another person, no right to the corpse remains except to protect it from unlawful interference ; 43 N. J. Eq. 140 ; 11 Phila. 303 ; 10 B. & S. 298. But see 130 Mass. 422. An autopsy may be made by a physician at the tomb of the deceased, under legal direction and at the request of the relatives, for the purpose of ascertaining whether a crime has been committed in producing death, and he does not render himself liable by removing and keeping in his possession a portion of the skull of the deceased at the direction of the coroner ; 78 Wis. 483. It is the duty of the coroner after death by violence to cause an autopsy to be made ; the surgeon who makes it can recover from the county for his labor ; 34 Pa. 301 ; 86 Ind. 154 ; 38 N. Y. 964. The matter of ordering autopsies and dissections of dead bodies, or exhuming them for that purpose, has been regulated by statutes in nearly all the states of the United States. See for collection of statutes relative to this entire subject, 1 Witthaus & Becker, Med. Jur. 304.

In England, where a son had removed, without leave, the body of his mother from the burial-ground of a congregation of Protestant dissenters, to bury it in church ground, it was held that he was guilty of a misdemeanor at common law, and that it was no defence to such a charge that his motives were pious and laudable; 1 Dears. & B. 160; s. c. 7 Cox, C. C. 214. But where the master of a workhouse, having as such the lawful possession of the bodies of paupers who died therein, and who therefore was authorized under the statute to permit the bodies of such paupers to undergo anatomical examination, unless to his knowledge the deceased person had expressed in his lifetime, in the manner therein mentioned, his desire to the contrary, "or unless the surviving husband or wife, or any known relative, of the deceased person, should require the body to be interred without such examination," in order to prevent the relatives of the deceased paupers from making this requirement, and to lead them to believe that the bodies were buried without dissection, showed the bodies to the relatives in coffins, and caused the appearance of a funeral to be gone through, and, having by this fraud prevented the relatives from making the requirement, then sold the bodies for dissection, he was held not to be indictable at common law; 1 Dears. & B. 590. When a post mortem examination is required by law, neither the coroner, nor the physician who performs it, nor the person in whose room it is held, will be liable to the relations of the deceased for injury to their feelings caused by the mutilations of the body; 32 Atl. Rep. (Md.) 177.

The preventing a dead body from being buried is also an indictable offence; 2 Term 734; 4 East 460; 1 Russ. Cr. 415, 416, note A. To inter a dead body found in a river, it seems, would render the offender liable to an indictment for a misdemeanor, unless he first sent for the coroner; 1 Ky. 250; or to cast it into a river without the rites of sepulchre; 1 Me. 226.

The purchaser of land upon which is located a burial ground may be enjoined from removing bodies therefrom, if he attempts to do so against the wishes of the relatives or next of kin of the deceased. Every interment is a concession of the privilege which cannot afterward be repudiated, and the purchaser's title to the ground is fettered with the right of burial; 2 Brewster (Pa.) 372. But the right of the municipal or state authorities, with the consent of the owner of the burial lot or in the execution of eminent domain, to remove dead bodies from cemeteries is well settled; 88 Pa. 42; 30 Ind. 492; 63 N. H. 17. To seize a dead body on pretence of arresting for debt is contra bonos mores and an extortion on the relatives; 4 East 460. And in some states there are statutes declaring it to be a misdemeanor to attach or seize under execution a dead body; Cal. Pen. Code § 295; Me. Rev. St.

ch. 124, § 26; Mass. Pub. St. ch. 207, § 46; R. I. Pub. St. § 3222.

The law of Indiana (2 R. S. p. 473) prohibits the removal of a dead body without the consent of a near relative or of the deceased in his lifetime. The laws of Louisiana, California, Connecticut, Vermont, and Ohio, recognize the interest of the relatives of a deceased person in his body.

In 4 Bradf. Sur. 502, a learned report by S. B. Ruggles lays down these conclusions, substantially:—

1. Neither a corpse nor its burial is subject to ecclesiastical cognizance.

2. The right to bury a corpse and preserve it is a legal right.

3. Such right, in the absence of testamentary disposition, is in the next of kin (so in 13 Ind. 138).

4. The right to protect the corpse includes the right to preserve it by burial, to select the place of sepulture, and to change it at pleasure.

5. If the burial-place be taken for public use, the next of kin must be indemnified for removal and reinterment, etc. Approved by the Sup. Ct. N. Y. (1856).

A widow who allows her husband to be buried in a certain place may not disturb his remains; her right to the body of her deceased husband being terminated by the burial, and any further disposition of such body belonging thereafter exclusively to his next of kin; 42 Pa. 293. When one in accordance with his own wishes was buried in his own lot by his widow, and she removed his remains, she was ordered, in equity, to restore them; 10 R. I. 227; s. c. 14 Am. Rep. 672, and note. A son is not allowed to remove his father's remains against his mother's wishes; 18 Abb. N. C. 78; see 10 Alb. L. J. 70, with note. After interment, the control over a dead body is in the next of kin living. But if they differ about its disposal, equity will not help its removal. Where a corpse has been properly buried, it is doubtful if even the next of kin can remove it; 16 Am. L. Reg. 155, and note. Where a wife allowed her husband's remains to be placed temporarily in a vault in New York, and his father removed them to his own vault, Held, that, in the absence of a request by the deceased husband in his lifetime, the widow might control the place of burial, but that she could not, under the circumstances, disturb their repose and take them to Kentucky; Southworth v. Southworth, in the New York Superior Court, 1881, reported in an article on this subject in 17 Can. L. J. 184. The husband having in a time of great distress of mind after his wife's death consented to her burial in a lot of the husbands of two of her sisters, and sought to remove her body to the lot owned by himself and his co-heirs, the defendants, being the lot owners, refused permission, and on application for injunction to restrain their interference, it was held that he had never consented to her burial in the lot as a final resting place, and that the defendants might be required by a court of chancery to permit the removal. Chief Justice Gray said: Neither the husband nor the next of kin, have, strictly speaking, any right of property in a dead body; but controversies between them as to the place of its burial are, in this country where there are no ecclesiastical courts, within the jurisdiction of a court of equity; 130 Mass. 423; 99 id. 281; 2 Bla. Com. 429; 60 How. Pr. 368.

DEAD-BORN. A dead-born child is to be considered as if it had never been conceived or born; in other words, it is presumed it never had life, it being a maxim of the common law that mortuus exitus non est exitus (a dead birth is no birth). Co. Litt. 29 b. See 2 PAIGE, CH. 35; 4 Ves. 334.

This is also the doctrine of the civil law. Dig. 50. 16. 129. Non nasci, et natum mori, pari sunt (not to be born, and to be born dead, are equivalent). La. Civ. Code, art. 28; Domat, liv. prél. t. 2, s. 1, nn. 4, 6.

DEAD FREIGHT. The amount paid by a charterer for that part of the vessel's capacity which he does not occupy although he has contracted for it.

When the charterer of a vessel has shipped part of the goods on board, and is not ready to ship the remainder, the master, unless restrained by his special contract, may take other goods on board, and the amount which is not supplied, required to complete the cargo, is considered dead freight. The dead freight is to be calculated according to the actual capacity of the vessel. 3 CHIT. COM. LAW 399; 2 STARK. 450; McCULL. COM. DIC. See L. R. 6 Q. B. 528.

DEAD LETTERS. Letters transmitted through the mails according to direction, and remaining for a specified time uncalled for by the persons addressed, are called dead letters.

By the act to amend the laws relating to the post-office department, June 8, 1872, the postmaster-general is authorized to regulate the times at which undelivered letters shall be sent to the dead-letter office, and for their return to the writers; and to have published a list of undelivered letters—by writing, posting, or advertising—in his discretion. If advertised, it must be in the newspaper of largest circulation regularly published within the delivery, and in case of dispute as to the calculation of computing newspapers, the postmaster may receive evidence and decide upon the fact. If no daily paper is published within the delivery, then the list may be advertised in the daily paper of adjoining delivery. One cent to be paid the publisher for each letter advertised. Letters addressed in a foreign language may be advertised in the journal of that language most used. Such journal must be in the same or adjoining district.

Dead letters containing valuables shall be registered in the department; and if they cannot be delivered to the person addressed or to the writer, the contents, so far as available, shall be included in receipts of department, subject to reclamation within four years; and such letters, containing valuables not available, shall be disposed of as the postmaster-general shall direct; the proceeds therefrom to be turned into the Treasury as a part of the postal revenues. U. S. Rev. Stat. sec. 3938.

Foreign dead letters remain subject to treaty stipulations.

The postage on a return dead letter is two cents, the single rate, unless it is registered as valuable, when double rates are charged.

By the act of July 1, 1864, c. 197, sect. 13, the contents of dead letters which have been registered in the department, so far as available, shall be used to promote the efficiency of the dead-letter office.

Dead matter is thus classified by the post-office department: unclaimed or refused by the party addressed; that which, from its nature, as obscene or relating to lottery, cannot be delivered; fictitious or indefinite address; fraudulent. See POSTAGE.

DEADLY WEAPON. See DANGEROUS WEAPON; ARMS.

DEAD MAN'S PART. That portion of the personal estate of a person deceased which by the custom of London became the administrator's.

If the decedent left wife and children, this was one-third of the residue after deducting the widow's chamber; if only a widow, or only children, it was one-half; 1 P. Wms. 341; Salk. 246; if neither widow nor children, it was the whole; 2 Show. 175. This provision was repealed by the statute 1 Jac. II. c. 17, and the same made subject to the statute of distributions. 2 Bla. Com. 5, 8. See CUSTOM OF LONDON.

DEAD'S PART. In Scotch Law. The part remaining over beyond the shares secured to the widow and children by law. Of this the testator had the unqualified disposal. Stair, Inst. lib. iii. tit. 4, § 24; Bell, Dict.; Paterson, Comp. §§ 674, 848, 902. See LEGITIM.

DEAD-PLEDGE. A mortgage; mortuum vadium.

DEAF AND DUMB. A person deaf and dumb is doli capax; but with such persons who have not been educated, and who cannot communicate their ideas in writing, a difficulty sometimes arises on the trial.

A case occurred of a woman deaf and dumb who was charged with a crime. She was brought to the bar, and the indictment was then read to her; and the question, in the usual form, was put, Guilty or not guilty? The counsel for the prisoner then rose, and stated that he could not allow his client to plead to the indictment until it was explained to her that she was at liberty to plead guilty or not guilty. This was attempted to be done, but was found impossible, and she was discharged from the bar simpliciter. Case of Jean Campbell, 1 Wh. & St. Med. Jur. § 468. When the party indicted is deaf and dumb, he may, if he understands the use of signs, be arraigned, and the meaning of the clerk who addresses him conveyed to him by signs, and his signs in reply explained to the court, so as to justify his trial and the infliction of punishment; 14 Mass. 207; 1 Leach 102; 1 Chit. Cr. L. 417. See 8 Jones, N. C. 136. It was formerly said that persons deaf and dumb were presumably idiots; 1 Hale, P. C. 34; but that doctrine was formulated at a period when the subject of the education of such unfortunate persons had received little or no attention. Such, baldly stated, is unquestionably not the rule of law. One deaf and dumb is not consequently insane, and his capacity appearing, he may be tried; 1 Bish. Cr. L. § 395; the ordinary presumption of sound mind and criminal responsibility, as was said by Gilpin, C. J., in a case of homicide by a person so afflicted, "does not apply to a deaf and dumb person when charged with the commission of a crime. On the contrary, the legal presumption is then directly reversed; for in such case it is incumbent upon the prosecution to prove to the satisfaction of the jury that the accused had capacity and reason sufficient to enable him to distinguish between right and wrong as to the act at the time when it was committed by him, and had a knowledge and consciousness that the act he was doing was wrong and criminal and would subject him to punishment; 1 Houst. Cr. Rep. 291. In that case the prisoner was acquitted "under circumstances wherein plainly they would not have done it if he had been endowed with hearing and speech;" 1 Bish. Cr. L. § 395.

A person deaf and dumb may be examined as a witness, provided he can be sworn; that is, if he is capable of understanding the terms of the oath, and assents to it, and if, after he is sworn, he can convey his ideas, with or without an interpreter, to the court and jury; Phill. Ev. 14. If he is able to communicate his ideas perfectly by writing, he will be required to adopt that as the more satisfactory method; but, if his knowledge of that method is imperfect, he will be permitted to testify by means of signs; 1 Greenl. Ev. § 366; Tayl. Ev. 1170.

DEAF, DUMB, AND BLIND. A man born deaf, dumb, and blind was formerly considered an idiot (q. v.). Fitzh. N. B. 233; 1 Bla. Com. 304. But this is only a legal presumption and is open to be rebutted by evidence of capacity; id., Sherwood's note 23; 1 Chit. Med. Jur. 301, 345; 4 Johns. Ch. 441; 3 Ired. 535.

DEAFFOREST. In Old English Law. To discharge from being forest. To free from forest laws.

DEALER. A dealer in the popular, and therefore in the statutory sense of the word, is not one who buys to keep, or makes to sell, but one who buys to sell again. 27 Pa. 494; 33 id. 385.

DEAN. In Ecclesiastical Law. An ecclesiastical officer, who derives his name from the fact that he presides over ten canons, or prebendaries, at least.

There are several kinds of deans, namely: deans of chapters; deans of peculiars; rural deans; deans in the colleges; honorary deans; deans of provinces.

DEAN AND CHAPTER. In Ecclesiastical Law. The council of a bishop, to assist him with their advice in the religious and also in the temporal affairs of the see. 3 Co. 75; 1 Bla. Com. 382; Co. Litt. 103, 300; Termes de la Ley; 2 Burn, Eccl. Law 120.

DEAN OF THE ARCHES. The presiding judge of the court of arches. He was also an assistant judge in the court of admiralty. 1 Kent 371; 3 Steph. Com. 727.

DEATH. The cessation of life. The ceasing to exist.

Civil death is the state of a person who, though possessing natural life, has lost all his civil rights, and as to them, is considered as dead.

A person convicted and attainted of felony and sentenced to the state prison for life is, in the state of New York, in consequence of the act of 29th of March, 1790, and by virtue of the conviction and sentence of imprisonment for life, to be considered as civilly dead; 6 Johns. 118; 4 id. 228, 260. And a similar doctrine anciently prevailed in other cases at common law in England. See Co. Litt. 133; 1 Sharsw. Bla. Com. 132, n.

Natural death is the cessation of life.

It is also used to denote a death which occurs by the unassisted operation of natural causes, as distinguished from a violent death, or one caused or accelerated by the interference of human agency.

In Medical Jurisprudence. The cause, phenomena, and evidence of violent death are of importance.

An ingenious theory as to the cause of death has been brought forward by Philip, in his work on Sleep and Death, in which he claims that to the highest form of life three orders of functions are necessary,—viz.: the muscular, nervous, and sensorial; that of these the two former are independent of the latter, and continue in action for a while after its cessation; that they might thus continue always, but for the fact that they are dependent on the process of respiration; that this process is a voluntary act, depending upon the will, and that this latter is embraced in the sensorial function. In this view, death is the suspension or removal of the sensorial function, and that leads to the suspension of the others through the cessation of respiration. Philip, Sleep & D.; Dean, Med. Jur. 413 et seq.

Its phenomena, or signs and indications. Real is distinguishable from apparent death by the absence of the heart-beats and respiration. These conditions are, however, not always easy to determine positively when the following tests may be applied:—
1. Temperature of body the same as the surrounding air. 2. Intermittent shocks of electricity at different tensions give no indications of muscular irritability. 3. Movements of the joints of the extremities and of the jaw showing more or less rigor-mortis. 4. A bright needle plunged into the biceps muscle and left there showing no signs of oxidation on withdrawal (Cloquet's test). 5. The opening of a vein showing that the blood has coagulated. 6. The subcutaneous injection of ammonia causing a dirty brown stain (Monte Verde's test). 7. A fillet applied to the arm causing no filling of the veins on the distal side of the fillet (Richardson's test). 8. "Diaphanous test"; after death there is an absence of the translucence seen in the living when the hand is held before a strong light with the fingers extended and in contact. 9. "Eye test"; after death there is loss of pupillary reaction to light and to anydriatics, and there is also loss of corneal transparency; H. P. Loomis in Witthaus & Becker, Med. Jur.

Its evidence when produced by violence. This involves the inquiry as to the cause of death in all cases of the finding of bodies divested of life through unknown agencies. It seeks to gather all the evidence that can be furnished by the body and surrounding circumstances bearing upon this difficult and at best doubtful subject. It more immediately concerns the duties of the coroner, but is liable to come up subsequently for a more thorough and searching investigation. As this is a subject of great, general, and growing interest, no apology is deemed necessary for presenting briefly some of the points to which inquiry should be directed, together with a reference to authorities where the doctrines are more thoroughly discussed.

The first point for determination is, whether the death was the act of God or the result of violence. Sudden death is generally produced by a powerful invasion of the living forces that develop themselves in the heart, brain, or lungs—the first being called syncope, the second apoplexy, and the third asphyxia. Dean, Med. Jur. 426.

The last two are the most important to be understood in connection with the subject of persons found dead.

In death from apoplexy, the sudden invasion of the brain destroys innervation, by which the circulation is arrested, each side of the heart containing its due proportion of blood, and the cavities are all distended from loss of power in the heart to propel its contents. Death from apoplexy is disclosed by the appearances revealed by dissection, particularly in the brain.

Death by asphyxia is still more important to be understood. It is limited to cases where the heart's action is made to cease through the interruption of the respiration. It is accomplished by all the possible modes of excluding atmospheric air from the lungs. The appearances in the body indicating death from asphyxia are, violet discolorations, eyes prominent, firm, and brilliant, cadaveric rigidity early and well marked, venous system of the brain full of blood, lungs distended with thick dark-colored blood, liver, spleen, and kidneys gorged, right cavities of the heart distended, left almost empty.

Many indications as to whether the death is the act of God or the result of violence may be gathered from the position and circumstances in which the body is found. As thorough an examination as possible should be first made of the body before changing its position or that of any of the limbs, or varying in any respect its relations with surrounding bodies. This is more necessary if the death has been apparently caused by wounds. Then the wounds require a special examination before any change is made in position, in order from their nature, character, form, and appearance to determine the instrument by which they were inflicted, and also their agency in causing the death. Their relations with external objects may indicate the direction from which they were dealt, and, if incised, their extent, depth, vessels severed, and hemorrhage produced may be conclusive as to the cause of death.

A thorough examination should be made of the clothes worn by the deceased, and any parts torn or presenting any unusual appearance should be carefully noted. A list should be made of all articles found on the body, and of their state and condition. The body itself should undergo a very careful examination. This should have reference to the color of the skin, the temperature of the body, the existence and extent of the cadaveric rigidity of the muscular system, the state of the eyes and of the sphincter muscles, noting at the same time whatever swellings, ecchymoses, or livid, black, or yellow spots, wounds, ulcers, contusions, fractures, or luxations, may be present. The fluids that have exuded from the nose, mouth, ears, sexual organs, etc., should be carefully examined: and when the deceased is a female, it will be proper to examine the sexual organs with care, with a view of ascertaining whether before death the crime of rape had or had not been committed.

Another point to which the attention should be directed is, the state of the body in reference to the extent and amount of decomposition that may have taken place in it, with the view of determining when the death took place. This is sometimes important to identify the murderer. The period after death at which putrefaction supervenes became a subject of judicial examination in Desha's case, reported in Dean, Med. Jur. 423 et seq., and more fully in 2 Beck, Med. Jur. 44 et seq. Another interesting inquiry, where persons are found drowned, is presented in the inquiry as to the existence of adipocere, a compound of a yellowish-white color, consisting of calcareous or ammoniacal soap, which is formed in bodies immersed in water in from eight weeks to three years from the cessation of life. Tayl. Med. Jur., Hartsh. ed. 542; 1 Ham. Leg. Med. 104.

Another point towards which it is proper to direct examination regards the situation and condition of the place where the body is found, with the view of determining two facts:—first, whether it be a case of homicide, suicide, or visitation of God; and, second, whether, if one of homicide, the murder occurred there or at some other place, the body having been brought there and left. The points to be noted here are whether the ground appears to have been disturbed from its natural condition; whether there are any, and what, indications of a struggle; whether there are any marks of footsteps, and, if any, their size, number, the direction to which they lead, and whence they came; whether any traces of blood or hair can be found; and whether any, or what, instruments or weapons, which could have caused death, are found in the vicinity; and all such instruments should be carefully preserved, so that they may be identified. Dean, Med. Jur. 257; 2 Beck, Med. Jur. 107, nn. 136, 250.

As the decision of the question relating to the cause of death is often important and difficult to determine, it may be proper to notice some of its signs and indications in a few of the most prominent cases where it is induced by violence.

Death by drowning is caused by asphyxia from suffocation, by nervous or syncopal asphyxia, or by asphyxia from cerebral congestion.

In the first, besides other indications of asphyxia, the face is pale or violet, a frothy foam at the mouth, froth in the larynx, trachea, and bronchi, water in the trachea and, sometimes, in the ramifications of the bronchia, and also in the stomach. In the second, the face and skin are pale, the trachea empty, lungs and brain natural, no water in the stomach. In the third, the usual indications of death by apoplexy are found on examination of the brain. See 1 Ham. Leg Med. 120.

Death by hanging is produced by asphyxia suspending respiration by compressing the larynx, by apoplexy pressing upon the veins and preventing the return of blood from the head, by fracture of the cervical vertebræ, laceration of trachea or larynx, or rupture of the ligaments of the neck, or by compressing the nerves of the neck. The signs and indications depend upon the cause of death. Among these are, face livid and swollen, lips distorted, eyelids swollen, eyes red and projecting, tongue enlarged, livid, compressed, froth about the lips and nostrils, a deep ecchymosed mark of the cord about the neck, sometimes ecchymosed patches on different parts of the body, fingers contracted or clenched, and the body retaining its animal heat longer than in other modes of death.

Death by strangulation presents much the same appearances, the mark of the cord being lower down on the neck, more horizontal, and plainer and more distinctly ecchymosed.

Death by cold leaves few traces in the system. Pale surface, general congestion of internal organs, sometimes effused serum in the ventricles of the brain.

Death by burning presents a narrow white line surrounding the burnt spot; external to that, one of a deep-red tint, running by degrees into a diffused redness. This is succeeded in a few minutes by blisters filled with serum.

Death by lightning usually exhibits a contused or lacerated wound where the electric fluid entered and passed out. Sometimes an extensive ecchymosis appears,—more commonly on the back, along the course of the spinal marrow.

Death by starvation produces general emaciation; eyes and cheeks sunken; bones projecting; face pale and ghastly; eyes red and open; skin, mouth, and fauces dry; stomach and intestines empty; gall-bladder large and distended; body exhaling a fetid odor; heart, lungs, and large vessels collapsed; early commencement of the putrefactive process.

These and all other questions relating to persons found dead will be found fully discussed in works on medical jurisprudence.

The Legal Consequences. Persons who have been once shown to have been in life are always presumed thus to continue until the contrary is shown; so that the burden is on the party asserting the death to make proof of it; 2 East 312; 2 Rolle 461. But proof of a long continued absence unheard from and unexplained will lay a foundation for presumption of death; 155 Mass. 461; 83 Me. 289; 83 Ky. 219; but where an heir at law and devisee marries in the state and afterwards removes with their children to the west, and nothing is heard of him or them for forty-five or fifty years by any of their relations living in the state, the court will not instruct the jury to presume that they were all dead without issue; 6 Houst. 447. Various periods of time are found in the adjudged cases to warrant such presumption. It was held to arise after twenty-seven years; 3 Bro. C. C. 510; twenty years, sixteen years; 5 Ves. 458; 155 Mass. 359; fourteen years; 3 S. & R. 390; twelve years; 18 Johns. 141; eleven years; 7 Mackey 268. The general rule, as now understood, is that the presumption of the duration of life ceases at the expiration of seven years from the time when the person was last known to be living; 1 Phil. Ev., 4th Am. ed. 640; 1 Greenl. Ev. § 41; Tayl. Ev. 216; 5 Johns. 263; 5 B. & Ad. 86; 11 Ky. L. Rep. 219; 126 Pa. 297; 69 Tex. 19. There are cases, however, where a presumption of death may be raised from even a shorter absence; 45 Minn. 159; 125 N. Y. 610; and while seven years is the period in which the presumption of continued life ceases, yet this period may be shortened by proof of such facts and circumstances as, submitted to the test of experience, would force a conviction of death within a shorter period; 71 Fed. Rep. 258; 97 U. S. 628; 130 Mass. 505; 18 Neb. 664; but the law raises no presumption as to the exact time of death; 97 U. S. 628; 73 Wis. 170. See article in 2 Harv. L. Rev.; 34 Sol. Journ. 247. It seems that such continued absence for seven years from the particular state of his residence, without showing an absence from the United States, is sufficient; 10 Pick. 515; 1 Rawle 373; 1 A. K. Marsh. 278; 1 Penning. 167; 2 Bay 476; but the statutory presumption of the death of a person will not be received until all reasonable doubt of his death, at a given time, is removed; 49 N. J. Eq. 420. There are cases, however, in which an absence of seven years will not raise a presumption of death without issue, as where it is probable that the failure to communicate with friends is intentional; 66 Hun 266. See ESCHÉAT.

The record of the probate of a will is not competent evidence of death; 60 N. Y. 121; s. c. 19 Am. Rep. 144, and note. But it is held that where a foreign court of competent jurisdiction has made a grant of administration on the presumption of death, such grant may be accepted by the court of probate as sufficient proof of the death; [1892] Prob. 255. A letter contained in an envelope requesting a return to the writer, if not called for, and showing the post office stamp that it had been returned to the writer, is admissible as affording ground for an inference, more or less strong, of the death of the addressee; 63 Vt. 667.

Questions of great doubt and difficulty have arisen where several persons, respectively entitled to inherit from one another, happen to perish all together by the same event, such as a shipwreck, a battle, or a conflagration, without any possibility of ascertaining who died first. In such cases the French civil code and the civil code of Louisiana lay down rules (the latter copying from the former) which are deduced from the probabilities resulting from the strength, age, and difference of sex of the parties.

If those thus perishing together were under fifteen, the eldest shall be presumed the survivor. If they were all above sixty, the youngest shall be presumed the survivor. If some were under fifteen and others above sixty, the former shall be presumed the survivors. If those who have perished together had completed the age of fifteen and were under sixty, the male shall be presumed the survivor where the ages are equal or the difference does not exceed one year. If they were of the same sex, that presumption shall be admitted which opens the succession in the order of nature; and thus the younger must be presumed to have survived the elder. French Civ. Code, art. 720-722; La. Civ. Code, art. 930-933; 76 Cal. 649.

The English common law has never adopted these provisions, or gone into the refinement of reasoning upon which they are based. It requires the survivorship of two or more to be proved by facts, and not by any settled legal rule or prescribed presumption. In some of the cases that have arisen involving this bare question of survivorship, the court have advised a compromise, denying that there was any legal principle upon which it could be decided. In others, the decision has been that they all died together, and that none could transmit rights to others; 1 W. Bla. 640; Fearne, Posth. Works 38, 39; 2 Phill. 261; Cro. Eliz. 503; 1 Metc. Mass. 308; 3 Hagg. Eccl. 748; 5 B. & Ad. 91; 1 Y. & C. Ch. 121; 1 Curt. 405, 429; 23 Kan. 276; 3 Redf. 87; [1892] Prob. 142; 73 Me. 403; that is, the one who bears the burden of proof of survivorship fails in his case; 75 N. Y. 78. Where a mother and daughter die in the same year, but there is no evidence of the precise date of the death of the mother, an assumption that she died before the daughter is not warranted; 81 Tex. 678.

Where the death of two or more persons result from a common disaster, the case must be determined upon its own peculiar facts and circumstances, whenever the evidence is sufficient to support a finding as to survivorship; 73 Wis. 445.

Where land has been sold on administration proceedings under a petition alleging the decease of a person because of his disappearance from home and failure to hear from him for a period of seven years, he cannot on his return recover it in ejectment against innocent purchasers who have taken possession and made valuable improvements; 5 Wash. St. 309.

As to contracts. These are, in general, not affected by the death of either party. The executors or administrators of the decedent are required to fulfil all his engagements, and may enforce all those in his favor. But to this rule there are the following exceptions, in which the contracts are terminated by the death of one of the parties:—

The contract of marriage. See MARRIAGE. The contract of partnership. See PARTNERSHIP.

Those contracts which are altogether personal: as, where the deceased has agreed to accompany the other party to the contract on a journey, or to serve another; Pothier, Obl. c. 7, art. 3, §§ 2, 3; 24 Fed. Rep. 583; or to instruct an apprentice; Bacon, Abr. Executor, P; 1 Burn, Eccl. Law 82; Hamm. Partn. 157; Ans. Contr. 325; 1 Rawle 61; also an instance of this species of contract in 2 B. & Ad. 303. In all those cases where one is acting for another and by his authority, such as agencies and powers of attorney, where the agency or power is not coupled with an interest, the death of the party ordinarily works a revocation; 8 Wheat. 174; 83 Pa. 228. Where the power is to transfer stock, signed by the seller of the stock, it is not revoked by his death; 81 W. N. Cas. Pa. 502. See AGENCY.

As to torts. In general, when the tortfeasor or the party injured dies, the cause of action dies with him; but when the deceased might have waived the tort and maintained assumpsit against the defendant, his personal representative may do the same thing. See ACTIO PERSONALIS MORITUR CUM PERSONA, where this subject is more fully examined.

As to crimes. When a person accused of crime dies before trial, no proceedings can be had against his representatives or his estate.

As to inheritance. By the death of a person seized of real estate or possessed of personal property, his property real and personal, after satisfying his debts, vests, when he has made a will, as he has directed by that instrument; but if he dies intestate, his real estate goes to his heirs at law under the statute of descents, and his personal to his administrators, to be distributed to the next of kin, under the statute of distributions.

In suits. At common law an original suit abated by reason of the death of the plaintiff; 6 Wait, Act. & Def. 400; 24 Miss. 192; but in most of the states and England it is otherwise, and the personal representatives may become parties and prosecute the suit; Wms. Ex., 7th Am. ed. pt. ii. b. iii. ch. 4, and American note thereto, pp. 91, 99. In one state, Delaware, there is a constitutional provision that no action shall abate by the death of a party; Del. Const. art. 6, § 18. The English practice and rules under the procedure acts will be found in the chapter of Williams on Executors above cited and a reference to the American statutes in the note thereto. In case of the death of a plaintiff the usual practice is to make a suggestion of it to the court which is entered of record; and in case of the death of a defendant his executor or administrator may be made a party, either by scire facias, or motion for an order of revivor, or other proceeding for giving due notice to the representative, according to the varying practice of the several states. See ABATEMENT.

The death of a defendant will discharge the special bail; Tidd, Pr. 243; but when he dies after the return of the ca. sa. and before it is filed, the bail are fixed; 6 Term 284; 5 Binn. 332, 338; 2 Mass. 485; 12 Wheat. 604; 4 Johns. 407; 4 N. H. 29; 45 Ala. 52; 67 How. Pr. 173.

DEATH-BED DEED. A deed made by one who was at the time sick of a disease from which he afterwards died. Bell, Dict.

DEATH'S PART. See DEAD'S PART; DEAD MAN'S PART.

DEBAUCH. To corrupt one's manners, to make lewd, to mar or spoil; to seduce and vitiate a woman. 2 Hilt. 329.

In an action for damages for crim. con., the allegation being that defendant seduced and debauched the plaintiff's wife, whereby her affections were alienated, etc., if the charge of adultery be not proved, the word debauch in the petition will not support a verdict for damages for alienation of affection; 47 Iowa 409.

It is a word of French origin which has come into use in our language in the sense of enticing and corrupting.

DEBENTURE (from debentur mihi, Lat., with which various old forms of acknowledgments of debt commenced). A certificate given in pursuance of law, by the collector of a port of entry, for a certain sum due by the United States, payable at a time therein mentioned, to an importer for drawback of duties on merchandise imported and exported by him, provided the duties on the said merchandise shall have been discharged prior to the time aforesaid. U. S. Rev. Stat. §§ 3037-40.

In some government departments a term used to denote a bond or bill by which the government is charged to pay a creditor or his assigns the money due on auditing his account.

An instrument in writing, generally under seal, creating a definite charge on a definite or indefinite fund or subject of property, payable to a given person, etc., and usually constituting one of a series of similar instruments. Cavanagh, Mon. Sec. 267. See 56 L. J. R. Ch. D. 815; Brice; Ultra Vires, 2d ed. 279.

A charge in writing of certain property, with the repayment at a time fixed of money lent by a person therein named at a given interest. It is frequently resorted to by public companies to raise money for the prosecution of their undertakings. The period is usually three, five, or seven years, and the amounts £50, £100, or £500, or some amounts divisible by ten. Wharton.

It is difficult to find in the books any statement approaching a definition of this class of securities. As a rule, both text writers and courts content themselves with a statement of inability to define them. A late English writer says:—"No one seems to know exactly what debenture means;" Buckley, Companies Act 169; and Chitty, J., said in one case that "a debenture means a document which either creates a debt or acknowledges it, and any document which fulfils either of these conditions is a debenture;" 37 Ch. D. 260, 264; but in the same case North, J., would not go so far. In another case the same judge (Chitty) said: "The term itself imports a debt and acknowledgment of a debt, and generally if not always imports an obligation to pay;" 36 Ch. D. 215; and again in another case he thus expresses the doubt existing as to the exact legal idea involved in the expression: "So far as I am aware, the term debenture has never received any precise legal definition. It is, comparatively speaking, a new term. I do not mean a new term in the English language, because there is a passage in Swift (quoted in Latham's Dict.) where the term debenture is used." The lines referred to are:

"You modern wits, should each man bring his claim,
I have desperate debentures on your fame;
And little would be left you, I'm afraid,
If all your debts to Greece and Rome were paid."

And the judge continued: "But although it is not a term with any legal definition, it is a term which has been used by lawyers frequently with reference to instruments under acts of parliament, which, when you turn to the acts themselves, are not so described;" 56 L. J. Ch. 817.

An American authority on corporate securities says:—"Debentures, which are the commonest form of security issued by English corporations, are defined to be instruments under seal creating a charge according to their wording upon the property of the corporation, and to that extent conferring a priority over subsequent creditors and over existing creditors not possessed of such charge. This is the true and proper use of the term; although it is frequently applied on the one hand to instruments which do not confer a charge and which are nothing more nor less than ordinary unsecured bonds, and on the other to instruments which are more than a mere charge, being in effect mortgages, and are properly termed mortgage debentures;" Jones, Corp. B. & M. § 32.

In the case of an instrument engaging for the payment of "the amount of this debenture," with coupons for interest payable half-yearly, Grove, J., said: "In the several dictionaries which we are in the habit of consulting, no satisfactory definition can be found, and neither of the learned counsel has been able to afford us any. I do not remember the term being used otherwise than in an acknowledgment of indebtedness by a corporate body having power by act of parliament or otherwise to increase its capital by borrowing money." It was something different from a promissory note, having a different stamp duty, different form, and a special mode of paying interest. The paper was held a debenture and subject to a higher stamp duty than a promissory note. In the same case Lindley, J., said that what were known as debentures were of various kinds;—mortgage debentures which were charges on some kinds of property, debenture bonds which were not, debentures which were nothing more than an acknowledgment of indebtedness and "a thing like this which is something more;" 7 Q. B. D. 165.

Debentures may be issued by a single person, a firm, or corporation, and it is an attribute implied in the definition of debenture that the holders are entitled without priority among themselves. They are, it is said, usually made a primary charge on the corporate property or undertaking, and as such will have priority over judgments obtained by general creditors and over the claims of shareholders; Cav. Mon. Sec. 358.

"Such debentures are in effect statutory mortgages. . . . In England each creditor is secured by a separate mortgage, while in America one secures all; and by statute in England, holders of mortgage debentures have no priority inter se." Jones, Corp. B. & M. Sec. 32.

Sometimes the nature of a debenture holder's charge is that of a floating mortgage or security attaching only to the subjects which are for the time being the property of the company, and not preventing the latter from disposing of the subject charged free from incumbrance; id.; L. R. 15 Ch. D. 465; 10 id. 530.

A debenture is distinguished (1) from a mortgage which is an actual transfer of property, (2) from a bond which does not directly affect property, and (3) from a mere charge on property which is individualized and does not form part of a series of similar charges; Cav. Mon. Sec. 267, citing L. R. 10 Ch. D. 530, 681; 15 id. 465; 21 id. 762; L. R. 7 App. Cas. 673. Debentures strictly so called differ from mortgages in not conferring on the grantee the legal title or any of the ordinary rights of ownership of the property upon which the charge is created. A leading American writer says of this class of securities as understood in England that the charge created by them confers only equitable rights either as against other creditors or as against the corporation creating them. It is a test whether an instrument is a debenture or mortgage to ascertain whether the holder has any legal right to interfere with the company's use or control of the property in whatever way it pleases. If the instrument confers a charge which can be protected and enforced only in equity it is strictly a debenture; Jones, Corp. B. & M. § 32. See 10 H. L. C. 191. Of course, the effect and extent of the charge depend entirely upon the language used; L. R. 2 Ch. D. 337.

A debenture holder in England differs from a mortgagee in that the latter has a lien upon tolls and traffic receipts and may have a receiver appointed while the former has not; Jones, Corp. B. & M. § 232; 2 Ir. Eq. 524; L. R. 7 Ch. 655.

Debentures issued by an English company owning land in Italy and binding their "assets, property, and effects" were held to create no mortgage or lien; 26 W. R. 123; and debenture bonds, principal and interest payable to bearer, secured by mortgage of the company to certain persons as trustees for the holders, which was void for non-recording, were held to create no charge; 19 Q. B. D. 568.

Where a company had power "to issue bonds, debentures, or mortgage debentures," which would entitle holders to be paid pari passu out of the company's property, evidences of debt expressed as "obligations" by which the company bound "themselves and their successors and all their estate property, etc.," were held to be debentures and to create a charge; 10 Ch. Div. 530.

Where a number of debentures are sealed one after another in numerical order they prima facie rank in priority accordingly, but if it is so provided, they rank pari pas- su; 21 Ch. D. 762; 38 id. 156, 171; Buckley, Companies Acts 172.

Debentures are not issued until they are delivered; id.; 34 Ch. D. 58.

The exact nature of debentures has been much discussed in England as arising in cases where the question was whether a paper required registration under the Bills of Sales Act which excepted from its provisions "debentures" issued by any mortgage, loan, or other incorporated company and secured upon the capital stock or goods, chattels, and effects of such company.

A memorandum of agreement which contained a covenant by a company to pay to each of nine persons, who were mentioned in it as lenders, the sum set opposite their names pari passu, and charged all the property of the company, was a debenture; per Chitty, J., 36 Ch. D. 215; and the covering deed which usually accompanies debentures as a security for the payment of the debentures when due is not a debenture; 34 Ch. D. 43.

A mere memorandum in writing by a coal and fireclay working and brick-making company, of a deposit with bankers of title deeds, as a security for balances due or to become due, but which did not admit any specific debt, or contain an agreement to pay otherwise than by an agreement to execute a legal mortgage, was not a debenture; 37 Ch. D. 281.

The act referred to speaks of "debentures issued . . . and secured upon," and an English writer of authority considers that this means a borrowing money for the benefit of several lenders; Buckley, Companies Acts 170; but it has been held that the statutory term debenture applied when there were several lenders but only one security given for the benefit of all; 36 Ch. D. 215; it may consist of one document, not necessarily of a series of documents; id.; and a single security to a single lender, not purporting in terms to be a debenture, was one in law; 37 Ch. D. 260. A security to a lender on some part of a company's property is not one, while an issue secured upon its entire stock in trade and undertaking is, and between these two is to be sought the line of demarcation; Buckley, Companies Acts 172.

See 7 Ry. & Corp. L. J. 518.

DEBENTURE BONDS. See DEBENTURES.

DEBENTURE STOCK. An issue of stock usually irredeemable and transferable in any amount, not including a fraction of a pound.

The terminability and fixity in amount of debentures being inconvenient to lenders has led to their being in many cases superseded by debenture stock. Whart. Lex.

The issue of debenture stock is not borrowing at all; it is the sale, in consideration of a sum of money, of the right to receive a perpetual annuity; 9 Ch. D. 337; Buckley, Companies Acts 172; and none the less so if redeemable at the option of the company; id.

DEBIT ET DETINET (Lat. he owes and withholds). In Pleading. An action of debt is said to be in the debet et detinet when it is alleged that the defendant owes and unjustly withholds or detains the debt or thing in question.

The action is so brought between the contracting parties. See DETINET.

DEBET ET SOLET (Lat. he owes and is used to). Where a man sues in a writ of right or to recover any right of which he is for the first time disseised, as of a suit at a mill or in case of a writ of quod permittat, he brings his writ in the debet et solet. Reg. Orig. 144 a; Fitzh. N. B. 122, M.

DEBIT. A term used in book-keeping, to express the left hand page of the ledger, or of an account to which are carried all the articles supplied or amounts paid on the subject of an account, or that are charged to that account.

The balance of an account where it shows that something remains due to the party keeping the account.

An amount which is set down as a debt or owing.

DEBITA FUNDI (Lat.). In Scotch Law. Debts secured on land. Bell, Dict.

DEBITA LAICORUM (Lat.). Debts of the laity. Those which may be recovered in civil courts.

DEBITUM IN PRÆSENTI SOLVENDUM IN FUTURO (Lat.). An obligation of which the binding force is complete and perfect, but of which the performance cannot be required till some future period.

DEBT (Lat. debere, to owe; debitum, something owed). In Contracts. A sum of money due by certain and express agreement. 3 Bla. Com. 154. See 2 Wash. C. C. 386.

All that is due a man under any form of obligation or promise. 3 Metc. Mass. 522. See 91 Pa. 402.

Any claim for money. Penn. Stat. March 21, 1906, § 5.

Active debt. One due to a person. Used in the civil law.

Ancestral debt. One of an ancestor which the law compels the heir to pay. 16 Pet. 25; A. & E. Encyc.

Doubtful debt. One of which the payment is uncertain. Clef des Lois Romaines.

Fraudulent debt. A debt created by fraud implies confidence and deception. It implies that it arose out of a contract, express or implied, and that fraudulent practices were employed by the debtor, by which the creditor was defrauded. 28 Ohio St. 628.

Hypothecary debt. One which is a lien upon an estate.

Judgment debt. One which is evidenced by matter of record.

Liquid debt. One which is immediately and unconditionally due.

Passive debt. One which a person owes.

Privileged debt. One which is to be paid before others in case a debtor is insolvent.

The privilege may result from the character of the creditor, as where a debt is due to the United States; or the nature of the debt, as funeral expenses, etc. See PREFERENCE; PRIVILEGE; LIEN; PRIORITY; DISTRIBUTION.

Specialty. A debt by specialty or special contract is one whereby a sum of money becomes, or is acknowledged to be, due by deed or instrument under seal; 2 Bla. Com. 465; 51 Vt. 86.

A debt may be evidenced by matter of record, by a contract under seal, or by a simple contract. The distinguishing and necessary feature is that a fixed and specific amount is owing and no future valuation is required to settle it; 3 Bla. Com. 154; 2 Hill 220.

See ACCORD AND SATISFACTION; BANKRUPTCY; COMPENSATION; CONFUSION; DEFEASANCE; DELEGATION; DISCHARGE OF A CONTRACT; EXTINCTION; EXTINGUISHMENT; FORMER RECOVERY; LAPSE OF TIME; NOVATION; PAYMENT; RELEASE; RESCISION; SET-OFF.

In Practice. A form of action which lies to recover a sum certain. 2 Greenl. Ev. 279; Andr. Steph. Pl. 77, n.

It lies wherever the sum due is certain or ascertained in such a manner as to be readily reduced to a certainty, without regard to the manner in which the obligation was incurred or is evidenced; 3 Sneed 145; 1 Dutch. 506; 26 Miss. 521; 3 McLean 150; 2 A. K. Marsh. 264; 1 Mas. 243; 13 Wall. 531; 97 U. S. 546; 110 Pa. 560.

It is thus distinguished from assumpsit, which lies as well where the sum due is uncertain as where it is certain, and from covenant, which lies only upon contracts evidenced in a certain manner.

It is said to lie in the debt and detinet (when it is stated that the defendant owes and detains) or in the detinet (when it is stated merely that he detains). Debt in the detinet for goods differs from detinue, because it is not essential in this action, as in detinue, that the specific property in the goods should have been vested in the plaintiff at the time the action is brought. Dy. 24b.

It is used for the recovery of a debt eo nomine and in numero; though damages, which are in most instances merely nominal, are usually awarded for the detention; 1 H. Bla. 550; Cowp. 588.

The action lies in the debet and detinet to recover money due, on a record or a judgment of a court of record; Salk. 109; 17 S. & R. 1; 27 Vt. 20; 10 Tex. 24; 21 Vt. 569; 1 Dev. 378; 1 Conn. 402; although a foreign court; 18 Ohio 430; 3 Brev. 395; 15 Me. 167; 2 Ala. 85; 1 Blackf. 16; 3 J. J. Mar. 600; 12 Me. 94; see 6 How. 44; on statutes at the suit of the party aggrieved; 15 Ill. 39; 22 N. H. 234; 11 Ala. N. S. 246; 11 Ohio 130; 10 Watts 382; 1 Scamm. 200; 2 McLean 195; 8 Pick. 514; 18 Wall. 516; or a common informer; 2 Cal. 243; 16 Ala. N. S. 214; 8 Leigh 479; including awards by a statutory commission; 11 Cush. 429; on specialties; 1 Term 40; 9 Mo. 218; 7 Ala. 772; 3 Ill. 14; 3 T. B. Monr. 204; 5 Gill 103; 3 Gratt. 350; 32 N. H. 446; 16 Ill. 79; 10 Humphr. 367; including a recognizance; 1 Hempst. 290; 21 Conn. 81; 8 Blackf. 527; 26 Me. 209; see 15 Ill. 221; 6 Cush. 138; 20 Ala. N. S. 68; 15 Ohio 65; on a promissory note; 1 Ark. 165; 36 Pa. 538; on a bill of exchange; 8 Leigh 50; on simple contracts, whether express; 26 Miss. 521; 17 Ala. N. S. 634; 1 Humplir. 480; although the contract might have been discharged in or before the day of payment in articles of merchandise; 4 Yerg. 171; or implied; Bull. N. P. 167; 18 Pick. 229; 10 Yerg. 452; 28 Me. 215; 1 Hempst. 181; 14 N. H. 414; to recover a specific reward offered; 1 N. J. 310. An action of debt is the proper remedy of a landlord against his tenant in possession to recover a statutory penalty for wilfully cutting trees without the owner's consent; 11 So. Rep. (Ala.) 743; and also in favor of the beneficiaries in a certificate of membership in a mutual benefit association; 23 Ill. App. 341; but it does not lie on a decree of foreclosure, which orders the money secured by the mortgage to be paid, or in default thereof the mortgaged premises to be sold and the proceeds paid into court; 15 R. I. 202.

It lies in the detinet for goods; Dy. 24 b; 1 Hempst. 290; 3 Mo. 21; Hard. 508; and by an executor for money due the testator; 1 Wins. Saund. 1; 4 Maule & S. 120; see 10 B. Monr. 247; 7 Leigh 604; or against him on the testator's contracts; 8 Wheat. 642.

The declaration, when the action is founded on a record, need not aver consideration. When it is founded on a specialty, it must contain the specialty; 11 S. & R. 238; but need not aver consideration; 16 Ill. 79; 65 Vt. 431; but when the action is for rent, the deed need not be declared on; 14 N. H. 414. When it is founded on a simple contract, the consideration must be averred; and a liability or agreement, though not necessarily an express promise to pay, must be stated; 2 Term 28, 30.

The plea of nil debet is the general issue when the action is on a simple contract, on statutes, or where a specialty is matter of inducement merely; 2 Mass. 521; 11 Johns. 474; 13 Ill. 619; 6 Ark. 250; 18 Vt. 241; 3 McLean 163; 15 Ohio 372; 8 N. H. 22; 33 Me. 268; 1 Ind. 146; 23 Miss. 233. Non est factum is the common plea when on specialty, denying the execution of the instrument; 2 Ld. Raym. 1500; 2 Ia. 320; 4 Strobb. 38; 5 Barb. 449; 8 Pa. 467; 7 Blackf. 514; 3 Mo. 79; and nil tiel record when on a record, denying the existence of the record; 16 Johns. 55; 23 Wend. 293; 6 Pick. 232. As to the rule when the judgment is one of another state, see 33 Me. 268; 3 J. J. Marsh. 600; 7 Cra. 481; 4 Vt. 58; 2 South. 778; 2 Ill. 2; 2 Leigh 172; as well as the titles FOREIGN JUDGMENT, CONFLICT OF LAWS. Other matters must, in general, be pleaded specially; 1 Ind. 174.

The judgment is, generally, that the plaintiff receive his debt and costs when for the plaintiff, and that the defendant receive his costs when for the defendant; 20 Ill. 120; 1 Ia. 99; 4 How. Miss. 40. See 8 S. & R. 263. It is reversible error to render judgment not only for the debt sued on, but for damages, as in assumpsit and for interest on the judgment; 3 Utah 451. See JUDGMENT.

DEBTEE. One to whom a debt is due;

a creditor: as, debtee executor. 3 Bla. Com. 18.

DEBTOR. One who owes a debt; he who may be constrained to pay what he owes.

DEBTOR'S ACT, 1869. The statute 32 & 33 Vict. c. 62, abolishing imprisonment for debt in England, and for the punishment of fraudulent debtors. 2 Steph. Com. 159-164. (Not to be confounded with the Bankruptcy Act of 1869.) Mozl. & W. Dict.

DEBTOR'S SUMMONS. In English Law. A summons issuing from a court having jurisdiction in bankruptcy, upon the creditor proving a liquidated debt of not less than 50*l.*, which he has failed to collect after reasonable effort, stating that if the debtor fail, within one week if a trader, and within three weeks if a non-trader, to pay or compound for the sum specified, a petition may be presented against him, praying that he may be adjudged a bankrupt. Bkcy. Act, 1869, s. 7; Robson, Bkcy.; Mozl. & W. Dict.

DECALOGUE. The ten commandments.

DECANATUS, DECANIA, DE-CANA (Lat.). A town or tithing, consisting originally of ten families of freeholders. Ten tithings compose a hundred. 1 Bla. Com. 114.

Decanatus, a deanery, a company of ten. Spelman, Gloss.; Calvinus, Lex.

Decania, Decana, the territory under the charge of a dean.

DECANUS (Lat.). A dean; an officer having charge of ten persons. In Constantinople, an officer who has charge of the burial of the dead. Nov. Jus. 43, 59; Du Cange. The term is of extensive use, being found with closely related meanings in the old Roman, the civil, ecclesiastical, and old European law. It is used of civil and ecclesiastical as well as military affairs. There were a variety of decani.

Decanus monasticus, the dean of a monastery.

Decanus in majori ecclesia, dean of a cathedral church.

Decanus militaris, a military captain of ten soldiers.

Decanus episcopi, a dean presiding over ten parishes.

Decanus friborgi, dean of a fribourg, tithing, or association of ten inhabitants. A Saxon officer, whose duties were those of an inferior judicial officer. Du Cange; Spelman, Gloss.; Calvinus, Lex.

DECAPITATION (Lat. de, from, caput, a head). The act of beheading. In some countries a method of capital punishment.

DECEDENT. A deceased person.

The signification of the word has become more extended than its strict etymological meaning. Strictly taken, it denotes a dying person, but is always used in the more extended sense given, denoting any deceased person, testate or intestate.

DECEIT. A fraudulent misrepresentation or contrivance, by which one man de-ceives another, who has no means of detecting the fraud, to the injury and damage of the latter. It need not be made in words, if the impression be made on the mind of the other party, upon which he acts, without the exact expression in words of the understanding sought to be created; 17 C. B. N. S. 482; 29 Mich. 229.

Fraud, or the intention to deceive, is the very essence of this injury; for if the party misrepresenting was himself mistaken, no blame can attach to him; Poll. Torts 353; 61 Ill. 373; 36 Pac. Rep. (Kan.) 978; 45 Ill. App. 344. The representation must be made malò animò; but whether or not the party is himself to gain by it is wholly immaterial.

It may be by the deliberate assertion of a falsehood to the injury of another, by failure to disclose a latent defect, or by concealing an apparent defect; but, as a rule, mere silence on the part of one party to a transaction as to facts which are important to the other is not deceit, if he is under no obligation to disclose them; Big. Torts 12; L. R. 6 H. L. 377; 93 U. S. 631. See CAVEAT EMPTOR.

The party deceived must have been in a situation such as to have no means of detecting the deceit. But see 52 Kan. 221.

A person cannot sustain an action for deceit where no harm comes to him; 47 Minn. 225; 2 Misc. Rep. 257; nor can he where he does not rely on the misrepresentations; 86 Wis. 427.

To entitle a party to maintain an action for deceit by means of false representations, he must, among other things, show that the defendant made false and fraudulent assertions, in regard to some fact or facts material to the transaction in which he was defrauded, by means of which he was induced to enter into it; that the misrepresentations related to alleged facts or to the condition of things as then existent. It is not every representation relating to the subject-matter of the contract which will render it void or enable the aggrieved party to maintain his action for deceit. It must be as to matters of fact substantially affecting his interests, not as to matters of opinion, judgment, probability, or expectation; 18 Pick. 95.

In order to constitute deceit it is necessary either that the false representations should be known by the person making them to be untrue, or that he should have no reason to believe them true. Mere ignorance of their falsity is no excuse; 42 Ga. 88; see 78 Ill. 65; 59 Ind. 379; 106 Mass. 77; 28 Mich. 53; 45 N. H. 422; 68 N. Y. 426. Deceit may be committed not only with the careful intention of one who knows what he asserts to be true or false, but also with the reckless intention of one who does not know what he represents to be true or false, but who, for one reason or another, is willing that his reckless representations should be believed; 9 Colo. 33; 53 N. J. Law 77; 13 Pet. 26; 31 N. W. Rep. (Minn.) 360, and cases cited.

The mere expression of opinion is not deceit, though untrue and made in most positive language; 3 T. R. 51; 2 East 92; 63

N. C. 304; but the expression of opinion as knowledge may render one liable for fraud; 42 Vt. 121. Thus a cattle-dealer who expresses an apparent opinion as to the weight of cattle he desires to sell, knowing it to be untrue, is guilty of deceit; 34 Wis. 62.

Though false representations as to the value of land are not alone sufficient to sustain an action for damages, yet if in connection with others as to the net revenues derived, they are sufficient to support such an action; 66 Hun 633; 54 Fed. Rep. 320; and an action for false representation as to title, in a sale of lands, may be maintained though the deed contains no covenants; 54 Fed. Rep. 87.

An action for deceit can only be based upon the misrepresentation of matters of fact, not of matters of law; unless the party who made the misrepresentation did it with knowledge both of the law and of the other's ignorance of it; 31 Ala. 434; 33 Ill. 238; 119 id. 567; 69 Ind. 1; L. R. 4 Ch. D. 702; 19 Tex. 303; 91 U. S. 45.

If the party complaining of misrepresentations had the same sources of information as the one who made them, he must avail himself of his means of knowledge, or he cannot recover; 13 Wall. 379; 107 Mass. 364. But a contracting party may rely upon express statements of fact, the truth of which is known or presumed to have been known to the other party, even where the means of information are open to him; Big. Torts 26; especially when the representation has a natural tendency to prevent investigation or is made the basis of the contract; id.; where one contracting party has a mental or physical infirmity, or where the parties do not stand upon an equal footing, the duty of investigating the truth of statements may be less; id. 28.

The plaintiff must also have acted upon the representation, and sustained injury by so doing; 4 H. & N. 225; 22 Me. 131; 34 Miss. 432; 30 Pa. 401; 63 N. H. 218; and they must have been made to him; 17 How. 183; 34 Miss. 432; 154 Mass. 286. One who purchases stock in the market, upon the faith of a prospectus received from persons not connected with the corporation, cannot enforce a liability against the directors for false representations therein; L. R. 6 H. L. 377; but where a prospectus is put out by a company to sell its stock, any one of the public may act on it; Big. Torts 33.

The false representations upon which deceit is predicated must also, in order to support the action, be material and relevant, and be the determining factor of the transactions; L. R. 2 Ch. 611; 5 De G., M. & G. 126; 36 Ark. 362; 89 Ill. 29; 50 Ia. 687; 127 Mass. 217; 66 N. Y. 558.

Where the effect of the misrepresentations was to bring the parties into relations with each other, express evidence of an intent to defraud is unnecessary; but where by false representations one suffers damage in a transaction with a third person, there must be express evidence that the party making the representation intended it to be acted on, or that the plaintiff was justified in assuming that he so intended ; 3 Term 51 ; Big. Torts 31.

An honest belief in a misrepresentation which the maker does not know to be false, and which it is not shown that he should know to be false by using proper care to ascertain its truth, is a complete defence, L. R. 14 App. Cas. 337, reversing 37 Ch. D. 541 ; but one who makes a representation positively, without knowing whether it is false or true, is liable for deceit ; L. R. 7 H. L. 102 ; 29 Mich. 359.

To tell half the truth and to conceal the other half, amounts to a false statement, and differs in no respect from the case of false representations ; 63 Ill. 501 ; 128 U. S. 333, 338 ; 24 Mich. 335 ; L. R. 6 H. L. 403 ; 35 Vt. 156.

An action of tort for deceit in the sale of property does not lie for false and fraudulent representations concerning profits that may be made from it in the future ; 5 Allen 324. While an honest belief in the truth of representations is a defence to an action for deceit at common law, it is no defence to a bill in equity to set aside the transaction ; 7 Beav. 149 ; 25 Fed. Rep. 361 ; 86 Ill. 142 ; 103 Mass. 356 ; 44 Miss. 477. It is also a ground for objecting to the enforcement of the contract, and even for a rescission of the contract upon the ground of mistake ; Big. Torts 23.

Private corporations are held liable for the wrongful acts and neglect of their agents or servants, done in the course of their employment ; 49 Md. 241. In England the rule is that if the person has been induced to purchase shares of a corporation by misrepresentations of its directors and suffers damage thereby, he must bring an action of deceit against such directors individually ; while in the United States it seems to be the rule that a corporation may be sued in such cases ; 2 Allen 1 ; 77 N. C. 233 ; 23 How. 331 ; 78 Ga. 586 ; 2 Black 722 ; 43 N. J. L. 288. "If the director of a company puts shares forth into the world, and deliberately adopts a scheme of falsehood and fraud, the effect of which is that parties buy the shares in consequence of the falsehood," the action for deceit lies ; Pollock, C. B., in 4 H. & N. 538 ; 2 Q. B. D. 48. See also 2 M. & W. 519 ; 3 B. & Ad. 114.

The general principles on which the right of action for deceit is based are those stated in Webb's Poll. Torts 355 :—

"To create a right of action for deceit there must be a statement made by the defendant, or for which he is answerable as principal, and with regard to that statement all the following conditions must concur :

"It is untrue in fact.

"The person making the statement, or the person responsible for it, either knows it to be untrue, or is culpably ignorant (that is, recklessly and consciously ignorant) whether it be true or not.

"It is made to the intent that the plaintiff shall act upon it, or in a manner apparently fitted to induce him to act upon it.

"The plaintiff does act in reliance on the statement in the manner contemplated or manifestly probable, and thereby suffers damage.

"There is no cause of action without both fraud and actual damage, or the damage is the gist of the action.

"And according to the general principles of civil liability, the damage must be the natural and probable consequence of the plaintiff's action on the faith of the defendant's statement.

"The statement must be in writing and signed in one class of cases, namely, where it amounts to a guaranty ; but this requirement is statutory, and as it did not apply to the court of chancery, does not seem to apply to the high court of justice in its equitable jurisdiction."

The remedy for a deceit, unless the right of action has been suspended or discharged, is by an action of trespass on the case. The old writ of deceit was brought for acknowledging a fine, or the like, in another name, and, this being a perversion of law to an evil purpose and a high contempt, the act was laid contra pacem, and a fine imposed upon the offender. See Brooke, Abr. Disceit ; Viner, Abr. Disceit.

When two or more persons unite in a deceit upon another, they may be indicted for a conspiracy. See, generally, 1 Rolle, Abr. 106 ; Com. Dig. ; 1 Viner, Abr. 560 ; 8 id. 490 ; Bigelow, Torts 9 ; Cooley, Torts 554.

It has been held that an action will not lie for fraudulent misrepresentations of a vendor of real estate as to the price he paid therefor ; 11 Am. Rep. 218 ; s. c. 60 Me. 578 ; 102 Mass. 217 ; 133 N. Y. 590 ; 29 Minn. 91 ; 80 Ind. 472 ; nor ordinarily for false statements as to value of stock ; 11 Am. Rep. 379 ; s. c. 56 N. Y. 83 ; nor for a false certificate of classification of a sailing yacht ; 60 Law J. Q. B. 526 ; nor a representation that a stallion would not produce sorrel colts ; 54 N. W. Rep. (Ia.) 437.

False representations concerning the financial responsibility of another, made for the purpose of procuring him credit, negligently and carelessly, without investigation, when investigation would disclose their falsity, imply a fraudulent intent and are actionable ; 59 Fed. Rep. 338. See COMMERCIAL AGENCY.

In an action of deceit in inducing plaintiff by false representations to take an assignment of a lease executed by one who has no title to the land, no offer of restitution need be made ; 88 Ga. 629. But one who seeks to rescind a contract of sale because of fraud, but retains the property so sold, cannot maintain an action for deceit ; 2 Misc. Rep. 257.

DECEM TALES (Lat. ten such). In Practice. A writ requiring the sheriff to appoint ten like men (apponere decem tales), to make up a full jury when a sufficient number do not appear. See TALES DE CIRCUMSTANTIBUS.

DECEMVIRI LITIBUS JUDICANDIS. Ten judges (five being senators and five knights), appointed by Augustus to act as judges in certain cases. Calvinus, Lex.; Anthon, Rom. Ant.

DECENNARIUS (Lat.). One who held one-half a virgate of land. Du Cange, One of the ten freeholders in a decennary. Du Cange; Calvinus, Lex.

Decennier. One of the decennarii, or ten freeholders making up a tithing. Spelman, Gloss.; Du Cange, Decenna; 1 Bla. Com. 114. See DECANTUS.

DECENNARY (Lat. decem, ten). A district originally containing ten men with their families.

King Alfred, for the better preservation of the peace, divided England into counties, the counties into hundreds, and the hundreds into tithings or decennaries: the inhabitants whereof, living together, were sureties or pledges for each other's good behavior. One of the principal men of the latter number presided over the rest, and was called the chief pledge, borsholder, borrow's elder, or tithing-man.

DECIES TANTUM (Lat.). An obsolete writ, which formerly lay against a juror who had taken money for giving his verdict. Called so, because it was sued out to recover from him ten times as much as he took.

DECIMÆ (Lat.). The tenth part of the annual profit of each living, payable formerly to the pope. There were several valuations made of these livings at different times. The decimæ (tenths) were appropriated to the crown, and a new valuation established, by 26 Hen. VIII. c. 3; 1 Bla. Com. 284.

DECIMATION. The punishment of every tenth soldier by lot.

DECISION. In Practice. A judgment given by a competent tribunal. The French lawyers call the opinions which they give on questions propounded to them, decisions. See Inst. 1. 2. 8; Dig. 1. 2. 2; 29 Ind. 170; 36 Wis. 434; also JUDGMENT.

The terms "opinions" and "decisions" are often confounded, yet there is a wide difference between them. A decision of a court is its judgment; the opinion is the reason given for that judgment. 13 Cal. 27.

DECLARANT. One who makes a declaration.

DECLARATION. In Pleading. A specification, in a methodical and logical form, of the circumstances which constitute the plaintiff's cause of action. 1 Chit. Pl. 248; Co. Litt. 17 a, 303 a; Bacon, Abr. Pleas (B); Comyns, Dig. Pleader, C, 7; Lawes, Pl. 35; Steph. Pl. 36; 6 S. & R. 28.

In real actions, it is most properly called the count; in a personal one, the declaration; Steph. Pl. 36; Doctr. Plac. 83; Lawes, Pl. 33. See Fitzh. N. B. 16 a, 60 d. The latter, however, is now the general term,—being that commonly used when referring to real and personal actions without distinction; 3 Bouvier, Inst. n. 2815.

In an action at law, the declaration answers to the bill in chancery, the libel (narratio) of the civilians, and the allegations of the ecclesiastical courts.

It may be general or special: for example, in debt on a bond, a declaration counting on the penal part only is general; one which sets out both the bond and the condition and assigns the breach is special; Gould, Pl. c. 4, § 50.

The parts of a declaration are the title of the court and term; the venue, see VENUE; the commencement, which contains a statement of the names of the parties and the character in which they appear, whether in their own right, the right of another, in a political capacity, etc., the mode in which the defendant has been brought into court, and a brief recital of the form of action to be proceeded in; 1 Saund. 318, n. 3, 111; 6 Term 130; if a person is doing business under a firm name, he properly sues on an account growing out of such business in his individual name; 83 Mich. 226; 93 Ala. 92; the statement of the cause of action, which varies with the facts of the case and the nature of the action to be brought, and which may be made by means of one or of several counts; 3 Wils. 185; 2 Bay 206; one count may incorporate by reference, certain general averments which are in a previous count in the same pleading; 94 Cal. 49; see COUNT; the conclusion, which in personal and mixed actions should be to the damage (ad damnum, which title see) of the plaintiff; Comyns, Dig. Pleader (C, 84); 10 Co. 116 b, 117 a; 1 M. & S. 236; unless in scire facias and in penal actions at the suit of a common informer, but which need not repeat the capacity of the plaintiff; 5 Binn. 16, 21; the profert of letters testamentary in case of a suit by an executor or administrator; Bacon, Abr. Executor (C); Dougl. 5. n.; 1 Day 305; and the pledges of prosecution, which are generally disused, and, when found, are only the fictitious persons, John Doe and Richard Roe.

The requisites or qualities of a declaration are that it must correspond with the process; and a variance in this respect was formerly the subject of a plea in abatement, see ABATEMENT; it must contain a statement of all the facts necessary in point of law to sustain the action, and no more; Co. Litt. 303 a; Plowd. 84, 122; Pep. Pl. 8. See 2 Mass. 363; Cowp. 682; 6 East 422; Viner, Abr. Declaration; 45 La. Ann. 935. The omission of a complaint to allege a material fact is cured where such fact is shown by the answer; 33 Ill. App. 91.

The circumstances must be stated with certainty and truth as to parties; 3 Cai. 170; 1 M. & S. 304; 3 B. & P. 559; 6 Rich. 390; 8 Tex. 109; 4 Munf. 430; 1 Campb. 195; time of occurrence, and in personal actions it must, in general, state a time when every material or traversable fact happened; 36 N. H. 252; 3 Ind. 484; 3 Zab. 309; 3 McLean 96; see 15 Barb. 550; and when a venue is necessary, time must also be mentioned; 5 Term 620; Com. Dig. Pleader (C, 19); 5 Barb. 375; 4 Den. 80; though the precise time is not material; 2 Dall. 346; 3 Johns. 43; 25 Ala. N. S. 469; unless it constitute a material part of the contract declared upon, or where the date, etc., of a written contract is averred; 4 Term 590; 2 Campb. 307, 308, n.; 36 N. H. 252; 3 Zab. 309; or in eject-ment, in which the demise must be stated to have been made after the title of the lessor of the plaintiff and his right of entry accrued : 2 East 257 ; 1 Johns. Cas. 283 ; the place, see VENUE ; and, generally, as to particulars of the demand, sufficient to enable the defendant to ascertain precisely the plaintiff's claim ; 2 B. & P. 265 ; 2 Saund. 74 b ; 12 Ala. N. S. 567 ; 2 Barb. 643 ; 35 N. H. 530 ; 32 Miss. 17 ; 1 Rich. 493.

In Evidence. A statement made by a party to a transaction, or by one having an interest in the existence of some fact in relation to the same.

Such declarations are regarded as original evidence and admissible as such—first, when the fact that the declaration was made is the point in question ; 4 Mass. 702 ; 11 Wend. 110 ; 1 Conn. 387 ; 2 B. & Ad. 845 ; 1 Mood. & R. 2, 8 ; 9 Bingh. 359 ; 4 Bingh. Declarations regarded as secondary evidence or hearsay are yet admitted in some cases : first, in matters of general and public interest, common reputation being admissible as to matters of public interest ; 14

East 329, n. ; 1 M. & S. 686 ; 6 M. & W. 234 ; 19 Conn. 250 ; but reputation amongst those only connected with the place or business in question, in regard to matters of general interest merely ; 1 Cr. S. 255 ; 108 Ill. 248 ; if they purport to be a part of the transaction to which they relate ; 1 Greenl. App. 442 ; 49 Minn. 255 ; 82 Tex. 22 ; 136 N. Y. 384 ; 72 Mich. 630 ; and see 1 Phill. Ev. 293 ; Gresl. Eq. Ev. 221 ; but such declarations and entries, to be so admitted, must appear or be shown to be against the pecuniary interest of the party making them ; 1 C. & P. 276 ; 11 Cl. & F. 85 ; 2 Jac. & W. 789 ; 3 Bingh. N. C. 308, 320 ; but letters written and signed by deceased, or a memorandum made by him, are not admissible by a party claiming under him if not shown to have been communicated to the party claiming adversely ; 66 Hun 28 ; fourth, dying declarations.

Dying declarations, made in cases of homicide where the death of the deceased is the subject of the charge and the circumstances of the death are the subject of the dying declarations, are admissible ; Steph. Dig. Ev. § 26 ; 2 B. & C. 605 ; 1 Leach 267, 378 ; 2 Mood. & R. 53 ; 2 Johns. 31 ; 15 id. 286 ; 1 Meigs 265 ; 4 Miss. 655 ; see 4 C. & P. 233 ; 91 Ga. 729 ; if made under a sense of impending death ; 2 Leach 563 ; 6 C. & P. 386. 631 ; 5 Cox, Cr. It is not necessary that the declarant state that he is expecting immediate death ; it is enough if, from all the circumstances, it satisfactorily appears that such was the condition of his mind at the time of the declarations ; 24 Kan. 189 ; and the question of whether made under a sense of impending death, is a question exclusively for the court ; 31 Fla. 514. The declaration may have been made by signs ; 1 Greenl. Ev. § 161 b ; and in answer to questions ; 7 C. & P. 238 ; 2 Leach 563 ; 3 Leigh 758. The substance only need be given by the witness ; 11 Ohio 424 ; 8 Blackf. 101 ; but the declaration must have been complete ; 3 Leigh 786 ; 146 U. 444; 2 Gratt. 594; 16 Miss. 401; 2 Hill 619. Such declarations are inadmissible when the witness does not pretend to give either the words or substance of what the deceased said, or all that he said; 118 Mo. 491. The admissibility of the declaration is not affected by the fact that subsequently to their being made and before death the declarant entertained a belief in recovery; 14 Cox. Cr. Cas. 565; s. c. 28 Engl. Rep. 587. and note; 23 Or. 555.

Declarations, to be admissible as original evidence, must have been made at the time of doing the act to which they relate; 3 Conn. 250; 16 Miss. 722; 9 Paige 611; 23 Ga. 193; 8 Metc. 436; 6 Me. 266; 36 N. To authorize their admission as secondary evidence, the declarant must be dead; 11 Price 162; 1 C. & K. 58; 12 Vt. 178; and the declaration must have been made before any controversy arose; 13 Ves. Ch. 514; 3 Campb. 444; 10 B. & C. 657; 4 M. & S. 486; 1 Pet. 328. It must also appear that the declarant was in a condition or situation to know the facts, or that it was his duty to know them; 2 J. & W. 464; 9 B. & C. 935; 4 Q. B. 137; 2 Sm. Lead. Cas. 193, n. The test to be applied to dying declarations to determine their admissibility is whether a living witness would have been permitted to testify to the matters contained in the declaration; 24 Or. 61.

The declarations of an agent respecting a subject-matter, with regard to which he represents the principal, bind the principal; Story, Ag. §§ 134-137; 1 Phill. Ev. 381; Mech. Ag. 714; 2 Q. Where several defendants are all interested in the relief prayed against them, admissions of one of them, made against his own interest, are admissible in evidence to affect him, although they would not be evidence to affect his co-defendants; 88 Ga. 541. See 109 Mo. 9; 49 Minn. 322; 3 Ind. App. 339.

Declarations made over a telephone are admissible, if the witness testifies that he recognized the declarant's voice; 31 Tex. Cr. Rep. 349. See 97 Mo. 473; TELEPHONE.

When more than one person is concerned in the commission of a crime, as in cases of riots, conspiracies, and the like, the declarations of either of the parties, made while acting in the common design, are evidence against the whole; 3 B. & Ald. 506; 1 Stark. 81; 2 Pet. 358; 10 Pick. 497; 30 Vt. 100; 32 Miss. 405; 9 Cal. 593; 32 Tex. Cr. Rep. 568; 64 Cal. 293; but the declarations of one of the rioters or conspirators made after the accomplishment of their object and when they no longer acted together, are evidence only against the party making them; 2 Russ. If one of two persons accused of having together committed a crime of murder makes a voluntary confession in the presence of the other, under such circumstances that he would naturally have contradicted it if he did not assent, the confession is admissible in evidence against both; 156 U. S. 51.

See HEARSAY EVIDENCE; BOUNDARY; REPUTATION; PEDIGREE; CONFESSION.

In Scotch Law. The prisoner's statement before a magistrate.

When used on trial, it must be proved that the prisoner was in his senses at the time of making it, and made it of his own free will; 2 Hume 328; Alison, Pr. 557. It must be signed by the witnesses present when it was made; Alison, Pr. 557, and by the prisoner himself; Arkl. Just. 70. See Paterson, Comp. §§ 952, 970.

Declaration by debtor of inability to pay his debts. In England a formal declaration of this character is an act of bankruptcy, under sec. 6 of the Bankruptcy Act of 1869; Robson, Bkcy.

DECLARATION OF INDEPENDENCE. A public act by which, through the Continental Congress, the thirteen British colonies in America declared their independence, in the name and by the authority of the people, on the fourth day of July, 1776, wherein are set forth:—

Certain natural and inalienable rights of man; the uses and purposes of governments; the right of the people to institute or to abolish them; the sufferings of the colonies, and their right to withdraw from the tyranny of the king of Great Britain;

The various acts of tyranny of the British king;

The petitions for redress of those injuries, and the refusal to redress them; the recital of an appeal to the people of Great Britain, and of their being deaf to the voice of justice and consanguinity;

An appeal to the Supreme Judge of the world for the rectitude of the intentions of the representatives;

A declaration that the United Colonies are, and of right ought to be, free and independent states; that they are absolved from all allegiance to the British crown, and that all political connection between them and the state of Great Britain is and ought to be dissolved;

A pledge by the representatives to each other of their lives, their fortunes, and their sacred honor.

The effect of this declaration was the establishment of the government of the United States as free and independent.

DECLARATION OF INTENTION.

The act of an alien who goes before a court of record and in a formal manner declares that it is bona fide his intention to become a citizen of the United States, and to renounce forever all allegiance and fidelity to any foreign prince, potentate, state, or sovereignty whereof at the time he may be a citizen or subject. See Rev. Stat. §§ 2165, 2174.

This declaration must, in ordinary cases, be made at least two years before his admission. Id. But there are exceptions to this rule. See NATURALIZATION.

DECLARATION OF PARIS. A declaration respecting international maritime law set forth by the leading powers of Europe at the Congress of Paris in April, 1856. The several articles are:—

1. Privateering is and remains abolished.
2. The neutral flag covers enemy's goods, except contraband of war.
3. Neutral goods, except contraband of war, are not liable to confiscation under a hostile flag.
4. Blockades, to be binding, must be effective. Twiss, Law of Nations, part ii. s. 86.

DECLARATION OF TRUST. The act by which an individual acknowledges that a property, the title of which he holds, does in fact belong to another, for whose use he holds the same.

The instrument in which such an acknowledgment is made.

Such a declaration is not always in writing; though it is highly proper it should be so; Hill, Trust, 49, note y; Sugden, Pow. 200; 1 Washb. R. P. See Tiedm. Eq. Jur. 296; FRAUDS, STATUTE OF; TRUST.

DECLARATION OF WAR. The public proclamation of the government of a state, by which it declares itself to be at war with a foreign power which is named, and which forbids all and every one to aid or assist the common enemy.

The power of declaring war is vested in congress by the constitution. art. 1, s. 8, § 12. There is no form or ceremony necessary except the passage of the act. A manifesto stating the causes of the war is usually published; but war exists as soon as the act takes effect. It was formerly usual to precede hostilities by a public declaration communicated to the enemy, and to send a herald to demand satisfaction. Potter, Grec. Ant. b. 3, c. 7; Dig. 49. 15. 24. But that is not the practice of modern times.

In some countries, as England, the power of declaring war is vested in the king; but he has no power to raise men or money to carry it on,—which renders the right almost nugatory.

Civil wars are never declared; Boyd's Wheat. Int. Law 355. See 2 Black 669. Many recent wars have been begun without this formality. A war de facto can exist without it; L. R. 4 P. C. 179.

DECLARATORY. Something which explains or ascertains what before was uncertain or doubtful: as, a declaratory statute, which simply declares or explains the law or the right, as it stood previous to the statute; Sedgw. Stat. & Const. L. 28; they are usually passed to put an end to a doubt as to what the law is, and declare what it is and what it has been. 1 Bla. Com. 86. Very many of the state statutes in this country are declaratory of the common law, and were not passed to quiet a doubt but to incorporate into the law of the state well-settled common-law principles. See STATUTES.

DECLARE. Often used of making a positive statement, as "declare and affirm." 17 N. J. L. 432. To assert; to publish; to utter; to announce clearly some opinion or resolution. 90 Pa. 121. For its use in pleading, see DECLARATION.

DECLINATION. In Scotch Law. A preliminary plea objecting to the jurisdiction on the ground that the judge is interested in the suit.

DECLINATORY PLEA. A plea of sanctuary or of benefit of clergy. 4 Bla. Com. 333. Abolished, 6 & 7 Geo. IV. c. 28, s. 6; Mozl. & W. Dict. See BENEFIT OF CLERGY.

DECOCTION. The operation of boiling certain ingredients in a fluid for the purpose of extracting the parts soluble at that temperature; the product of this operation.

In a case in which the indictment charged the prisoner with having administered to a woman a decoction of a certain shrub called savin, it appeared that the prisoner had administered an infusion, and not a decoction. The prisoner's counsel insisted that he was entitled to an acquittal on the ground that the medicine was misdescribed; but it was held that infusion and decoction are ejusdem generis, and that the variance was immaterial. 3 Camp. 74, 75.

DECOCTOR. In Roman Law. A bankrupt; a person who squandered the money of the state. Calvinus, Lex.; Du Cange.

DECOLLATIO. Decollation; beheading.

DECONFES. In French Law. A name formerly given to those persons who died without confession, whether they refused to confess or whether they were criminals to whom the sacrament was refused. Droit de Canon, par M. l'Abbé André; Dupin, Gloss. to Loisel's Institutes.

DECOY. A pond used for the breeding and maintenance of water-fowl. 11 Mod. 74, 130; 3 Salk. 9; Holt 14; 11 East 571.

DECOY LETTER. A letter prepared and mailed on purpose to detect offenders against the postal and revenue laws. 5 Dill. 39.

The use of decoy letters by inspectors of mails for the purpose of ascertaining the depredations upon the mails is proper and justifiable as a means to that end; 40 Fed. Rep. 752.

A postal employé who takes from the mail under his charge a package containing things of value, though placed in the mail as a decoy and addressed to a person having no existence, is punishable, under R. S. secs. 3891, 5467, for taking a letter or package entrusted to him; 48 Fed. Rep. 802; 38 id. 106; 40 id. 752; contra, 35 id. 407, 890. The fact that they were decoy letters is immaterial on a prosecution for embezzlement; 42 Fed. Rep. 891.

The offence of sending letters by mail giving information where obscene pictures can be obtained does not lose its criminal character, though the letters were sent in response to a decoy letter, since it does not appear that the accused was solicited to use the mails and thus to commit an offence; 50 Fed. Rep. 528.

A decoy letter placed in a sealed envelope and addressed to a fictitious person in a place where there was no post-office was wrapped up in a newspaper, enclosed in an ordinary paper wrapper, sealed and properly stamped and directed as the envelope inside the packet, and in this condition was handed by a post-office inspector and placed by him as a decoy in a basket kept for improperly illegibly addressed mail matter. It was held that this was not a mailing of the packet, and that it did not become mail matter; 30 Fed. Rep. 818. A letter with a fictitious address which cannot be delivered is "not intended to be conveyed by mail" within the meaning of R. S. sec. 3891, providing a penalty for embezzling; 35 id. 407.

DECREE. In Practice. The judicial decision of a litigated cause by a court of equity. It is also applied to the determination of a cause in courts of admiralty and probate. It is accurate to use the word judgment as applied to courts of law and decree to courts of equity, although the former term is now used in a larger sense to include both. There is, however, a distinction between the two which is well understood, and may wisely be preserved as tending to keep before the mind the distinction between the two jurisdictions—quite as fundamental with respect to the final determination of a cause as to the forms of procedure and the principles of jurisprudence applied by the two tribunals. Even the modern tendency of courts of law to avail themselves of equitable forms of procedure and principles of decision has left undisturbed the well-defined line of demarcation between the judgment at law and the decree in equity. It is well stated by an able writer, thus:—"A judgment at law was either simply for the plaintiff or for the defendant. There could be no qualifications or modifications of the judgment. But such a judgment does not always touch the true justice of the cause or put the parties in the position they ought to occupy. While the plaintiff may be entitled, in a given case, to general relief, there may be some duty connected with the subject of litigation which he owes to the defendant, the performance of which, equally with the fulfilment of his duty by the defendant, ought, in a perfect system of remedial law, to be exacted. This result was attained by the decree of a court of equity which could be so moulded, or the execution of which could be so controlled and suspended, that the relative duties and rights of the parties could be secured and enforced;" Bisph. Eq. § 7.

It necessarily springs from the nature of the chancery jurisdiction that its determinations should be cast in a mould differing, toto cælo, from a judgment at law, and it would hardly be an exaggeration to say that the essential character of the decree, as described by the author quoted, is to be found in the literal application of the fundamental maxim, "He who seeks equity must do equity." Accordingly, it is said that a court of equity will always reach, by a direct decree, what would otherwise be accomplished by a circuitry of proceedings; 4 Del. Ch. 410. And even when a complainant is entitled to relief which it is inequitable to grant except upon a condition to be performed by him springing from an obligation of equity and good conscience, though not from legal right, a chancellor may make a decree only upon such condition; 8 Wall. 557; Bisph. Eq. § 43. In such case, when something remains to be done by the party in order to entitle him to relief, while no present decree can be made, as the decree must be absolute and final and not contingent, the court will enter an interlocutory decree and suspend the entry of a final decree until the performance of such condition; 3 Del. Ch. 124; and in default thereof in a reasonable time dismiss the bill; 4 id. 43. The doctrine of the wife's equity is a familiar instance of this principle.

Decrees are either interlocutory or final. In the strictest sense all decrees are interlocutory until signed and enrolled; 2 Dan. Ch. Pr., 6th Am. ed. 987, n. 1; but it is not in this sense that the terms are in practice used. But while there is a distinction well understood it is not always easy of exact definition. The existence of the two classes is, however, necessary in American chancery courts, as the right of appeal is frequently confined to final decrees, as in the federal courts. The former is entered on some plea or issue arising in the cause which does not decide the main question; the latter settles the matter in dispute; and a final decree has the same effect as a judgment at law; 2 Madd. 462; 1 Ch. Ca. 27; 2 Vern. 89; 4 Brown, P. C. 287. See 7 Viner, Abr. 394; 7 Comyns, Dig. 445; 1 Belt, Suppl. Ves. 223; 28 Cal. 75, 85. For forms of decrees, see Seton, Decrees; 2 Dan. Ch. Pr. 986.

Final Decree. One which finally disposes of a cause, so that nothing further is left for the court to adjudicate. See 2 Dan. Ch. Pr. 994, n.

A decree which determines the particular cause. It is not confined to those which terminate all litigation on the same right; 1 Kent 316.

A decree which disposes ultimately of the suit. Ad. Eq. 375. After such decree has been pronounced, the cause is at an end, and no further hearing can be had ; id. 388 ; Beach, Mod. Eq. Pr. 789.

Prior to the establishment of the circuit courts of appeals there was an appeal to the United States supreme court only from final decrees of the circuit courts ; U. S. Rev. Stat. § 692 ; and the same is still true of appeals from those courts ; U. S. Rev. Stat. 1 Supp. 903 ; except that special provision is made for an appeal within a limited time from an order granting or refusing an injunction ; id. 904. Accordingly, the question what is a final decree is one of constant occurrence and importance as determining the jurisdiction of the appellate courts. The same question arises under the constitutional and statutory regulations of appeals in many of the states, although in some of them the right of appeal is not limited to final decrees ; e. g. Delaware, where it is extended to interlocutory decrees or orders, if prayed before the first day of the following term, while it may be taken from a final decree within two years after it is signed.

Another reason why the distinction is important is that a final decree, entered of record and not directed to be without prejudice, is a bar to another bill filed between the same parties for the same subject-matter ; 2 Del. Ch. 27.

Where the whole law of a case is settled by a decree, and nothing remains to be done, unless a new application be made at the foot of the decree, the decree is a final one so far as respects a right of appeal ; 12 Wall. 86 ; and so is a decree dismissing a bill with costs, although they be afterwards taxed and decree entered for them ; 139 U. S. 549 ; but a decree of foreclosure and sale is not final in the sense which allows an appeal from it so long as the amount due upon the debt must be determined, and the property to be sold ascertained and defined ; 23 Wall. 405 ; see 45 N. J. Eq. 77 ; but a decree for foreclosure and sale of mortgaged premises is final and may be appealed from without waiting for the return and confirmation of the sale by a decretal order ; 4 How. 503.

A decree fixing the priority of claims against an insolvent corporation, and directing the sale of its property for their payment, is a final decree within equity rule 88, relating to rehearings ; 1 C. C. App. 535. A decree is final which disposes of every matter of contention between the parties, except as to the amount of one item, and refers the case to a master to ascertain that ; 140 U. S. 52.

If the decree decides the rights to property and orders it to be delivered up or sold, or adjudges a sum of money to be paid, and the party is entitled to have such decree carried into immediate execution, it is a final decree ; 6 How. 203. In such cases it is held that the decree is final upon the merits, and the ulterior proceedings, as in the foreclosure case, constitute but a mode of executing the original decree ; 4 id. 503.

The multiplicity of cases on this subject is too great for citation here, but the principle applied is illustrated by those cited, and as to a particular case the course of decisions must be critically examined. Cases will be found collected in notes to U. S. Rev. Stat. § 692 and to 2 Dan. Ch. Pr., 6th Am. ed. ch. xxvi. sec. 1. See Foster, Federal Practice ; Field, Federal Courts ; JUDGMENT.

Interlocutory Decree. An adjudication or order made upon some point arising during the progress of a cause which does not determine finally the merits of the question or questions involved. Neither the courts nor the text-writers have satisfactorily defined this term. As was well said by Baldwin, J., "The difficulty is in the subject itself ; for, by various gradations, the interlocutory decree may be made to approach the final decree, until the line of discrimination becomes too faint to be readily perceived." 1 Rob. Va. 27. The real matter of importance is to define what is a final decree, and that being done, it may be generally stated that every other order or decree made during the progress of a cause in chancery is interlocutory. The test which is to be derived from the cases can hardly be better stated than in a late case, thus :

Where something more than the ministerial execution of the decree as rendered is left to be done, the decree is interlocutory, and not final, even though it settles the equities of the bill ; 135 U. S. 232.

As every decree inter partes is either final or interlocutory, all that has been said upon the former head, with the citations, must also be read in connection with this.

Decree Pro Confesso. An order or decree of a court of chancery that the allegations of the bill be taken as confessed, as against a defendant in default, and permitting the plaintiff to go on to a hearing ex parte.

"A decree pro confesso is one entered when the defendant has made default by not appearing in the time prescribed by the rules of court. A decree nisi is drawn by the plaintiff's counsel, and is entered by the court as it is drawn. A decree, when the bill is taken pro confesso, is pronounced by the court after hearing the pleadings and considering the plaintiff's equity ;" Freem. Judg. § 11.

Such a decree is also entered when the defendant, having appeared, has not answered. The effect of such a decree is that the facts set forth in the bill are taken as true, and a decree made thereon according to the equity of the case. It was formerly the practice to put the plaintiff to his proof of the substance of the bill ; 4 Johns. Ch. 547 ; 1 Dan. Ch. Pr., 5th Am. ed. 517, n. ; but the practice of taking the bill pro confesso is now generally established ; id. 518 ; and the subject is, in most courts of chancery, provided for, and the practice thereon regulated by rule of court.

The usual modern practice is substantially that provided for by Equity Rule 19 of the United States courts. Upon motion, it appearing from the record that the facts warrant it, an order is entered that the bill be taken pro confesso, and the cause proceeds ex parte, and the court may proceed to a decree after thirty days from the entry of the order; 1 Dan. Ch. Pr. 525, note.

Such a decree cannot be entered when the bill contains a great lack of precision; 2 J. J. Marsh. 155; but only when the allegations of the bill are specific, and the defendant has been properly served; 30 Ill. 25; 47 id. 353; 3 Ind. 316; 122 Mass. 302.

When only one defendant answers, but he disproves the whole case made by the bill, a decree pro confesso cannot be entered against those who fail to answer; 27 Va. 433.

A decree pro confesso cannot be safely entered against an infant; 30 Beav. 148; 8 Pet. 128; 56 Ala. 612; 74 Ala. 415; 43 Ill. 239; 44 id. 503; 65 Me. 352; 44 Miss. 296; 21 N. H. 470; 3 Johns. Ch. 367; 8 N. Y. 9; 8 Ohio 372; though this is sometimes done, on consent of his solicitor; 116 Mass. 377.

In Legislation. In some countries, as in France, some acts of the legislature or of the sovereign, which have the force of law are called decrees: as, the Berlin and Milan decrees.

In Scotch Law. A final judgment or sentence of court by which the question at issue between the parties is decided.

DECREE IN ABSENCE. In Scotch Law. Judgment by default or pro confesso.

DECREE NISI. In English Law. A decree for a divorce, not to take effect till after such time, not less than six months from the pronouncing thereof, as the court shall from time to time direct. During this period any person may show cause why the decree should not be made absolute; 29 Vict. c. 32, s. 3; 23 & 24 Vict. c. 144, s. 7; 2 Steph. Com. 281; Mozl. & W. Dict.

The term is also sometimes applied to a decree entered provisionally to become final at a time therein named, unless cause is shown to the contrary.

DECREE OF CONSTITUTION. In Scotch Law. Any decree by which the extent of a debt or obligation is ascertained.

The term is, however, usually applied especially to those decrees which are required to found a title in the person of the creditor in the event of the death of either the debtor or the original creditor. Bell, Dict.

App. 11.

DECRETALES BONIFACII OCTAVI. A supplemental collection of the canon law, published by Boniface VIII. in 1298, called, also, Liber Sextus Decretalium (Sixth Book of the Decretals). 1 Kaufm. Mackeldey, Civ. Law 82, n. See DECRETALES.

DECRETALES GREGORII NONI. The decretals of Gregory the Ninth. A collection of the laws of the church, published by order of Gregory IX. in 1227. It is composed of five books, subdivided into titles, and each title is divided into chapters. They are cited by using an X (or extra); thus, Cap. & X de Regulis Juris, etc. 1 Kaufm. Mackeldey, Civ. Law 83, n.; Butler, Hor. Jur. 115.

DECRETALS. In Ecclesiastical Law. Canonical epistles, written by the pope alone, or by the pope and cardinals, at the instance or suit of one or more persons, for the ordering and determining some matter in controversy, and which have the authority of a law in themselves.

The decretals were published in three volumes. The first volume was collected by Raymundus Barcinus, chaplain to Gregory IX., about the year 1227, and published by him to be read in schools and used in the ecclesiastical courts. The second volume is the work of Boniface VIII., compiled about the year 1298, with additions to and alterations of the ordinances of his predecessors. The third volume is called the Clementines, because made by Clement V., and was published by him in the council of Vienna, about the year 1308. To these may be added the Extravagantes of John XXII. and other bishops of Rome, which, relatively to the others, are called Novellæ Constitutiones. Ridley's View, etc. 99, 100; 1 Fournel, Hist. des Avocats 194, 105.

The false decretals were forged in the names of the early bishops of Rome, and first appeared about A. D. 845-850. The author of them is not known. They are mentioned in a letter written in the name of the council of Quierzy, by Charles the Bald, to the bishops and lords of France. See Van Espen Fleury, Droit de Canon, by André.

The decretals constitute the second division of the Corpus Juris Canonici.

DEDBANA. An actual homicide or manslaughter. Toml.

DEDI (Lat. I have given). A word used in deeds and other instruments of conveyance when such instruments were made in Latin.

The use of this word formerly carried with it a warranty in law, when in a deed: for example, if in a deed it was said, "dedi (I have given), etc., to A B," there was a warranty to him and his heirs. But this is no longer so. 8 & 9 Vict. c. 106, s. 4. Brooke, Abr. Guaranty, pl. 85. The warranty thus wrought was a special warranty, extending to the heirs of the feoffee during the life of the donor only. Co. Litt. 384 b; 4 Co. 81; 5 id. 17; 3 Washb. R. P. 671. Dedi is said to be the aptest word to denote a feoffment; 2 Bla. Com. 310. The future, dabo, is found in some of the Saxon grants. 1 Spence, Eq. Jur. 44. See GRANT.

DEDI ET CONCESSI (Lat. I have given and granted). The aptest words to work a feoffment. They are the words ordinarily used, when instruments of conveyance were in Latin, in charters of feoffment, gift, or grant. These words were held the aptest; though others would answer; Co. Litt. 384 b; 1 Steph. Com. 114; 2 Bla. Com. 53, 316. See COVENANT.

DEDICATION. An appropriation of land to some public use, made by the owner, and accepted for such use by or on behalf of the public. 23 Wis. 416; 33 N. J. L. 13; 95 Cal. 463.

Express dedication is that made by deed, vote, or declaration.

Implied dedication is that presumed from an acquiescence in the public use.

To be valid it must be made by the owner of the fee; 5 B. & Ald. 454; 3 Sandf. 502; 4 Campb. 16; 84 Ala. 215; or, if the fee be subject to a naked trust, by the equitable owner; 6 Pet. 431; 1 Ohio St. 478; and to the public at large; 22 Wend. 425; 2 Vt. 480; 10 Pet. 662; 11 Ala. N. S. 63. In making the appropriation, no particular formality is required, but any act or declaration, whether written or oral, which clearly expresses an intent to dedicate, will amount to a dedication, if accepted by the public, and will conclude the donor from ever after asserting any right incompatible with the public use; Washb. Easem. 133; 11 M. & W. 827; 5 C. & P. 460; 6 Pet. 431; 22 Wend. 450; 25 Conn. 235; 19 Pick. 405; 2 Vt. 480; 9 B. Monr. 201; 12 Ga. 239; 27 Mo. 211; 22 Tex. 94; 95 Cal. 463; 148 Pa. 367; 35 W. Va. 554; 44 La. Ann. 931; 96 Ala. 272; 133 Ind. 331; the vital principle of the dedication being the intention, which must be unequivocally manifested, and clearly and satisfactorily appear; 40 Minn. 284; 84 Ala. 215; 78 Cal. 9; 42 Kan. 203. A mere acquiescence by the owner of land in its occasional and varying use for travel by the public is insufficient to establish a dedication thereof, as a street by adverse user; 135 Pa. 256; 152 id. 368. And, without any express appropriation by the owner, a dedication may be presumed from twenty years' use of his land by the public, with his knowledge; 22 Ala. N. S. 190; 19 Conn. 250; 11 Metc. 421; 3 Zab. 150; 4 Ind. 518; 17 Ill. 249; 26 Pa. 187; or from any shorter period, if the use be accompanied by circumstances which favor the presumption, the fact of dedication being a conclusion to be drawn, in each particular case, by the jury, who as against the owner have simply to determine whether by permitting the public use he has intended a dedication; 5 Taunt. 125; 6 Wend. 651; 9 How. 10; 10 Ind. 219; 4 Cal. 114; 17 Ill. 416; 30 E. L. & Eq. 207. See 51 Minn. 381. But this presumption, being merely an inference from the public use, coupled with circumstances indicative of the owner's intent to dedicate, is open to rebuttal by the proof of circumstances indicative of the absence of such an intent; 4 Cush. 332; 25 Me. 297; 9 How. 10; 4 B. & Ad. 447; 7 C. & P. 578; 8 Ad. & E. 99; 110 Mo. 260; 63 Hun 628; 134 U. S. 84.

The death of the owner is a revocation of a proffered dedication of streets, and an acceptance thereafter by the village gives it no right in the streets; 67 Hun 546. Where one who has offered to dedicate land for a public street, conveys such land before his offer is accepted, the conveyance operates as a revocation of the offer; 141 Ill. 89; 100 Cal. 302.

Without acceptance, a dedication is incomplete. In the case of a highway, the question has been raised whether the public itself, or the body charged with the repair, is the proper party to make the acceptance. In England, it has been decided that an acceptance by the public, evidenced by mere use, is sufficient to bind the parish to repair, without any adoption on its part; 5 B. & Ad. 469; 2 N. & M. 583. See 3 Steph. Com. 130. In this country there are cases in which the English rule seems to be recognized; 1 R. I. 93; 23 Wend. 103; though the weight of decision is to the effect that the towns are not liable, either for repair or for injuries occasioned by the want of repair, until they have themselves adopted the way thus created, either by a formal acceptance or by indirectly recognizing it, as by repairing it or setting up guide-posts therein; Thomp. Highw. 52; 13 Vt. 424; 6 N. Y. 237; 8 Gratt. 632; 2 Ind. 147; 3 Cush. 290; 35 W. Va. 554; 89 Va. 401; 69 Hun 86; 152 Pa. 494; 84 Ala. 224; 69 Tex. 449; Ang. Highw. 111. It has been held that the acceptance, improvement, and user by a city of a street or a portion of a street as platted is equivalent to an acceptance of the whole tract platted; 110 Mo. 618.

In order that a plat showing lots, blocks, and streets may operate as a common-law dedication of an easement in the streets to the public, there must be an acceptance by the public in a reasonable time; 86 Mich. 567. See STREET; BRIDGE; HIGHWAY.

The authorities above cited relate chiefly to the dedication of land for a highway. But a dedication may be made equally well to any other purpose which is for the benefit of the public at large, as for a square, a common, a landing, a cemetery, a school, or a monument; and the principles which govern in all these cases are the same, though they may be somewhat diversified in the application, according as they are invoked for the support of one or another of these objects; 6 Hill 407; 11 Pa. 444; 18 Ohio 18; 2 Ohio St. 107; 12 Ga. 239; 4 N. H. 537; 1 Wheat. 469; 2 Watts 23; 1 Spenc. 86; 8 B. Monr. 234; 3 Sandf. 502; 7 Ind. 641; 2 Wis. 153; 93 Cal. 43; 154 Mass. 323.

DEDIMUS ET CONCESSIMUS (Lat. we have given and granted). Words used by the king, or where there were more grantors than one, instead of dedi et concessi.

DEDIMUS POTESTATEM (Lat. we have given power). The name of a writ to commission private persons to do some act in the place of a judge: as, to administer an oath of office to a justice of the peace, to examine witnesses, and the like. Cowel; Com. Dig. Chancery (K, 3), (P, 2), Fine (E, 7); Dane, Abr. Index; 2 Bla. Com. 351.

DEDIMUS POTESTATEM DE ATTORNO FACIENDO (Lat.). The name of a writ which was formerly issued by authority of the crown in England to authorize an attorney to appear for a defendant, and without which a party could not, until the statute of Westminster 2 (infra), appear in court by attorney.

By statute of Westminster 2, 13 Edw. I. c. 10, all persons impleaded may make an attorney to sue for them, in all pleas moved by or against them, in the superior courts there enumerated. 3 M. & G. 184, n.

DEDITITII (Lat.). In Roman Law. Criminals who had been marked in the face or on the body with fire or an iron so that the mark could not be erased, and were subsequently manumitted. Calvinus, Lex.

DEDUCTION FOR NEW. In Maritime Law. The allowance (usually one-third) on the cost of repairing a damage to the ship by the extraordinary operation of the perils of navigation, the renovated part being presumed to be better than before the damage. In some parts, by custom or by express provision in the policy, the allowance is not made on a new vessel during the first year, or on a new sheathing, or on an anchor or chain-cables; 1 Phill. Ins. § 50; 2 id. §§ 1369, 1431, 1433; Benecke & S. Av. 167, n. 238; 2 S. & R. 229; 1 Cal. 573; 18 La. 77; 2 Cra. 218; 21 Pick. 456; 5 Cow. 63.

DEED. A written instrument under seal, containing a contract or agreement which has been delivered by the party to be bound and accepted by the obligee or covenantor. Co. Litt. 171; 2 Bla. Com. 295; Shepp. Touchst. 50.

A writing containing a contract sealed and delivered to the party thereto. 3 Washb. R. P. 239.

A writing under seal by which lands, tenements, or hereditaments are conveyed for an estate not less than a freehold. 2 Bla. Com. 294.

A writing or instrument, written on paper or parchment, sealed and delivered, to prove and testify the agreement of the parties whose deed it is to the things contained in the deed. 35 W. Va. 647. See 73 Tex. 129.

Any instrument in writing under seal, whether it relates to the conveyance of real estate or to any other matter,—as, for instance, a bond, single bill, agreement, or contract of any kind,—is as much a deed as is a conveyance of real estate, and, after delivery and acceptance, is obligatory; 2 S. & R. 504; 5 Dana 365; 2 Miss. 154. The term is, however, often used in the latter sense above given, and perhaps oftener than in its more general signification.

Deeds of feoffment. See FEOFFMENT.

Deeds of grant. See GRANT.

Deeds indented are those to which there are two or more parties who enter into reciprocal and corresponding obligations to each other. See INDENTURE.

Deeds of release. See RELEASE; QUIT-CLAIM.

Deeds poll are those which are the act of a single party and which do not require a counterpart. See DEED POLL.

Deeds under the statute of uses. See BARGAIN AND SALE; COVENANT TO STAND SEISED; LEASE AND RELEASE.

According to Blackstone, 2 Com. §13, deeds may be considered as conveyances at common law,—of which the original are feoffment; gift; grant; lease; exchange; partition: the derivative are release; confirmation; surrender; assignment; defeasance,—or conveyances which derive their force by virtue of the statute of uses: namely, covenant to stand seized to uses; bargain and sale of lands; lease and release; deed to lead and declare uses; deed of revocation of uses.

For a description of the various forms in use in United States, see 2 Washb. R. P. 607.

Requisites of. Deeds must be upon paper or parchment; 5 Johns. 246; must be completely written before delivery: 1 Hill, S. C. 267; 6 M. & W. 216, Am. ed. note; 3 Washb. R. P. 239; but see 21 Or. 211; BLANK; must be between competent parties, see PARTIES; and certain classes are excluded from holding lands, and, consequently, from being grantees in a deed; see 1 Washb. R. P. 73;

2 id. 564; must have been made without restraint; 13 Mass. 371; 2 Bla. Com. 291; must contain the names of the grantor and grantee; 2 Brock. 156; 19 Vt. 613; 12 Mass. 447; 14 Mo. 420; 13 Ohio 120; 14 Pet. 322; 1 McLean 321; 2 N. H. 525; but a variance in the names set forth in the deed will not invalidate it; 148 Pa. 216; must relate to suitable property; Browne, Stat. Frauds § 6; 3 Washb. R. P. 331; must contain the requisite parts, see infra; must be sealed; 6 Pet. 124; Thornt. Conv. 205; see 12 Cal. 163; 98 N. C. 558; (i. e. in order to constitute it a deed, though an unsealed instrument may operate as a conveyance of land; Mitchell, R. P. 453;) and should, for safety, be signed, even where statutes do not require it; 3 Washb. R. P. 239; but see 66 Tex. 142. Previous to the Statute of Frauds, signing was not essential to a deed, provided it was sealed. The statute makes it so; 2 Bla. Com. 306; contra, Shep. Touch. n. (24), Preston's ed., which latter is of opinion that the statute was intended to affect parol contracts only, and not deeds. See Wms. R. P. 153; 2 Q. B. 580.

They must be delivered (see DELIVERY) and accepted; 8 Ill. 177; 1 N. H. 353; 5 id. 71; 20 Johns. 187; 13 Cent. L. J. 222; 85 Ia. 149; 38 Minn. 395. A deed may be delivered by doing something and saying nothing, or by saying something and doing nothing, or it may be by both; 16 Or. 437. But if the deed is delivered without the consent of the grantor it is of no effect; 145 U. S. 317. Deeds conveying real estate must in most states of the United States be acknowledged and recorded. See ACKNOWLEDGMENT; RECORD. In Pennsylvania this is unnecessary to its validity as between the parties; 146 Pa. 451.

The requisite number of witnesses is also prescribed by statute in most of the states. See ATTESTATION.

Formal parts. The premises embrace the statement of the parties, the consideration, recitals inserted for explanation, description of the property granted, with the intended exceptions. The habendum begins at the words "to have and to hold," and limits and defines the estate which the grantee is to have. The reddendum, which is used to reserve something to the grantor, see EXCEPTION; the conditions, see CONDITION; the covenants, see COVENANT; WARRANTY; and the conclusion, which mentions the execution, date, etc., properly follow in the order observed here; 3 Washb. R. P. 365.

The construction of deeds is favorable to their validity; the principal includes the incident; punctuation is not regarded; a false description does not harm; the construction is least favorable to the party making the conveyance or reservation; the habendum is rejected if repugnant to the rest of the deed. Shepp. Touchst. 89; 3 Kent 422.

All the terms of a deed should be construed together; 98 N. C. 299; 82 Va. 685; 139 U. S. 226; and the words therein should be taken most strongly against the party using them; 131 U. S. 75; 84 Ala. 313; where two clauses in a deed are repugnant, the first prevails; 83 Va. 238; and if possible a deed should be so construed as to give it effect; 69 Tex. 153.

The lex rei sitæ governs in the conveyance of lands, both as to the requisites and forms of conveyance. See LEX REI SITÆ.

Recitals in deeds of payment of the considerations expressed therein are not proof of such payments as against persons not parties thereto; 142 U. S. 417; nor is a consideration always necessary to the validity of a deed of land; 73 Tex. 129. An alteration in the description of property in a deed cannot be made without re-execution, reacknowledgment, and redelivery, after the deed has been delivered and recorded; 148 U. S. 21.

Much of the English law in reference to the possession and discovery of title-deeds has been rendered useless in the United States by the system of registration, which prevails so universally.

Consult Preston; Wood; Thornton, Conveyancing; Greenleaf's Cruise, Dig.; Washburn; Hilliard; Williams; Tiedeman, Real Property; Barton, Deeds; Leake, Land Laws; Dembitz, Land Titles.

DEED TO DECLARE USES. A deed made after a fine or common recovery, to show the object thereof.

DEED TO LEAD USES. A deed made before a fine or common recovery, to show the object thereof.

DEED POLL. A deed which is made by one party only.

A deed in which only the party making it executes it or binds himself by it as a deed. 3 Washb. R. P. 311.

The term is now applied in practice mainly to deeds by sheriffs, executors, administrators, trustees, and the like.

The distinction between deed poll and indenture has come to be of but little importance. The ordinary purpose of a deed poll is merely to transfer the rights of the grantor to the grantee. It was formerly called charta de una parte, and usually began with these words,—"Sciant presentes et futuri quod ego, A, etc.; and now begins, "Know all men by these presents that I, A B, have given, granted, and enfeoffed, and by these presents do give, grant, and enfeoff," etc. Cruise, Dig. tit. 32, c. 1, s. 23. See INDENTURE.

DEEM. To decide; to judge; to sentence. When by statute certain acts are deemed to be crimes of a particular nature, they are such crimes, and not a semblance of it, nor a mere fanciful approximation to or designation of the offence. 132 Mass. 247.

DEEMSTERS. Judges in the Isle of Man, who decide all controversies without process, writings, or any charges. These judges were chosen by the people, and are said by Spelman to be two in number. Spelman, Gloss.; Camden, Brit.; Cowel; Blount.

DEFALCATION. The act of a defaulter.

The reduction of the claim of one of the contracting parties against the other, by deducting from it a smaller claim due from the former to the latter.

The law operates this reduction in certain cases; for, if the parties die or are insolvent, the balance between them is the only claim; but if they are solvent and alive, the defendant may or may not defalcate at his choice. See SET-OFF. For the etymology of this word, see Brackenridge, Law Misc. 186. Defalcation was unknown at common law; 1 Rawle 291.

DEFAMATION. The speaking or writing words of a person so as to hurt his good fame, de bona fama aliquid detrahere. Written defamation is termed libel, and oral defamation slander.

The provisions of the law in respect to defamation, written or oral, are those of a civil nature, which give a remedy in damages to an injured individual, or of a criminal nature, which are devised for the security of the public. Heard, Lib. & Sl. § 1.

In England, besides the remedy by action, proceedings might formerly be instituted in the ecclesiastical court for redress of the injury. The punishment for defamation, in this court, was payment of costs and penance enjoined at the discretion of the judge. When the slander had been privately uttered, the penance might be ordered to be performed in a private place; when publicly uttered, the sentence was to be in public, as in the church of the parish of the defamed party, in time of divine service; and the defamer was required publicly to pronounce that by such words—naming them—as set forth in the sentence he had defamed the plaintiff, and, therefore, that he did beg pardon, first of God, and then of the party defamed, for uttering such words. Clerk's Assist. 225; 3 Burn. Eccl. Law, Defamation, pl. 14; 2 Chit. Pr. 471; Cooke, Def. This jurisdiction was taken away in England by 18 & 19 Vict. c. 41, and in Ireland by 23 & 24 Vict. c. 32.

If words are false, injurious, and uttered malo animo, they are actionable; 40 La. Ann. 423; words that, according to their usual construction and common acceptance, are construed as insults, and tend to violence and breach of the peace, are actionable, whether written or spoken; 84 Va. 664; 74 Ia. 563; 70 Md. 328; 71 Wis. 427; 98 N. C. 131; 147 Mass. 438; 152 Pa. 187; 51 Fed. Rep. 424; as is the publication of anything which tends to hold a person up to contempt and ridicule; 76 Ga. 280; but under the common law there was no redress for defamatory words unless they imputed a crime, or related to a man's profession or trade; 17 Or. 259.

If a publication does not contain a libelous charge, no action will lie therefor, no matter what its author intended; 119 Ind. 244; and where the language is so vague and uncertain, that it could not have been intended to be used in reference to any particular person or persons, it is not actionable; 40 Minn. 291. In publishing a libel a man is presumed to intend the natural consequences of his act; 57 Conn. 73. A false publication that a business firm is insolvent is libellous per se; 116 Mo. 226.

When the truth is relied upon in justification of a libel, to constitute a complete defence, it must be as broad as the defamatory accusation; 37 Minn. 285. One may show in mitigation of a libel that the violent conduct and language of the other provoked him to the use of the words charged; 75 Mich. 402. See LIBEL; SLANDER.

DEFAULT. The non-performance of a duty, whether arising under a contract or otherwise.

By the fourth section of the English statute of frauds, 29 Car. II. c. 3, it is enacted that "no action shall be brought to charge the defendant upon any special promise to answer for the debt, default, or miscarriage of another person, unless the agreement," etc., "shall be in writing," etc.

In Practice. The non-appearance of a plaintiff or defendant at court within the time prescribed by law to prosecute his claim or make his defence.

When the plaintiff makes default, he may be nonsuited; and when the defendant makes default, judgment by default is rendered against him. Comyns, Dig. Pleader, E 42, B. 11. See article JUDGMENT BY DEFAULT; 7 Viner, Abr. 429; Doctr. Plac. 208; Grah. Pr. 631. See as to what will excuse or save a default, Co. Litt. 259 b; 29 Iowa 245.

DEFEASANCE. An instrument which defeats the force or operation of some other deed or of an estate. That which is in the same deed is called a condition; and that which is in another deed is a defeasance. Comyns, Dig. Defeasance.

The defeasance may be subsequent to the deed in case of things executory; Co. Litt. 237 a; 2 Saund. 43; but must be a part of the same transaction in case of an executed contract; Co. Litt. 236 b; 1 N. H. 39; 3 Mich. 482; 7 Watts 401; 21 Ala. n. s. 9. Yet, where an instrument of defeasance is executed subsequently in pursuance of an agreement made at the time of making the original deed, it is sufficient; 2 Washb. R. P. 489; as well as where a deed and the defeasance bear different dates but are delivered at the same time; Devl. Deeds 1102; 13 Pick. 411; 31 Pa. 131; 7 Me. 435; 13 Ala. 246. The instrument of defeasance must at law be of as high a nature as the principal deed; 22 Pick. 526; 7 Watts 261, 401; 43 Me. 206. It must recite the deed it relates to, or at least the most material part thereof; and it is to be made between the same persons that were parties to the first deed; 43 Me. 371. Defeasances of deeds conveying real estate are generally subject to the same rules as deeds, as to record and notice to purchasers; 3 Wend. 208; 14 id. 63; 17 S. & R. 70; 12 Mass. 456; 38 Me. 447; 40 id. 381; but in some states actual notice is not sufficient without recording; Mich. Rev. Stat. 261; Minn. Stat. at Large, 1873, 34, § 23.

In equity, a defeasance could be proved by parol and a deed, absolute on its face, shown to be in legal effect a mortgage; 3 W. & S. 338; 115 Pa. 254; but such evidence must be clear, explicit, and unequivocal, and the parol defeasance must be shown to have been contemporaneous with the deed; id. In Pennsylvania, all defeasances are now required to be in writing, executed as deeds and recorded within sixty days after the deed. Act of June 8, 1881.

DEFECT. The want of something required by law.

In pleading, matter sufficient in law must be deduced and expressed according to the forms of law. Defects in matters of substance cannot be cured, because it does not appear that the plaintiff is entitled to recover; but when the defects are in matter of form, they are cured by a verdict in favor of the party who committed them; 2 Wash. C. C. 1; 1 Hen. & M. 153; 16 Pick. 128, 541; 12 Conn. 455; 1 Pet. 76; 2 Green, N. J. 133; 4 Blackf. 107; 2 McL. 35; Bacon, Abr. Verdict, X. See 31 Ohio St. 15; 50 Barb. 55; 40 Wis. 373.

DEFECTUM, CHALLENGE PROP-TER. See CHALLENGE.

DEFECTUM SANGUINIS. See ESCHEAT.

DEFENCE. Torts. A forcible resistance of an attack by force.

A man is justified in defending his person, that of his wife, children, and servants, and for this purpose he may use as much force as may be necessary, even to killing the assailant, remembering that the means used must always be proportioned to the occasion, and that an excess becomes itself an injury; 3 M. & W. 150; 69 Miss. 478; 93 Cal. 476; 30 Fla. 142; 27 Tex. App. 562; 49 Ark. 543; 86 Ky. 39; but it must be in defence, and not in revenge; 1 C. & M. 214; 11 Mod. 43; Poll. Torts 255; 35 S. C. 283; for one is not justified in shooting another, if such other party is retreating or has thrown away his weapon; 129 Ind. 587; nor is a mere threat to take one's life, with nothing more, a sufficient defence or excuse for committing homicide; 35 S. C. 197.

A man may also repel force by force in defence of his personal property, against one who manifestly intends or endeavors, by violence or surprise, to commit a known felony, as robbery, by any force short of taking the aggressor's life; 1 Bish. New Cr. L. § 875; or short of wounding or the employment of a dangerous weapon; 148 Mass. 529. In the latter case, Holmes, J., said:—"We need not consider whether this explanation is quite adequate. There are weighty decisions which go further than those above cited, and which can hardly stand on the right of self-defence, but involve other considerations of policy." See 42 Ill. App. 427.

With respect to the defence or protection of the possession of real property, although it is justifiable even to kill a person in the act of attempting to commit a forcible felony, as burglary or arson, yet this justification can only take place when the party in possession is wholly without fault; 1 Hale, Pl. Cr. 440, 444; 1 East, Pl. Cr. 259, 277. And where an illegal forcible attack is made upon a dwelling-house with the intention merely of committing a trespass, and not with any felonious intent, it is generally lawful for the rightful occupant to oppose it by force; 7 Bing. 305; 20 Eng. C. L. 139. See, generally, 1 Chit. Pr. 589; Grotius, lib. 2, c. 1; Rutherford, Inst. b. 1, c. 16; 2 Whart. Cr. L. § 1019; Bishop; Clark; Wharton, Criminal Law; Thompson, Cases of Self-Defence; ASSAULT; SELF-DEFENCE.

In Pleading and Practice. The denial of the truth or validity of the complaint. A general assertion that the plaintiff has no ground of action, which is afterwards extended and maintained in the plea. 3 Bla. Com. 296; Co. Litt. 127; 33 Ind. 448.

In this sense it is similar to the contestatio litis of the civilians, and does not include justification. In a more general sense it denotes the means by which the defendant prevents the success of the plaintiff's action, or, in criminal practice, the indictment. The word is commonly used in this sense in modern practice.

Half defence was that which was made by the form "defends the force and injury, and says" (defendit vim et injuriam, et dicit).

Full defence was that which was made by the form "defends the force and injury when and where it shall behoove him, and the damages, and whatever else he ought to defend" (defendit vim et injuriam quando et ubi curia consideravit, et damna et quicquid quod ipse defendere debet, et dicit), commonly shortened into "defends the force and injury when," etc. 8 Term 632; 3 B. & P. 9, n.; Co. Litt. 127 b; Willes 41. It follows immediately upon the statement of appearance, "comes" (venit), thus: "comes and defends." By a general defence the propriety of the writ, the competency of the plaintiff, and the jurisdiction of the court were allowed; by defending the force and injury, misnomer was waived; by defending the damages, all exceptions to the person of the plaintiff; and by defending either when, etc., the jurisdiction of the court was admitted. 3 Bla. Com. 298.

The distinction between the forms of half and full defence was first lost sight of; 8 Term 633; Willes 41; 3 B. & P. 9; 2 Saund. 209 c; and no necessity for a technical defence exists, under the modern forms of practice.

Formerly, in criminal trials for capital crimes the prisoner was not allowed counsel to assist in his defence; 1 Ry. & M. 166; 3 Campb. 98; 4 Sharsw. Bla. Com. 356, n. This privilege was finally extended to all persons accused of felonies in England, by 6 & 7 Will. IV. c. 114; and in the United States by statute or universal practice; 3 Whart. Cr. L. § 3004.

DEFENDANT. A party sued in a personal action. The term does not in strictness apply to the person opposing or denying the allegations of the demandant in a real action, who is properly called the tenant. The distinction, however, is very commonly disregarded; and the term is further frequently applied to denote the person called upon to answer, either at law or in equity, and as well in criminal as civil suits.

See 8 Dana 41; 11 Ohio 374; 9 Ill. 20; 10 Paige 290; 16 Wis. 169; 118 Mass. 470; 122 id. 8; 56 L. J. R. Ch. D. 400; 54 Ala. 440.

As will be seen, they had considerable judicial power. Du Cange; Schmidt, Civ. Law, introd. 16.

VOL. I.—34

DEFINITION (Lat. de, and finis, a boundary; a limit). An enumeration of the principal ideas of which a compound idea is formed, to ascertain and explain its nature; that which denotes and points out the substance of a thing. Ayliffe, Pand. 59.

Definitions are always dangerous, because it is always difficult to prevent their being inaccurate, or their becoming so: omnis definitio in jure civili periculosa est, parum est enim ut non subverti possit.

All ideas are not susceptible of definition, and many legal terms cannot be defined. This inability is frequently supplied, in a considerable degree, by descriptions.

The meaning of ordinary words, when used in acts of parliament, is to be found, not so much in a strict etymological propriety of language, nor even in popular use, as in the subject or occasion on which they are used, and the object which is intended to be attained; L. R. 1 Ex. D. 143; for words used with reference to one set of circumstances may convey an intention quite different from what the self same set of words used in reference to another set of circumstances would or might have produced; L. R. 3 App. Cas. 68.

For a list of definitions of various words and phrases, as found in the reports, etc., which are not the subject of separate titles, see WORDS; MAXIMS.

DEFINITIVE. That which terminates a suit; final. A definitive sentence or judgment is put in opposition to an interlocutory judgment.

A distinction has been drawn in the United States supreme court between a final and a definitive judgment in regard to the condemnation of a prize in a court of admiralty; 1 Cra. 103; but for all practical purposes a definitive judgment or decree is final; 84 Pa. 238; 96 id. 420. See DECREE; JUDGMENT.

DEFLORATION. The act by which a woman is deprived of her virginity.

When this is done unlawfully and against her will, it bears the name of rape (which see); when she consents, it is fornication (which see); or if the man be married it is adultery on his part; 2 Greenl. Ev. § 48; 21 Pick. 509; 36 Me. 261; 11 Ga. 53; 2 Dall. 124.

DEFORCEMENT. The holding any lands or tenements to which another has a right.

In its most extensive sense the term includes any withholding of any lands or tenements to which another person has a right; Co. Litt. 277; 17 Conn. 212; so that this includes as well an abatement, an intrusion, a disseisin, or a discontinuance, as any other species of wrong whatsoever, by which the owner of the freehold is kept out of possession. But, as contradistinguished from the former, it is only such a detainer of the freehold from him who has the right of property as falls within none of the injuries above mentioned; 3 Bla. Com. 173; Archb. Civ. Pl. 13; Dane, Abr. Index.

In Scotch Law. The opposition given, or resistance made, to messengers or other officers while they are employed in executing the law.

The mode of proceeding in the trial of clergymen is determined by canons in the various dioceses.

The same term is applied to the loss, by a peer, of his rank as such, as when he is deprived thereof by act of parliament. 2 Steph. Com. 608. Degradation must be distinguished from disqualification for bankruptcy, under stat. 34 & 35 Vict. c. 50.

DEGRADING. Sinking or lowering a person in the estimation of the public.

As to compelling a witness to answer questions tending to degrade him, see WITNESS; 13 Howell, St. Tr. 17, 334; 16 id. 161; 1 Phill. Ev. 269. To write or print of a man what will degrade him in society is a libel; 1 Dowl. 674; 2 M. & R. 77.

DEGREE (Fr. degré, from Lat. gradus, a step in a stairway; a round of a ladder).

A remove or step in the line of descent or consanguinity.

As used in law, it designates the distance between those who are allied by blood: it means the relations descending from a common ancestor, from generation to generation, as by so many steps. Hence, according to some lexicographers, we obtain the word pedigree (q. v.) par degré (by degrees), the descent being reckoned par degré. Minshew. Each generation lengthens the line of descent one degree; for the degrees are only the generations marked in a line by small circles or squares, in which the names of the persons forming it are written. See CONSANGUINITY; LINE; Ayliffe, Parerg. 209; Toul-lier, Droit. Civ. Franc. lib. 3, t. 1, c. 3, n. 158; Aso & M. Inst. b. 2, t. 4, c. 3, § 1.

In criminal law, the word is used to distinguish different grades of guilt and punishment attached to the same act, committed under different circumstances, as murder in the first and second degrees.

The state or civil condition of a person. 15 Me. 122.

The ancient English statute of additions, for example, requires that in process, for the better description of a defendant, his state, degree, or mystery shall be mentioned.

An honorable state or condition to which a student is advanced in testimony of proficiency in arts and sciences.

They are of pontifical origin. See 1 Schmidt, Thesaurus, 144; Vicat, Doctores; Minshew, Dict. Bachelor; Merlin, Répertoire Univ.; Van Espen, pt. 1, tit. 10; Giannone, Istoria di Napoli, lib. xi. c. 2, for a full account of this matter.

R. 6 Ch. App. 397; and he is liable, in the first instance, without any demand from the debtor. But the principal cannot sue the del credere factor until the debtor has refused or neglected to pay; 1 Term 112; Paley, Ag. 39. See Pars. Contr.; Story; Wharton; Mechem, Agency.

He is virtually a surety; 8 Ex. 40; and the purchaser is the primary debtor; 7 Misc. Rep. 582. He is distinguished from other agents by the fact that he guarantees that those persons to whom he sells shall perform the contracts which he makes with them; L. R. 6 Ch. 403.

DELAWARE. The name of one of the original states of the United States of America, being the first to adopt the constitution.

In 1623, Cornelius May, with some Dutch emigrants, established a trading-house, but the settlers soon removed to North river. Ten years afterwards

De Vries arrived at Cape Henlopen, but the natives shortly destroyed the settlement. In the spring of 1638 the Swedes under Minuit established a settlement at the mouth of the Minquas river, which was called by them the Christiana, in honor of their queen. They purchased all the lands from Cape Henlopen to the falls near Trenton, and named the country New Sweden. Stuyvesant, the Dutch governor of New York, ended the Swedish authority in 1654. The Dutch held the country until 1664, when it fell into the hands of the English, and was granted by Charles II. to his brother James, Duke of York. In 1682, William Penn obtained a patent from the Duke of York, releasing all his title claimed through his patent from the crown to a portion of the territory. By this grant Penn became possessed of New Castle and the land lying within a circle of twelve miles around it, and subsequently of a tract of land beginning twelve miles south of New Castle and extending to Cape Henlopen. In consequence of a dispute between Penn and Lord Baltimore, the south and west lines, dividing his possessions from Maryland, were traced in 1761, under a decree of Lord-Chancellor Hardwicke, by the surveyors Mason and Dixon; and this line, extended westward between Maryland and Pennsylvania, has become historical as Mason and Dixon's line (q. v.).

Delaware was divided into three counties, called New Castle, Kent, and Sussex, and by enactment of Penn was annexed to Pennsylvania under the name of The Three Lower Counties upon Delaware. These counties remained for twenty years a part of Pennsylvania, each county sending six delegates to the general assembly. They separated in 1703, with the consent of the proprietary, and were governed by a separate legislature of their own, pursuant to the liberty reserved to them by a clause of their original charter. Delaware was the first state to ratify the federal constitution, on December 7, 1787.

In 1776 a state constitution was framed, a second in 1792, and a third in 1831, which remained in force until 1897. The agitation for constitutional changes was begun before 1850, and in 1853 a convention was held and a constitution adopted which was, on submission to a popular vote, defeated. After the civil war the efforts to obtain a convention were resumed, but were unsuccessful until 1896.

The present constitution was adopted June 4, 1897, by a constitutional convention which was duly called to meet in December, 1896, delegates having been elected at the general election of that year. The constitution contains the usual declaration of rights, no change being made in that article.

The changes made by this constitution are very radical. There is a veto power vested in the governor, but the general power of appointing state and county officers is taken from the executive, and all important officers are to be elected, except judges, who are appointed by the governor and confirmed by the senate for twelve years, in lieu of for life as formerly. There are provisions for state boards of pardons, agriculture, and health; district, not county, representation; restrictions on special legislation; detailed regulation of elections, with stringent provisions as to bribery, and a system of registration, prepayment of poll-tax being replaced by a registration fee; and local option by districts.

THE LEGISLATIVE POWER.—The general assembly, which meets biennially, consists of a senate and a house of representatives.

The senate is composed of seventeen senators, chosen for four years by the citizens residing in the several senatorial districts. They must be twenty-seven years of age.

The house of representatives is composed of thirty-five members, chosen for two years by the citizens residing in the several districts. They must be twenty-four years of age.

The districts are described in the constitution. There are two senators and five representatives from the city of Wilmington, and five senators and two representatives from the remaining part of New Castle County, and from each of the other counties. Senators and representatives must have a residence of three years in the state and one year in the district.

THE EXECUTIVE POWER.—The governor is chosen by the citizens of the state for the term of four years. He must be thirty years old, and have been for twelve years next before his election a citizen and resident of the United States, the last six of which he must have lived in the state, unless absent on business of the state or the United States.

He is commander-in-chief of the army and navy of the state and of the militia, and may appoint all officers whose appointment is not otherwise provided for, with a consent of a majority of all the senators elected. He may fill vacancies in the recess of the senate, except that for judicial appointments a special session must be called.

A lieutenant-governor is elected having the same term and qualifications, and if both offices are vacant, the secretary of state, attorney-general, president pro tempore of the senate or speaker of the house succeed in that order.

The secretary of state is appointed by the governor and confirmed by the senate; the attorney-general and insurance commissioner are elected for four years, and the state treasurer and auditor of accounts, for two. Sheriffs and coroners are elected for two years and other county officers for four.

THE JUDICIAL POWER.—The supreme court consists of the chancellor, who presides; the chief justice, who presides in the absence of the chancellor; and four associate judges, one at large, and three, of whom one must reside in each county, termed resident associate judges. Appeals from chancery are heard by the chief justice and associate judges, and writs of error or appeals in election cases, by the chancellor and such law judges as did not sit in the cause below. This court has a general appellate jurisdiction. Three constitute a quorum.

The superior court is the court of law of original civil jurisdiction, held in each county. It is vested with jurisdiction of all causes of a civil nature at common law.

The court of oyer and terminer has jurisdiction of all capital crimes, and of manslaughter, and of being an accessory to such crimes.

The court of general sessions is the county court of general criminal jurisdiction in other cases except those exclusively cognizable before justices of the peace. It acts also as court of general jail delivery, and, for the purpose of indictment, commitment for trial, or holding to bail, has jurisdiction of crimes and offences cognizable before the court of oyer and terminer.

The three courts last mentioned are composed of the chief justice and the four associate judges, who are authorized to designate those of their number who shall hold the courts in the several counties. Whenever practicable, three shall sit, but no more; and two are a quorum, except in the court of oyer and terminer, where three are required.

Prosecutions for fraud or bribery at general or primary elections are to be tried on information, after examination and commitment before a judge or justice of the peace, and trial by the court without grand or petit jury, with an appeal to the supreme court. Neither conviction, nor affirmance of one, in such case, can be had without the concurrence of all the trial judges.

The court of chancery is held by the chancellor. It is to hear and decree all matters in equity, including injunctions to stay suits at law and prevent waste, according to the course of chancery practice in England. But these powers are to be exercised only when no adequate remedy exists at law. In cases where matters of fact are in dispute, the cause is to be remitted to the superior court, to be tried by a jury. But this is construed to be only a provision for the ordering of an issue for trial by jury in accordance with the chancery practice of England, and not as limiting the discretion of the court in such cases, or as providing for a trial of facts by jury in equity cases as a matter of right.

The orphans' court in each county consists of the chancellor and the associate judge residing in that county. It appoints and removes guardians, and has the general superintendence of the estates of minors, except that guardians' accounts are passed before the register of wills with the right of exception to be heard by the orphan's court. This court also has jurisdiction for the sale of intestate real estate, and the sale of land of decedents to pay debts and to hear and determine exceptions to accounts of executors and administrators passed before the register of wills. There is an appeal from this court to the superior court, in cases of a division of opinion, or affecting the right to or value of real estate, or guardians' accounts.

The register of wills in each county exercises the powers of a probate court, admitting wills to probate, granting administration, and passing accounts of executors, administrators, and guardians; with appeal in cases of probate, or refusal thereof, to the superior court, and exception to accounts to the orphans' court. He may also order an issue of de.

visavit vel non to be tried by a jury at the bar of the superior court.

Justices of the peace have a jurisdiction of actions arising from contracts, of trespass where the amount involved does not exceed one hundred dollars, of cases under the process of forcible entry and detainer, and a civil jurisdiction, generally, where the amount involved is not over one hundred dollars. They may issue search-warrants, and may punish breaches of the peace, in cases which are not aggravated, by a fine not exceeding ten dollars. If the case be aggravated, the justice must bind over the offender for trial by the higher court.

DELAY. To procrastinate; detain or stop; to prolong.

A carrier who receives live-stock for shipment cannot escape liability for injuries by delay in their transportation, on the ground that there was an unusual rush of business on its road; 3 Tex. Civ. App. 8; see 49 Ill. App. 443; but it is liable for an unreasonable delay; 53 Mo. App. 473; 50 Fed. Rep. 567. In an action for damages for delay in transporting cattle, the difference in the market value of the cattle at the place of destination, at the time they should have arrived, and the time they did arrive, is the measure of damages; 82 Tex. 608.

When a telegraph company receives a message to transmit at a time when it cannot be sent because of a storm and broken wires, and does not inform the sender of such inability, it will not be relieved from liability for special damages for failure to transmit it within a reasonable time because of such storm; 8 Ind. App. 246; 55 Fed. Rep. 738. See TELEGRAPH.

DELECTUS PERSONÆ (Lat. the choice of the person). The right of a partner to decide what new partners, if any, shall be admitted to the firm. Story, Partn. §§ 5, 195.

This doctrine excludes even executors and representatives of partners from succeeding to the state and condition of partners; 7 Pick. 237; 3 Kent 55; Colly. Partn. §§ 8, 113, n.; Lind. Partn. 590.

In Scotch Law. The personal preference which is supposed to have been exercised by a landlord in selecting his tenant, by the members of a firm in making choice of partners, in the appointment of persons to office, and other cases. Nearly equivalent to personal trust, as a doctrine in law. Bell, Dict.

DELEGATE (Lat. delegare, to choose from). One authorized by another to act in his name; an attorney.

A person elected, by the people of an organized territory of the United States, to congress, who has a seat in congress and a right of debating, but not of voting. Ord. July 13, 1787; 2 Story, U. S. Laws 2076.

A person elected to any deliberative assembly. It is, however, in this sense generally limited to occasional assemblies, such as conventions and the like, and does not usually apply to permanent bodies, as houses of assembly, etc. In Maryland the most numerous branch of the Legislature is called the House of Delegates.

DELEGATION. In Civil Law. A kind of novation by which the original debtor, in order to be liberated from his creditor, gives him a third person, who becomes obliged in his stead to the creditor or to the person appointed by him. See NOVATION.

Perfect delegation exists when the debtor who makes the obligation is discharged by the creditor.

Imperfect delegation exists when the creditor retains his rights against the original debtor. 2 Duvergny, n. 169.

It results from the definition that a delegation is made by the concurrence of at least three parties, viz.: the party delegating—that is, the ancient debtor who procures another debtor in his stead; the party delegated, who enters into the obligation in the place of the ancient debtor, either to the creditor or to some other person appointed by him; and the creditor, who, in consequence of the obligation contracted by the party delegated, discharges the party delegating. Sometimes there intervenes a fourth party; namely, the person indicated by the creditor in whose favor the person delegated becomes obliged, upon the indication of the creditor and by the order of the person delegating. Pothier, Obl. pt. 3, c. 2, art. 6; 48 Miss. 454. See La. Civ. Code 2188, 2189; 14 Wend. 116; 20 Johns. 76; 5 N. H. 410; 11 S. & R. 179.

The party delegated is commonly a debtor or of the person delegating, and, in order to be liberated from the obligation to him, contracts a new one with his creditor. In this case there is a novation both of the obligation of the person delegating, by his giving his creditor a new debtor, and of the person delegated, by the new obligation which he contracts. Pothier, Obl. pt. 3, c. 2, art. 6, § 2.

In general, where the person delegated contracts a valid obligation to the creditor, the delegant is entirely liberated, and the creditor has no recourse against him in case of the substitute's insolvency. There is an exception to this rule when it is agreed that the debtor shall at his own risk delegate another person; but even in that case the creditor must not have omitted using proper diligence to obtain payment whilst the substitute continued solvent. Pothier, Obl. pt. 3, c. 2.

Delegation differs from transfer and simple indication. The transfer which a creditor makes of his debt does not include any novation. It is the original debt which passes from one of the parties, who makes the transfer, to the other, who receives it, and only takes place between these two persons, without the consent of the debtor necessarily intervening. Again, when the debtor indicates to the creditor a person from whom he may receive payment of the debt, and to whom the debtor gives the creditor an order for the purpose, it is merely a mandate, and neither a transfer nor a novation. So, where the creditor indicates a person to whom his debtor may pay the money, the debtor does not contract any obligation to the person indicated, but continues the debtor of his creditor who made the indication. Pothier, Obl. pt. 3, c. 2. See NOVATION.

At Common Law. The transfer of authority from one or more persons to one or more others.

Any person, sui juris, may delegate to another in authority to act for him in a matter which is lawful and otherwise capable of being delegated; Comyns, Dig. Attorney, c. 1; 9 Co. 75 b; Story, Ag. § 6.

When a bare power or authority has been given to another, the latter cannot, in general, delegate that authority, or any part of it, to a third person, for the obvious reason that the principal has relied upon the intelligence, skill, and ability of his agent, and cannot have the same confidence in a stranger; Story, Ag. § 13; 2 Kent 633; Broom, Leg. Max. 839; 5 Pet. 390; 3 Stor. 411. 425; 1 McMull. 453; 15 Pick. 303, 307; 26 Wend. 485; 11 G. & J. 58; 5 Ill. 127, 133; 35 W. Va. 300; 62 Hun 369; 2 Misc. Rep. 397. A power to delegate his authority may, however, be given to the agent by express terms of substitution; 1 Hill 505. And sometimes such power is implied, as in the following cases: First, when, by the law, such power is indispensable in order to accomplish the end proposed: as, for example, when goods are directed to be sold at auction, and the law forbids such sales except by licensed auctioneers; 6 S. & R. 386. Second, when the employment of such substitute is in the ordinary course of trade: as, where it is the custom of trade to employ a shipbroker or other agent for the purpose of procuring freight and the like; 2 M. & S. 301; 2 B. & P. 438; 3 Johns. Ch. 167, 178; 6 S. & R. 386. Third, when it is understood by the parties to be the mode in which the particular thing would or might be done; 3 Chit. C. L. 206; 9 Ves. 234, 251, 252; 1 M. & S. 484; 2 id. 301, 303, note. See 53 Fed. Rep. 936. Fourth, when the powers thus delegated are merely mechanical in their nature; 1 Hill 501; Sugd. Pow. 176.

As to the form of the delegation, for most purposes it may be either in writing, not under seal, or verbally without writing; or the authority may be implied. When, however, the act is required to be done under seal, the delegation must also be under seal unless the principal is present and verbally or impliedly authorizes the act; Story, Ag. § 51; Mech. Ag. 81; 5 Cush. 483.

Judicial power cannot be delegated; 3 Brev. 500; 112 N. C. 141; a statute authorizing an attorney to sit in the place of a judge who was disqualified, by reason of prejudice or interest, is void; 39 Wis. 390; S. C. 20 Am. Rep. 50. See 3 Dutch. 622; Cooley, Const. Lim. 117.

Legislative power cannot be delegated by the legislature to any other body or authority; 62 Me. 62, 451; 43 Tex. 41; 72 Pa. 491; 45 Mo. 458; 26 Vt. 362; 4 Harring. 479; 8 N. Y. 483; Cooley, Const. Lim. 141; 45 Fed. Rep. 178; 50 id. 406; 47 Mo. App. 125; see 143 U. S. 649; but the taking effect of a statute may be made to depend upon some subsequent event; 7 Cra. 382; 60 Me. 356; 23 Md. 449; 42 Conn. 583; 43 Iowa 252. The grant by congress to the secretary of war prescribing rules for the use of canals owned or operated by the government is not a delegation of legislative power, and the rules prescribed by him have the force of law and persons violating the same are subject to criminal punishment therefor; 74 Fed. Rep. 207. The question of the adoption or rejection of a general law cannot be referred to the vote of the people. It is usual, however, to confer certain legislative functions upon municipal corporations, and this practice has been constantly upheld.

The state government may delegate to a municipal corporation part of its own powers, but these powers cannot be delegated by the corporation, unless the authority to delegate is specially granted by the legislature, nor can the corporation divest itself of the discretion vested by the statute; 44 La. 809.

Acts (commonly called local-option laws) permitting the people of a locality to accept or reject for themselves particular police regulations, have been upheld as constitutional; 72 Pa. 491; s. c. 13 Am. DELESTAGE. In French Marine Law. A discharging of ballast from a vessel. Black, L. Dict.

DELIBERATE. To examine, to consult, in order to form an opinion. Thus, a jury deliberate as to their verdict.

DELIBERATION. The act of the understanding by which a party examines whether a thing proposed ought to be done or not to be done, or whether it ought to be done in one manner or another.

The deliberation relates to the end proposed, to the means of accomplishing that end, or to both. It is a presumption of law that all acts committed are done with due deliberation,—that the party intended to do what he has done. But he may show the contrary. In contracts, for example, he may show that he has been taken by surprise (q. v.); and when a criminal act is charged, he may prove that it was an accident, and not with deliberation,—that, in fact, there was no intention or will. See 18 Ani. Dec. 778, n.

By the use of this word in describing the crime of murder in the first degree, the idea is conveyed that the perpetrator weighs the motives for the act, and its consequences, the nature of the crime, or other things connected with his intentions, with a view to a decision thereon, that he carefully considers all these, and the act is not suddenly committed; 28 Ia. 524. See 66 Mo. 13; 91 id. 502; 35 Mich. 16. See INTENTION; WILL.

In Legislation. Council or consultation touching some business in an assembly having the power to act in relation to it.

DELICT. In Civil Law. The act by which one person, by fraud or malignity, causes some damage or tort to some other.

In its most enlarged sense, this term includes all kinds of crimes and misdemeanors, and even the injury which has been caused by another, either voluntarily or accidentally, without evil intention. But more commonly by delicts are understood those small offences which are punished by a small fine or a short imprisonment.

Private delicts are those which are directly injurious to a private individual.

Public delicts are those which affect the whole community in their hurtful consequences.

Quasi delicts are the acts of a person, who, without malignity, but by an inexcusable imprudence, causes an injury to another. Pothier, Obl. n. 116; Erskine, Pr. 4. 4. 1.

DELICTUM (Lat.). A crime or offence; a tort or wrong, as in actions ex delicto. 1 Chit. Pl. A challenge of a juror propter delictum is for some crime or misdemeanor that affects his credit and renders him infamous. 3 Bla. Com. 363; 2 Kent 241. Some offence committed or wrong done. 1 Kent 552; Cowp. 199, 200. A state of culpability. Occurring often, in the phrase "in pari delicto melior est conditio defendentis." So, where both parties to a broken contract have been guilty of unlawful acts, the law will not interfere, but will leave them in pari delicto. 2 Greenl. Ev. § 111.

DELIMIT. To mark or lay out the limits or boundary line of a territory or country.

DELINQUENT. In Civil Law. He who has been guilty of some crime, offence, or failure of duty.

DELIRIUM FEBRILE. In Medical Jurisprudence. A form of mental aberration incident to febrile disease, and sometimes to the last stages of chronic diseases.

The aberration is mostly of a subjective character, maintained by the inward activity of the mind rather than by outward impressions. "Regardless of persons or things around him, and scarcely capable of recognizing them when aroused by his attendants, the patient retires within himself, to dwell upon the scenes and events of the past, which pass before him in wild and disorderly array, while the tongue feebly records the varying impressions, in the form of disjointed, incoherent discourse, or of senseless rhapsody." Ray, Med. Jur. 346. It comes on gradually, being first manifested by talking while asleep, and by a momentary forgetfulness of persons and things on waking. Fully aroused, however, the mind becomes clear and tranquil, and so continues until the return of sleep, when the same incidents recur. Gradually the mental disorder becomes more intense, and the intervals between its returns of shorter duration, until they disappear altogether. Occasionally the past is revived with wonderful vividness, and acquirements are displayed which the patient, before his illness, had entirely forgotten. Instances are related of persons speaking in a language which, though acquired in youth, had long since passed from their memory. See the definition of delirium by Bland, Ch., in Owning's case, 1 Bland, Ch. 386.

The only acts which are liable to be affected by delirium are wills, which are often made in the last illness during the periods when the mind is apparently clear. Under such circumstances it may be questioned whether the apparent clearness was or was not real; and it is a question not always easily answered. In the early stages of delirium the mind may be quite clear, no doubt, in the intervals, while it is no less certain that there comes a period at last when no really lucid interval occurs and the mind is reliable at no time. The person may be quiet, and even answer questions with some degree of pertinence, while a close examination would show the mind to be in a dreamy condition and unable to appreciate any nice relations. In all these cases the question to be met is, whether the delirium which confessedly existed before the act left upon the mind no trace of its influence; whether the testator, calm, quiet, clear, and coherent as he seemed, was not quite unconscious of the nature of the act he was performing. The state of things implied in these questions is not fanciful. In every case it may possibly exist, and the questions must be met.

After obtaining all the light which can be thrown on the mental condition of the testator by nurses, servants, and physicians, then the character of the act itself and the circumstances which accompany it require a careful investigation. If it should appear that the mind was apparently clear, and that the act was a rational act rationally done, consistent one part with another, and in accordance with wishes or instructions previously expressed, and without any appearance of foreign influence, then it would be established. A different state of things would to that extent raise suspicion and throw discredit on the act. Yet at the very best it will occasionally happen, so dubious sometimes are the indications, that the decision will be largely conjectural. 1 Hag. Eccl. 146, 256, 502, 577; 2 id. 142; 3 id. 790; 1 Lee, Eccl. 130; 2 id. 229. See INSANITY.

DELIRIUM TREMENS (called, also, mania-a-potu). In Medical Jurisprudence. A form of mental disorder, usually accompanied by tremor, incident to habits of intemperate drinking, which generally appears as a sequel to a period of unusual excess or after a few days' abstinence from stimulating drink. It may also be caused by an accident, fright, or acute inflammatory disease, such as pneumonia.

The nature of the connection between this disease and abstinence is not yet clearly understood. Where the former succeeds a broken limb, or any other severe accident that confines the patient to his bed and obliges him to abstain, it would seem as if its development were favored by the constitutional disturbance then existing. In other cases, where the abstinence is apparently voluntary, there is some reason to suppose that it is really the incubation of the disease, and not its cause.

Its approach is generally indicated by a slight tremor and faltering of the hands and lower extremities, a tremulousness of the voice, a certain restlessness and sense of anxiety which the patient knows not how to describe or account for, disturbed sleep, and impaired appetite. These symptoms having continued two or three days, at the end of which time they have usually increased in severity, the patient ceases to sleep altogether, and soon becomes delirious at intervals. After a while the delirium becomes constant, as well as the utter absence of sleep. There is usually an elevation of temperature of two or three degrees. This state of watchfulness and delirium continues three or four days, when, if the patient recover, it is succeeded by sleep, which at first appears in uneasy and irregular naps, and lastly in long, sound, and refreshing slumbers. When sleep does not supervene about this time, the disease proves fatal.

The mental aberration of delirium tremens is marked by some peculiar characters. Almost invariably the patient manifests feelings of fear and suspicion, and labors under continual apprehensions of being made the victim of sinister designs and practices. He imagines that people have conspired to rob and murder him, and insists that he can hear them in an adjoining room arranging their plans and preparing to rush upon him, or that he is forcibly detained and prevented from going to his own home. One of the most common hallucinations in this disease is that of constantly seeing devils, snakes, or vermin around him and on him. Under the influence of the terrors inspired by these notions, the wretched patient often endeavors to cut his throat, or jump out of the window, or murder his wife, or some one else whom his disordered imagination identifies with his enemies.

Delirium tremens must not be confounded with other forms of mental derangement which occur in connection with intemperate habits. Hard drinking may produce a paroxysm of maniacal excitement, or a host of hallucinations and delusions, which disappear after a few days' abstinence from drink and are succeeded by the ordinary mental condition. In U. S. v. McGuire, 1 Curt. 1, for instance, the prisoner was defended on the plea that the homicide for which he was indicted was committed in a fit of delirium tremens. There was no doubt that he was laboring under some form of insanity; but the fact, which appeared in evidence, that his reason returned before the recurrence of sound sleep, rendered it very doubtful whether the trouble was delirium tremens, although in every other respect it looked like that disease.

By repeated decisions the law has been settled in this country that delirium tremens annuls responsibility for any act that may be committed under its influence: provided, of course, that the mental condition can stand the tests applied in other forms of insanity. The law does not look to the remote causes of the mental affection; and the rule on this point is, that if the act is not committed under the immediate influence of intoxicating drinks, the plea of insanity is not invalidated by the fact that it is the result of drinking at some previous time. Such drinking may be morally wrong; but the same may be said of other vicious indulgences which give rise to much of the insanity which exists in the world; Whart. Cr. L. § 48; 57 Tenn. 178; 50 Ala. 149; 40 Ind. 233; 2 Cra. 153; 19 Mich. 401; 12 Tex. 500; 64 Ind. 435; 1 Curt. 1; 5 Mas. 28; State v. Wilson, Ray, Med. Jur. 520; 9 Houst. 369; 105 Cal. 486; 20 S. W. Rep. (Tex.) 306. In England, the existence of delirium tremens has been admitted as an excuse for crime for the same reasons; Reg. v. Watson and Reg. v. Simpson, 2 Tayl. Med. Jur. 599; 14 Cox, Cr. Cas. 565. In the case of Birdsall, 1 Beck, Med. Jur. 808, it was held that delirium tremens was not a valid defence, because the prisoner knew, by repeated experience, that indulgence in drinking would probably bring on an attack of the disease; see also in 19 Mich. 401.

DELIVERANCE. In Practice. A term used by the clerk in court to every prisoner who is arraigned and pleads not guilty, to whom he wishes a good deliverance. In modern practice this is seldom used.

DELIVERY. In Conveyancing. The transfer of a deed from the grantor to the grantee, or some person acting in his behalf, in such a manner as to deprive the grantor of his right to recall it at his option.

An absolute delivery is one which is complete upon the actual transfer of the instrument from the possession of the grantor.

A conditional delivery is one which passes the deed from the possession of the grantor, but is not to be completed by possession in the grantee, or a third person as his agent, until the happening of a specified event. A delivery in this manner is an escrow (q. v.).

No particular form is required to effect a delivery. It may be by acts merely, by words merely, or by both combined; but in all cases an intention that it shall be a delivery must exist; Comyns, Dig. Fait (A); 1 Wood, Conv. 193; 6 Sim. 31; 11 Vt. 621; 18 Me. 391; 2 Pa. 191; 12 Johns. 536; 20 Pick. 28; 4 J. J. Marsh. 572; 141 Ill. 400; 38 Minn. 443; 69 Tex. 513; 16 Or. 437.

"Although a delivery is essential to the transfer of title under a deed, no formality, either of words or action, is necessary to constitute it. Anything which signifies the intention of the grantor to part with his control or dominion over the paper, so that it may become a muniment of title in the grantee, operates as a legal delivery. The question of delivery is purely one of intention. With respect to the measure of proof required, a difference is recognized in the cases depending upon the character of the deed, whether it be voluntary or made to give effect to a sale. In the former case the intention to part with the control of the deed is not presumed and a delivery must be proved strictly. . . . But if the conveyance be for a valuable consideration and absolute on its face, the intention to consummate the conveyance by the delivery of the deed as a muniment of title is inferred from the grantor's parting with the possession of it, whether it be to the grantee directly or to some third person—if he part with it without any condition or reservation." Bates, Ch., in 4 Del. Ch. 326. In the absence of direct evidence, the delivery of a deed will be presumed from the concurrent acts of the parties recognizing a transfer of title; 94 U. S. 405; 160 Pa. 336; 148 Ill. 426. So long as a deed is within the control and subject to the dominion and authority of the grantor, there is no delivery, without which there can be no deed; 37 W. Va. 725. The possession of a deed by the grantee therein, is prima facie evidence of its delivery; 32 Fla. 264; 70 Hun 600; 98 Ala. 470. The deed of a corporation was said to be delivered by affixing the corporate seal; Co. Litt. 22, n., 36, n.; Cro. Eliz. 167; 2 Rolle, Abr. Fait (I).

It may be made by an agent as well as by the grantor himself; 9 Mass. 307; 4 Day 66; 5 B. & C. 671; 2 Washb. R. P. 579; or to an agent previously appointed; 6 Metc. 356; or subsequently recognized; 22 Me. 121; 14 Ohio 307; but a subsequent assent on the part of the grantee will not be presumed; 9 Ill. 177; 1 N. H. 353; 15 Wend. 656. See, also, 9 Mass. 307; 4 Day 66; 2 Ired. Eq. 557. Where a father in purchasing land has the deed executed in the name of his minor son, the delivery of the deed to the father is sufficient delivery to the son; 107 Mo. 101.

The delivery of a deed to a third person for the grantee's benefit, followed by an assertion of title by the grantee, is a good delivery; 146 Ill. 262; as is also such a delivery where the third person is to be custodian, but where the deed is not to go into force until after the grantor's death; 68 Hun 490.

To complete a delivery, acceptance must take place, which may be presumed from the grantee's possession; 1 Har. & J. 319; 4 Pick. 518; 2 Ala. 136; 1 N. H. 353; 4 Fla. 359; 108 Mo. 110; 1 Zabr. 379; from the relationship of a person holding the deed to the grantee; 7 Ill. 557; 1 Johns. Ch. 240, 456; and from other circumstances; 18 Conn. 257; 5 Watts 243. The execution and registration of a deed, and delivery of it to the register for that purpose, do not vest the title in the grantee; he must first ratify these acts; 3 Wall. 636; 10 Mass. 456; 3 Metc. 281; 55 N. W. Rep. (Ia.) 326; but see 87 Mich. 349; but they are prima facie evidence of delivery; 79 Pa. 15; 91 Tenn. 147; 94 Mich. 204.

There can ordinarily be but one valid delivery; 12 Johns. 536; 20 Pick. 28; which can take place only after complete execution; 2 Dev. 379; 148 U. S. 21. But there must be one; 2 Harring. 197; 16 Vt. 563; 2 Washb. R. P. 581; Mitch. R. P. 464; and from that one the deed takes effect; 12 Mass. 455; 4 Yeates 278; 18 Me. 190. See 1 Denio 323.

The delivery of a deed in escrow contrary to the condition is voidable; 2 W. N. C. Pa. 504; but it cannot be avoided, as against a bona fide purchaser, without proof by the most unexceptionable testimony, of facts which avoid the title; and the onus of showing such facts is on the grantor; 10 Pa. 285.

In Contracts. The transfer of the possession of a thing from one person to another.

Originally, delivery was a clear and unequivocal act of giving possession, accomplished by placing the subject to be transferred in the hands of the transferee or his avowed agent, or in their respective warehouses, vessels, carts, and the like; but in modern times it is frequently symbolical, as by delivery of the key to a room containing goods; 5 Johns. 335; 1 Yeates 529; 2 Ves. Sen. 445; 1 East 192; see, also, 7 East 558; 3 B. & P. 233; 158 Mass. 592; by marking timber on a wharf, or goods in a warehouse, or by separating and weighing or measuring them; 2 Vt. 374; 40 N. J. L. 581; 69 Md. 537; or otherwise constructive, as by the delivery of a part for the whole; 23 Vt. 265; 9 Barb. 416; 11 Cush. 282; 39 Me. 496; 3 B. & P. 69. And see, as to what constitutes a delivery, 4 Mass. 661; 71 N. Y. 291; 89 Ill. 218; 89 Va. 1; 90 Tenn. 306; 74 Ia. 506; [1892] 1 Q. B. 582.

Where goods are ordered by a foreign merchant, the title passes, on a delivery to a carrier for shipment, subject only to the right of stoppage in transitu; 88 Pa. 264; 156 Mass. 221; 37 Fed. Rep. 268; 117 Ind. 132; 7 Mont. 150; 50 Mo. App. 18; 98 Ala. 176; but such is not a delivery to the vendee where he dies before they reach their destination; 62 Mich. 349. Where the vendor takes the bill of lading deliverable to the order of himself, or of his agent, it prevents the property from passing to the intended vendee until delivery; 50 Ark. 20; Blackb. Sales 130.

Delivery is not necessary at common law to complete a sale of personal property as between the vendor and vendee; Benj. Sales § 315; as a sale passes title as soon as the bargain is struck without any delivery or payment; 143 U. S. 346; but as against third parties possession retained by the vendor raises a presumption of fraud conclusive according to some authorities; 1 Cra. 309; 2 Munf. 341; 4 M'Cord 294; 1 Ov. 91; 14 B. Monr. 533; 18 Pa. 113; 4 Harr. 458; 2 Ill. 296; 1 Halst. 153; 5 Conn. 196; 12 Vt. 653; 4 Fla. 219; 9 Johns. 337; 1 Campb. 332; 48 Pa. 413; 73 Cal. 399; 122 Pa. 25; others holding it merely strong evidence of fraud to be left to the jury; 3 B. & C. 368; 5 Rand. 211; 1 Bail. 568; 3 Yerg. 475; 3 J. J. Marsh. 643; 4 N. Y. 303, 580; 2 Metc. 99; 18 Me. 127; 5 La. Ann. 1; 1 Tex. 415; but delivery is necessary, in general, where the property in goods is to be transferred in pursuance of a previous contract; 1 Taunt. 318; 16 Me. 49; 1 Pars. Contr. 235; and also in case of a donatio causa mortis; 3 Binn. 370; 2 Ves. Ch. 120; 9 id. 1; 64 Cal. 346; 158 Mass. 592; 3 Misc. Rep. 277. To give validity to a gift, there must be such a delivery of the subject thereof as works an immediate change in the dominion of the property; 45 Mo. App. 160. The rules requiring actual full delivery are subject to modification in the case of bulky articles; 5 S. & R. 19; 12 Mass. 400; 16 Me. 49. See, also, 3 Johns. 399; 13 id. 294; 1 Dall. 171; 2 N. H. 75; 7 Oreg. 49; 59 Pa. 464; 2 Kent 508.

The word delivery is used in different senses, which should be borne in mind in considering the cases. Sometimes it denotes transfer of the property in the chattel and sometimes transfer of the possession of the chattel. When used in the latter sense it may refer either to the formation of the contract, or to the performance of it. When it refers to the delivery of possession in the performance of the contract, the buyer is sometimes spoken of as being in possession although he has only the right of possession, while the actual custody remains with the vendor.

A condition requiring delivery may be annexed as a part of any contract of transfer; 19 Me. 147.

In the absence of contract, the amount of transportation to be performed by the seller to constitute delivery is determined by general usage.

See Browne, Stat. of Frauds; Story; Benjamin, Sales; Parsons, Contr.

In Medical Jurisprudence. The act of a woman giving birth to her offspring.

Pretended delivery may present itself in three points of view. First, when the female who feigns has never been pregnant. When thoroughly investigated, this may always be detected. There are signs which must be present and cannot be feigned. An enlargement of the orifice of the uterus, and a tumefaction of the organs of generation, should always be present, and if absent are conclusive against the fact. 2 Annales d'Hygiène, 227. Second, when the pretended pregnancy and delivery have been preceded by one or more deliveries. In this case attention should be given to the following circumstances: the mystery, if any, which has been affected with regard to the situation of the female; her age; that of her husband; and, particularly, whether aged or decrepit. Third, when the woman has been actually delivered, and substitutes a living for a dead child. But little evidence can be obtained on this subject from a physical examination.

Concealed delivery generally takes place when the woman either has destroyed her offspring or it was born dead. In suspected cases the following circumstances should be attended to: First, the proofs of pregnancy which arise in consequence of the examination of the mother. When she has been pregnant, and has been delivered, the usual signs of delivery, mentioned below, will be present. A careful investigation as to the woman's appearance before and since the delivery will have some weight; though such evidence is not always to be relied upon, as such appearances are not unfrequently deceptive. Second, the proofs of recent delivery. Third, the connection between the supposed state of parturition and the state of the child that is found; for if the age of the child do not correspond to that time, it will be a strong circumstance in favor of the mother's innocence. A redness of the skin and an attachment of the umbilical cord to the navel indicate a recent birth. Whether the child was living at its birth, belongs to the subject of infanticide.

The usual signs of delivery are very well collected in Beck's excellent treatise on Medical Jurisprudence, and are here extracted:—

If the female be examined within three or four days after the occurrence of delivery, the following circumstances will generally be observed: greater or less weakness, a slight paleness of the face, the eye a little sunken and surrounded by a purplish or dark-brown colored ring, and a whiteness of the skin like that of a person convalescing from disease. The belly is soft, the skin of the abdomen is lax, lies in folds, and is traversed in various directions by shining reddish and whitish lines, which especially extend from the groin and pubes to the navel. These lines have sometimes been termed lineæ albicantes, and are particularly observed near the umbilical region, where the abdomen has experienced the greatest distension. The breasts become tumid, and hard, and, on pressure, emit a fluid which at first is serous and afterwards gradually becomes whiter. The areolæ round the nipples are dark colored. The external genital organs and vagina are dilated and tumefied throughout the whole of their extent, from the pressure of the foetus. The uterus may be felt through the abdominal parietes, voluminous, firm, and globular, and rising nearly as high as the umbilicus. Its orifice is soft and tumid, and dilated so as to admit two or more fingers. The fourchette, or anterior margin of the perineum, is sometimes torn, or it is lax, and appears to have suffered considerable distension. A discharge (termed the lochial) commences from the uterus, which is distinguished from the menses by its pale color, its peculiar and well-known smell, and its duration. The lochia are at first of a red color, and gradually become lighter until they cease.

These signs may generally be relied upon as indicating recent delivery; yet it requires much experience in order not to be deceived by appearances.

The lochial discharge might be mistaken for menstruation, or leucorrhæa, were it not for its peculiar smell; though this is not absolutely characteristic.

Relaxation of the soft parts arises as frequently from menstruation as from delivery; but in these cases the os uteri and vagina are not so much tumefied, nor is there that tenderness and swelling. The parts are found pale and flabby when all signs of contusion disappear, after delivery, and this circumstance does not follow menstruation.

The presence of milk, though a usual sign of delivery, is not always to be relied upon; for this secretion may take place independent of pregnancy.

The wrinkles and relaxations of the abdomen which follow delivery may be the consequence of dropsy, or of lankness following great obesity. This state of the parts is also seldom striking after the birth of the first child, as they shortly resume their natural state. Positive proof of the occurrence of birth is furnished only by the discovery of parts of the ovum. In most cases the demonstration by the microscope of shreds of the decidua with large, nucleated and fatty cells is of itself a sure proof; Winckle, quoted by Witthaus & Becker.

DELUSION. In Medical Jurisprudence. A symptom of mental disease, in which persons believe things to exist which exist only, or in the degree they are conceived of only, in their own imaginations, with a persuasion so fixed and firm that neither evidence nor argument can convince them to the contrary. A faulty belief concerning a subject capable of physical demonstration, out of which the person cannot be reasoned by adequate means for the time being. 1 Wood, American Text Book of Med. See HALLUCINATION.

The individual is, of course, insane. For example, should a parent unjustly persist, without the least ground, in attributing to his daughter a coarse vice, and use her with uniform unkindness, there not being the slightest pretence or color of reason for the supposition, a just inference of insanity or delusion would arise in the minds of a jury; because a supposition long entertained and persisted in, after argument to the contrary, and against the natural affections of a parent, suggest that he must labor under some morbid mental delusion; Whart. Cr. L. § 37; Whart. & S. Med. Jur.; 1 Redf. Wills; Ray, Med. Jur. § 20; Shelf. Lun. 296; 3 Add. Eccl. 70, 90, 180; 1 Hagg. Eccl. 27. See 10 Fed. Rep. 170; Mann, Med. Jur. of Insan. 58.

Where one "labors under a partial delusion only, and is not in other respects insane, we think he must be considered in the same situation as to responsibility as if the facts with respect to which the delusion exists were real. For example, if under the influence of his delusion he supposes another man to be in the act of attempting to take away his life, and he kills that man, as he supposes, in self-defence, he would be exempt from punishment." This is the rule as stated by the English judges, cited in 1 Whart. Cr. L. § 37. Shaw, C. J., in 7 Metc. 500, says: "Monomania may operate as an excuse for a criminal act," when "the delusion is such that the person under its influence has a real and firm belief of some fact, not true in itself, but which, if it were true, would excuse his act; as where the belief is that the party killed had an immediate design upon his life, and under that belief the insane man kills in supposed self-defence. A common instance is where he fully believes that the act he is doing is done by the immediate command of God, and he acts under the delusive but sincere belief that what he is doing is by the command of a superior power, which supersedes all human laws and the laws of nature."

Where a testator was laboring under a delusion that his brother was exercising his muscle preparatory to killing him, that of itself would not justify a rejection of his will on the ground of unsound mind; 64 Hun 639. A person persistently believing supposed facts which have no real existence, against all evidence and probability, and conducting himself on the assumption of their existence, is, so far as such facts are concerned, under an insane delusion; 95 Mich. 332.

DEMAIN. See DEMESNE.

DEMAND. A claim; a legal obligation. Demand is a term of art of an extent greater in its signification than any other word except claim. Co. Litt. 291; 2 Hill 220; 9 S. & R. 124; 6 W. & S. 226.

A release of all demands is, in general, a release of all covenants, real or personal, conditions, whether broken or not, annuities, recognizances, obligations, contracts, and the like; 3 Pa. 120; 2 Hill 228; but does not discharge rent before it is due, if it be a rent incident to the reversion; for the rent was not only not due, but the consideration—the future enjoyment of the lands—for which the rent was to be given was not executed; 1 Lev. 99; Bac. Abr. Release, I. See 10 Co. 128; 23 Pick. 295; 7 Md. 375; 79 Ga. 555.

In Practice. A requisition or request to do a particular thing specified under a claim of right on the part of the person requesting.

In causes of action arising ex contractu it is frequently necessary, to secure to the party all his rights and to enable him to bring an action, that he should make a demand upon the party bound to perform the contract or discharge the obligation. Thus, where property is sold to be paid for on delivery, a demand must be made before bringing an action for non-delivery, and proved on trial; 5 Term 409; 3 M. & W. 254; 39 Ill. App. 158; 67 Hun 505; but not if the seller has incapacitated himself from delivering them; 5 B. & Ald. 712; 2 Bibb 280; 1 Vt. 25; 4 Mass. 474; 3 Wend. 556; 2 Me. 308; 5 Munf. 1; and this rule and exception apply to contracts for marriage; 2 Dowl. & R. 55; 1 Chit. Pr. 57, note (n), 438, note (e). Nor is a demand necessary where it is to be presumed that it would have been unavailing; 38 Minn. 545; 39 Kan. 31. Where a selling price has been agreed on, the bringing of a suit therefor is a sufficient demand for the money claimed; 1 Misc. Rep. 509. A demand of rent is necessary before re-entry for non-payment; 92 Tenn. 161. But where rent is payable on the first day of the month, no demand of the rent on the day it falls due is necessary to entitle the landlord to maintain an action therefor; 128 Mass. 483; 99 id. 388. See RE-ENTRY. No demand is in general necessary on a promissory note before bringing an action; but after a tender demand must be made of the sum tendered; 1 Campb. 181, 474; 1 Stark. 323. A note payable "on call" may be sued on without demand; 83 Ala. 595; but a demand and notice of non-payment are essential to fix the liability of endorsers unless waived; 1 App. D. C. 171. Where a mortgagor has resolved to default on an interest coupon and provides no funds to pay it, the holder is not required to present it for payment before bringing suit; 161 Pa. 391.

In cases arising ex delicto, a demand is frequently necessary. Thus, when the wife, apprentice, or servant of one person has been harbored by another, the proper course is to make a demand of restoration before an action brought, in order to constitute the party a wilful wrong-doer unless the plaintiff can prove an original illegal enticing away; 2 Lev. 63; 5 East 39; 4 J. B. Moo. 12.

So, too, in cases where the taking of goods is lawful but their subsequent detention becomes illegal, it is absolutely necessary, in order to secure sufficient evidence of a conversion on the trial, to give a formal notice of the owner's right to the property and possession, and to make a formal demand in writing of the delivery of such possession to the owner. See TROVER; CONVERSION. And when a nuisance has been erected or continued by a man on his own land, it is advisable, particularly in the case of a private nuisance, to give the party notice, and request him to remove it, either before an entry is made for the purpose of abating it or an action is commenced against the wrong-doer; and a demand is always indispensable in cases of a continuance of a nuisance originally created by another person; 2 B. & C. 302; Cro. Jac. 555; Poll. Torts 314; 5 Co. 100; 5 Viner, Abr. 506; 1 Ayliffe, Pand. 497; Bac. Abr. Rent, I.

In cases of contempts, as where an order to pay money or to do any other thing, has been made a rule of court, a demand for the payment of the money or performance of the thing must be made before an attachment will be issued for a contempt; 1 Cr. M. & R. 88, 459; 4 Tyrwh. 369; 2 Scott 193; 1 H. & W. 216.

Demand should be made by the party having the right, or his authorized agent; 2 B. & P. 464 a; 1 Bail. 193; 2 Mas. 77; 18 N. H. 75; 55 Ind. 122; of the person in default, in cases of torts; 8 B. & C. 528; 7 Johns. 302; 30 Conn. 237; 46 Barb. 183; in case of rent; 2 Washb. R. P. 321, 322; and at a proper time and place in case of rents; Wood, Landl. & Ten. 1034; 3 Wend. 230; 17 Johns. 66; 4 N. H. 251; 15 id. 68; 4 Harr. & M'H. 135; 21 Pick. 389; 56 Ind. 554; in cases of notes and bills of exchange; Pars. Notes & B.

As to the allegation of a demand in a declaration, see 1 Chit. Pl. 322; 2 id. 84; 1 Wms. Saund. 33, note 2; 65 Hun 43; Com. Dig. Pleader.

DEMAND IN RECONVENTION.

A demand which the defendant institutes in consequence of that which the plaintiff has brought against him. Used in Louisiana. La. Pr. Code, art. 374.

DEMANDANT. The plaintiff or party who brings a real action. Co. Litt. 127; Com. Dig. See REAL ACTION.

DEMEMBRATION. In Scotch Law. Maliciously cutting off or otherwise separating one limb from another. 1 Hume 323; Bell, Dict.

DEMENS (Lat.). One who has lost his mind through illness or some other cause. One whose faculties are enfeebled. Dean, Med. Jur. 481. See DEMENTIA.

DEMENTIA. In Medical Jurisprudence. That form of insanity which is characterized by mental weakness and decrepitude, and by total inability to reason correctly or incorrectly.

The mind dwells only in the past, and the thoughts succeed one another without any obvious bond of association. Delusions, if they exist, are transitory, and leave no permanent impression; and for everything recent the memory is exceedingly weak. In mania, the action of the mind is marked by force, hurry, and intensity; in dementia, by slowness and weakness. It is the natural termination of many forms of insanity. Occasionally it occurs in an acute form in young subjects; and here only it is curable. In old men, in whom it often occurs, it is called senile dementia, and it indicates the breaking down of the mental powers in advance of the bodily decay. It is this form of dementia only which gives rise to litigation; for in the others the incompetency is too patent to admit of question. It cannot be described by any positive characters, because it differs in the different stages of its progress, varying from simple lapse of memory to complete inability to recognize persons or things. And it must be borne in mind that often the mental infirmity is not so serious as might be supposed at first sight. Many an old man who seems to be scarcely conscious of what is passing around him, and is guilty of frequent breaches of decorum, needs only to have his attention aroused to a matter in which he is deeply interested, to show no lack of vigor or acuteness. In other words, the mind may be damaged superficially (to use a figure), while it may be sound at the core. And therefore it is that one may be quite oblivious of names and dates, while comprehending perfectly well his relations to others and the interests in which he was concerned. It follows that the impressions made upon casual or ignorant observers in regard to the mental condition are of far less value than those made upon persons who have been well acquainted with his habits and have had occasion to test the vigor of his faculties.

Senile dementia or the imbecility caused by the decay of old age is often the ground on which the wills of old men are contested, and the conflicting testimony of observers, the proofs of foreign influence, and the indications of mental capacity all combine to render it no easy task to arrive at a satisfactory conclusion. The only general rule of much practical value is that competency must be always measured, not by any fancied standard of intellect, but solely by the requirements of the act in question. A small and familiar matter would require less mental power than one complicated in its details and somewhat new to the testator's experience. Less capacity would be necessary to distribute an estate between a wife and child than between a multitude of relatives with unequal claims upon his bounty. Such is the principle; and the ends of justice cannot be better served than by its correct and faithful application. Of course, there will always be more or less difficulty; but generally by discarding all legal and metaphysical subtleties and following the leading of common sense, it will be satisfactorily surmounted.

The legal principles by which the courts are governed are not essentially different whether the mental incapacity proceed from dementia or mania. If the will coincides with the previously expressed wishes of the testator, if it recognizes the claims of those who stood in near relation to him, if it shows no indication of undue influence,—if, in short, it is a rational act rationally done,—it will be established though there may have been considerable impairment of mind. 2 Phill. Eccl. 449; 3 Wash. C. C. 580; 4 id. 262; 44 N. H. 531; 151 Ill. 106; 40 N. E. Rep. (Ind.) 70; 51 N. J. Eq. 233; 5 Misc. Rep. 199; 83 Hun 327; 84 id. 1591; 165 Pa. 596; 166 id. 630.

This species of dementia is also frequently alleged and proved as a ground of impeaching deeds. This particular form of mental disease may result either in total incompetency, such as is produced by any form of insanity, or a greatly defective capacity, though short of total insanity, in which the court scrutinizes the act, and sustains it only when there is found to have been capacity sufficient for the act in question and entire freedom of will. Consequently such cases usually include the two elements of mental incompetency of some degree and undue influence; and probably a majority of the cases in which the aid of equity is sought to set aside deeds on the ground of undue influence involve also the question of the existence of senile dementia to a greater or less extent. The principle upon which courts of equity deal with this class of persons is neither as a matter of course to affirm or avoid their acts, but to protect them in the exercise of such capacity as they have. It will scrutinize their transactions; considering the nature of the act done, the inducements leading to it, and the attending circumstances and influences. If the conscience of the court is satisfied that such a grantor comprehended the nature and consequences of the transaction, and exercised a deliberate and free judgment, it will be sustained; but if the nature of the act or the attending circumstances justify the conclusion that the grantor's weakness has been taken advantage of, the deed will be set aside in equity however valid it might be at law; 1 Bro. Ch. 560; 1 Knapp 73; 5 Dana 181; 12 B. Monr. 55; 2 Dev. & B. Eq. 241; 1 Ohio St. 54; 4 Sneed 497. The United States Supreme Court says:—"It may be stated as settled law, that whenever there is great weakness of mind in a person executing a conveyance of law, arising from age, sickness, or any other cause, though not amounting to absolute disqualification, and the consideration given for the property is grossly inadequate—a court of equity will . . . interfere and set the conveyance aside;" 94 U. S. 511; 1 Sto. Eq. Jur. § 238; Bisph. Eq. 238. For a thorough examination and discussion of the subject in a case of senile dementia in which a deed was set aside, see 5 Del. Ch. 374. In that case Saulsbury, Ch., thus stated the principle upon which courts of equity deal with such cases: "In cases of alleged mental incapacity, the test is whether the party had the ability to comprehend in a reasonable manner the nature of the affair in which he participated. This is the rule in the absence of fraud. . . . This ability so to comprehend necessarily implies the power to understand the character, legal conditions, and effect of the act performed. . . . The cause of mental weakness is immaterial. It may arise from injury to the mind, temporary illness, or excessive old age. In such cases any unfairness will be promptly redressed." In a very similar case a deed was set aside on the ground of mental incapacity of the grantor by reason of senile dementia or dotage, by Bland, Ch., whose opinion contains an elaborate discussion of the different species of dementia, which he classifies as, Idiocy, Delirium, Lunacy, and Dotage, under which latter term he describes senile dementia; 1 Bland, Ch. 370. See 1 Redf. Wills; 3 Am. L. Reg. N. S. 449, article by Judge Redfield; 2 Ham. Leg. Med. 116; INSANITY.

DEMESNE (Lat. dominicum). Lands of which the lord had the absolute property or ownership; as distinguished from feudal lands, which he held of a superior. 2 Bla. Com. 104; Cowel. Lands which the lord retained under his immediate control, for the purpose of supplying his table and the immediate needs of his household; distinguished from that farmed out to tenants, called among the Saxons bordlands. Blount; Co. Litt. 17 a.

Own; original. Son assault demesne, his (the plaintiff's) original assault, or assault in the first place. 2 Greenl. Ev. § 633; 3 Bla. Com. 120, 306.

DEMESNE AS OF FEE. A man is said to be seised in his demesne as of fee of a corporeal inheritance, because he has a property dominium or demesne in the thing itself. 2 Bla. Com. 106. But when he has no dominion in the thing itself, as in the case of an incorporeal hereditament, he is said to be seised as of fee, and not in his demesne as of fee; Littleton § 10; 17 S. & R. 196; Jones, Land Tit. 166.

Formerly it was the practice in an action on the case—e. g. for a nuisance to real estate—to aver in the declaration the seisin of the plaintiff in demesne as of fee; and this is still necessary, in order to estop the record with the land, so that it may run with or attend the title; Archb. Civ. Pl. 104; Co. Entr. 9, pl. 8; 1 Saund. 346. But such an action may be maintained on the possession as well as on the seisin; although the effect of the record in this case upon the title would not be the same; Steph. Pl. 322; 4 Term 718; 2 Wms. Saund. 113 b; Cro. Car. 500, 575.

DEMESNE LANDS. A phrase meaning the same as demesne.

DEMESNE LANDS OF THE CROWN. That share of lands reserved to the crown at the original distribution of landed property, or which came to it afterwards by forfeiture or otherwise. 1 Bla. Com. 286; 2 Steph. Com. 550.

DEMI-MARK. A sum of money (6s. 8d., 3 Bla. Com. App. v.) tendered and paid into court in certain cases in the trial of a writ of right by the grand assize. Co. Litt. 294 b; Booth, Real Act. 98.

It was paid by the tenant to obtain an inquiry by the grand assize into the time of the demandant's seisin; 1 Reeve, Hist. Eng. Law 429; Stearns, Real Act. 378. It compelled the demandant to begin; 3 Chit. Pl. 1373. It is unknown in American practice; 13 Wend. 546.

DEMI-VILL. Half a tithing.

DEMIDIETAS. A word used in ancient records for a moiety, or one-half.

DEMISE. A conveyance, either in fee, for life, or for years.

A lease or a conveyance for a term of years. According to Chief Justice Gibson, the English word demise, though improperly used as a synonyme for concessi or demisi, strictly denotes a posthumous grant, and no more. 5 Whart. 278. See 4 Bingh. n. c. 678; 5 How. Pr. 71.

In a conveyance, the word "demise" imports in law a covenant for quiet enjoyment; 9 N. H. 219; 1 M. G. & S. 429; it implies a power to lease; 8 Cow. 36. See 109 Mass. 235; COVENANT.

A term nearly synonymous with death, appropriated in England especially to denote the decease of the king or queen.

DEMISE OF THE CROWN. The natural dissolution of the king.

The term is said to denote in law merely a transfer of the property of the crown. 1 Bla. Com. 249. By demise of the crown we mean only that, in consequence of the disunion of the king's natural body from his body politic, the kingdom is transferred or demised to his successor, and so the royal dignity remains perpetual. Plowd. 117, 234.

A similar result, viz.: the perpetual and continuous existence of the office of president of the United States, has been secured by the constitution and subsequent statutes. 1 Sharsw. Bla. Com. 249.

DEMISE AND RE-DEMISE. An old form of conveyance by mutual leases made from one to another on each side of the same land, or of something issuing from it. A lease for a given sum—usually a mere nominal amount—and a release for a larger rent. Toullier; Whishaw; Jacob.

DEMOCRACY. That form of government in which the people rule.

But the multitude cannot actually rule: an unorganic democracy, therefore, one that is not founded upon a number of institutions each endowed with a degree of self-government, naturally becomes a one-man government. The basis of the democracy is equality, as that of the aristocracy is privilege; but equality of itself is no guarantee for liberty, nor does equality constitute liberty. Absolute democracies existed in antiquity and the middle ages: they have never endured for any length of time. On their character, Aristotle's Politics may be read to the greatest advantage. Lieber, in his Civil Liberty, dwells at length on the fact that mere equality, without institutions of various kinds, is adverse to self-government; and history shows that absolute democracy is anything rather than a convertible term for liberty. See ABSOLUTISM; GOVERNMENT.

DEMONETIZE. To divest of the character of standard money; to withdraw from use as currency. Stand. Dict.

DEMONSTRATIO (Lat.). Description; addition; denomination. Occurring often in the phrase falsa demonstratio non nocet (a false description does not harm). 2 Bla. Com. 382, n.; 2 P. Wms. 140; 1 Greenl. Ev. § 291; Wigr. Wills 208, 233.

DEMONSTRATION (Lat. demonstrare, to point out). Whatever is said or written to designate a thing or person.

Several descriptions may be employed to denote the same person or object; and the rule of law in such cases is that if one of the descriptions be erroneous it may be rejected, if, after it is expunged, enough will remain to identify the person or thing intended. For falsa demonstratio non nocet. The meaning of this rule is, that if there be an adequate description with convenient certainty of what was contemplated, a subsequent erroneous addition will not vitiate it. The complement of this maxim is, non accipi debent verba in demonstrationem falsam quæ competent in limitationem veram; which means that if it stand doubtful upon the words whether they import a false reference or demonstration, or whether they be words of restraint that limit the generality of the former words, the law will never intend error or falsehood. If, therefore, there is some object wherein all the demonstrations are true, and some wherein part are true and part false, they shall be intended words of true limitation to ascertain that person or thing wherein all the circumstances are true; 4 Exch. 604; 8 Bingham, 244; Broom, Leg. Max. 490; 7 Cushman, 460.

The rule that falsa demonstratio does not vitiate an otherwise good description applies to every kind of statement of fact. Some of the particulars of an averment in a declaration may be rejected if the declaration is sensible without them and by their presence is made insensible or defective; Yelv. 182.

In Evidence. That proof which excludes all possibility of error.

DEMONSTRATIVE LEGACY. A pecuniary legacy coupled with a direction that it be paid out of a specific fund.

A bequest of a sum of money payable out of a particular fund or thing. A pecuniary legacy given generally, but with a demonstration of a particular fund as the source of its payment. 118 Ind. 147; 17 Ohio St. 413. See 47 Ala. 547; 56 Md. 120.

Such a bequest differs from a specific legacy in this, that if the fund out of which it is payable fails for any cause, it is nevertheless entitled "to come on the estate as a general legacy; and it differs from a general legacy in this, that it does not abate in that class, but in the class of specific legacies." 63 Pa. 312, per Sharswood, J. A bequest of "\$2,000 of the South Ward Loan of Chester," where the testator owned \$10,000 of the loan, was held demonstrative; 58 Fed. Rep. 718. So, also, "25 shares of capital stock of the State Bank," etc., the testator owning 25 shares; 1 Ired. Eq. 309; had the testator said "my" 25 shares, it would have been a specific legacy; id. So of a gift of 25 $\frac{1}{4}$ canal shares of which the testator owned 15 $\frac{1}{4}$, all of which he sold before his death; 2 Beav. 515. The criterion in all the cases is whether it was the testator's intention to give the specific security then owned by him, or, on the other hand, to give nothing distinctly severed from his estate, but rather such a sum as would suffice to buy the securities named; id. See 2 White & T. Lead. Cas. 646; 3 Am. Dec. 667; 2 Y. & C. 90; 28 N. Y. 61; 49 Md. 356.

DEMPSTER. In Scotch Law. A doomsman. One who pronounced the sentence of court. 1 Howell, St. Tr. 937.

DEMURRAGE. The delay of a vessel by the freighter beyond the time allowed for loading, unloading, or sailing.

Payment for such delay.

The amount due by the freighter or charterer to the owner of the vessel for such delay. 5 E. & B. 755; Abb. Adm. Dec. 548; 19 Fed. Rep. 144.

Demurrage may become due either by the ship's detention for the purpose of loading or unloading the cargo, either before or during or after the voyage, or in waiting for convoy; 3 Kent 159; Abbott, Shipp. 192; Pars. Mar. Law; 26 N. Y. 85; 134 id. 143; 1 Holmes 290; 49 Fed. Rep. 107; 65 Hun 625; 1 C. C. A. 85; Porter, Bills of L. 356.

Where neither the charter nor the bill of lading contained any provisions as to demurrage, and the master made no formal protest against the delay, but signed the bill of lading without objection and did not bring suit until long after, demurrage could not be recovered; 1 C. C. A. 237.

Under the terms of a charter where demurrage was to be paid for each working day beyond the days allowed for loading, the time lost by reason of storms before the beginning of the lay days, or after their expiration, could not be deducted in computing the demurrage; 2 C. C. A. 656.

The term "working days" in maritime affairs means calendar days, on which the law permits work to be done, and excludes Sundays and legal holidays, but not stormy days; 2 C. C. A. 650. But see 142 N. Y. 279, where it was held that Sundays are properly included in computing demurrage, when demurrage has begun to run. Where there are no agreed demurrage days for loading the case is one of implied contract to load with reasonable diligence; 74 Fed. Rep. 247. See LAY DAYS.

DEMURRER (Lat. demorari, Old Fr. demorren, to stay; to abide). In Pleading. An allegation, that, admitting the facts of the preceding pleading to be true, as stated by the party making it, he has yet shown no cause why the party demurring should be compelled by the court to proceed further. A declaration that the party demurring will go no further, because the other has shown nothing against him; 5 Mod. 232; Co. Litt. 71 b. It imports that the objecting party will not proceed, but will wait the judgment of the court whether he is bound so to do; Co. Litt. 71 b; Steph. Pl. 61; Pep. Pl. 11.

In Equity. An allegation of a defendant, which, admitting the matters of fact alleged by the bill to be true, shows that as they are therein set forth they are insufficient for the plaintiff to proceed upon or to oblige the defendant to answer; or that, for some reason apparent on the face of the bill, or on account of the omission of some matter which ought to be contained therein, or for want of some circumstances which ought to be attendant thereon, the defendant ought not to be compelled to answer to the whole bill, or to some certain part thereof. Mitf. Eq. Pl. 107.

On demurrer a bill must be taken as true, and matter in avoidance is not available; 57 Fed. Rep. 433.

A demurrer may be either to the relief asked by the bill, or to both the relief and the discovery; 5 Johns. Ch. 184; 10 Paige, Ch. 210; but not to the discovery alone where it is merely incidental to the relief; 2 Bro. Ch. 123; 1 Y. & C. 197; 1 S. & S. 83. It is said by Langdell (Eq. Pl. 60) that every proper demurrer is to relief alone; and that while it always, if well taken, profects the defendant from giving any discovery, that is a legal consequence merely. As to exceptions to avoid self-crimination, see 3 Johns. Ch. 407; 1 Hayw. 167; 2 H. & G. 392; 6 Day 361. If it goes to the whole of the relief, it generally defeats the discovery if successful; 2 Bro. Ch. 319; 3 Edw. Ch. 117; Saxt. 358; Walk. Ch. 35; 5 Metc. 525; otherwise, if to part only; Ad. Eq. 334; Story, Eq. Pl. § 545; 10 Paige, Ch. 210.

It may be brought either to original or supplemental bills; and there are peculiar causes of demurrer in the different classes of supplemental bills; 2 Madd. 387; 4 Sim. 76; 3 Hare 476; 3 P. Wms. 284; 4 Paige, Ch. 259; 7 Johns. Ch. 250; 13 Pet. 6, 14; Story, Eq. Pl. § 611.

Demurrers are general, where no particular cause is assigned except the usual formulary that there is no equity in the bill, or special, where the particular defects are pointed out; Story, Eq. Pl. § 455; Dan. Ch. Pr. 586. General demurrers are used to point out defects of substance; special, to point out defects in form. "The terms have a different meaning [in equity] from what they have at common law;" Langd. Eq. Pl. 58.

The defendant may demur to part of the bill; 2 Barb. Ch. 106; and plead or answer to the residue, or both plead and answer to separate parts thereof; 3 P. Wms. 80; 6 Johns. Ch. 214; 4 Wis. 54; taking care so to apply them to different and distinct parts of the bill that each may be consistent with the others; 3 M. & C. 653; 1 Keen 389; 23 Miss. 304; Story, Eq. Pl. § 442; but if it be to the whole bill, and a part be good, the demurrer must be overruled; 27 Miss. 419; 5 Ired. Eq. 86; 29 Me. 273; 12 Metc. 323; 36 W. Va. 582. If it is to the whole bill it cannot be sustained if, for any equity apparent in the bill, complainants are entitled to relief; 101 Ala. 607, 752; 43 Fed. Rep. 450. A general demurrer to a bill must be overruled unless it appears that on no possible state of the evidence could a decree be made; 55 Fed. Rep. 892; 62 Mich. 480.

Demurrers lie only for matter apparent on the face of the bill, and not upon any new matter alleged by the defendant; Beames, Ord. in Ch. 26; 6 Sim. 51; 2 Sch. & L. 637; 5 Fla. 110; 3 Halst. Ch. 440; 54 Fed. Rep. 63. Demurrers are not applicable to pleas or answers. If a plea or answer is bad in substance, it may be shown on hearing; and if the answer is insufficient in form, exceptions should be filed; Story, Eq. Pl. §§ 456, 864; Langd. Eq. Pl. 58; 54 Miss. 341; 14 N. J. Eq. 254.

Demurrers to relief are usually brought for causes relating to the jurisdiction, as that the subject is not cognizable by any court, as in some cases under political treaties; 1 Ves. 371; 2 Pet. 253; but see 5 Pet. 1; 8 id. 436; 1 Wheat. 304; 2 id. 259; 10 id. 181; 1 Wash. C. C. 322; certain cases of confiscation; 3 Ves. 424; 10 id. 354; see 3 Dall. 199; and questions of boundaries; Story, Eq. Pl. 347; 1 Ves. 446; as to law in the United States, see 6 Cra. 158; 4 Dall. 3;

5 Pet. 284; 14 id. 210; or that it is not cognizable by a court of equity; 1 S. & S. 227; 6 Beav. 165; 30 N. H. 446; 19 Me. 124; 7 Cra. 68; 16 Ga. 541; 16 Mo. 543; 8 Ired. Eq. 123; 21 Miss. 93; L. R. 8 Ch. App. 369; or that some other court of equity has jurisdiction properly; 4 Wheat. 1; 6 Cra. 158; 7 Ga. 243; 2 Paige, Ch. 402; 1 Ves. 203; or that some other court has jurisdiction properly; 3 Dall. 382; 8 Pet. 148; 30 N. H. 444; 2 How. 497; to the person, as that the plaintiff is not entitled to sue, by reason of personal disability, as infancy, idiocy, etc.; Jac. 377; bankruptcy and assignment; 8 Sim. 28, 76; 1 Y. & C. 172; or has no title to sue in the character in which he sues; 2 P. Wms. 369; 4 Johns. Ch. 575; to the substance of the bill, as that the matter is too trivial; 4 Johns. Ch. 183; 3 Ohio St. 457; 1 Vern. 359; that the plaintiff has no interest in the matter; Mitf. Eq. Pl. 154; 2 Bro. Ch. 322; 2 S. & S. 592; 4 Russ. 225, 244; 1 Johns. Ch. 305; 30 Me. 419; 29 W. Va. 256; 87 Va. 249; or that the defendant has no such interest; Story, Eq. Pl. § 519; 2 Bro. Ch. 332; 5 Madd. 19; 3 Barb. 483; 10 Wheat. 384; or that the bill is to enforce a penalty; 1 Young 308; 4 Bro. Ch. 434; to the frame and form of the bill, as that there is a defect or want of form; Mitf. Eq. Pl. 206; 5 Russ. 42; 11 Mo. 42; or that the bill is multifarious; Story, Eq. Pl. § 530, n.; 2 S. & S. 79; 4 Harring. 9; 2 Gray 471; 3 How. 412; 4 Edw. 592; that there is a want or misjoinder of plaintiffs; 1 P. Wms. 428; 4 Russ. 272; 2 Paige, Ch. 281; 4 id. 510; 3 Cra. 220; 8 Wheat. 451; 5 Fla. 110; 5 Duer 168; 2 Gray 467; 1 Jones, N. C. 40; 4 Fla. 11; for a misjoinder of parties defendant where those only can demur who are improperly joined; 98 Mich. 657; or where laches affirmatively appear on the face of a bill; 54 Fed. Rep. 63; but laches as an equitable defence cannot be raised on demurrer; 65 Vt. 611.

Demurrers to discovery may be brought for most of the above causes; 9 Sim. 180; 12 Beav. 423; 2 Stor. 59; 1 Johns. Ch. 547; and, generally, that the plaintiff has no right to demand the discovery asked for, either in whole or in part; 8 Ves. 398; 2 Russ. 564; or to ask it of the defendant; Story, Eq. Pl. § 570. "A demurrer to discovery is not, in its nature, a pleading at all, but a mere statement in writing that the defendant refuses to answer certain allegations or charges in the bill, for reasons which appear upon the face of the bill, and which the demurrer points out." Langd. Eq. Pl. 61. See Beach, Mod. Eq. Pr. 239; DISCOVERY.

The effect of a demurrer when allowed is to put an end to the suit, unless it is confined to a part of the bill or the court gives the plaintiff leave to amend; 13 Ill. 31; it is within the discretion of the court whether the defendant will be ruled to answer after overruling a demurrer; and it may enter a decree against him at once, or hear evidence, or refer to a master to take evidence before entering a decree; 41 Ill. App.

439; 145 Ill. 433. If overruled, the defendant must make a fresh defence by answer; 12 Mo. 132; unless he obtain permission to put in a plea: Ad. Eq. 336. It admits the facts which are well pleaded; 20 How. 108; and the jurisdiction: 28 Vt. 470; 4 R. I. 285; 1 Stockt. 434; 4 Md. 72. But the demurrer admits the facts in the bill only for the purpose of argument on the demurrer: if the demurrer is overruled the plaintiff must proceed to prove his bill; Langd. Eq. Pl. 60. The court will sometimes disallow the demurrer without deciding that the bill is good, reserving that question till the hearing; ibid.

Under rule 31 of the Rules of Practice for courts of equity of the United States as laid down by the supreme court, no demurrer shall be allowed to be filed unless upon a certificate of counsel that in his opinion it is well founded in point of law, and supported by the affidavit of the defendant, that it is not interposed for delay. The supreme court has held that a demurrer lacking these is fatally defective and a decree pro confesso may be entered unless something takes place between the filing of the demurrer and the decree, to take away the right; 149 U. S. 574.

At Law. A general demurrer is one which excepts to the sufficiency of a previous pleading in general terms, without showing specifically the nature of the objection; and such demurrer is sufficient when the objection is on matter of substance; Steph. Pl. 159; Co. Litt. 72 a; 1 Dutch. 506; 11 Ark. 12; 2 Ia. 532; 2 Barb. 160; 82 Tex. 146. A court, after overruling a general demurrer to a complaint on the ground that it does not state a cause of action, may in its discretion enter final judgment on the demurrer; and this judgment will be a bar to any other suit for the same cause of action; 111 U. S. 472.

A special demurrer is one which excepts to the sufficiency of the pleadings on the opposite side, and shows specifically the nature of the objection and the particular ground of exception; Co. Litt. 72 a. An objection to a complaint, on the ground of ambiguity or uncertainty, can be taken only by special demurrer; 96 Cal. 602; as must be a demurrer to a plea on the ground of duplicity; 64 Vt. 212; but see 99 Ala. 541.

It is necessary where the objection is to the form, by the statutes 27 Eliz. c. 5 and 4 Anne, c. 16; 18 Ark. 347; 6 Md. 210; 20 Ohio 100. Under a special demurrer the party may, on the argument, not only take advantage of the particular faults which his demurrer specifies, but also of all objections in substance.

It is not enough that a special demurrer object in general terms, that the pleading is "uncertain, defective, and informal," or the like, but it is necessary to show in what respect it is uncertain, defective, and informal; 1 Wms. Saund. 161, n. 1, 337 b, n. 3; Steph. Pl. 159, 161; 1 Chit. Pl. 642.

A demurrer may be for insufficiency either in substance or in form; that is, it may be either on the ground that the case shown by the opposite party is essentially insufficient, or on the ground that it is stated in an inartificial manner; Hob. 164; 48 Fed. Rep. 241. But such a demurrer does not raise the question of the jurisdiction of the court; 48 Ohio St. 554. It lies to any of the pleadings, except that there may not be a demurrer to a demurrer; Salk. 219; Bacon, Abr. Pleas (N 2). But it will not lie to a supplemental complaint; 131 Ind. 373; while it will to a supplemental answer; 134 Ind. 614. Demurrer may be to the whole or a part of the pleading; but if to the whole, and a part be good, the demurrer will be overruled; 13 East 76; 3 Caines 89, 265; 5 Johns. 476; 13 id. 264, 402; 11 Cush. 348; 23 Miss. 548; 2 Curt. C. C. 97; 2 Paine 545; 14 Ill. 77; 2 Md. 284; 81 Wis. 301; 94 Ala. 226. But see 6 Fla. 262; 4 Cal. 327; 9 Ind. 241; 6 Gratt. 130; 8 B. Monr. 400. The objection must appear on the face of the pleadings; 2 Saund. 364; 29 Vt. 354; or upon over of some instrument defectively set forth therein; 2 Saund. 60, n.; 1 Misc. Rep. 364. A joint demurrer by two defendants to a declaration for want of a cause of action should be overruled if the declaration sets forth a cause of action as to either of them; 88 Ga. 308; 144 Ill. 213.

A demurrer does not reach vagueness and uncertainty in a complaint, but they must be remedied by a motion to make more specific and certain; 130 Ind. 131; 3 Ind. App. 312; 92 Ky. 72; 51 Fed. Rep. 669.

Where the want of jurisdiction in a federal court is apparent on the face of the petition, it may be taken advantage of by demurrer; 146 U. S. 202.

For the various and numerous causes of demurrer, reference must be had to the law of each state.

As to the effect of a demurrer. It admits all such matters of fact as are sufficiently pleaded; Com. Dig. Pleader (A 5); 4 Ia. 63; 14 Ga. 8; 9 Barb. 297; 7 Ark. 282; 6 Wash. 315; 7 Misc. Rep. 1. Its office was to test the sufficiency of the preceding pleading both as to form and substance, and it was resorted to by either party who believed that the pleading of the other party was insufficient either because the declaration did not show a good cause of action or the plea did not set up a legal defence; but it does not admit mere epithets charging fraud and allegations of legal conclusions; 144 U. S. 75; nor an erroneous averment of law; 97 Ala. 491. On demurrer the court consider the whole record, and give judgment according to the legal right for the party who on the whole seems the best entitled to it; 4 East 502; 8 Ark. 224; 2 Mich. 276; 7 How. 706; 28 Ala. n. s. 637; 31 N. H. 22; 39 Me. 426; 16 Ill. 269. For example, on a demurrer to the replication, if the court think the replication bad, but perceive substantial fault in the plea, they will give judgment, not for the defendant, but for the plaintiff; 2 Wils. 150; 7 How. 706; provided the declaration be good; but if the declaration also be bad in substance, then, upon the same principle, judgment would be given for the defendant; 5 Co.

29 a. The court will not look back into the record to adjudge in favor of an apparent right in the plaintiff, unless the plaintiff have himself put his action upon that ground; 5 B. & Ald. 507. If, however, the plaintiff demur to a plea in abatement, and the court decide against the plea, they will give judgment of respondeat ouster, without regard to any defect in the declaration; Carth. 172; 4 R. I. 110; 13 Ark. 335; 14 Ill. 49. A party waives his demurrer by not calling for action thereon; 83 Tex. 97.

In Practice. Demurrer to evidence is a declaration that the party making it, generally the plaintiff, will not proceed, because the evidence offered on the other side is not sufficient to maintain the issue; 28 Ala. N. S. 637. Upon joinder by the opposite party, the jury is generally discharged from giving any verdict; 1 Archb. Pr. 186; and the demurrer being entered on record is afterwards argued and decided by the court in banc; and the judgment there given upon it may ultimately be brought before a court of error; Andr. Steph. Pl. 180. See 2 H. Bla. 187; Gould, Pl. c. 9, part 2, § 47. It admits the truth of the evidence given and the legal deductions therefrom; 14 Pa. 275; 111 N. C. 175. As to the right so to demur, and the practice, see 4 Ia. 63. All facts proved and legitimate inferences therefrom must be admitted; 35 S. W. Rep. (Tenn.) 560; and if the evidence is prima facie insufficient the demurrer is sustained; 33 S. W. Rep. (Mo.) 161; otherwise if there is some evidence on each material point; 2 Kan. App. 711; 45 Pac. Rep. (Kan.) 100. In criminal trials it is entirely discretionary with the court whether it will entertain a demurrer to the evidence, even though counsel for the prisoner and state should both consent to it; 29 Fla. 439.

A demurrer to the evidence in an equity case has the same effect as in a law case, and concedes every fact which such evidence tends to prove, and every inference fairly deducible from the facts proved; 113 Mo. 340. There is an increasing tendency towards the adoption of the demurrer to evidence in practice and in many states it takes the place of a motion for a non-suit. For a full discussion of the subject see 32 L. R. A. 354, where the authorities are collected.

Demurrer to interrogatories is the reason which a witness tenders for not answering a particular question in interrogatories; 2 Swanst. 194. It is not, strictly speaking, a demurrer, except in the popular sense of the word; Gresl. Eq. Ev. 61. The court are judicially to determine its validity. The witness must state his objection very carefully; for these demurrers are held to strict rules, and are readily overruled if they cover too much; 2 Atk. 524; 1 Y. & J. 132.

DEMURRER BOOK. In English Practice. A transcript of all the pleadings that have been filed or delivered between the parties made upon the formation of an issue at law. 3 Steph. Com. 511; Lush, Pr. 787.

DEMURRER TO EVIDENCE. See DEMURRER.

DEMY SANKE, DEMY SANGUE. Half-blood. A corruption of demi-sang.

DEN AND STROND. Liberty for ships and vessels to run aground or come ashore (strand themselves). Cowel.

DENARII. An ancient general term for any sort of pecunia numerata, or ready money. The French use the word denier in the same sense: payer de ses propres deniers.

DENARIUS DEI. God's penny; earnest money. A certain sum of money which is given by one of the contracting parties to the other as a sign of the completion of the contract. See EARNEST.

It differs from arrhæ in this, that the latter is a part of the consideration, while the denarius Dei is no part of it. 1 Duvergny, n. 132; 3 id. n. 49; Répert. de Jur., Denier à Dieu.

DENIAL. In Pleading. A traverse of the statement of the opposite party; a defence.

DENIER A DIEU. In French Law. A sum of money which the hirer of a thing gives to the other party as evidence, or for the consideration of the contract, which either party may annul within twenty-four hours, the one who gave the denier à Dieu by demanding, and the other by returning it. See DENARIUS DEI.

DENIZATION. The act by which a foreigner becomes a subject of a country, but without the rights either of a natural-born subject or of one who has become naturalized. It has existed from an early period, and is effected only by letters patent from the sovereign. Denization has no retrospective operation; a denizen is in an intermediate position between an alien and a natural-born subject, and partakes of both these characters. He may ordinarily take lands by purchase, but not by inheritance; and his issue born before denization cannot inherit from him, but his issue born after it may; Cockburn, Nationality 27; Morse, Citizenship 106. See 20 Wend. 352.

DENIZEN. In English Law. An alien born who has obtained, ex donatione legis, letters patent to make him an English subject.

He is intermediate between a natural-born subject and an alien. He may take lands by purchase or devise,—which an alien cannot; but he is incapable of taking by inheritance. 1 Bla. Com. 374.

But now in England, by the Naturalization Act of 1870, an alien can take, hold, and dispose of every description of property, in all respects as a natural-born subject.

In South Carolina, and perhaps in other states, this civil condition is well known to the law, having been created by statute.

The right of making denizens is not exclusively vested in the king, for it is possessed by parliament, but is scarcely ever exercised but by royal power. It may be effected by conquest; 7 Co. 6 a; 2 Ventr. 6; Com. Dig. Alien (D 1); Chitty, Com. Law 120. See DENIZATION.

In the common law, the word denizen is sometimes applied to a natural-born subject. Co. Litt. 129 a; 6 Pet. 101, 116.

DENMARK. A kingdom of Europe. It is a hereditary monarchy, and has a responsible ministry. The legislature, in conjunction with the sovereign, is called the Rigsdag or Diet, and it consists of the Lands-thing or upper house and the Folkething. The Lands-thing consists of 66 members, part life nominees of the crown and part elected for eight years. The Folkething consists of 102 members elected for three years. The Rigsdag must meet annually for two months. For the administration of justice the high courts are the supreme tribunals of the kingdom with a president and 12 ordinary and 7 extraordinary members. There is a superior tribunal for the isles and Copenhagen consisting of a president and 16 members, and a tribunal for Jutland at Viborg consisting of a president and 8 members, and a tribunal of commerce and navigation consisting of a president and 35 members.

DENOUNCEMENT. In Mexican Law. A judicial proceeding for the forfeiture of land held by an alien.

Though real property might be acquired by an alien in fraud of the law, that is without observing its requirements, he nevertheless retained his right and title to it, liable to be deprived of it by the proper proceedings of denouncement, which in its substantive characteristics was equivalent to the inquest of office found, at common law. 26 Cal. 477; 1 id. 63; 3 Wheat. 563.

DENUNCIATION. In Civil Law. The act by which an individual informs a public officer, whose duty it is to prosecute offenders, that a crime has been committed. See 1 Bro. Civ. Law 447; Ayliffe, Parerg. 210; Pothier, Proc. Cr. sect. 2, § 2.

DENUNTIATIO. In Old English Law. A public notice or summons. Bracton 202 b.

DEODAND. Any personal chattel whatever, animate or inanimate, which is the immediate cause of the death of a human creature. It was forfeited to the king to be distributed in alms by his high almoner "for the appeasing," says Coke, "of God's wrath." The word comes from Deo dandum, a thing that must be offered to God.

A Latin phrase which is attributed to Bracton has, by mistranslation, given rise to some erroneous statements in some of the authors as to what are deodands. Omnia quæ ad mortem movent, although it evidently means all things which tend to produce death, has been rendered move to death,—thus giving rise to the theory that things in motion only are to be forfeited. A difference, however, according to Blackstone, existed as to how much was to be sacrificed. Thus, if a man should fall from a cartwheel, the cart being stationary, and be killed, the wheel only would be deodand: while, if he was run over by the same wheel in motion, not only the wheel but the cart and the load became deodand. And this, even though it belonged to the dead man. Horses, oxen, carts, boats, mill-wheels, and cauldrons were the commonest deodands. The common name for it was the "bana," the slayer. In the thirteenth century the common practice was that the thing itself was delivered to the men of the township where the death occurred, and they had to account to the king's officers. In very early records the justices in eyre named the charitable purpose, to which the money was to be applied; 2 Poll. & Maitl. 471. In 1840, a railway company in England was amerced £2,000, as a deodand. Deodands were not abolished till 1846; Statute 9 & 10 Vict. c. 62. See 1 Bla. Com. 301; 2 Steph. Com. 651. Originally deodands went to the Crown, to be applied to charitable uses; they were often granted to lords of manors. The value was fixed, generally very low, by the coroner's jury. The Law's Lumber Room 60.

No deodand accrues in the case of a felonious killing; 1 Q. B. 818; 1 G. & D. 211, 481; 9 Dow. 1048.

DEPARTMENT. A portion of a country.

In France, the country is divided into departments, which are somewhat similar to the counties in this country. The United States have been divided into military departments, including certain portions of the country. 1 Pet. 293.

A portion of the agents employed by the executive branch of the United States government, to whom a specified class of duties is assigned.

The department of state is intrusted with such matters relating to correspondences, commissions, and instructions to or with public ministers and consuls of the United States, or to negotiations with public ministers from foreign states or princes, or to memorials or other applications from foreign public ministers or other foreigners, or to such matters respecting foreign affairs as the president of the United States shall assign to said department. U. S. Rev. Stat. § 202. It has custody and charge of the seal of the United States, and of the seal of the department of state, and of all of the books, papers, records, etc., in and appertaining to the department, or any that may hereafter be acquired by it; id. § 203.

The principal officer is a secretary, appointed by the president; he shall conduct the business of the department in such manner as the president shall direct. An assistant secretary, and a second assistant secretary of state, each of whom are appointed by the president, a chief and various subordinate clerks, appointed by the secretary, are employed in the duties of the department; U. S. Rev. Stat. § 200. By the act of 1890, July 11; 26 Stat. L. 228; the appointment of a third assistant is authorized.

The department of the treasury has charge of the services relating to the finances. It is the duty of the secretary to digest and prepare plans for the improvement and management of the revenue, and for the support of public credit; to prepare and report estimates of the public revenue and the public expenditures; to superintend the collection of the revenue; to decide on the forms of keeping and stating accounts and making returns, and to grant, under limitations established by law, all warrants for moneys to be issued from the treasury in pursuance of appropriations by law; to execute such services relative to the sale of lands belonging to the United States as may by law be required of him; to make report and give information to either branch of the legislature, in person or in writing, respecting all matters referred to him by the senate or house of representatives, or which shall appertain to his office; and, generally, to perform all such services relative to the finances as he shall be directed to perform. The offices consist of a secretary, who is the head of the department, a comptroller, six auditors, a treasurer, a register, a commissioner of customs, a commissioner of internal revenue, a comptroller of the currency, a solicitor, three assistant secretaries, a director of the mint, and numerous subordinate clerks. There are also assistant treasurers, appointed by the president, to reside in several of the more important cities of the United States. There is also a lighthouse board attached to this department. U. S. Rev. Stat. §§ 248, 4653; 28 Stat. L. 170.

The department of war is intrusted with duties relating to military commissions, the land forces, and warlike stores of the United States.

The chief officer is a secretary, appointed by the president. There are also an assistant secretary, a chief clerk and numerous subordinate clerks. U. S. Rev. Stat. § 214.

The department of justice is presided over by the attorney-general, who is assisted by the solicitor-general and four assistant attorneys-general, and by solicitors for certain departments.

The attorney-general is required to give his advice and opinion upon questions of law whenever required by the president or the head of any executive department, and on behalf of the United States to procure proper evidence for, and conduct, prosecute, or defend all suits in the supreme court or in the court of claims, in which the United States or any officer thereof, as such officer, is a party or may be interested. He exercises general superintendence and direction over the attorneys and marshals of all the districts in the United States and territories, and has power to employ and retain such attorneys and counsellors-at-law as he may think necessary to assist the district attorneys in the discharge of their duties. U. S. Rev. Stat. § 346.

The post office department has the general charge of matters relating to the postal service, the establishment of post-offices, appointment of postmasters, and the like.

The chief officer is the postmaster-general. There are also four assistant postmasters-general, a chief clerk, and various superintendents, chief of division and inferior clerks. U. S. Rev. Stat. §§ 394-396; 1 Supp. 927. The assistant postmasters-general are appointed by the president, with the consent of the senate.

The department of the navy is intrusted with the execution of such orders as may be received from the president relative to the procurement of naval stores and materials and the construction, armament, and equipment of vessels of war, as well as all other matters connected with the naval establishment of the United States. U. S. Rev. Stat. §§ 417, 3660-7.

The chief officers are a secretary and assistant secretary, appointed by the president: the secretary is to appoint such clerks as may be necessary, of the classes specified by the statutes. U. S. Rev. Stat. §§ 169, 416.

There are in the navy department eight bureaus, each with a chief and a number of clerks, viz.: a bureau of yards and docks; a bureau of equipment and recruiting; a bureau of navigation; a bureau of ordnance; a bureau of construction and repair; a bureau of steam engineering; a bureau of provisions and clothing; a bureau of medicine and surgery. U. S. Rev. Stat. § 419.

The department of the interior has general supervisory and appellate powers over the office of the commissioner of patents; in relation to the land office; over the commissioner of Indian affairs; over the commissioner of pensions; over the census, education, and publications; over the mines of the United States; over the commissioner of public buildings; over the government hospitals and asylums.

The chief officers are a secretary and an assistant secretary, appointed by the president, etc., and a chief and other clerks, appointed by the secretary, including a chief and other clerks in each of the bureaus among whom the duties of the department are divided. U. S. Rev. Stat. §§ 437 et seq.

The department of agriculture is presided over by a secretary of agriculture, appointed by the president, by and with the advice and consent of the senate. He has one assistant. The design and duties of this department are to acquire and diffuse among the people of the United States useful information on subjects connected with agriculture, and to procure, propagate, and distribute among the people new and valuable seeds and plants. Act 1889, Feb. 9; 25 Stat. L. 659.

DEPARTURE. In Maritime Law. A deviation from the course prescribed in the policy of insurance. It may be justifiable; 7 Cra. 100; 1 Paine 247. See 51 Pa. 143; DEVIATION.

In Pleading. The statement of matter in a replication, rejoinder, or subsequent pleading, as a cause of action or defence, which is not pursuant to the previous pleading of the same party, and which does not support and fortify it; 2 Wms. Saund. 84 a, n. 1; 2 Wils. 98; Co. Litt. 304 a. It is not allowable, as it prevents reaching an issue; 49 Ind. 111; 13 N. Y. 83, 89; 2 Wms. Saund. a, n. 1; Steph. Pl. 410; 1 M. & S. 395. It is to be taken advantage of by demurrer, general; 5 D. & R. 295; 14 Johns. 132; McKel. Pl. 57; 2 Caines 320; 16 Mass. 1; or special; 2 Saund. 84; Com. Dig. Pleader (F 10); 77 Md. 64.

A departure is cured by a verdict in favor of him who makes it, if the matter pleaded by way of departure is a sufficient answer in substance to what has been before pleaded by the opposite party; that is, if it would have been sufficient if pleaded in the first instance; 2 Saund. 84; 1 Lilly, Abr. 444.

DEPARTURE IN DESPITE OF COURT. This took place where the tenant, having once made his appearance in court upon demand, failed to reappear when demanded; Co. Litt. 139 a. As the whole term is, in contemplation of law, but a single day, an appearance on any day, and a subsequent failure to reappear at any subsequent part of the term, is such a departure; 8 Co. 62 a; 1 Rolle, Abr. 583; Metc. Yelv. 211.

DEPENDENCY. A territory distinct from the country in which the supreme sovereign power resides, but belonging rightfully to it, and subject to the laws and regulations which the sovereign may think proper to prescribe.

It differs from a colony, because it is not settled by the citizens of the sovereign or mother state; and from possession, because it is held by other title than that of mere conquest. For example, Malta was considered a dependency of Great Britain in the year 1813. 3 Wash. C. C. 286. See Act of Cong. Mch. 1, 1809, commonly called the non-importation law.

DEPENDENT PROMISE. One which it is not the duty of the promisor to perform until some obligation contained in the same agreement has been performed by the other party. Hamm. Partn. 17, 29, 30, 109; Harr. Cont. 152. See CONTRACT; COVENANT; INDEPENDENT PROMISE.

DEPONENT. One who gives information, on oath or affirmation, respecting some facts known to him, before a magistrate; he who makes a deposition. 47 Me. 248.

DEPORTATION. In Roman Law. A perpetual banishment, depriving the banished of his rights as a citizen: it differed from relegation (q. v.) and exile (q. v.). 1 Bro. Civ. Law 125, n.; Inst. 1. 12. 1; Dig. 48. 22. 14. 1.

In Modern Law. "The removal of an alien out of the country, simply because his presence is deemed inconsistent with the public welfare, and without any punishment being imposed or contemplated, either under the laws of the country out of which he is sent, or under those of the country to which he is taken." 149 U. S. 709. It differs from transportation (q. v.), which is by way of punishment of one convicted of an offence against the laws of the country; and from extradition (q. v.), which is the surrender to another country of one accused of an offence against its laws, there to be tried, and, if found guilty, punished; id.

The right of a nation to expel or deport foreigners who have not been naturalized or taken any steps towards becoming citizens of the country, rests upon the same grounds, and is as absolute and unqualified as the right to prohibit and prevent their entrance into the country; 149 U. S. 698; in the same opinion the supreme court says, by a divided court, that this right exists even though such persons be subjects of a friendly power and have acquired a domicile in this country. This case follows Vattel, Law of Nations § 230; Ortolan, Dipl. de la Mer 297; 1 Phill. Int. L. § 220; Bar. Int. Law (Gillespie's ed.) 708. In England, the only question has been whether the power of deportation could be exercised by the king without the consent of parliament. It was formerly exercised by the king, but in later times by parliament. See 2 Inst. 57; 1 Bla. Com. 260; 6 Law Quart. Rev. 27. A British colonial governor has exercised it; 1 Moore, P. C. 460. See App. Cas. (1891) 272.

Congress may exercise the power through the executive, or may call in the judiciary to ascertain contested facts; 149 U. S. 698.

DEPOSE. To deprive an individual of a public employment or office against his will. Wolfius, Inst. § 1063. The term is usually applied to the deprivation of all authority of a sovereign.

To give testimony under oath. See DEPOSITION.

DEPOSIT. A naked bailment of goods to be kept for the depositor without reward, and to be returned when he shall require it. Jones, Bailm. 36, 117; 9 Mass. 470; 40 Vt. 380.

A bailment of goods to be kept by the bailee without reward, and delivered according to the object or purpose of the original trust. Story, Bailm. § 41; 42 Miss. 544.

A contract by which one of the contracting parties gives a thing to another to keep, who is to do so gratuitously and obliges himself to return it when he shall be requested. See 3 L. R. P. C. C. 101.

An irregular deposit arises where one deposits money with another for safekeeping, in cases where the latter is to return, not the specific money deposited, but an equal sum.

A quasi deposit arises where one comes lawfully into possession of the goods of another by finding.

A depositary is bound to take only ordinary care of the deposit, which will of course vary with the character of the goods to be kept, and other circumstances; Edw. Bailm. 43. See 14 S. & R. 375; 17 Mass. 479; 3 Mas. 132; 2 Ad. & E. 526; 1 B. & Ald. 59. While gross negligence on the part of a gratuitous bailee is not fraud, it is in effect the same thing; 100 U. S. 699. He has, in general, no right to use the thing deposited; Bac. Abr. Bailment, D; unless in cases where permission has been given or may from the nature of the case be implied; Story, Bailm. § 90; Jones, Bailm. 80, 81. He is bound to return the deposit in individuo, and in the same state in which he received it: if it is lost, or injured, or spoiled, by his fraud or gross negligence, he is responsible to the extent of the loss or injury; Jones, Bailm. 36, 46, 120; 17 Mass. 479; 2 Hawks 145; 1 Dane, Abr. c. 17, art. 1 and 2; 87 Mich. 209. He is also bound to restore, not only the thing deposited, but any increase or profits which may have accrued from it; if an animal deposited bear young, the latter are to be delivered to the owner; Story, Bailm. § 99.

In the case of irregular deposits, as those with a banker, the relation of the banker to his customer is that of debtor and creditor, and does not partake at all of a fiduciary character. It ceases altogether to be the money of the depositor, and becomes the money of the banker. It is his to do what he pleases with it, and there is no trust created; Edw. Bailm. 41, 45; 17 Wend. 94; 1 Mer. 568; 33 N. E. Rep. (Ohio) 1054; 138 Ill. 596; 33 Fla. 429; 104 U. S. 64. See 37 N. J. E. 18. The legal remedy is a suit at law for debt: the balance cannot be reached by a bill in equity; 2 H. L. Cas. 39; except in some cases of insolvency, when a fund can be followed; 11 Phila. 511. See 1 C. C. App. 598. The banker is not liable for interest unless expressly contracted for; and the deposit is subject to the statute of limitations; 2 H. L. Cas. 39; 139 N. Y. 514.

Deposits in the civil law are divisible into two kinds—necessary and voluntary. A necessary deposit is such as arises from pressing necessity; as, for instance, in case of a fire, a shipwreck, or other overwhelming calamity; and thence it is called miserabile depositum. La. Civ. Code 2935. A voluntary deposit is such as arises without any such calamity, from the mere consent or agreement of the parties. Dig. 16. 3. 2.

This distinction was material in the civil law in respect to the remedy, for in voluntary deposits the action was only in simplex, in the other in duplum, or twofold, whenever the depositary was guilty of any default. The common law has made no such distinction. Jones, Bailm. 48.

Deposits are again divided by the civil law into simple deposits and sequestrations: the former is when there is but one party depositor (of whatever number composed), having a common interest; the latter is where there are two or more depositors, having each a different and adverse interest. These distinctions do not seem to have become incorporated into the common law. See Story, Bailm. § 41. See BAILMENT.

Where goods, for the recovery of which an action has been brought, are converted into money, which is, by consent of all parties, placed in the hands of an officer of the court, it is at the risk of one party as much as the other; 6 Wash. 603.

Deposit is sometimes used as equivalent to or in the sense of earnest (q. v.), when made by way of a forfeiture to bind a bargain. In such case it is forfeited on a breach "even if as a deposit and in part payment of the purchase money," and it cannot be recovered back unless circumstances make it inequitable to retain it; 53 L. J. Ch. 1061; 27 Ch. D. 89. See BAILMENT.

DEPOSITARY. A person entrusted with anything by another for safekeeping; a trustee; fiduciary; one to whom goods are bailed to be held without recompense. Stand. Dict.

DEPOSITION. The testimony of a witness reduced to writing, in due form of law, by virtue of a commission or other authority of a competent tribunal, or according to the provisions of some statute law, to be used on the trial of some question of fact in a court of justice. 3 Blatchf. 456; 23 N. J. L. 49.

Depositions were not formerly admitted in common-law courts, and were afterwards admitted from necessity, where the oral testimony of a witness could not be obtained. But in courts of chancery this is generally the only testimony which is taken; Ad. Eq. 363. In some of the United States, however, both oral testimony and depositions are used, the same as in courts of common law.

In criminal cases, in the United States, depositions cannot be used without the consent of the defendant; 3 Greenl. Ev. § 11; 15 Miss. 475; 4 Ga. 335.

The constitution of the United States provides that in all criminal prosecutions "the accused shall enjoy the right to be confronted with the witnesses against him." Amend. art. 6. This principle is recognized in the constitutions or statutes of most of the states of the Union. 3 Greenl. Ev. § 11; Cooley, Const. Lim. 387.

In some of the states, provision is made for the taking of depositions by the accused. Conn. Comp. Stat. art. 6, § 162; 3 Greenl. Ev. § 11.

Provision has been made for taking depositions to be used in civil cases, by an act of congress and by statute in most of the states.

The Rev. Stat. §§ 863-876, directs that when, in any civil cause depending in any district in any court of the United States, the testimony of any person shall be necessary who shall live at a greater distance from the place of trial than one hundred miles, or is bound on a voyage to sea, or is about to go out of the United States, or out of such district, and to a greater distance from the place of trial than as aforesaid, before the time of trial, or is ancient, or very infirm, the deposition of such person may be taken, de bene esse, before any justice or judge of any of the courts of the United States, or any commissioner of a circuit court, or any clerk of a district or circuit court, or before any chancellor, justice, or judge of a supreme or superior court, mayor or chief magistrate of a city, or judge of a county court or court of common pleas of any of the United States, or any notary public, not being of counsel or attorney to either of the parties, or interested in the event of the cause; provided that a notification in writing from the party or his attorney, to the adverse party, to be present at the taking of the same, and to put interrogatories, if he think fit, be first made out and served on the adverse party, or his attorney, as either may be nearest. And in all cases in rem, the person having the agency or possession of the property at the time of the seizure shall be deemed the adverse party until a claim shall have been put in; and whenever, by reason of the absence from the district, and want of an attorney of record, or other reason, the giving of the notice herein required shall be impracticable, it shall be lawful to take such depositions as there shall be urgent necessity for taking, upon such notice, as any judge authorized to hold courts in such circuit or district shall think reasonable and direct. Any person may be compelled to appear and depose, as provided by this section, in the same manner as witnesses may be compelled to appear and testify in court. And every person deposing as aforesaid shall be carefully examined and cautioned, and sworn or affirmed to testify to the whole truth, and shall subscribe the testimony by him or her given, after the same shall be reduced to writing, which shall be done only by the magistrate taking the deposition, or by the deponent in his presence. And the depositions so taken shall be retained by such magistrate until he deliver the same with his own hand into the court for which they are taken, or shall, together with a certificate of the reasons as aforesaid of their being taken, and of the notice, if any given, to the adverse party, be by him the said magistrate sealed up and directed to such court, and remain under his seal until opened in court. But unless it appears to the satisfaction of the court that the witness is then dead or gone out of the United States, or to a greater distance than one hundred miles from the place where the court is sitting, or that, by reason of age, sickness, bodily infirmity, or imprisonment, he is unable to travel and appear at court, such deposition shall not be used in the cause. Provided that nothing herein shall be construed to prevent any court of the United States from granting a dedimus potestatem, to take depositions according to common usage, when it may be necessary to prevent a failure or delay of justice,—which power they shall severally possess; nor to extend to depositions taken in perpetuum rei memoriam, which, if they relate to matters that may be cognizable in any court of the United States, a circuit court, on application thereto, made as a court of equity, may, according to the usages in chancery, direct to be taken.

In any cause before a court of the United States, it shall be lawful for such court, in its discretion to admit in evidence any deposition taken in perpetuum rei memoriam, which would be so admissible in a court of the state wherein such cause is pending, according to the laws thereof.

The act of January 24, 1827, authorizes the clerk of any court of the United States within which a witness resides, or where he is found, to issue a subpoena to compel the attendance of such witness; and a neglect of the witness to attend may be punished by the court whose clerk has issued the subpoena, as for a contempt. And when papers are wanted by the parties litigant, the judge of the court within which they are may issue a subpoena duces tecum, and enforce obedience by punishment as for a contempt. Rev. Stat. §§ 863-875; see 92 U. S. 1; Desty, Fed. Proc.

No witness shall be required, under the provisions of either of the two preceding sections, to attend at any place out of the county where he resides, nor more than forty miles from the place of his residence, to give his deposition, nor shall any witness be deemed guilty of contempt for disobeying any subpoena directed to him by virtue of either of the said sections, unless his fee for going to, returning from, and one day's attendance at the place of examination are paid or tendered to him at the time of the service of the subpoena. See Rev. Stat. § 870, etc.

Section 863 Rev. Stat. above quoted, relating to depositions de bene esse, applies to equity as well as to common-law causes; 36 Fed. Rep. 183. When a party is represented by counsel at the taking of a deposition and takes part in the examination, that must be regarded as a waiver of irregularities in taking it; 158 U. S. 271.

A clerical mistake in making out a commission which in no way misled the opposite party or affected his rights, is no valid ground for the suppression of the deposition; 149 U. S. 981.

The statutes of some states provide that courts may issue commissions to take depositions; others, that the parties may take them by giving notice of the time and place of taking the deposition to the opposite party. The privilege of taking them is generally limited to cases where the witness lives out of the state or at a distance from the court, or where he is sick, aged, about to leave the state, or where, from some other cause, it would be impossible or very inconvenient for him to attend in person. If the deposition is not taken according to the requirements of the statute authorizing it, it will, on objection being made by the opposite party, be rejected. See, generally, Weeks, Depositions.

In Ecclesiastical Law. The act of depriving a clergyman, by a competent tribunal, of his clerical orders, to punish him for some offence and to prevent his acting in future in his clerical character. Ayliffe, Parerg. 206.

DEPOSITO. In Spanish Law. A real contract by which one person confides to the custody of another an object on the condition that it shall be returned to him whenever he shall require it.

DEPOSITOR. He who makes a deposit.

DEPOSITUM. A species of bailment. See DEPOSIT.

DEPREDAATION. In French Law. The pillage which is made of the goods of a decedent.

DEPRIVATION. In Ecclesiastical Law. A censure by which a clergyman is deprived of his parsonage, vicarage, or other ecclesiastical promotion or dignity. See Ayliffe, Parerg. 206. 1 Bla. Com. 393. See DEGRADATION.

DEPRIVE. Referring to property taken under the power of eminent domain, it means the same as "take." 21 Pa. 167.

The constitution contains no definition of this word "deprive" as used in the Fourteenth Amendment. To determine its signification, therefore, it is necessary to ascertain the effect which usage has given it, when employed in the same or a like connection; 94 U. S. 123. See DUE PROCESS OF LAW; EMINENT DOMAIN; PRIVILEGES AND IMMUNITIES.

DEPUTY. One authorized by an officer to exercise the office or right which the officer possesses, for and in place of the latter.

In general, ministerial officers can appoint deputies, Comyns, Dig. Officer (D 1), unless the office is to be exercised by the ministerial officer in person; and when the office partakes of a judicial and ministerial character, although a deputy may be made for the performance of ministerial acts, one cannot be made for the performance of a judicial act; a sheriff cannot, therefore, make a deputy to hold an inquisition, under a writ of inquiry, though he may appoint a deputy to serve a writ. Sometimes, however, a general deputy or under-sheriff is appointed, who possesses, by virtue of his appointment, authority to execute all the ordinary duties of sheriff, and may even appoint, in the name of the sheriff, a special deputy; 12 N. J. L. 159; 2 Johns. C3.

In general, a deputy has power to do every act which his principal might do; but a deputy cannot make a deputy. See 9 Ia. 87; 9 Mo. 183; 20 Wall. 111.

A deputy should always act in the name of his principal. The principal is liable for the deputy's acts performed by him as such, and for the neglect of the deputy; 3 Dane, Abr. c. 76, a. 2; and the deputy is liable himself to the person injured for his own tortious acts; Dane, Abr. Index; Com. Dig. Officer (D), Viscount (B). See 7 Viner, Abr. 556; L. R. 3 Q. B. Div. 741; 8 Jones, L. 62.

DERAIGN. The literal meaning of the word seems to be, to disorder or displace, as deraignment out of religion; stat. 31, Hen. VIII. c. 6. But it is generally used in the common law for to prove, as, to deraign the warranty; Glanv., lib. 2, c. 6.

DERELICT. Abandoned; deserted; cast away.

Land left uncovered by the receding of water from its former bed. 2 Rolle, Abr. 170; 2 Bla. Com. 262; 1 Crabb, R. P. 109.

When so left by degrees, the derelict land belongs to the owner of the soil adjoining; but when the sea retires suddenly, it belongs to the government; 2 Bla. Com. 262; 1 Bro. Civ. Law 239; 1 Sumn. 328, 490; 1 Gall. 133; Bee 62, 178, 260; Ware 332.

Personal property abandoned or thrown away by the owner in such manner as to indicate that he intends to make no further claim thereto. 2 Bla. Com. 9; 2 Reeve, Hist. Eng. Law 9; 1 C. B. 112; Broom, Max. 261; 1 Ohio 81; 2 Schoul. Per. Prop. 8; 12 Ga. 473. Dereliction or renunciation properly requires both the intention to abandon and external action. Thus the casting overboard of articles in a tempest to lighten the ship is not dereliction, as there is no intention of abandoning the property in the case of salvage. Nor does the mere intention of abandonment constitute dereliction of property without a throwing away or removal, or some other external acts; 74 Me. 455.

It applies as well to property abandoned at sea as on land; 1 Mas. 373; 1 Sumn. 207, 336; 2 Kent 357. A vessel which is abandoned and deserted by her crew without any purpose on their part of returning to the ship, or any hope of saving or recovering it by their own exertions, is derelict; 2 Pars. Mar. Law 615; 20 E. L. & Eq. 607; 2 Cra. 240; Olc. 77; Newson, Salvage; 1 Newb. 329, 421; 3 Ware 65; 14 Wall. 336; Bee 260.

The title of the owner to property lying at the bottom of the sea is not divested, however long it may remain there; 38 Fed. Rep. 503; "because as goods lying at the bottom, they always await their owner;" id.; after another has taken them, the owner must follow them within a year and a day; id.; 5 Co. 105; 1 B. & Ad. 141, where the law is fully discussed; 3 Black Book, Adm. 439.

A vessel at least six miles from shore submerged from midship to bow, her running rigging overboard and snarled fast, her boat gone, her cabin, etc., full of water, a distress flag set, and deserted by her crew, who had left no sign of an intention to return and were not visible, is prima facie derelict, though she was anchored and her master was intending to return to save her and had telegraphed for a wrecking vessel; 37 Fed. Rep. 233.

However long goods thrown overboard may have been on the ocean, they do not become derelict by time, but will be restored on the payment of salvage, unless there was a voluntary intention to abandon them; Bee 82. See SALVAGE.

DERIVATIVE. Coming from another; taken from something preceding; secondary; as, derivative title, which is that acquired from another person.

There is considerable difference between an original and a derivative title. When the acquisition is original, the right thus acquired to the thing becomes property, which must be unqualified and unlimited, and, since no one but the occupant has any right to the thing, he must have the whole right of disposing of it. But with regard to derivative acquisition it may be otherwise; for the person from whom the thing is acquired may not have an unlimited right to it, or he may convey or transfer it with certain reservation of right. Derivative title must always be by contract.

Derivative conveyances are those which presuppose some precedent conveyance, and serve only to enlarge, confirm, alter, restrain, restore, or transfer the interest granted by such original conveyance. 3 Bla. Com. 324.

DEROGATION. The partial abrogation of a law. To derogate from a law is to enact something which impairs its utility and force; to abrogate a law is to abolish it entirely.

DESAFUERO. In Spanish Law. An irregular action committed with violence against law, custom, or reason.

DESCEND. To pass by succession; as when the estate vests by operation of law in the heirs immediately upon the death of the ancestor. 128 Mass. 40. See DESCENT AND DISTRIBUTION.

DESCENDANTS. Those who have issued from an individual, including his children, grandchildren, and their children to the remotest degree. Ambl. 327; 2 Bro. Ch. 30, 230; 1 Roper, Leg. 115.

The descendants from what is called the direct descending line. The term is opposed to that of ascendants.

There is a difference between the number of ascendants and descendants which a man may have; every one has the same order of ascendants, though they may not be exactly alike as to numbers, because some may be descended from a common ancestor. In the line of descendants they fork differently according to the number of children, and continue longer or shorter as generations continue or cease to exist. Many families become extinct, while others continue: the line of descendants is, therefore, diversified in each family.

DESCENT AND DISTRIBUTION. The division among those legally entitled thereto of the real and personal property of intestates, the term descent being applied to the former and distribution to the latter. Descent is the devolution of real property to the heir or heirs of one who dies intestate; the transmission by succession or inheritance.

Title by descent is the title by which one person, upon the death of another, acquires the real estate of the latter as his heir at law. 2 Bla. Com. 201; Com. Dig. Descent.

It was one of the principles of the feudal system that on the death of the tenant in fee the land should descend, and not ascend. Hence the title by inheritance is in all cases called descent, although by statute law the title is sometimes made to ascend.

The English doctrine of primogeniture, by which by the common law the eldest son and his issue take the whole real estate, has been universally abolished in this country. So, with few exceptions, has been the distinction between male and female heirs.

The rules of descent are applicable only to real estates of inheritance. Estates for the life of the deceased, of course, terminate on his death; estates for the life of another are governed by peculiar rules.

Distribution is the division by order of the court or legal representative having authority, among those entitled thereto, of the residue of the personal estate of an intestate, after payment of the debts and charges.

The term is sometimes used to denote the division of a residue of both real and personal estate, and also the division of an estate according to the terms of a will, but neither use is accurate, the term being technically applied only to personal estate.

The title to real estate vests in the heirs by the death of the owner; the legal title to personal estate, by such death, vests in the executor or administrator, and is transferred to the persons beneficially interested, by the distribution; 4 Conn. 347.

Terms of years, and other estates less than freehold, are regarded as personal estate, and, on the death of the owner, vest in his executor or administrator.

The rules of descent and distribution are prescribed by the statute laws of the several states; and, although they correspond in some respects, it is doubtful whether in any two they are precisely alike.

Property in real estate and its transmission by descent as by alienation or devise is governed by the lex rei sitæ (q. v.), but the law of the domicile of the decedent governs in the distribution of his personal estate, unless otherwise provided by statute. See Domicil; CONFLICT OF LAWS. In Alabama, Arkansas, California, Colorado, Connecticut, North Dakota, Florida, Georgia, Illinois, Indiana, Iowa, Kansas, Louisiana, Michigan, Minnesota, Mississippi, Missouri, Montana, Nebraska, Nevada, New Hampshire, New Mexico Ty., Ohio, Oklahoma Ty., Pennsylvania, South Carolina, South Dakota, Texas, Utah, Vermont, Washington, and Wyoming, the rules for the distribution of personal property are, by statute, essentially the same as those of the descent of real estate, where no distinction is made between real estate, ancestral and non-ancestral, and, where such distinction is made, of real estate non-ancestral; the rule is substantially the same, also, in Arizona Ty., Kentucky, Maine, and Wisconsin; Me. Rev. Stat. 1884, p. 73; Ky. Gen. Stat. (1873), p. 371; Wisc. Rev. Stat. (1878) § 3935; Am. Rev. Stat. § 1459.

The following is the order of descent of real estate and (except where otherwise stated) the distribution of personal property of persons dying intestate in the several states and territories of the United States. The statutes on this subject are constantly liable to change and amendment, and should consequently be consulted with reference to cases requiring the application of the local laws of a particular state. This summary, however, affords an opportunity for a general view of the subject and comparison of the systems which are generally found to differ, for the most part, rather in groups of states, than to be circumscribed merely by state lines.

ALABAMA. Subject to the payment of debts, charges, and dower: 1. Children and their descendants. 2. Brothers or sisters or their descendants. 3. Father, if living; if not, to the mother. 4. Next of kin of equal degree, equally. 5. Husband or wife. 6. Escheat to the State. Personal estate differs only from real in case of the wife of intestate; who takes all if there are no children; one-half if but one child; if more than one and not more than four, a child's part; if more than four, one-fifth. Of a wife's separate estate, the husband takes one-half of personality absolutely and the use of the realty for life unless he has been deprived of control over it by decree in chancery. Lineal descendants in equal degree represent their ancestors; that is, children of a deceased child, brother, or sister, inherit in equal parts the share which such deceased child, brother, or sister would have inherited if living; the grandchildren of such deceased child, brother, or sister taking in equal parts the share their parents would have inherited if living. No representation among collaterals except with the descendants of brothers and sisters of the intestate. 7. No distinction between whole and half blood, except that, in case the inheritance was ancestral, those not of the blood of the ancestor are excluded as against those of the same degree. Posthumous children of intestate inherit as if born in his lifetime, but there is no right of inheritance in any other person unless born at the time of his death. Illegitimate children inherit from the mother as if legitimate. Degrees of kindred are computed according to the civil law. Code, 1886, §§ 1915-1920; Acts, 1892-3, p. 1053.

ARIZONA. (a) Where there is no surviving husband or wife: 1. Children and their descendants. 2. Father and mother equally, but if only one survive, to him or her one-half and the other to brothers and sisters, or if none the whole. 3. Brothers and sisters and their descendants. 4. If none, the estate is divided into two portions one of which goes to the paternal and the other to the maternal grandfather and grandmother in equal portions, and if one of either be dead his or her portion to his or her descendants; should there be no descendants, the whole half portion to the survivor, and if no grandfather or grandmother the whole estate passes to their descendants, and so on to nearest lineal ancestor and descendants of such ancestor. (b) If there be a surviving husband or wife, he or she takes one-third of the personal property and one-third of the real estate for life with remainder to children or their descendants. If no child or children the survivor takes all the personal property and one-half the lands without remainder to any one; the other half goes to the next of kin in the order above enumerated; provided, that if neither father nor mother survive the husband or wife takes all. There is no distinction as to ancestral descent, all being held as if by purchase. Those of the half-blood take one-half as much as those of the same degree of the whole blood if there are both; but if all are of the half-blood they take equally. There is no corruption of blood or forfeiture by reason of casualty or suicide; and no right of inheritance to any person other than children or lineal descendants, unless in being and capable of taking at the death of the intestate. Rev. Stat. 1887, § 1459. There is no dower or curtesy.

ARKANSAS. 1. Children and their descendants equally, including posthumous children. 2. Father, then mother. 3. Brothers and sisters, and their descendants. 4. Posthumous children of the intestate inherit as if born in his lifetime, but other posthumous children not born at his death do not inherit from him. Illegitimate children are capable of inheriting and transmitting inheritance on the part of the mother as if legitimate, and if recognized by the father and he inter-marries with the mother they shall be legitimate. An heir at law may be made by declaration in writing acknowledged and recorded. Advancements are reckoned as against shares, pro tanto, but not for education and maintenance or gift otherwise than for settlement in life. Dig. Stats. 1894, §§ 2470-2493.

IDAHO. If a surviving husband or wife and only one child, or the lawful issue of one child, they take in equal shares. If there is a surviving husband or wife and more than one child living, or one child living and the lawful issue of one or more deceased children, one-third goes to the surviving husband or wife, and the remainder in equal shares to the children and issue of any deceased child by right of representation; but if there be no child of the decedent living at his death the remainder goes to all of his lineal descendants, who, if all in the same degree, share equally, otherwise by right of representation. If no surviving husband or wife, but issue, the whole estate goes to such, and if there is more than one child living, or one child living and the lawful issue of one or more deceased children, then in equal shares to the children or child living, and the issue of the deceased child or children by right of representation. If no issue, one-half to the surviving husband or wife and the other half to decedent's father or mother in equal shares, and if either be dead, the whole of said half goes to the other; and if there be no father or mother, then one-half goes in equal shares to the brothers and sisters of the decedent and to the children of any deceased brother or sister. If there is no issue, husband or wife, the estate goes to his father and mother in equal shares, or if either be dead, then to the other. If there be neither issue, husband, wife, father or mother, then in equal shares to the brothers and sisters of the decedent and to the children of any deceased brother or sister. If the decedent leaves a husband or wife, but neither issue, father, mother, brother nor sister, the whole estate to surviving husband or wife; if no issue, surviving husband or wife, father, mother, brother, or sister, it goes to the next of kin in equal degrees, except when there are two or more collateral kindred in equal degree, claiming through different ancestors, those claiming through the nearest are preferred. If the decedent leave several children or one child and the issue of one or more, and any such surviving child dies under age, and unmarried, all the estate that came to the deceased child by such inheritance descends in equal shares to the other children of the same parent and to the issue of such other children who are dead, by right of representation. If at the death of such child under age and unmarried, all the other children of his parents are also dead, and any have left issue, such estate descends to the issue of all the other children of the same parent. On the death of the husband intestate one-half of the entire community property belongs to the wife and the remainder to his descendants according to right of representation, but if the decedent be the wife the entire community property belongs to the husband. If the decedent be a widow or widower and leave no kindred, and the estate or any portion of it was common property of such decedent and his or her deceased spouse, such shall go to the father of such deceased spouse, or if he be dead, to the mother. If there be no father nor mother, then it goes to the brothers and sister of such deceased spouse in equal shares and to the lawful issue if any deceased brother or sister. If the decedent leave no husband, wife or kindred and there be no heirs to take his estate, the same shall be paid into the treasury for the support of the common schools. Rev. Stat. (1887), p. 645.

If there be no father and mother, the brothers and sisters or descendants take the whole, as tenants in common. If there be no brothers or sisters or descendants of them, it goes to the father and mother as joint tenants; and if either be dead, to the other. 4. If there be none of these, if the inheritance came from the paternal line, then it goes—(1) to the paternal grandfather and grandmother, as joint tenants, or the survivor of them; (2) to the uncles and aunts and their issue; (3) to the next of kin in equal degree among the paternal kindred; (4) if none of these, then to the maternal kindred in the same order. 5. Curtesy and dower are abolished, and the widow takes one-third of the estate in fee-simple, free from all demands of creditors: provided that when the real estate exceeds in value ten thousand dollars she takes one-fourth only, and when it exceeds twenty thousand dollars, one-fifth only. In case there is a widow and children, she takes a share of the personal property, equal to a child, provided her share shall not be reduced below one-third. 11. When the widow marries again, she cannot alienate the estate; and if during such marriage she die, the estate goes to her children by the former marriage, if any there be. 12. If there be no child or parent, the whole goes to the surviving husband or wife. Horner's Anno. Stats. 1896, §§ 2467-2511. LOUISIANA. 1. Children and their issue; if in equal degree, per capita; otherwise, per stirpes. 2. Parents one moiety; and the other moiety to brothers and sisters and their issue. If one parent be dead, his or her share goes to the brothers and sisters of the deceased, who then have three-fourths. If of different marriage, the portion is divided equally between the paternal and maternal lines of the intestate, the german brothers and sisters taking a part in each line. If there be no issue, nor parent, nor brothers, nor sisters, nor their issue, then the inheritance goes to the ascendants in the paternal and maternal lines one moiety to each,—those in each line taking per capita. If there be none of the heirs above mentioned, then the inheritance goes to the collateral relations of the intestate,—those in the nearest degree excluding all others. If there are several persons in the same degree, they take per capita. 6. Representation takes place ad infinitum in the direct descending line, but does not take place in favor of ascendants,—the nearest in degree always excluding those of a degree superior or more remote. 7. In the collateral line, representation is admitted in favor of the issue of the brothers and sisters of the intestate, whether they succeed in concurrence with the uncles and aunts, or whether the brothers and sisters, being dead, their issue succeed in equal or unequal degrees. 8. When representation is admitted, the partition is made per stirpes; and if one root has produced several branches, the subdivision is also made by roots in each branch, and the members of the branch take between themselves per capita. If no issue, father, brother, or sister, it descends to his mother to the exclusion of the issue of deceased brothers and sisters. 5. If no such issue, father, mother, brother or sister, it descends to his next of kin of equal degree; when they claim through different ancestors, preferring those claiming through the nearer. 6. If a minor dies unmarried leaving property inherited from a parent, it descends to the other children of the same parent in equal share, and to their issue by representation. 7. If no kindred, it descends to the surviving husband or wife; otherwise it escheats to the state. 8. Degrees of kindred are computed according to the civil law, the half-blood inheriting equally with the whole blood of equal degree. Rev. Stat. 1884, p. 610; Laws, 1889, p. 189. With respect to all persons married since May 1, 1895 (and as to those after January 1, 1897), dower and curtesy are abolished, but the interest of husband or wife in the real estate of the other must be barred, as dower and curtesy have been barred hitherto, and the order of descent (and distribution, except as stated) is as follows: 1. The widow or widower one-third if issue, one-half if no issue, and if no kindred the whole. 2. Subject to the foregoing, the remainder or the whole, as the case may be, to children and their issue, by representation; if no child to lineal descendants, equally if of the same degree, otherwise by representation. 3. If no issue to father and mother equally. 4. If only one of these, he or she takes one-half and the remainder in either case to brothers and sisters and their issue by representation. 5. Property of an unmarried minor, inherited from either parent, descends to the other children of the same parent and their issue, in equal shares if of the same degree, otherwise by representation. 8. Escheat to state. Illegitimate children are heirs of the mother in any case and of parents who marry and of the father if adopted by him by writing duly acknowledged. Adopted children are heirs unless otherwise specially provided. Pub. Law, 1895, ch. 157. Personal property, except an allotment to widow is distributed in the same manner except that life insurance is no part of the estate, but descends one-third to the widow and remainder to issue; if no widow the whole to issue, if no issue the whole to widow. Rev. Stat. 1884, p. 612.

To the grandfather on the part of the father, if living, otherwise to his descendants in equal degree; and if none to the father of such grandfather and his descendants, and so on to the next lineal male paternal ancestor and his descendants, without end. And if there be no paternal ancestor, nor descendants of any, then to the mother and the kindred on her side in the same manner as above directed. 5. An acquired estate, when there is no issue, descends—(1) to brothers and sisters of the whole blood, and their descendants in equal degree; (2) then to the brothers and sisters of the half-blood and their descendants; (3) if none to the father; (4) if no father, to the mother; (5) if neither, to the paternal grandfather and his descendants in equal degree; then to the maternal grandfather and his descendants in equal degree; then to the paternal great-grandfather and his descendants in the same manner, and so on, alternating and giving preference to the paternal ancestor. 7. If no kindred, then to the surviving wife or husband, and their kindred, as an estate by purchase; and if the intestate has had more husbands or wives than one, all of whom are dead, then to their kindred in equal degree, equally. 8. No distinction between brothers and sisters of the whole and half-blood, all being descendants of the same father, where the estate descended on the part of the father, nor where all are descendants of the same mother, the estate descending on her part. 9. Children take by representation; but no representation is admitted among collaterals after brothers' and sisters' children. Pub. Gen. Laws, 1888, pp. 808-814. Personal property is distributed as follows: To the widow, the whole if no child, parent, grandchild, brother or sister or child of a brother or sister; one-third, if children or descendants thereof; or one-half if a parent or brother or sister or child of a brother or sister. If no collaterals, to grandfather; and if two grandfathers, they shall take alike; and a grandmother, in case of the death of her husband (the grandfather), shall take as he might have done. If any person entitled to distribution shall die before the same be made, his or her share shall go to his or her representatives. Posthumous children of intestates take as if born before the decease of the intestate; but no other posthumous relation shall be considered as entitled to distribution in his or her own right. The illegitimate child or children of any female, and the issue of such child or children, shall be capable to take real or personal estate from their mother, or from each other, in like manner as if born in lawful wedlock. If there be no relations of the intestate within the fifth degree,—which degree shall be reckoned by counting down from the common ancestor to the more remote,—the whole surplus escheats to the state for the use of the public schools of the county in which administration was granted. A representative not more remote than brother's or sister's children may afterwards claim payment. 2 Pub. Gen. Laws, 1888, pp. 1356-9.

MASSACHUSETTS. Real estate descends subject to debts—1. In equal shares to his children and the issue of any deceased child by right of representation; and if there is no child of the intestate living at his death, then to all his other lineal descendants,—equally, if they are all of the same degree of kindred, otherwise according to the right of representation. 2. If the intestate leaves a widow and no kindred, the estate descends to the widow. And if the intestate is a married woman and leaves no kindred, her estate descends to her husband. 8. If the intestate leaves no kindred, and no widow, nor husband, the estate escheats to the commonwealth. Pub. Stat. 1882, pp. 740, 743. When there are no issue, the widow of the intestate takes the real estate in fee to the amount of five thousand dollars, and also takes one-half the other real estate of which her husband died seised for her life. If the intestate be a married woman, her surviving husband holds the lands for his life as tenant by curtesy, and should there be no issue living he holds one-half her lands for life, and takes in fee real estate to the amount of five thousand dollars. Illegitimate children inherit from the mother and she from them, and should she be dead, then through her to her heirs at law. Subject to certain allowances provided for by law, to a widow and minor children (as to which, see 155 Mass. 141), personal estate is distributed as real estate, except that a husband is entitled to the whole, and a widow to one-third, if there be issue, otherwise the whole to the amount of five thousand dollars, and one-half the excess above ten thousand dollars. Pub. Stat. 1882, ch. 135; Supp. Pub. Stat. ch. 276.

MICHIGAN. Real estate descends: 1. To children (including posthumous children), and issue, by representation. 2. Lineal descendants equally if in the same degree, otherwise by representation. 3. If surviving husband or widow one-half, remainder to parents equally, or to the survivor of them, but if no husband or widow, the whole to parents or the survivor. 4. Brothers and sisters and their issue by representation, subject to the said provision for the husband or widow, which is in lieu of dower. 5. Next of kin, those claiming through the nearest ancestor preferred. 6. Husband or wife. 7. Escheat to state for primary school fund. The share of any deceased minor child dying unmarried passes to other children of the same parent and their issue, by representation if those who take are not of the same degree. Illegitimate children inherit from their mother, but not through her, and she inherits from them and her kindred through her from them. Subsequent marriage of parents or acknowledgment by the father duly recorded legitimizes a child. Degrees are computed by the civil law, and the half-blood takes equally except from an ancestor not of the same blood. Howell's Stats. § 5772 a; Pub. Act, 1883, p. 323. Personal estate is distributed as follows: The husband or widow takes one-third if there is more than one child; if only one child, one-half; if none, all up to one thousand dollars; the excess to be divided between the husband or widow and the father, or if he be dead, his share passes to the mother, brothers, and sisters and their issue, share and share alike. If no such relations, to the husband or widow. In other cases as real estate. Howell's Stats. § 5847.

MINNESOTA. If issue, the husband or widow takes one-third in fee-simple, dower and curtesy being abolished; subject thereto:—1. Children, and their issue by representation. 2. If no child or issue of such, a surviving husband or wife takes the whole. 3. Father. 4. Mother. 5. Brothers and sisters, and their issue by representation. 6. Next of kin, in equal degree; those who claim through the nearest ancestor being preferred. 7. The share of any child dying under age, an unmarried, inherited from a deceased parent shall descend in equal shares to the other children of the same parent, and to the issue of any who have died, by representation. 8. Escheat to the state. 9. Degrees of kindred computed according to the civil law, and kindred of the half-blood inherit equally with the whole blood, unless the inheritance is by descent, devise or gift of some ancestor, in which case all those who are not of the blood of such ancestor shall be excluded. The homestead passes to widow for life, remainder to children and issue; if no widow, to children and issue, or if none, as other real estate. 2 Pub. Stat. 1894, §§ 4469-4477. Personal property same as real, except certain provisions for widow and minor children. When an adopted child dies intestate, any property received by him from adopting parents shall go to relatives through such parents; property from natural parents shall pass as if there were no adoption; Laws, 1895, ch. 221.

MISSISSIPPI. 1. To children and their descendants in equal parts by representation. 2. To brothers and sisters and their descendants in the same manner. 3. If none of these, to the father and mother equally, or to the survivor. 4. To the next of kin in equal degree, computing by the rules of the civil law. 5. There is no representation among collaterals except with the descendants of the brothers and sisters of the intestate. 6. There is no distinction between the half and the whole blood, except that the whole blood is preferred to the half-blood, in the same degree. 7. A surviving wife or husband takes the whole when there are no children or issue, and when there are such, takes a child's part in fee simple. 8. Escheat to state. Hotchpot prevails. If husband or wife has property equal in value to the homestead, and the deceased is without children by the survivor, children by a former marriage take the homestead. One who wilfully causes or procures the death of another shall not inherit real or personal property from such decedent, but the same shall descend as though such person had never been in being. Ann. Code, 1892, §§ 1543, 1554.

MISSOURI. 1. To children or their descendants in equal parts. 2. If none, the father, mother, brothers, and sisters, and their descendants, in equal parts. 3. If none of these, husband or wife. 4. Grandfather, grandmother, uncles, and aunts, and their descendants, in equal parts. 5. Great-grandfathers, great-grandmothers, and their descendants, in equal parts; and so on, passing to the nearest lineal ancestors, and their children and their descendants, in equal parts. 6. If there be no kindred above named, nor any husband or wife, capable of inheriting, then the estate goes to the kindred of the wife and husband of the intestate, in the like course as if such wife or husband had survived the intestate and then died entitled to the estate. 7. Collaterals of the half-blood inherit only half as much as those of the whole blood; but if all such collaterals be of the half-blood, they have whole portions, only giving to the ascendants double portions. 8. When all are of equal degree of consanguinity to the intestate, they take per capita; if of different degrees, per stirpes. Rev. Stat. 1889, p. 1022. If a married woman die without descendants, the husband is entitled to one-half of her real and personal property absolutely, subject to her debts; Laws, 1895, p. 169; and the husband of a wife dying intestate has the same right over her personal property as the widow over her husband's; id. p. 35.

MONTANA. The rules of descent and distribution are the same as in California. Montana, C. C. § 1850-71.

NEBRASKA. Real estate descends—1. In equal shares to children and to the representatives of a deceased child by right of representation, and if no child or children be living, then to all the lineal descendants, equally if in the same degree, if not by representation. 2. If no issue, then to the widow for life, and after her death to father, and if there be no widow then to the father. 3. To brothers and sisters and their issue by representation, and if a mother, she takes equally with brothers and sisters. 4. To the mother, to the exclusion of children of deceased brothers and sisters. 5. Next of kin in equal degrees, those claiming through the nearest ancestor preferred. 6. If no other kindred but a widow, the widow takes the estate. 7. Escheats. Illegitimate children inherit from the mother and shall be considered the heirs of any person who shall, in writing, acknowledge himself to be the father of such child or children, and they shall in all cases be considered the heirs of the mother and she of such child; if she be dead the property of such child goes to her heirs at law. Degrees of kindred are computed according to the civil law, and kindred of the half blood inherit equally with those of the whole blood, unless the inheritance was ancestral, in which case all those who are not of the blood of such ancestor are excluded. Advancements are reckoned, but should the advancement of any child exceed his portion of an estate, he will not be required to refund such excess. Personal estate is distributed in the same manner as real property, excepting certain provisions for widow and minor children; Comp. Stat. 1895, § 2546.

NEVADA. 1. If there be a surviving husband or wife and only one child, or its issue, in equal shares to each of them. If more than one child, or one child living and the issue of one or more others, one-third to the husband or wife and the remainder in equal shares to the children and their issue by representation. If there be no child living, the remainder goes to all the intestate's lineal descendants, those of the same degree of kindred sharing equally, the others by representation. 2. If there be no issue, it goes to the surviving husband or wife and the father in equal shares. If no issue, nor husband or wife, it goes to the father. 3. If none of these survive, the whole estate goes to the surviving husband or wife. 6. The estate goes next to the nearest descendant of equal degree, those claiming through the nearest ancestor being preferred. 7. The same provision is made for the distribution of the estate of an unmarried child as in Minnesota. 8. If there be no husband, wife, nor kindred, the estate escheats to the state for the support of the schools. Gen. Stats. (1885) § 2981. Upon the death of the wife, the entire community property goes to the husband, unless she has been abandoned by him without cause, in which case he only takes one-half, and the other half, unless devised by the wife, goes to her kindred by representation. On the death of the husband if there be issue the widow takes one-half, otherwise, all, unless she has separated from him without cause of divorce, in which case she takes no part of it. Laws, 1873, p. 183, as amended, March 2, 1881.

NEW JERSEY. Real estate descends—1. To children and their issue, by right of representation to the remotest degree. 2. To brothers and sisters of the whole blood, and their issue, in the same manner. 3. To the father, unless the inheritance came from the part of the mother, in which case it descends as if the father had previously died. 4. To the mother for life, and after her death to go as if the mother had previously died. 5. If there be no such kindred, then to brothers and sisters of the half-blood and their issue by right of representation; but if the estate came from an ancestor, then only to those of the blood of such ancestor, if any be living. 6. If there be none of these, then to the next of kin in equal degree,—subject to the restriction as to ancestral estates. 7. And if any person die, without leaving any person as hereinbefore mentioned, capable of inheriting the same, but leaving a husband or wife, the same shall descend and go to said husband or wife in fee-simple. Rev. Stat. pp. 297, 298; Laws, 1894, p. 209. The personal estate is distributed as follows: 1. One-third to the widow and the residue to children, or their representatives, if dead. NEW MEXICO. Of the marriage community all property brought into it or acquired separately by the surviving husband or wife constitutes his or her separate estate; of that acquired jointly the survivor takes one-half. The remainder of the acquiescent property and the separate estate of the decedent is divided as follows: One-fourth to the survivor and the residue in equal shares to the children or their heirs, or if none all to the wife; if no wife the portion which would have gone to her shall go to the parents of decedent or the survivor if one be dead. If both parents be dead the estate is disposed of as if they had outlived the intestate and died in possession, and so on through the ascending ancestors and their issue. If heirs are not thus found the portion uninherited shall go to the heirs of the wife according to like rules, and if there were more than one wife it is divided among the heirs of all, by representation, and finally it shall escheat to the territory. Posthumous children inherit and illegitimate ones take from the mother and the mother from them. They inherit from the father only when in default of legitimate children and where duly recognized by him. When the recognition has been mutual he may inherit from them but the mother is preferred to him. They are legitimated by marriage of the parents. Advancements are charged. Proceeds of life insurance are not subject to debts except by special contract in writing. Comp. Laws, 1884; Laws, 1893, ch. 90.

NEW YORK. Real estate descends—1. To lineal descendants. 2. To father. 3. To mother. 4. To collateral relatives. Subject, however, to these rules: (1) Lineal descendants, in equal degree, take in equal parts; if of unequal degree, by representation; (2) The preceding rule applies to all descendants of unequal degrees: so that those who are in the nearest degree of consanguinity take the share which would have descended to them had all the descendants in the same degree been living, and the children in each degree take the share of their parents; (3) If there be no descendants, the father takes the whole, unless the inheritance came from the mother, and she be living; but if she be dead, it goes to the father for life, and the remainder to the brothers and sisters of the intestate and their descendants; or if there be none living, to the father in fee; (4) If there be no descendants and no father, or a father not entitled to take as above, then the inheritance descends to the mother for life, and the remainder to the brothers and sisters of the intestate and their descendants, by representation; but if there be none such, then to the mother in fee. (5) If there be no father or mother capable of inheriting the estate, it descends, in the cases hereafter specified, to the collateral relatives,—in equal parts if of equal degree, however remote. (6) If all the brothers and sisters of the intestate be living, the inheritance descends to them; but if some be dead, leaving issue, the issue take by right of representation; and the same rule applies to all the direct lineal descendants of brothers and sisters, to the remotest degree. (7) If there be no heirs entitled to take under either of the preceding sections, the inheritance, if the same shall have come to the intestate on the part of his father, shall descend to brothers and sisters of the father in equal shares, and their issue, by right of representation. In all cases the inheritance is to descend in the same manner as if all such brothers and sisters had been brothers and sisters of the intestate. (8) If there be no brothers and sisters, nor descendants of such, of the father's side, then the inheritance goes to the brothers and sister of the mother and their descendants, in the same manner. (9) Where the inheritance has come to the intestate on the part of his mother, the same descends to the brothers and sisters of the mother and to their descendants; and if there be no such, to those of the father, as before prescribed. (10) Property not acquired from either father or mother, descends to collaterals on both sides in equal shares. (11) Relatives of the half-blood inherit equally with the whole blood, unless the inheritance came to the intestate by descent, devise, or gift of some one of his ancestors,—in which case none inherit who are not of the blood of that ancestor. (12) In all cases not otherwise provided for, the inheritance descends according to the course of the common law. (13) Real estate held in trust for any other person, if not devised by the person for whose use it is held, descends to his heirs, according to the preceding rules. (14) Posthumous and legally adopted children inherit; and illegitimate children inherit both real and personal property from the mother if she has no lawful descendants. Birdseye, Rev. Stat. 1899, pp. 838-61. Rev. Stat. 1896 (Banks & Brothers' ed.), p. 1824. The personal estate of an intestate shall be distributed to the widow, children, or next of kin to the deceased, in manner following. One-third to the widow, if any, and the residue in equal portions among the children, and their representatives if deceased; if no children, nor any legal representatives of them, one moiety to the widow, and the other to the next of kin of the deceased, entitled under the provisions of this section; if a widow, and no descendant, parent, brother or sister, nephew or niece, the widow shall be entitled to the whole; but if there be a brother or sister, nephew or niece, and no descendant or parent, the widow shall be entitled to a moiety as above provided, and to the whole where it does not exceed two thousand dollars; if the residue exceed that sum, she shall receive, in addition to her moiety, two thousand dollars, and the remainder shall be distributed to the brothers and sisters and their representatives. In case there be no widow then to the children, and their representatives, or if none then the whole to the next of kin in equal degree to the deceased, and their legal representatives. If the deceased shall leave no children and no representative of them, and no father, and shall leave a widow and a mother, the moiety not distributed to the widow in equal shares to his mother and brothers and sisters, or their representatives; and if there be no widow, the whole in like manner to the mother and to the brothers and sisters, or the representatives of such brothers and sisters. If a father and no child or descendant, the father shall take a moiety if there be a widow, and the whole if there be none. If a mother and no child, descendant, father, brother, sister, or representative of a brother or sister, the mother, if there be a widow, shall take a moiety, and the whole if none. And if the deceased was illegitimate, and left a mother and no child or descendant or widow, such mother shall take the whole, and shall be entitled to letters of administration in exclusion of all other persons. And if the mother of such deceased be dead, his relatives on the part of the mother shall take as if the deceased had been legitimate, and be entitled to letters of administration in the same order. Descendants or next of kin in equal degree share equally, and when of unequal degrees of kindred, by representation. No representation among collaterals after brothers' and sisters' children. Relatives of the half-blood and their representatives take equally with those of the whole blood in the same degree. Descendants and next of kin of the deceased begotten before his death, but born thereafter, take in the same manner as if they had been born in the lifetime of the deceased and had survived him. Bliss, Code, 1895, § 2732.

NORTH CAROLINA. Real estate descends—1. Inheritances lineally descend to the issue of the person who died last seised, but do not lineally ascend, except as hereinafter stated. 2. Females inherit equally with males, and younger with older children; but advancements are charged against shares of children. 3. Lineal descendants represent their ancestors. 4. On failure of lineal descendants, where the inheritance has been transmitted by descent or otherwise from an ancestor to whom the intestate was an heir, it goes to the next collateral relations of the blood of that ancestor, subject to the two preceding rules. 5. When the inheritance is not so derived, or the blood of such ancestor is extinct, then it goes to the next collateral relation of the person last seised, whether of the paternal or maternal line, subject to the same rules. 6. Collateral relations of the half-blood inherit equally with those of the whole blood, and the degrees of relationship are computed according to the rules which prevail in descents at common law; provided, that, if there be no issue, nor brother, nor sister, nor issue of such, the inheritance vests in the father, if living, and if not, then in the mother, if living. 7. If there be no heirs, the widow is deemed such, and inherits. 8. An estate for the life of another is deemed an inheritance; and a person is deemed to have been seised, if he had any right, title, or interest in the inheritance. Posthumous children inherit if born within ten lunar months; and illegitimate children inherit from, but not through the mother, but their estates descend as if they were legitimate. 1 Code, 1893, pp. 508-10. The personal estate is distributed as follows: If there are not more than two children, one-third to the widow and the residue equally to the children, and their representatives. If more than two children, the widow shall share equally with all the children, and be entitled to a child's part. If no child nor legal representative of a deceased child, one-half of the estate to the widow, and the residue equally to the next of kin in equal degree, and to their legal representatives. If there be no child nor legal representative of a deceased child nor any of the next of kin of the intestate, then the widow, if there be one, shall be entitled to all the personal estate of such intestate. If no widow, in equal portions among all the children, and their legal representatives. If neither widow nor children, nor any legal representative of children, equally to the next of kin in equal degree, and to their legal representatives. But if, after the death of the father, and in the lifetime of the mother, any children shall die intestate, without wife or children, every brother and sister, and the representatives of them, shall have an equal share with the mother of the deceased child. The personalty of an intestate married woman passes to her husband. Code, 1893, § 1478-87; Pub. Laws, 1893, p. 75.

If no issue, all to the surviving husband or wife, unless the estate exceed five thousand dollars, in which case the excess is divided equally between the survivor and the father, if no father, then to the mother. 3. If no issue, husband or wife, to the father, and should he be dead, to the mother, who takes to the exclusion of issue of deceased brothers and sisters. 4. The children of the half-blood inherit equally with the whole blood, unless the estate came by descent, gift or devise of some one of his ancestors, when the half-blood are excluded. The homestead property descends to the surviving husband or wife, or if none, to the decedent's minor child or children until the youngest reaches majority. When the homestead estate is fully satisfied, the property is distributed as other property. Dower and curtesy are abolished. Rev. Code, 1895, § 3742.

If none, in equal moieties to paternal and maternal kindred, each in the following courses:—(1) to the grandfather; (2) to the grandmother, uncles, and aunts, on the same side, and their descendants; (3) to the great-grandfathers, or great-grandfather; (4) to the great-grandmothers, or great-grandmother, and the brothers and sisters of the grandfathers and grandmothers and their descendants, and so on without end,—passing first to the nearest lineal male ancestors, and for want of them to the lineal female ancestors in the same degree, and the descendants of such male and female lineal ancestors. 5. No right accrues to any persons, other than children of the intestate, unless such persons be in being, and capable, in law, to take as heirs, at the time of the intestate's death. 6. When the inheritance is directed to go by moieties, as above, to paternal and maternal kindred, if there be no such kindred on the one part, the whole goes to the other part; and if there be none of either part, the whole goes to the husband or wife of the intestate; and if the wife or husband be dead, it goes to his or her kindred in the like course as if such husband or wife had survived the intestate and then died entitled to the estate. 7. The descendants of any person deceased inherit the estate which such person would have inherited had such person survived the intestate. 8. If the estate came by descent, gift or devise, from the parent or other kindred of the intestate, and such intestate die without children, it goes to the next of kin to the intestate, of the blood of the person from whom such estate came or descended, if any there be. Gen. Stat. 1873, p. 369. In default of heirs, the estate is taken possession of by the town where it may be. Pub. Stat. 1882, p. 480; Gen. Laws, 1896, p. 733. The personal estate of decedents is distributed in the manner following:—first, one-half part thereof to the widow of the deceased forever, if the intestate died without issue; second, one-third part thereof to the widow of the deceased forever, if the intestate died leaving issue; third, the residue shall be distributed amongst the heirs of the intestate, in the same manner as real estates descend and pass by this chapter, but without having any respect to the blood of the person from whom such personal estate came or descended. If deceased was a married woman her husband takes the whole. Pub. Stat. 1882, p. 490.

SOUTH CAROLINA. The estate descends—1. One-third to the widow in fee, the remainder to the children, including posthumous children. Lineal descendants represent their parents. 2. If there be no issue or other lineal descendant, then one-half goes to the widow, and the other half to the father, or, if he be dead, to the mother, and the brethren of the whole blood, so that such mother or father and each brother and sister shall receive an equal share. 3. If there be neither issue nor parent, then one-half goes to the widow, and the other half to the brothers and sisters and their issue by representation. 4. If there be no issue, nor parent, nor brother, nor sister of the whole blood, but a widow, and a brother or sister of the half-blood, and a child or children of a brother or sister of the whole blood, then the widow takes one moiety, and the other is divided equally between the brothers and sisters of the half-blood, and the children of the brothers and sisters of the whole blood,—the children of every deceased brother or sister of the whole blood taking among them a share equal to the share of a brother or sister of the half-blood. But if there be no brother or sister of the half-blood, then a moiety of the estate descends to the child or children of the deceased brother or sister; and if there be no child of the whole blood, then to the brothers and sisters of the half-blood. 5. If there be no issue, nor parent, nor brother, nor sister of the whole blood, nor their children, nor any brother nor sister of the half-blood, then one-half goes to the widow and the other half to the lineal ancestors; but if there be none of these, then the widow takes two-thirds and the residue goes to the next of kin. 6. If there be no widow, her share in each of the preceding cases goes to the residue. 7. On the decease of the wife, the husband takes the same share in his wife's estate that she would have taken in his had she survived him, and the remainder goes in the same manner as above described in case of the intestacy of a man. 8. If there be no widow nor issue, but a surviving parent and brothers and sisters, then it goes in equal shares to the father, or, if he be dead, to the mother, and to the brothers and sisters and their issue by representation. 9. If there be no issue, parent, nor brother, nor sister of the whole blood, nor their children, nor brother nor sister of the half-blood, nor lineal ancestor, nor next of kin, the whole goes to the surviving husband or wife. 1 Rev. Stat. 1893, pp. 679, 680. Dower is unprovided for and curtesy is abolished by statute, but the widow is entitled to claim dower, if she renounce the provisions made for her as stated.

SOUTH DAKOTA. The laws of descent and distribution are the same as in North Dakota. C. C. § 777; Comp. Laws, § 3401.

TENNESSEE. Real estate descends—1. Without reference to the source of his title—(1) to all the sons and daughters equally, and to their descendants by right of representation; (2) if there be none of these, and either parent be living, then to such parent. 2. If the estate was acquired by the intestate, and he died without issue—(1) to his brothers and sisters of the whole and half-blood, born before or after his death, and to their issue by representation; (2) in default of these, to the father and mother as tenants in common; (3) if both be dead, then in equal moieties to the heirs of the father and mother in equal degree, or representing those in equal degree, of relationship to the intestate; but if these are not in equal degree, then to the heirs nearest in blood, or representing those nearest in blood, to the intestate, in preference to others more remote. 3. When the land came by gift, devise, or descent from a parent or the ancestor of a parent, and he died without issue—(1) if there be brothers and sisters of the paternal line of the half-blood, and such also of the maternal line, then it descends to the brothers and sisters on the part of the parent from whom the estate came, in the same manner as to brothers and sisters of the whole blood, until the line of such parent is exhausted of the half-blood, to the exclusion of the other line; (2) if no brothers or sisters, then to the parent, if living, from whom or whose ancestors it came, in preference to the other parent; (3) if both be dead, then to the heirs of the parent from whom or whose ancestor it came. 4. The same rules of descent are observed in lineal descendants and collaterals respectively, when the lineal descendants are further removed from their ancestor than grandchildren, and when the collaterals are further removed than children of brothers and sisters. 5. If there be no heirs, then to the husband or wife in fee-simple. A posthumous child, born within ten calendar months after death of an intestate, takes equally with other children. Illegitimate children take from the mother, and the share of such child dying a minor and unmarried passes to other children of the mother, and if there be no such other children, then to the heirs of the mother (Acts 1885), but a child of color cannot take from a father if such father were white; Acts 1866-67, ch. 36, § 10. Advancements are reckoned, and, should such advancement exceed the share allowed by the laws of descent, it shall be collated and brought into contribution in the distribution of the personal estate. Personal estate is distributed, as follows: 1. Widow, and children and their descendants, the widow taking the share of one child. 2. If no children or issue, all to the widow. 3. If no widow to the children equally, or if one be dead to the issue of such by representation. 4. If no children or widow to the father. 5. To mother and brothers and sisters, the mother sharing equally with them, but if no brothers and sisters or issue of such, all to the mother. 6. If no mother, all to brothers and sisters equally or to their issue by representation. 7. If none of the above mentioned kindred then to the next of kin of equal degree, equally. There is no representation among collaterals after the children of brothers and sisters. Stats. 1871, § 2429; 1 Stat. 1871, § 2420; Code, 1874, § 278.

TEXAS. The estate descends—1. To children and their descendants. 2. To father and mother in equal portions; but if one be dead, then one-half to the survivor and the other to brothers and sisters and their descendants; but if there be none of these, then the whole goes to the surviving father or mother. 3. If there be neither father nor mother, then the whole to the brothers and sisters of the intestate and their descendants. 4. If there be no kindred aforesaid, then the estate descends in two moieties, one to the paternal and the other to the maternal kindred in the following course—(1) to the grandfather and grandmother equally; (2) if only one of these be living, then one-half to each survivor and the other to the descendants of the other; (3) if there be no such descendants, then the whole to the surviving grandparent; (4) if there be no such, then to the descendants of the grandfather and grandmother, passing to the nearest lineal ancestors. 5. There is no distinction between ancestral and acquired estates. 6. If there be a surviving husband or wife, and a child or children and their issue, such survivor takes one-third of the estate for life, with remainder to children or their descendants and one-third of the personal property. 7. If no issue or descendants, then the surviving husband or wife takes half the land, without remainder over and all of the personal property, and the other half passes according to the preceding rules, unless there be no issue, father or mother, brothers and sisters, or descendants of such, in which case the survivor takes the whole estate. The community property, however acquired during marriage, passes to the surviving husband or wife, if there be no issue. Heirs of the half-blood take only one-half the portion of those of the whole blood, unless all the heirs are of the half blood; in such case they take equally. Advancements are reckoned and charged. Illegitimate children inherit from the mother and transmit to her, and if the father and mother afterwards marry, such child is legitimated and capable of taking from the father. The issue of marriages deemed null at law are legitimate. 8. Among collaterals, those of the half-blood inherit only half as much as those of the whole blood; but if all be of the half-blood, they have whole portions. 9. If all relations are in the same degree, they take per capita; otherwise, per stirpes. Sayles, T. Civ. Stat. 1889, art. 1645-1652.

UTAH. The estate descends—1. If the decedent be a resident and the head of a family, to the surviving family in equal shares. 2. If the decedent leave a husband or wife, and only one child, or the issue of one child, each of them is to have equal shares, but if there be more than one child living, or the issue of such, then the one-third to the surviving husband or wife for life, the remainder to such children or their issue by right of representation. 3. If there be no children living, the remainder goes to all the lineal descendants equally if of the same degree of kindred, otherwise by representation. If there be no husband or wife, but issue, the whole goes to such. 4. If there be a husband or wife and a mother, and no issue, in equal shares to the mother and husband or wife, but if the estate came from the father, the father takes half instead of the mother. 5. If there be no mother or issue, then the brothers and sisters take half the estate, their issue taking by representation, and the father, if living, receiving a brother's share. 6. If no issue, nor husband or wife, the mother receives the whole estate, unless it came to the decedent from the father, in which event he takes it. 7. If there be a mother or father and no issue, and no husband or wife or father or brother or sister, one-half of the estate goes to the mother or father, the other to the issue of any deceased brother or sister. 8. If there be a husband or wife and no issue, nor father or mother, brother or sister, the estate goes to the surviving husband or wife. 9. If there be brothers and sisters alone surviving, the estate goes to them in equal shares, their issue taking by representation. 10. If there be none of these, the estate passes to the next of kin, in equal degree, those claiming through the nearest ancestor being preferred. 11. The portion of any child of the decedent who dies unmarried descends to his brothers and sisters and their issue by representation. 12. If there be no husband, wife, or kindred, the estate escheats to the state for the common schools. Comp. Laws, 1894, pp. 73, 74. By the act of March 10, 1892, it was provided that all property, real, personal, or mixed, of persons dying, or who have died, intestate and without heirs in this state at the time of death, shall escheat to the state for the benefit of the common schools. Laws, 1892, p. 62. Illegitimate children may inherit from the mother and she from them, but they cannot inherit from the father, or receive any distributive share in his estate; but this does not apply to the issue of any Mormon marriages born prior to Jan. 1, 1883, who have been legitimated, nor to any illegitimate child, born within twelve months after March 3, 1888.

VERMONT. The estate descends—1. In equal shares to his children, or their representatives. 2. If the deceased leave no issue, the surviving husband or wife is entitled to the whole forever, if the estate does not exceed the sum of two thousand dollars. If it exceeds this sum, then he or she is entitled to such sum and one-half of the remainder of the estate; and the remainder descends as the whole would if no husband or widow had survived; and if there be no kindred, the surviving husband or wife is entitled to the whole. 3. If there be no issue nor surviving husband or wife, the mother takes the whole. 4. If there be neither of these, it goes to the brothers and sisters equally, and their representatives. 5. If none of the relatives above named survive, then in equal shares to the next of kin, in equal degree; but no person is entitled by right of representation. 6. The degrees of kindred are computed according to the rules of the civil law, and the half-blood inherits equally with the whole blood. 7. If there be no kindred, it escheats to the town for the use of the schools. Rev. Laws, 1880, §§ 2230-2237; Laws, 1895, ch. 56. The homestead, at the death of the owner, vests in his widow and minor children who hold their interest during minority, and if there are none it vests in the widow. R. L. §§ 2179-2200.

VIRGINIA. Real estate descends—1. To children and their descendants. 2. If there be none such, to the father. 3. If no father, to the mother and brothers and sisters and their descendants. 4. If there be none of those, then one-half goes to the paternal, the other to the maternal, kindred, as follows:—(1) to the grandfather; (2) to the grandmother, uncles and aunts on the same side, and their descendants; (3) to the great-grandfathers or great-grandfather; (4) to the great-grandmothers, or great-grandmother, and the brothers and sisters of the grandfathers and grandmothers, and their descendants; and so on, passing to the nearest lineal male ancestors, and for want of these, to the nearest lineal female ancestors in the same degree, and their descendants. 5. If there be no paternal kindred, the whole estate goes to the maternal kindred; and vice versa. 6. If there be neither paternal nor maternal kindred, the whole goes to the husband or wife of the intestate; and if the husband or wife be dead, their kindred take the estate, in the same manner as though they had survived the intestate, and died. 7. Collaterals of the half-blood inherit only half as much as those of the whole blood. But if all the collaterals be of the half blood, the ascending kindred (if any) have double portions. 8. When the estate goes to children, or to the mother, brothers and sisters, or to the grandmothers, uncles and aunts, or to any of his female lineal ancestors, with the children of his deceased lineal ancestors, male and female, in the same degree, they take per capita; but if the degrees are unequal, they take per stirpes. Code, 1887, p. 619, 620. Personal estate follows the same course of distribution with the following exceptions: The personal estate of an infant shall be distributed as if he were an adult. If the intestate was a married woman, her husband shall be entitled to the whole surplus of the personal estate. If the intestate leave a widow and issue by her, the widow shall be entitled to one-third of the said surplus; if a widow but no issue by her, she shall be entitled absolutely to such of the personal property in the said surplus as shall be acquired by the intestate in virtue of his marriage with her and remain in kind at his death: she shall also be entitled, if the intestate leave issue by a former marriage, to one third, if no issue to one-half of the residue of such surplus. To the commonwealth shall accrue all the personal estate of every decedent, of which there is no other distributee. In making title by descent, it shall be no bar to a party that any ancestor through whom he derives his descent from the intestate, is or hath been an alien. Va. Code, 1887, §§ 2551, 2557, 2558.

WASHINGTON. The estate descends—1. If the decedent leaves a surviving husband or wife and only one child, in equal shares to each. 2. If more than one child, one-third to the surviving husband or wife and the remainder to the children in equal shares; and to the children of a deceased child by right of representation. 3. If there be no issue, one-half to the surviving consort, and one-half to the father and mother, or to the survivor of them. If there be no father nor mother, then one-half goes in equal shares to the brothers and sisters of the deceased and the children of such; but if no issue, husband or wife survive, then it goes to the father and mother. 4. To the brothers and sisters in equal shares. 5. To the surviving consort. 6. To the next of kin, those claiming through the nearest ancestor being preferred to those claiming through one more remote. 7. If there be no husband, wife, or kindred, the estate escheats to the state for the support of the common schools. 1 Gen. Stat. 1891, § 1490. Title to real estate vests in heirs or devisees immediately after death of owner, subject to rightful claims and to rights of executor or administrator; Laws, 1895, ch. 105. Community property, one-half to surviving husband or wife and the other half according to testamentary disposition, or if none, to legitimate issue of his, her or their bodies, or in default thereof to the survivor subject to community debts, family allowance, and expenses of administration. Dower and curtesy are abolished. 1 Hill's Codes, § 1481.

In WEST VIRGINIA, the rules of descent and distribution are the same as in Virginia. Code, 1891, p. 665.

WISCONSIN. Subject to dower, curtesy, and homestead rights, real estate descends—1. To children and their descendants by representation. 2. Widow or surviving husband. 3. Parents or the survivor. 4. Brothers and sisters and their children, by representation. 5. Next of kin; those claiming through the nearest ancestor being preferred. 6. Escheat to state for capital of school fund. If any person die, leaving children, or one child and the issue of others, the share of any such surviving child, dying under age and not having been married, descends in equal shares to the other children of the same parent, and to their issue by representation; or if all the other children of such deceased parent are also dead, and any of them have left issue, then to all the issue of other children of the same parent equally, if in the same degree of kindred to the said child, otherwise by representation. Degrees of kindred are computed according to the rules of the civil law; and kindred of the half-blood inherit equally with those of the whole blood, in the same degree, unless the inheritance be ancestral, in which case those who are not of the blood of such ancestor are excluded. Supp. R. S. § 2270; Laws, 1893, ch. 28. The homestead passes clear of debts if no issue to widow absolutely, otherwise during widowhood, and then to issue, who also take if there is no widow. § 2271. Subject to allowances to a widow and minor children or to orphan children, the distribution of personal property is the same, except that when there is a widow and issue the former takes a child's share. § 3935.

WYOMING. The estate descends and is distributed—One-half to the surviving husband or wife, and the residue to the surviving children or the descendants of children; if there be no children, nor descendants thereof, three-fourths to the surviving husband or wife, and one-fourth to the mother and father or the survivor of them; provided that if the estate does not exceed in value $10,000, then the whole thereof descends to the surviving husband or wife, absolutely. Dower and tenancy by curtesy are abolished. Except in cases above enumerated, the estate descends—1. To the surviving children and the descendants of children by representation. 2. To the father, mother, and brothers and sisters and their descendants by representation. 3. To the grandfather, grandmother, uncles, aunts, and their descendants by representation. 4. Children of the half-blood inherit the same as those of the whole blood, but collateral relations of the half-blood only half as much as those of the whole blood if there be any of the last-named living. Rev. Stat. 1887, pp. 534, 535.

DESCRIPTIO PERSONÆ. Description of the person. In wills, it frequently happens that the word heir is used as a descriptio personæ: it is then a sufficient designation of the person. In criminal cases, a mere descriptio personæ or addition, if false, can be taken advantage of only by plea in abatement; 1 Metc. 151. A legacy "to the eldest son" of A would be a designation of the person. See 1 Roper, Leg. c. 2.

The description contained in a contract of the persons who are parties thereto.

In all contracts under seal there must be some designatio personæ. In general, the names of the parties appear in the body of the deed, "between A B, of, etc., of the one part, and C D, of, etc., of the other part," being the common formula. But there is a sufficient designation and description of the party to be charged if his name is written at the foot of the instrument; 1 Ld. Raym. 2; 1 Salk. 214; 2 B. & P. 339.

When a person is described in the body of the instrument by the name of James, and he signs the name of John, on being sued by the latter name he cannot deny it; 3 Taunt. 505; Cro. Eliz. 897, n. (a). See 11 Ad. & E. 594; 3 P. & D. 271.

DESCRIPTION. An account of the accidents and qualities of a thing. Ayliffe, Pand. 60.

A written account of the state and condition of personal property, titles, papers, and the like. It is a kind of inventory, but is more particular in ascertaining the exact condition of the property, and is without any appraisalment of it.

In Pleading. One of the rules which regulate the law of variance is that allegations of matter of essential description should be proved as laid. It is impossible to explain with precision the meaning of these words; and the only practical mode of understanding the extent of the rule is to examine some of the leading decisions on the subject, and then to apply the reasoning or ruling contained therein to other analogous cases. With respect to criminal law, it is clearly established that the name or nature of the property stolen or damaged is matter of essential description. Thus, for example, if the charge is one of firing a stack of hay, and it turns out to have been a stack of wheat, or if a man is accused of stealing a drake, and it is proved to have been a goose, or even a duck, the variance is fatal. 1 Tayl. Ev. § 233; Steph. Cr. Proc. 177.

The strict rule of pleading which formerly required exact accuracy in the description of premises sought to be recovered, has, in modern practice, been relaxed, and a general description of the property held to be good. The provisions of state statutes as to the description of the premises by metes and bounds, have been held to be only directory, and a description by name where the property is well known is often sufficient; 127 U. S. 480.

DESERTION. In Criminal Law.

An offence which consists in the abandonment of the public service, in the army or navy, without leave.

An absence without leave, with the intention of returning, will not amount to desertion; 115 Mass. 336; 2 Sumn. 373; 3 Story 108.

The articles of war, U. S. Rev. Stat. § 1342, provide as follows:

Every soldier who deserts the service of the United States shall be liable to serve for such period as shall, with the time he may have served previous to his desertion, amount to the full term of his enlistment; and such soldier shall be tried by a court-martial and punished, although the term of his enlistment may have elapsed previous to his being apprehended and tried. Art. 43.

By the articles of war it is enacted that any officer or soldier who, having received pay, or having been duly enlisted in the service of the United States, deserts the same, shall in time of war suffer death, or such other punishment as a court-martial may direct; and in time of peace, any punishment, excepting death, which a court-martial may direct. Art. 20.

By the articles for the government of the navy, art. 4, it is enacted that the punishment of death, or such punishment as a court-martial may adjudge, may be inflicted on any person in the naval service who in time of war deserts or entices others to desert; and by art. 8, such punishment as a court-martial may adjudge, may be inflicted on any person in the navy, who in time of peace deserts or entices others to desert.

The act by which a man abandons his wife and children, or either of them.

Wilful desertion, as the term is applied in actions for divorce, is the voluntary separation of one of the married parties from the other, or the voluntary refusal to renew a suspended cohabitation, without justification either in the consent or wrongful conduct of the other. 17 Or. 542.

On proof of desertion, the courts possess the power under statute, in many states, to compel support of the wife. And a continued desertion by either husband or wife, after a certain lapse of time, entitles the party deserted to a divorce, in most states.

There must, however, be an actual and intentional withdrawal from matrimonial cohabitation for a statutory period, against the consent of the abandoned party and without justification; Tiffany, Dom. Rel. 181; and an intention to desert in the mind of the offender; 43 Conn. 313; 30 Gratt. 307; 89 Pa. 173; Bish. Mar. Div. & Sep. 1637-1734; 5 Q. B. D. 31; 69 Law T. 617; 160 Mass. 258; where parties continue to live together as husband and wife and other marital duties are observed, a refusal to occupy the same bed does not by itself constitute desertion; 39 Minn. 258.

Desertion is established by proof of a refusal to commence cohabitation; 57 Ia. 370; Wright 223; a refusal to renew cohabitation, on request of the other party; 29 Ala. 719; 31 Me. 342; 45 N. J. Eq. 498; 130 N. Y. 192; 89 Pa. 173; causing a separation, by driving the other away, or by cruel conduct which has that effect; 14 Ct. of Sess. Cas. (4th series) 443; 37 Ala. 393; 125 Ill. 510; 4 Bush 682; 33 Md. 328; 99 Mass. 493; 54 Mich. 492; 41 N. J. Eq. 202; 46 N. J. Eq. 490; a refusal by the wife to follow the husband when he changes his residence; 14 Cal. 654; 87 Ill. 250; 29 N. J. Eq. 96; 163 Pa. 649. But a separation by mutual consent is not desertion; 3 L. R. P. & D. 129; 7 Prob. Div. 17; 50 Mich. 49; 48 N. J. Eq. 549; Wright 284; 49 Pa. 249; 86 Va. 768; 53 Wis. 153; neither is non-cohabitation; 13 Ala. 145; 44 Mass. 257; Wright 469; 21 W. Va. 445; nor a refusal by the husband to follow the wife to a new residence; for it is her duty to follow him; 17 N. H. 251. See DOMICIL.

Mere non-support is not always desertion; 33 N. J. Eq. 7; 1 Hun 444; but if the husband have the means to support his wife, and does not do so, this is a wilful desertion; 58 N. H. 266; but see 135 Pa. 459.

It is not yet settled whether the refusal of sexual intercourse is desertion. The true rule seems to be that it is, in the absence of specific statutory provisions qualifying the meaning of the term; 87 Ga. 471; 17 Oreg. 542; 1 Bish. Mar. & Div. § 1670; contra, 28 Atl. Rep. (N. J.) 467. See 138 Ill. 426; 97 Mass. 327; 112 Mass. 298; 39 Minn. 258; 83 Wis. 553.

Involuntary absence, on account of sickness or business, if not prolonged beyond such a time as is reasonable or necessary, will not constitute desertion; 1 P. & M. 641; 1 Swab. & T. 88; 3 id. 547; 42 Ill. App. 504; 131 Pa. 552. See 9 L. R. A. 696, n.; Tiffany; Schouler, Dom. Rel.; DIVORCE.

DESERTION OF A SEAMAN. The abandonment, by a sailor, of a ship or vessel, in which he had engaged to perform a voyage, before the expiration of his time, and without leave.

Where a seaman signs articles for a voyage, agreeing to go to the port where the vessel is lying to join her, and fails to do so, he is a deserter; 53 Fed. Rep. 551.

Desertion without just cause renders the sailor liable on his shipping articles for damages, and, will, besides, work a forfeiture of his wages previously earned; 3 Kent 155. It has been decided in England that leaving the ship before the completion of the voyage is not desertion, in case,—first, of the seaman's entering the public service, either voluntarily or by impressment; and, second, when he is compelled to leave it by the inhuman treatment of the captain; 2 Esp. 269; 1 Bell, Com. 514; 2 C. Rob. 232. And see 1 Sumn. 373; 2 Pet. Adm. 393; 3 Story 109.

To justify the forfeiture of a seaman's wages for absence for more than forty-eight hours, under the provisions of the act of congress of July 20, 1790, an entry in the log-book of the fact of his absence, made by the officer in charge of it on the day on which he absented himself, and giving the name of the absent seaman as absent without permission, is indispensable; 2 Pars. Sh. & Adm. 101; 1 Wash. C. C. 48; Gilp. 212, 296.

Receiving a marine again on board, and his return to duty with the assent of the master, is a waiver of the forfeiture of wages previously incurred; 1 Pet. Adm. 160.

DESERVING. Worthy or meritorious, without regard to condition or circumstances. In no sense of the word is it limited to persons in need of assistance, or objects which come within the class of charitable uses. 130 Mass. 211.

DESIGN. As a term of art, "the giving of a visible form to the conceptions of the mind, or in other words to the invention." 4 Wash. C. C. 48. See COPYRIGHT; PATENTS. Plan, scheme, or intention carried into effect. 1 Sumn. 434. A project, an idea. 3 H. & N. 301.

As used in an indictment, see 2 Mass. 128.

DESIGNATIO PERSONÆ. See DESCRIPTIO PERSONÆ.

DESIGNATION. The expression used by a testator to denote a person or thing, instead of the name itself.

A bequest of the farm which the testator bought of a person named, or of a picture which he owns, painted by a certain artist, would be a designation of the thing.

DESIRE. The word desire, in a will, raises a trust, where the objects of that desire are specified; 1 Cai. 84.

DESLINDE. In Spanish Law. The act of determining and indicating the boundaries of an estate, county, or province.

DESMEMORIADOS. In Spanish Law. Persons without memory. White, New Recop. lib. 1, tit. 2, c. 1, § 4.

DESPACHEURS. The name given, in some countries, to persons appointed to settle cases of average. Ord. Hamb. t. 21, art. 10.

DESPATCHES. Official communications of official persons on the affairs of government.

In general, the bearer of despatches is entitled to all the facilities that can be given him, in his own country, or in a neutral state; but a neutral cannot, in general, be the bearer of despatches of one of the belligerent parties; 6 C. Rob. 465. See 2 Dods. 54; 1 Edw. 274.

DESPERATE. Of which there is no hope.

This term is used frequently in making an inventory of a decedent's effects, when a debt is considered so bad that there is no hope of recovering it. It is then called a desperate debt, and, if it be so returned, it will be prima facie considered as desperate. See Toll. Ex. 248; 2 Wms. Ex. 644; 1 Chitt. Pr. 580; 11 Wend. 365.

DESPITUS. A contemptible person. Fleta, l. 4, c. 5, § 4.

DESPOIL. This word involves in its signification, violence or clandestine means, by which one is deprived of that which he possesses. 1 Cal. 268.

DESPOT. This word, in its original and most simple acceptation, signifies master and supreme lord; it is synonymous with monarch; but taken in bad part, as it is usually employed, it signifies a tyrant.

DESPOTISM. That abuse of government where the sovereign power is not divided, but united in the hands of a single man, whatever may be his official title. It is not, properly, a form of government. Toullier, Dr. Civ. Fr. tit. prél. n. 32; Ruth. erf. Inst. b. 1, c. 20, § 1.

DESRENEWABLE. Unreasonable. Britton, c. 121.

DESTINATION. The intended application of a thing.

For example, when a testator gives to a hospital a sum of money to be applied in erecting buildings, he is said to give a destination to the legacy. Mill-stones taken out of a mill to be picked, and to be returned, have a destination, and are considered real estate, although detached from the freehold. Heirlooms, although personal chattels, are, by their destination, considered real estate; and money agreed or directed to be laid out in land is treated as real property; 3 Wheat. 577; 2 Bell, Com. 2; Erskine, Inst. 2. 2. 14; Fonbl. Eq. b. 1, c. 6, § 9. See EASEMENT; FIXTURES.

In Common Law. The port at which a ship is to end her voyage is called her port of destination. Pardessus, n. 600.

The phrases "port of destination" and "port of discharge" are not equivalent; 5 Mass. 404. See 66 Me. 65.

DESTROY. In the act of congress punishing with death any one destroying vessels, it means to unfit the vessel for service, beyond the hopes of recovery, by ordinary means. 1 Wash. C. C. 363; 4 Dall. 412.

A will burned, cancelled, or torn, animo revocandi is destroyed; 2 Nott & McC. 272. The scratching out of the signature with a knife, in England, has been held to be tearing or otherwise destroying a will in the sense of the statute; 56 L. J.R. Pr. & D. 96.

DESUETUDE. Disuse.

DETAIL. In Military Law. One who belongs to the army, but is only detached, or set apart, for the time to some particular duty or service, and who is liable at any time, to be recalled to his place in the ranks. 39 Ala. 379.

DETAINDER. Detention. The act of keeping a person against his will, or of withholding the possession of goods or other personal or real property from the owner.

Detainer and detention are very nearly synonymous. If there be any distinction, it is perhaps that detention applies rather to the act considered as a fact, detainer to the act considered as something done by some person. Detainer is more frequently used with reference to real estate than in application to personal property.

All illegal detainers of the person amount to false imprisonment, and may be remedied by habeas corpus. Hurd, Hab. Corp. 209.

A detainer or detention of goods is either lawful or unlawful; when lawful, the party having possession of them cannot be deprived of it. It is legal when the party has a right to the property, and has come lawfully into possession. It is illegal when the taking was unlawful, as in the case of forcible entry and detainer, although the party may have a right of possession; but in some cases the detention may be lawful, although the taking may have been unlawful; 3 Pa. 20. So also the detention may be unlawful although the original taking was lawful: as when goods were distrained for rent, and the rent was afterwards paid; or when they were pledged, and the money borrowed and interest was afterwards paid; or, as in another case, if one borrow a horse, to ride from A to B, and afterwards detain him from the owner, after demand, such detention is unlawful, and the owner may either retake his property, or have an action of replevin or detinue; 1 Chit. Pr. 135. In these and many other like cases the owner should make a demand, and, if the possessor refuses to restore them, trover, detinue, or replevin will lie, at the option of the plaintiff. In some cases the detention becomes criminal although the taking was lawful, as in embezzlement.

There may also be a detainer of land; and this is either lawful and peaceable, or unlawful and forcible. The detainer is lawful where the entry has been lawful and the estate is held by virtue of some right. It is unlawful and forcible where the entry has been unlawful and with force, and it is retained by force against right; or even where the entry has been peaceable and lawful, if the detainer be by force and against right; as, if a tenant at will should detain with force after the will has determined, he will be guilty of a forcible detainer; 2 Chitt. Pr. 238; Com. Dig. Detainer, B 2; 8 Cow. 216; 1 Hall 240; 4 Johns. 198; 4 Bibb 501. See 45 Ala. 421; 54 Mo. 437; 83 Ill. 473. A forcible detainer is a distinct offence from a forcible entry; 8 Cow. 216. See FORCIBLE ENTRY AND DETAINDER.

In Practice. A writ or instrument, issued or made by a competent officer, authorizing the keeper of a prison to keep in his custody a person therein named. A detainer may be lodged against one within the walls of a prison, on what account soever he is there; Com. Dig. Process, E (3 B). This writ was superseded by 1 & 2 Vict. c. 110, §§ 1, 2.

DETECTIVE. One whose business it is to watch, and furnish information concerning, alleged wrongdoers by adroitly investigating their haunts and habits. In England they are usually police officers in plain clothes, and are the successors of the Bow Street runners. In this country there are usually detectives in the police department of the large cities, but the term is applied more particularly to the persons engaged in the detection of crime and the prosecution of such investigations as in England are made through the private inquiry offices. The latter correspond to the private detective agencies in the United States.

One who joins a conspiracy for the purpose of robbery, in order to expose it, and honestly carries out the plan, is not an accessory before the fact, though he encourages the others to the commission of the crime, with the intent that they shall be punished; 157 Pa. 13. See 84 Pa. 187; Tayl. Ev. § 971; Whart. Cr. Ev. § 440.

DETENTION. The act of retaining and preventing the removal of a person or property.

The detention may be occasioned by accidents, as the detention of a ship by calms, or by ice; or it may be hostile, as the detention of persons or ships in a foreign country by order of the government. In general, the detention of a ship does not change the nature of the contract; and therefore sailors will be entitled to their wages during the time of the detention; 1 Bell. Com., 5th ed. 517; Mackeldey, Civ. Law § 210; 2 Pars. Sh. & Adm. 63. See DETAINDER.

DETERMINABLE. Liable to come to an end by the happening of a contingency: as, a determinable fee.

DETERMINABLE FEE (also called a qualified or base fee). One which has a qualification subjoined to it, and which must be determined whenever the qualification annexed to it is at an end. A limitation to a man and his heirs on the part of his father affords an example of this species of estate; Littleton § 254; Co. Litt. 27 a, 220; 1 Prest. Est. 449; 2 Bla. Com. 109; Cruise, Dig. tit. 1, § 82. See 1 Washb. R. P. 62; 35 Wis. 36.

DETERMINATE. That which is ascertained; what is particularly designated: as, if I sell you my horse Napoleon, the article sold is here determined. This is very different from a contract by which I sell you a horse, without a particular designation of any horse.

DETERMINATION. The decision of a court of justice. See DECREE; JUDGMENT.

The end, the conclusion, of a right or authority: as, the determination of a lease, Com. Dig. Estates by Grant (G 10, 11, 12). The phrase "determination of will" is used of the putting an end to an estate at will. 2 Bla. Com. 146.

The determination of an authority is the end of the authority given; the end of the return-day of a writ determines the authority of the sheriff; the death of the principal determines the authority of a mere attorney.

DETERMINE. To come to an end. To bring to an end. 2 Bla. Com. 121; 1 Washb. R. P. 380.

DETINET (Lat. detinere, to detain; detinet, he detains). In Pleading. An action of debt is said to be in the detinet when it is alleged merely that the defendant withholds or unjustly detains from the plaintiff the thing or amount demanded.

The action is so brought by an executor, 1 Wms. Saund. 1; and so between the contracting parties when for the recovery of such things as a ship, horse, etc.; 3 Bla. Com. 156.

An action of replevin is said to be in the detinet when the defendant retains possession of the property until after judgment in the action; Bull. N. P. 53; Chit. Pl. 145.

It is said that anciently there was a form of writ adapted to bringing the action in this form; but it is not to be found in any of the books; 1 Chit. Pl. 145.

In some of the states of the United States, however, the defendant is allowed to retain possession upon giving a bond similar to that required of the plaintiff in the common-law form; the action is then in the detinet; 3 Sharsw. Bla. Com. 146, n.; 5 W. & S. 556; 8 Ark. 510; 2 Sandf. 68; 13 Ill. 315; 1 Dutch. 390. The jury are to find the value of the chattels in such case, as well as the damage sustained. See DEBT ET DETINET; DETINUE.

DETINUE (Lat. detinere,—de, and tenere,—to hold from; to withhold).

In Practice. A form of action which lies for the recovery, in specie, of personal chattels from one who acquired possession of them lawfully but retains it without right, together with damages for the detention. 3 Bla. Com. 151.

It is generally laid down as necessary to the maintenance of this action that the original taking should have been lawful, thus distinguishing it from replevin, which lies in case the original taking is unlawful. Brooke, Abr. Detinue, 21, 36, 63. It is said, however, by Chitty, that it lies in cases of tortious taking, except as a distress, and that it is thus distinguished from replevin, which lay originally only where a distress was made, as was claimed, wrongfully; 1 Chit. Pl. 112. See 8 Sharsw. Bla. Com. 152. In England this action has yielded to the more practical and less technical action trover, but was formerly much used in the slaveholding states of the United States for the recovery of slaves; 4 Munf. 72; 4 Ala. 221; 3 Bibb 510; 1 Ov. 187; 10 Ired. 124.

The action lies only to recover such goods as are capable of being identified and distinguished from all others; Andr. Steph. Pl. 79, n.; Com. Dig. Detinue, B, C; Co. Litt. 236 b; 1 J. J. Marsh. 500; 15 B. Monr. 479; 2 Greene 266; 5 Sneed 562; in cases where the defendant had originally lawful possession, which he retains without right; 12 Ala. 279; 2 Mo. 45; 4 B. Monr. 365; 11 Ala. N. S. 322; as where goods were delivered for application to a specific purpose; 4 B. & P. 140; but a tort in taking may be waived, it is said, and detinue brought; 2 A. K. Marsh. 233; 14 Mo. 491; 15 Ark. 235. That it lies whether the taking was tortious or not, see 18 Ala. 151; 9 Ala. N. S. 780; 1 Mo. 749. It may be maintained for the recovery of a policy of insurance where it has been paid for, but is withheld by the agent who wrote it; 40 Ill. App. 132. The property must be in existence at the time; 2 Dana 332; 1 Ala. N. S. 203; 1 Ired. 523; see 13 Mo. 612; 12 Ark. 368; but need not be in the possession of the defendant; 1 Dana 110; 5 Yerg. 301; 3 Miss. 304; 19 Ala. N. S. 491; 23 Mo. 389; 18 B. Monr. 86. See 4 Dev. & B. 458; 10 Ired. 124.

The plaintiff must have had actual possession, or a right to immediate possession; 2 Mo. 45; 1 Wash. Va. 308; 4 Bibb 518; 7 Ala. N. S. 189; 6 Ired. 88; 2 Jones, N. C. 168; 2 Md. Ch. Dec. 178; 34 Neb. 93; but a special property, as that of a bailee, with actual possession at the time of delivery to the defendant, is sufficient; 2 Wms. Saund. 47 b; 9 Leigh 158; Cam. & N. 416; 1 Miss. 315; 4 B. Monr. 365; 2 Mo. 45; 22 Ala. 534. A mere equitable claim reserved by a vendor on the sale of personal property for the unpaid purchase money, is not sufficient title to authorize a recovery in detinue; 94 Ala. 616. Either want of title in the plaintiff or the absence of actual possession in defendant, when the action was brought, will prevent plaintiff's recovery, as constructive possession in defendant from the fact that he had the title is not sufficient; 36 W. Va. 423. A demand is not requisite except to entitle the plaintiff to damages for detention between the time of the demand and that of the commencement of the action; 4 Bibb 340; 14 Mo. 491; 3 Litt. 46; 3 Munf. 122; 12 Ala. N. S. 135; 19 S. E. Rep. (N. C.) 599. See 90 Ala. 253.

The declaration may state a bailment or trover; though a simple allegation that the goods came to the defendant's hands is sufficient; Brooke, Abr. Detinue, 10. The bailment or trover alleged is not traversable; Brooke, Abr. Detinue, 1, 2, 50. It must describe the property with accuracy; 2 Ill. 206; 13 Ired. 172; 2 Greene, Ia. 266.

The plea of non detinet is the general issue, and special matter may be given in evidence under it; Co. Litt. 283; 16 E. L. & Eq. 514; 2 Munf. 329; 6 Humpl. 108; 94 Ala. 616; including title in a third person; 3 Dana 422; 12 Ala. N. S. 823; eviction, or accidental loss by a bailee; 3 Dana 36. The plea of not guilty is not appropriate; 40 Ill. App. 132.

The defendant in this action frequently prayed garnishment of a third person, who he alleged owned or had an interest in the thing demanded; but this he could not do without confessing the possession of the thing demanded, and making privy of bailment; Brooke, Abr. Garnishment, 1, Interpleader, 3. If the prayer of garnishment was allowed, a sci. fa. issued against the person named as garnishee. If he made default, the plaintiff recovered against the defendant the chattel demanded, but no damages. If the garnishee appeared, and the plaintiff made default, the garnishee recovered. If both appeared, and the plaintiff recovered, he had judgment against the defendant for the chattel demanded, and a distringas in execution; and against the garnishee a judgment for damages, and a fi. fa. in execution.

The judgment is in the alternative that the plaintiff recover the goods, or the value thereof if he cannot have the property itself; 7 Ala. N. S. 189; 5 Munf. 166; 1 Bibb 484; 7 B. Monr. 421; 8 Humphr. 406; 5 Mo. 489; 4 Ired. Eq. 118; 7 Gratt. 343; 4 Tex. 184; 34 W. Va. 639; with damages for the detention; 1 Ired. 523; 13 Mo. 612; 8 Gratt. 578; 16 Ala. N. S. 271; and full costs. One cannot recover as damages both rent or hire and the ordinary wear and tear of the property sued for, as rent and hire include ordinary wear and tear; 90 Ala. 253.

The verdict and judgment must be such that a special remedy may be had for a recovery of the goods detained, or a satisfaction in value for each parcel in case they or either of them cannot be returned; 7 Ala. N. S. 189, 807; 2 Humphr. 59; 5 Miss. 489; 4 Dana 58; 3 B. Monr. 313.

DETINUE OF GOODS IN FRANK MARRIAGE. A writ formerly available to a wife after a divorce, for the recovery of the goods given with her in marriage. Moz. & W. Dict.

DETINUEIT (Lat. he detained).

In Pleading. An action of replevin is said to be in the detinueit when the plaintiff acquires possession of the property claimed by means of the writ. The right to retain is, of course, subject in such case to the judgment of the court upon his title to the property claimed; Bull. N. P. 521.

The declaration in such case need not state the value of the goods; 6 Blackf. 469; 7 Ala. N. S. 189.

The judgment in such case is for the damage sustained by the unjust taking or detention, or both, if both were illegal, and for costs; 4 Bouvier, Inst. n. 3562.

DEUTEROGAMY. A second marriage after the death of a former husband or wife.

DEVASTATION. Wasteful use of the property of a deceased person: as, for extravagant funeral or other unnecessary expenses. 2 Bla. Com. 508.

DEVASTAVIT. The mismanagement and waste by an executor, administrator, or other trustee, of the estate and effects trusted to him as such, by which a loss occurs.

Devastavit by direct abuse takes place when the executor, administrator, or trustee sells, embezzles, or converts to his own use goods intrusted to him; Com. Dig. Administration (I 1); 101 U. S. 327; releases a claim due to the estate; 3 Bacon, Abr. 700; Cro. Eliz. 43; 7 Johns. 404; 9 Mass. 352; or surrenders a lease; 2 Johns. Cas. 376; 3 P. Wms. 330; 68 N. C. 537; below its value. These instances sufficiently show that any wilful waste of the property will be considered a direct devastavit. See 64 Cal. 35.

Devastavit by mal-administration most frequently occurs by the payment of claims which were not due nor owing, or by paying others out of the order in which they ought to be paid, or by the payment of legacies before all the debts are satisfied; 4 S. & R. 394; 5 Rawle 266; 110 Mass. 195; 84 Va. 731.

Devastavit by neglect. Negligence on the part of an executor, administrator, or trustee may equally tend to the waste of the estate as the direct destruction or mal-administration of the assets, and render him guilty of a devastavit. The neglect to sell the goods at a fair price, within a reasonable time, or, if they are perishable goods, before they are wasted, will be a devastavit; and a neglect to collect a doubtful debt which by proper exertion might have been collected will be so considered. Bacon, Abr. Executors, L. See 5 Misc. Rep. 560; 127 Pa. 360; 83 Va. 361, 791; 79 Ga. 260.

The law requires from trustees good faith and due diligence, the want of which is punished by making them responsible for the losses which may be sustained by the property intrusted to them: when, therefore, a party has been guilty of a devastavit, he is required to make up the loss out of his own estate. See Com. Dig. Administration, I; Belt, Suppl. to Ves. 209; 39 Pa. 218; 160 id. 13; 1 Johns. 396; 1 Cai. Cas. 96; Bacon, Abr. Executors, L; 11 Toullier 58. The return of nulla bona testatoris nec propria and a devastavit to the writ of execution de bonis testatoris, in an action against an executor or administrator, is called a devastavit. Upon this return the plaintiff may forthwith sue out an execution against the person or property of the executor or administrator in as full a manner as in an action against him sued in his own right. This is not, however, a common use of the word; Brown, Dict.

DEVENERUNT (Lat. devenire, to come to). A writ, now obsolete, directed to the king's escheators when any one of the king's tenants in capite dies, and when his son and heir dies within age and in the king's custody, commanding the escheat, or that by the oaths of twelve good and lawful men they shall inquire what lands or tenements by the death of the tenant have come to the king. Dy. 360; Keilw. 199 a; Blount; Cowel.

DEVEST OR DIVEST. To deprive, to take away; opposite to invest, which is to deliver possession of anything to another. Wharton.

DEVIATION. In Insurance. Varying from the risks insured against, as described in the policy, without necessity or just cause, after the risk has begun. 1 Phill. Ins. § 977; 1 Arn. Ins. 415.

Any unnecessary or unexcused departure from the usual or general mode of carrying on the voyage insured. 15 Am. L. Rev. 108. See also 9 Mass. 436.

The mere intention to deviate is not a deviation, and if not carried into effect will not vitiate a policy or exempt insurers from a loss happening before the vessel arrives at the dividing port; 3 Cra. 357; 6 id. 29. Usage, in like cases, has a great weight in determining the manner in which the risk is to be run,—the contract being understood to have implied reference thereto in the absence of specific stipulations to the contrary; 2 Pars. Ins. 6; 38 Me. 414; 30 Pa. 334; 18 Mo. 193; 19 N. Y. 372; 11 Fed. Rep. 181. A variation from risks described in the policy from a necessity which is not inexcusably incurred does not forfeit the insurance; 1 Phill. Ins. § 1018; as to seek an intermediate port for repairs necessary for the prosecution of the voyage; 1 Phill. Ins. § 1019; changing the course to avoid disaster; 1 Phill. Ins. § 1023; 2 Mas. 234; delay in order to succor the distressed at sea; 6 East 54; 2 Cra. 240, 258; if the object is to save life, otherwise, to save property merely; 1 Spra. 141; 2 Wash. C. C. 80; 1 Sumn. 328; damage merely in defence against hostile attacks; 1 Phill. Ins. § 1030; or in taking measures to repel such attacks; 2 Mas. 230. "Liberty to touch" at a particular port, reserved in the policy, does not imply liberty to remain for trading, which, if it involves delay, may amount to deviation; 7 id. 26; nor to touch and stay at a port out of the course when within the usage of the trade; 2 Pai. 82; Wall. C. Ct. 58.

Necessity alone will sanction a deviation, and the latter must be strictly commensurate with the power compelling; 7 Cra. 26; the smallest deviation without necessity discharges the underwriters, though the loss be not the immediate consequence of the deviation; 2 Wash. 254.

This subject is fully treated in 15 Am. L. Rev. 103.

Change of risk in insurance against fire, so as to render the insured subject, or its surroundings, or the use made of it, different from those specified in the application, will discharge the underwriters; Biddle, Ins. 710; 2 N. Y. 210; 7 Cush. 175; 19 Pa. 45; 13 B. Monr. 282; 23 Mo. 453; 4 Zabr. 447; 1 Dutch. 54; 4 Wis. 20.

Change of risk under a life-policy in contravention of its express provisions will defeat it, in like manner; 1 Phill. Ins. § 1039; though such a policy does not appear to have any implied conditions other than those relative to fraud common to all contracts.

The effect of a deviation in all kinds of insurance is to discharge the underwriters, whether the risk is thereby enhanced or not; and the doctrine applies to lake and river navigation as well as that of the ocean; 1 Phill. Ins. § 987; 2 Pars. Ins. 5. See INSURANCE.

In Contracts. A change made in the progress of a work from the original plan agreed upon.

When the contract is to build a house according to the original plan, and a deviation takes place, the contract must be traced as far as possible, and the additions, if any have been made, must be paid for according to the usual rate of charging; 3 B. & Ald. 47. And see 14 Ves. 413; 6 Johns.

Ch. 38; 3 Cra. 270; 9 Pick. 298; Chit. Contr. 168.

The Civil Code of Louisiana, provides that when an architect or other workman has undertaken the building of a house by the job, according to a plot agreed on between him and the owner of the ground, he cannot claim an increase of the price agreed on, on the plea of the original plot having been changed and extended, unless he can prove that such changes have been made in compliance with the wishes of the proprietor.

DEVICE. That which is devised or formed by design, a contrivance, an invention. 59 Ala. 91. See PATENT.

DEVISAVIT VEL NON. In Practice. The name of an issue sent out of a court of chancery, or one which exercises chancery or probate jurisdiction, to a court of law, to try the validity of a paper asserted and denied to be a will, to ascertain whether or not the testator did devise, or whether or not that paper was his will; 7 Bro. P. C. 437; 2 Atk. 424; 5 Pa. 21.

An application for an issue devisavit vel non is properly denied where the decided weight of evidence is in favor of the testamentary capacity of testatrix, and it appears that the two sons in whose favor the will was made cared for their mother and her estate, while the two who had been disinherited, attempted to have her declared insane; 157 Pa. 465.

DEVISE. A gift of real property by a last will and testament.

The term devise, properly and technically, applies only to real estate; the object of the devise must, therefore, be that kind of property; 1 Hill, Abr. c. 36, 62; 21 Barb. 501. But it is also sometimes improperly applied to a bequest or legacy. See 4 Kent 489; 8 Viner, Abr. 41; Com. Dig. Estates by Devise. Although the word "devise" is more specially appropriate to a gift of lands, yet the terms "bequest" and "devise" are used indifferently, and legatees may take under a devise of lands, if the context of the will shows that such was the testator's intention; 21 N. H. 515; 58 Pa. 427.

A general devise of lands will pass a reversion in fee, even though the testator has other lands which will satisfy the words of the devise, and although it be highly improbable that he had in mind such reversion; 3 P. Wms. 56; 3 Bro. P. C. 408; 4 Bro. Ch. 338; 1 Metc. Mass. 281; 8 Ves. 256.

A general devise will pass leases for years, if the testator have no other real estate upon which the will may operate; but if he have both lands in fee and lands for years, a devise of all his lands and tenements will commonly pass only the lands in fee-simple; Cro. Car. 293; 1 Ed. Ch. 151; 6 Sim. 99. But if a contrary intention appear from the will, it will prevail; 5 Ves. 540; 9 East 448.

Testator "gave, devised and bequeathed all his furniture, goods, chattels and effects, whatsoever the same may be and wheresoever situate." It was held that giving expression to the word "devise," in connection with the other terms of the will, that the gift passed all the property of the testator, whether real or personal; [1891] 3 Ch. 389.

A devise in a will can never be regarded as the execution of a power, unless that intention is manifest: as, where the will would otherwise have nothing upon which it could operate. But the devise to have that operation need not necessarily refer to the power in express terms. But where there is an interest upon which it can operate, it shall be referred to that, unless some other intention is obvious; 6 Co. 176; 6 Madd. 190; 4 Kent 334; 1 Jarm. Wills 628.

The devise of all one's lands will not generally carry the interest of a mortgagee, in premises, unless that intent is apparent; 2 Vern. 621; 3 P. Wms. 61; 1 Jarm. Wills, 633. The fact that the mortgagee is in possession is sometimes of importance in determining the purpose of the devise. But many cases hold that the interest of a mortgagee or trustee will pass by a general devise of all one's land, unless a contrary intent be shown; 13 Johns. 537; 8 Ves. 407; 1 J. & W. 494. But see 9 B. & C. 267. This is indeed the result of the modern decisions, 4 Kent 539; 1 Jarm. Wills 638. It seems clear that a devise of one's mortgages will pass the beneficial title of the mortgagee; 4 Kent 539.

Devises may be contingent or vested, after the death of the testator. They are contingent when the vesting of any estate in the devisee is made to depend upon some future event, in which case, if the event never occur, or until it does occur, no estate vests under the devise. But when the future event is referred to merely to determine the time at which the devisee shall come into the use of the estate, this does not hinder the vesting of the estate at the death of the testator; 1 Jarm. Wills, c. xxvi., and numerous cases cited. The law favors that construction of the will which will vest the estate; 21 Pick. 311; 1 W. & S. 205. But this construction must not be carried to such an extent as to defeat the manifest intent of the testator; 21 Pick. 311; 7 Metc. 171. Where the estate is given absolutely, but only the time of possession is deferred, the devisee or legatee acquires a transmissible interest although he never arrive at the age to take possession; 1 Ves. Sen. 44, 59, 118; 4 Pick. 198; 7 Metc. 173. See LAPSED DEVISE; WILL; LEGACY; CHARGE.

DEVISEE. A person to whom a devise has been made.

All persons who are in rerum natura, and even embryos, may be devisees, unless excepted by some positive law. But the devisee must be in existence, except in case of devises to charitable uses; Story, Eq. Jur. §§ 1146, 1160; 2 Washb. R. P. 688; 2 How. 127; 4 Wheat. 33, 49. See CHARITABLE USES. In general, he who can acquire property by his labor and industry may receive a devise; Cam. & N. 353. Femes covert, infants, aliens, and persons of non-sane memory may be devisees; 4 Kent 506; 2 Wms. Ex. 269, n.; 1 Harr. Del. 524. Corporations in England and in some of the United States can be devisees only to a limited extent; 2 Washb. R. P. 687.

DEVISOR. A testator. One who devises real estate.

Any person who can sell an estate may, in general, devise it; and there are some disabilities to a sale which are not such to a devise.

DEVOIR. Duty. It is used in the statute of 2 Ric. II. c. 3, in the sense of duties or customs.

DEVOLUTION. In Ecclesiastical Law. The transfer, by forfeiture, of a right and power which a person has to another, on account of some act or negligence of the person who is vested with such right or power; for example, when a person has the right of presentation and he does not present within the time prescribed, the right devolves on his next immediate superior. Ayliffe, Parerg. 331. See 3 App. Cas. 520.

DEVOLVE. To pass from a person dying to a person living. 1 Mylne & K. 648.

DI COLONA. In Maritime Law. The contract which takes place between the owner of a ship, the captain, and the mariners, who agree that the voyage shall be for the benefit of all. The term is used in the Italian law. Targa, cc. 36, 37; Emerigon, Mar. Loans, s. 5.

The New England whalers are owned and navigated in this manner and under this species of contract. The captain and his mariners are all interested in the profits of the voyage in certain proportion, in the same manner as the captain and crew of a privateer, according to the agreement between them. Such agreements were very common in former times, all the mariners and the masters being interested in the voyage. It is necessary to know this in order to understand many of the provisions of the laws of Oleron, Wisbuy, the Consolato del Mare, and other ancient codes of maritime and commercial law. Hall, Mar. Loans 42.

DICTATE. To pronounce, word by word, what is meant to be written by another. It is thus defined in the Louisiana code, which provides that the testator may dictate his will; 6 Mart. N. s. 143. The presentation, by testator, of an instrument which he has caused to be written, declaring it to be his will, may sometimes supply the want of dictation; 16 La. Ann. 219.

DICTATOR. In Roman Law. A magistrate at Rome invested with absolute power. His authority over the lives and fortunes of the citizens was without bounds. His office continued but for six months. Hist. de la Jur. Dig. 1. 2. 18, 1. 1. 1.

DICTORES. Arbitrators.

DICTUM (also, Obiter Dictum). An opinion expressed by a court, but which, not being necessarily involved in the case, lacks the force of an adjudication.

It frequently happens that, in assigning its opinion upon a question before it, the court discusses collateral questions and expresses a decided opinion upon them. Such opinions, however, are frequently given without much reflection or without previous argument at the bar; and as, moreover, they do not enter into the adjudication of the point at issue they have only that authority which may be accorded to the opinion, more or less deliberate, of the individual judge who announces it. Chase, Bla. Com. 36, n. It may be observed that in recent times, particularly in those jurisdictions where appeals are largely favored, the ancient practice of courts in this respect is much modified. Formerly, judges aimed to confine their opinion to the precise point involved, and were glad to make that point as narrow as it might justly be. Where appeals are frequent, however, a strong tendency may be seen to fortify the judgment given with every principle that can be invoked in its behalf,—those that are merely collateral, as well as those that are necessarily involved. In some courts of last resort, also, when there are many judges, it is not unfrequently the case that, while the court come to one and the same conclusion, the different judges may be led to that conclusion by different views of the law, so that it becomes difficult to determine what is to be regarded as the principle upon which the case was decided and what shall be deemed mere dicta.

It is not easy to define the term with such precision as to afford an exact criterion by which to decide when the language of a court or judge is entitled to be considered as a precedent and followed as an authority. Judicial references to the subject indicate that expressions which would be included under the term dicta are nevertheless afterwards treated by other courts with respect if not with the binding force of adjudicated cases. Possibly no better definition can be found than that of Folger, J., in 62 N. Y. 68: “Dicta are the opinions of a judge which do not embody the resolution or determination of the court, and, made without argument or full consideration of the point, are not the professed, deliberate determinations of the judge himself; obiter dicta are such opinions uttered by the way, not upon the point or question pending, as if turning aside for the time from the main topic of the case to collateral subjects.”

The general rule, broadly stated by the United States supreme court, is that to make an opinion a decision “there must have been an application of the judicial mind to the precise question necessary to be determined to fix the rights of the parties, . . . and, therefore, this court has never held itself bound by any part of an opinion which was not needful to the ascertainment of the question between the parties.” Per Curtis, J., in 16 How. 287. And in Cohen v. Virginia, when the case of Marbury v. Madison was very earnestly pressed upon the attention of the court, Marshall, C. J., said: “It is a maxim not to be disregarded that general expressions in every opinion are to be taken in connection with the case in which those expressions are used. If they go beyond the case, they may be respected, but ought not to control the judgment in a subsequent case when the very point is presented;” 6 Wheat. 399. In 3 How. 292, Catron, J., dissenting, strongly criticised the majority of the court for a long discussion of the power of a court as to which they decided that they had no authority to review its decisions. In a later case the same court said, in reference to an allusion to the opinion in a case previously decided, “This was the only question before the court and the decision is authority only to the extent of the case before it; . . . if more was intended by the judge who delivered the opinion it was purely obiter,” 96 U. S. 211. The great powers and peculiar functions included in the constitutional powers of that court, as well as the conclusiveness of its judgments as declarations of constitutional construction, make it not only proper but essential that its decisions should be confined to the points necessarily involved in the case and embraced in the argument. And the same reasons not only warrant but require a rigid exclusion of mere dicta from the category of authorities. The reason for the enforcement of the rule, as against expressions of opinion upon points not fairly raised by the case, is very well stated by the supreme court of Pennsylvania: “What I have said or written outside of the case trying, or shall say or write in such circumstances, may be taken as my opinion at the time, without argument or full consideration; but I will not consider myself bound by it when the point is fairly trying and fully argued and considered.” Per Huston, J., 17 S. & R. 287.

According to the more rigid rule, any expression of opinion however deliberate upon a question however fully argued, if not essential to the disposition that was made of the case, may be regarded as a dictum; but it is, on the other hand, said that it is difficult to see why, in a philosophical point of view, the opinion of the court is not so persuasive on all the points which were so involved in the cause that it was the duty of counsel to argue them, and which were deliberately passed over by the court, as if the decision had hung upon but one point; 1 Abbott, N. Y. Dig. pref. iv. And a judicious text writer has said that “the line must not be too sharply drawn;” Wells, Res. Adj. & Sta. Dec. § 581. The fact that a decision might have been rested upon a different ground, and even a more satisfactory one, does not place the actual decision, on a ground arising, in the category of a dictum; 4 Heisk. 419.

But even when the point ruled was not directly and necessarily in issue, there are distinctions drawn as to the relative authority of judicial expressions of opinion comprehended under the general term dicta, as used in its broadest sense. An expression of opinion upon a point involved in a case, argued by counsel and deliberately passed upon by the court, though not essential to the disposition of the case, if a dictum, should be considered as a judicial dictum as distinguished from a mere obiter dictum, i. e. an expression originating alone with the judge writing the opinion, as an argument or illustration; 60 Wis. 264. What was, in strictness, a dictum of Mr. Justice McLean has been extensively commented on, treated, and in several cases followed, as an authority. The suit was on a bond of a U. S. officer, and the question was when a resignation took effect, it being claimed that for default after resignation the surety was not liable. The court held the resignation to be a conditional one, and went on to discuss the right of resignation and the necessity of acceptance or power of rejection, reaching the conclusion that an unqualified resignation required no acceptance and would have discharged the surety; 1 McLean 509. This case having been cited to that point it was contended that it was a mere dictum. After defining dictum the supreme court of Nevada held "that while technically such, it was not liable to the objections usually urged,—it was the expression of opinion on a point argued, and entitled to far more weight than an ordinary dictum on a point not discussed and remotely connected with the case." 3 Neb. 565. The same case was followed in 6 Cal. 28; 49 Ala. 402; and is commented on and treated as an authority without being characterized as a dictum in 103 U. S. 471 and 31 N. J. L. 107.

So also it has been held, with respect to a court of last resort, that all that is needed to render its decision authoritative is that there was an application of the judicial mind to the precise question adjudged; and that the point was investigated with care and considered in its fullest extent; 5 Md. 488; and that when a question of general interest is involved, and is fully discussed and submitted by counsel, and the court decides the question with a view to settle the law, the decision cannot be considered a dictum; id.

When a question is involved in the case, though not in the particular phase of it, at the time before the court, the language of the court is not a mere dictum. When a will was offered for probate the question of its validity, so far as regarded charitable uses, was involved, and what was said as to that was not obiter; 107 U. S. 174; although a point may not have been exhaustively argued a decision upon it cannot be said to be obiter dictum when it was upon a question raised by a demurrer upon which the court distinctly expressed an opinion; 26 Md. 488.

The expressions of courts and judges which fall within the general designation of dicta are accorded more or less weight as they agree with, or run counter to, the current of authority, and, like the adjudications of courts in other jurisdictions, not direct authorities, they are always considered with reference to the judicial reputation and experience of their authors. Referring to a case cited in a dictum Lord Mansfield said, "This dictum of Lord C. J. Holt's is no formed decisive resolution; no adjudication; no professed or deliberate determination . . ."; then after citing cases contra he continued, "therefore this mere obiter dictum ought not to weigh against the settled direct authority of the cases which have been deliberately and upon argument determined the other way." 2 Burr. 2064. "Dicta of judges upon matters not argued or directly before them, have had more importance attached to them than, in my opinion, they ought to have had; but such expressions, falling from such a man as Lord Hardwicke, may be safely relied upon to show that, at that time, the idea of a larger legacy being adeemed by a smaller portion was not familiar to his mind. It is the more important to keep this dictum of Lord Hardwicke in mind because another dictum of that very eminent judge . . . is relied upon in support of the supposed rule." Ld. Ch. Cottenham, in 1 Russ. 27. Consult 1 Phill. Eccl. 406; 1 Eng. Eccl. 129; Ram, Judgm. 36; Willes 666; 1 H. Bla. 53; 2 B. & P. 375; 7 Pa. 287; 3 B. & Ald. 341; 2 Bingh. 90. The doctrine of the courts of France on this subject is stated in 11 Toullier 177, n. 133.

In French Law. The report of a judgment made by one of the judges who has given it. Pothier, Proc. Civ. pl. 1, c. 5, art. 2.

DIEM CLAUSIT EXTREMUM (Lat. he has closed his last day,—died). A writ which formerly lay on the death of a tenant in capite, to ascertain the lands of which he died seised, and reclaim them into the king's hands. It was directed to the king's escheators. Fitzh. N. B. 251, K; 2 Reeve, Hist. Eng. Law 327.

A writ of the same name, issuing out of the exchequer after the death of a debtor of the king, to levy the debt of the lands or goods of the heir, executor, or administrator. Termes de la Ley. This writ is still in force in England. 3 Steph. Com. 667.

DIES (Lat.). A day; days. Days for appearance in court. Provisions or maintenance for a day. The king's rents were anciently reserved by so many days' provisions. Spelman, Gloss.; Cowel; Blount.

DIES AMORIS (Lat.). A day of favor. If obtained after a default by the defendant, it amounted to a waiver of the default. Co. Litt. 135 a; 2 Reeve, Hist. Eng. Law 60. The appearance day of the term, or quarto die post, was also so called.

DIES COMMUNES IN BANCO (Lat.). Regular days for appearance in court; called, also, common return-days. 2 Reeve, Hist. Eng. Law 57.

DIES DATUS (Lat. a day given). A day or time given to a defendant in a suit, which is in fact a continuance of the cause. It is so called when given before a declaration. When it is allowed afterwards, it assumes the name of imparlance, which see.

Dies datus in banco, a day in bank. Co. Litt. 135. Dies datus partibus, a continuance; dies datus prece partium, a day given on prayer of the parties.

DIES DOMINICUS. The Lord's day; Sunday.

DIES FASTI (Lat.). In Roman Law. Days on which courts might be held and judicial and other business legally transacted. Calvinus, Lex.; Anthon, Rom. Ant. 3 Bla. Com. 275, 424.

DIES GRATIÆ (Lat.). In Old English Law. Days of grace. Co. Litt. 134 b.

DIES NEFASTI (Lat.). In Roman Law. Days on which it was unlawful to transact judicial affairs, and on which the courts were closed. Anthon, Rom. Ant.; Calvinus, Lex.; 1 Kaufmann, Mackeld. 24; 3 Bla. Com. 275.

DIES NON (Lat.). An abbreviation of the phrase dies non juridicus, universally used to denote nonjudicial days. Days during which courts do not transact any business; as, Sunday, or the legal holidays. 3 Chitty, Gen. Pr. 104; W. Jones 156. Sunday was the original dies non, but in many states days declared by statute to be legal holidays are also such, but the decisions on this subject depend largely upon the terms and scope of the statutes, many of which apply solely to the presentment and payment of commercial paper, and others include a prohibition of judicial business and provide for the closing of public offices.

A distinction was made in 9 Co. 66 between judicial and ministerial acts performed on a dies non; this was overruled in 1 Stra. 337; but the distinction now obtains; 5 Cent. L. J. 26. And under a statute forbidding the transaction of any judicial business on Sunday or a legal holiday, the issuing on such a day of an attachment by a county judge for a claim not due was held to be "judicial" business and void; 54 N. W. Rep. (Neb.) 253; but an attachment for a claim past due was held to be valid, as a ministerial, and not a judicial act; 55 N. W. Rep. (Neb.) 227.

It has usually been held that a verdict may be received on a dies non; 3 Watts 56; 14 Ind. 39; 23 Tex. App. 42; 32 Tex. Cr. R. 119; but a judgment entered on such verdict on the same day is void; 8 Ill. 368; 15 Johns. 118. See 36 Ind. 466; 34 N. H. 202; 17 Pick. 106; 74 N. C. 187; 92 Tenn. 476; 36 Neb. 218. A judgment by confession entered upon December 25, a legal holiday, is not void; 45 Ill. App. 326. In Kentucky although Thanksgiving day is a legal holiday, it is not treated as the Christian Sabbath, except as to commercial paper, and where money becomes due on such a day, the debtor is in default if he fails to pay on that day; 85 Ky. 88. A bill of exceptions signed on Sunday is void; 137 Ind. 697. Warrants for treason, felony, and breach of the peace may be executed on Sunday; 74 N. C. 187. Where public policy or the prevention of irremediable wrong requires it, the courts may sit on Sunday and issue process; 13 Am. L. Reg. N. S. 747; S. C. 64 Ill. 243. See a full article on this title in 7 So. L. Rev. N. S. 697. See SUNDAY; HOLIDAYS.

DIES NON JURIDICUS (Lat.). Nonjudicial days. See DIES NON.

DIET. A general assembly is sometimes so called on the continent of Europe. 1 Bla. Com. 147.

DIETS OF COMPEARANCE. In Scotland. The days within which parties in civil and criminal prosecutions are cited to appear. Bell.

DIGEST. A compilation arranged in an orderly manner.

The name is given to a great variety of topical compilations, abridgments, and analytical indices of reports, statutes, etc. When reference is made to the Digest, the Pandects of Justinian are intended, they being the authoritative compilation of the civil law. As to this Digest and the mode of citing it, see PANDECTS. Other digests are referred to by their distinctive names. For some account of digests of the civil and canon law, and those of Indian law, see CIVIL LAW, CODE, and CANON LAW.

The digests of English and American law are for the most part deemed not authorities, but simply manuals of reference, by which the reader may find his way to the original cases which are authorities. 1 Burr. 364; 2 Wils. 1, 2. Some of them, however, which have been the careful work of scholarly lawyers, possess an independent value as original repositories of the law. Bacon's Abridgment, which has long been deservedly popular in this country, and Comyns's Digest, also often cited, are examples of these. The earlier English digests are those of Statham (Hen. VI.), Fitzherbert, 1516, Brooke, 1573, Rolle, Danvers, Nelson, Viner, and Petersdorf. Of these Rolle and Viner are still not unfrequently cited, and some others rarely. The several digests by Coventry & Hughes, Harrison, Fisher, Jacobs, and Chitty, together with the subsequent annual digests of Emden and of Mews, afford a convenient index for the American reader to the English reports. In most of the United States one or more digests of the state reports have been published, and in some of them digests or topical arrangements of the statutes. There are also digests of the federal reports, the federal statutes, and one known as the United States Digest, with the annual volumes from 1873 to 1889 and the American Digest and the General Digest subsequent to that date, which cover the reports of the federal and state courts together. Dane's Abridgment of American Law has been commended by high authority (Story's article in N. Am. Rev. July, 1826), but it has not maintained a position as a work of general use. There are also numerous digests of cases on particular titles of the law.

DIGGING. Has been held as synonymous with excavating, and not confined to the removal of earth. 1 N. Y. 316.

DIGNITARY. In Ecclesiastical Law. An ecclesiastic who holds a dignity or benefice which gives him some pre-eminence over mere priests and canons, such as a bishop, archbishop, prebendary, etc. Swift; Burn, Law Dict.

DIGNITIES. In English Law. Titles of honor.

They are considered as incorporeal hereditaments. The character of our government forbids their admission into the republic.

DILACION. In Spanish Law. The time granted by law or by the judge to parties litigant for the purpose of answering a demand or proving some disputed fact.

DILAPIDATION. A species of ecclesiastical waste which occurs whenever the incumbent suffers any edifices of his ecclesiastical living to go to ruin or decay. It is either voluntary, by pulling down, or permissive, by suffering the church, parsonage-houses, and other buildings thereunto belonging, to decay. And the remedy for either lies either in the spiritual court, where the canon law prevails, or in the courts of common law. It is also held to be good cause of deprivation if the bishop, parson, or other ecclesiastical person dilapidates buildings or cuts down timber growing on the patrimony of the church, unless for necessary repairs; and that a writ of prohibition will also lie against him in the common-law courts. 3 Bla. Com. 91.

DILATORY DEFENCE. In Chancery Practice. One the object of which is to dismiss, suspend, or obstruct the suit, without touching the merits, until the impediment or obstacle insisted on shall be removed.

DILATORY PLEA. One which goes to defeat the particular action brought, merely, and which does not answer as to the general right of the plaintiff. See PLEA.

DILIGENCE. The degree of care and attention which the law exacts from a person in a particular situation or a given relation to another person. The word finds its most frequent application in the law of Bailments and of Negligence. Indeed it may be termed the correlative of negligence.

In the law of bailment, three degrees of diligence have been recognized, viz.: slight, ordinary, and great.

In order to avoid liability for negligence either in contract or tort it is said to be a "general rule that every one is bound to exercise due care towards his neighbors in his acts and conduct, or rather omits or falls short of it at his peril; the peril, namely, of being liable to make good whatever harm may be a proved consequence of the default;" Poll. Torts 533. What constitutes "due diligence" depends very much upon the facts of each particular case. It will depend upon the relation of the parties and the obligations which the law implies from it, the risk or danger, either apparent or which may be apprehended by the exercise of his faculties by a man of ordinary prudence.

The failure or omission to exercise due diligence is sometimes a ground of liability both in contract and tort, as when there is a misfeasance in the execution of a contract from which there results a common-law liability. 1 Chit. Pl. 135. See NEGLIGENCE; BAILEE.

In Scotch Law. Process. Execution. Diligence against the heritage. A writ of execution by which the creditor proceeds against the real estate of the debtor.

Diligence incident. A writ or process for citing witnesses and examining havers. It is equivalent to the English subpoena for witnesses and rule or order for examination of parties and for interrogatories.

Diligence to examine havers. A process to obtain testimony: equivalent to a bill of discovery in chancery, or a rule to compel oral examination and a subpoena duces tecum at common law.

Diligence against the person. A writ of execution by which the creditor proceeds against the person of the debtor: equivalent to the English ca. sa.

Second diligence. Second letters issued where the first have been disregarded. A similar result is produced in English practice by the attachment for contempt.

Summary diligence. Diligence issued in a summary manner, like an execution of a warrant of attorney, cognovit actionem, and the like, in English practice.

Diligence against witnesses. Process to compel the attendance of witnesses: equivalent to the English subpoena. See PATERSON, Comp.; Bell.

DIME (Lat. decem, ten). A silver coin of the United States, of the value of ten cents, or one-tenth of the dollar.

DIMINUTION OF THE RECORD. In Practice. Incompleteness of the record of a case sent up from an inferior to a superior court.

When this exists, the parties may suggest a diminution of the record, and pray a writ of certiorari to the justices of the court below to certify the whole record; Tidd, Pr. 1109; 1 S. & R. 472; Co. Entr. 232; 8 Viner, Abr. 552; Cro. Jac. 597; Cro. Car. 91; 1 Ala. 20; 4 Dev. 575; 1 D. & B. 382; 1 Munf. 119. See CERTIORARI.

DIOCESE. The territorial extent of a bishop's jurisdiction. The circuit of every bishop's jurisdiction. Co. Litt. 94; 1 Bla. Com. 111; 2 Burn, Eccl. Law 158.

DIOCESAN COURTS. See CONSTITUTIONAL COURTS.

DIPLOMA. An instrument of writing, executed by a corporation or society, certifying that a certain person therein named is entitled to a certain distinction therein mentioned.

It is usually granted by learned institutions to their members or to persons who have studied in them.

Proof of the seal of a medical institution and of the signatures of its officers thereto affixed, by comparison with the seal and signatures attached to a diploma received by the witness from the same institution, has been held to be competent evidence of the genuineness of the instrument, although the witness never saw the officers write their names; 25 Wend. 469.

This word, which is also written diploma, in the civil law signifies letters issued by a prince. They are so called it is supposed, a duplicatis tabellis, to which Ovid is thought to allude, 1 Amor. 12, 2, 27, when he says, Tunc ego vos duplices rebus pro nomine sensi. Sueton. in Augustum, c. 26. Seals also were called Diplomata. Vicat, Diploma.

DIPLOMACY. The science which treats of the relations and interests of nations with nations.

DIPLOMATIC AGENTS. Public officers who have been commissioned according to law to superintend and transact the affairs of the government which has employed them, in a foreign country. Vattel, liv. 4, c. 5.

The agents were formerly of divers orders and known by different denominations. Those of the first order were almost the perfect representatives of the government by which they were commissioned: such were legates, nuncios, internuncios, ambassadors, ministers, plenipotentiaries. Those of the second order did not so fully represent their government: they were envoys, residents, ministers, chargés d'affaires, and consuls. The classification of these agents, now so far sanctioned as to be considered a rule of international law, was agreed upon at the Congress of Vienna in 1815 and modified by that of Aix-la-Chapelle in 1818. There are (1) ambassadors, ordinary and extraordinary, legates, and nuncios; (2) envoys, ministers, or others accredited to sovereigns; (3) ministers resident, accredited to sovereigns; (4) chargés d'affaires, and other diplomatic agents accredited to ministers of foreign affairs (whether bearing the title of minister or not), and consuls charged with diplomatic duties. See the several titles and Davis, Int. Law ch. vii.

DIPLOMATICS. The art of judging of ancient charters, public documents, or diplomas, and discriminating the true from the false. Encyc. Lond.

DIPSOMANIA. In Medical Jurisprudence. A mental disease characterized by an uncontrollable desire for intoxicating drinks. An irresistible impulse to indulge in intoxication, either by alcohol or other drugs. 19 Neb. 614. How far the law will hold a party responsible for acts committed while the mind is overwhelmed by the effects of liquor so taken is an open question. See DRUNKENNESS.

DIRECT. Straightforward; not collateral. 6 Blatchf. 533. The direct line of descent is formed by a series of relationships between persons who descend successively one from the other.

Evidence is termed direct which applies immediately to the fact to be proved, without any intervening process as distinguished from circumstantial, which applies immediately to collateral facts supposed to have a connection, near or remote, with the fact in controversy.

The examination in chief of a witness is called the direct examination.

DIRECTING THE VERDICT. See VERDICT; JURY.

DIRECTION. The order and government of an institution; the persons who compose the board of directors are jointly called the direction.

Direction, in another sense, is nearly synonymous with instruction (q. v.).

In Practice. The instruction of a jury by a judge on a point of law, so that they may apply it to the facts before them. See CHARGE.

That part of a bill in chancery which contains the address of the bill to the court: this must, of course, contain the appropriate and technical description of the court. See BILL.

DIRECTOR OF THE MINT. An officer appointed by the president of the United States, by and with the advice and consent of the senate. He is the chief officer of the bureau of the mint and is under the general direction of the secretary of the treasury. He has the control and management of the mint, the superintendence of the officers and persons employed therein, and the general regulation and superintendence of the business of the several branch mints and of the assay offices. Act of Congress, Feb. 12, 1873, U. S. Rev. Stat. § 343.

DIRECTORY STATUTE. See STATUTE.

DIRECTORS. Persons appointed or elected according to law, authorized to manage and direct the affairs of a corporation or company. The directors collectively form the board of directors.

They are generally invested with certain powers by the charter of the corporation, and it is believed that there is no instance of a corporation created by statute without provision for such a board of control, whether under the name of directors, or, as they are sometimes termed, managers or trustees, —the latter designation being more frequent in religious or charitable corporations. A recent comprehensive work on corporations states that the author has likewise found no instance in which these officers were wanting; 3 Thomp. Corp. § 3850. But the power to elect directors has been held to be inherent and not dependent upon statute; 62 Wis. 590.

As to the nature of the office and its powers very different views have been held, and each is sustained by high authority. They have been held to be the corporation itself "to all purposes of dealing with others" and not to "exercise a delegated authority in the sense which applies to agents or attorneys;" Shaw, C. J., in 2 Metc. 163. Another view, and probably the one which is the best settled conclusion of judicial opinion in this country, is that they are general agents; 61 Pa. 202; 48 Vt. 266; 86 Ill. 220; 13 N. Y. 599; 24 Conn. 591; 3 Thomp. Corp. § 3968. The question is of importance with respect to the power of directors to act outside of the home state of the corporation, in order to do which, they must act as agents; 13 Pet. 519; 11 Ind. 398; 6 Conn. 428. They are undoubtedly, in a certain sense, agents, but they are agents of the corporation, not of the stockholders; they derive their powers from the charter. They alone have the management of the affairs of the corporation, free from direct interference on the part of the stockholders; 5 W. & S. 246; 12 Wheat. 113; 1 Disn. 84. The stockholders cannot perform any acts connected with the ordinary affairs of the corporation; 12 Barb. 27, 63; the delegation of powers to the directors excludes control by the stockholders; 2 Col. 565. See 8 Wheat. 357; 2 Cal. 381; 33 Cal. 11.

It has been said that directors are special agents of the corporation, and not general agents; 52 Barb. 389; and this is the view which it is said that in England "the ingenuity of the bench has been taxed to demonstrate;" 3 Thomp. Corp. § 3969; Lindl. Partn., 4th ed. 249. Among the cases relied on as supporting this view are, 6 Exch. 796; 8 C. B. 849; 6 H. L. Cas. 401; L. R. 5 Eq. 316; but the distinction has been said not to be very satisfactory; per Comstock, J., in 13 N. Y. 599. See Green's Brice, Ultra Vires 470, n. Although the weight of authority is as stated, it is nevertheless important to keep in view the different theories held, in order to weigh accurately the authorities upon the powers of directors, and to distinguish between them when they are to be applied to a particular case. Directors have no common-law powers; 3 Thomp. Corp. § 3973; but only granted ones, although in dealing with corporations courts sometimes ascribe to the directors certain powers, termed implied powers, which, however, in fact amount to no more than a recognition by the courts of the usages of business and acts done in the course of business; id. But they have no power to make changes in the fundamental law of the corporation, their relation to it being analogous to that of a legislature to the constitution of the state; id. § 3979. Accordingly, their power to make such changes must be derived from the charter. They may not change the membership or capital of the corporation by increasing either; 18 Wall. 233; 3 Whart. 228; 72 Mo. 424; or reducing the capital; 3 La. 568; R. M. T. Charl. 260; nor make by-laws unless specially authorized; 56 Mo. App. 145; nor request or accept amendments to the charter; 9 La. Ann. 341; 44 Mo. 570; 18 N. J. Eq. 178; 2 Conn. 573; (but see contra, 1 Disney, Ohio 84, which is doubted, 3 Thomp. Corp. § 3980, n. 7). They may alien property in the course of business; 3 Thomp. Corp. § 3984 (and see note on this subject 59 Am. Rep. 466); or mortgage corporate property; 13 Metc. 437; 36 Vt. 453; 35 Me. 491; 14 Allen 381; 19 N. Y. 207; or make an assignment for the benefit of creditors; 8 Gill 59; and see Thomp. Corp. chs. 145 and 146, which discusses this subject and the validity of preferential assignments by directors in favor of others and of themselves. They cannot give away corporate property; 48 Pa. 20; 24 Me. 490; nor sell the stock at less than par; 1 Biss. 246; in money or money's worth; 7 Mo. App. 210 (but see 133 U. S. 417; 2 Thomp. Corp. § 1665; STOCK); nor, as a general rule, become surety, accommodation indorser, or guarantor; 3 Thomp. Corp. § 3990; but under urgent necessity their assumption of a debt of another to secure from the common creditors an extension for themselves has been held justified; 34 Vt. 134. See 23 How. 381. In the usual course of business they have a general power to borrow money; 8 Wheat. 338; 12 S. & R. 256; and secure it by assigning securities owned by the corporation; 79 Wis. 31; and one so dealing with them is not affected with knowledge of a breach of trust by them; 37 Fed. Rep. 394. They may make, accept, or indorse negotiable paper; 13 Pick. 291; 21 id. 270; 29 Me. 133; but a single director is not authorized to make corporate notes; 41 Barb. 575. They may determine the salaries of officers of the corporation; 37 Vt. 608. Under the English decisions the powers of corporations with respect to borrowing money, and making notes are now restricted; 3 Thomp. Corp. § 3989, n. 3.

As to the effect of ultra vires acts of directors, the general principle is that they do not bind the corporation or the stockholders unless ratified or unless circumstances of equitable estoppel exist; 3 Thomp. Corp. § 3999; which see for a discussion of this subject and also, id. § 5967, and ULTRA VIRES. Their acts are not voidable for mere errors of judgment; 43 Fed. Rep. 483; 13 Colo. 534; even though absurd, if honest; 71 Pa. 11; 86 Ky. 330.

While directors are not strictly trustees, yet they occupy a fiduciary position; 21 Wall. 616; 59 Me. 277; 48 Cal. 398; 54 N. Y. 314; 2 Black 715; 71 Pa. 11; 5 Sawy. 403; 8 Baxt. 103; 1 Edw. Ch. 513; 9 Bush 468; S. c. Zinn, Cas. on Trusts 466, and 4 Am. Corp. Cas. 404; 14 Mich. 477; 8 Kan. 466; 24 N. J. Eq. 463; 30 W. Va. 443; Moraw. Priv. Corp. 516; and by some very leading authorities they are termed trustees; Walworth, Ch., in 3 Paige 222; Hardwicke, Ld. Ch., in 2 Atk. 400. The director of a corporation cannot buy the corporate property at a judicial sale; 2 Pa. Dist. R. 629. Directors also occupy a fiduciary relation to creditors, for whom they have been said to be quasi trustees, and when the corporation becomes insolvent, they become trustees for the creditors and stockholders; 1 Holmes 433; 53 Cal. 306; 37 Tex. 660. When directors of an insolvent corporation confessed a judgment against it in favor of one of themselves to give him an advantage by priority of lien over another creditor, about to obtain judgment, the preference was not permitted and the two judgments were placed upon the same footing; 9 Fed. Rep. 532. See Thomp. Liab. of Dir. 397; 18 Ohio St. 169. Directors are held personally responsible for acts of misfeasance or gross negligence, or for fraud and breach of trust; L. R. 5 H. L. 480; 50 Vt. 477; 71 Pa. 11; 68 Law T. 380; 3 Fed. Rep. 817; 17 Cent. L. J. (N. J. Ch.) 433. An action to enforce this responsibility must be brought on behalf of all the stockholders, and not by a single one; 83 Pa. 19; and cannot be brought by a creditor; 8 W. Va. 530. Directors are not liable for the fraud of agents employed by them; 26 W. R. 147; Thomp. Liab. of Dir. 355.

It is their duty to use their best efforts to promote the interests of the stockholders, and they cannot acquire any adverse interests; 4 Dill. 330; 53 Cal. 466; s. c. 31 Am. Rep. 62; 59 Me. 277; 21 Kan. 365. A director may become a creditor of a corporation, where his action is not tainted with fraud or other improper act; 37 Fed. Rep. 394. It is said to be the rule that contracts made by a director with his company are voidable; L. R. 6 H. L. 189; 4 Dill. 330; 79 Pa. 168; 36 Mich. 263; 91 U. S. 587; 44 Cal. 106. In many instances the courts have held them absolutely void. In a leading English case in the house of lords the view was taken that the directors were agents of the corporation and could not be permitted to enter into engagements or have any personal interest which might possibly conflict with the interests of the corporation, and that no question could be raised as to the fairness or unfairness of such a contract; 1 McQ. H. L. (Sc.) 461; and in several American cases taking this view it is considered that directors were subject to the rule applying to all persons standing in relations of trust and involving duties inconsistent with their dealing with the trust property as their own; 22 N. Y. 327; 36 Ind. 60; 64 Wis. 639. A recent high authority says, "there is no sound principle of law or equity which prohibits" such contracts, if entered into in good faith, and where there is a quorum of directors on the other side of the contract present, so that the adoption of the measure does not depend on the vote of the interested director, and even in the latter case the contract is good at law. Because, however, he is on both sides of it equity will closely scrutinize it and set it aside if it violates the good faith which the circumstances require; 3 Thomp. Corp. § 4059; but in many cases contracts of a corporation with directors, fairly made, have been upheld; 43 Fed. Rep. 483; 51 id. 33; 113 U. S. 322; 134 id. 688; 80 N. Y. 527; 43 Mich. 105; 47 Conn. 47. The true rule to be ascertained from the cases is probably, that as to such contract there is a presumption of invalidity which casts upon the party claiming under such contracts the burden of showing that no undue advantage was taken or resulted from the relation, and the evidence must clearly show such fairness and good faith; 134 N. Y. 240; 122 id. 177; 125 id. 263; 103 U. S. 651; 146 id. 536; 30 N. J. Eq. 702. Accordingly, the more reasonable view is that first stated, and it is supported by the weight of American authority; 3 Thomp. Corp. § 4061; but courts holding the extreme view that such contracts are void will not enforce the fairest contract if the corporation exercises the option to set it aside; id.

Some courts take the view that in all cases of such contracts their nature and terms and the circumstances under which they were made must be taken into consideration, and that after having been subjected to careful scrutiny they will be enforced if for the benefit of the corporation; 56 Ia. 178; 41 Fed. Rep. 736; 123 Pa. 503; 19 Vt. 187. A corporation acting in good faith and with the sole object of continuing a business which promises to be successful, may give a mortgage to directors who have lent their credit to it, in order to induce a continuance of that credit, and to obtain renewals of maturing paper at a time when it is in fact a going business and expects to continue in business, although its assets may not in fact equal its indebtedness; 157 U. S. 312. See, generally, on the subject of contracts between the directors and the corporation, 3 Thomp. Corp. §§ 4059 to 4075. Note by J. C. Harper, 20 Fed. Rep. 175, and one by Francis Wharton, 17 id. 53. This rule extends even to cases where a majority of directors in one corporation contract with another corporation in which they are directors; Green's Brice, Ultra Vires 479, n.; 93 Mo. 485. In a leading case on this subject a railroad company desired to purchase the property of a canal company, both companies having the same president, who by a purchase of a majority of the stock of the canal company at nominal rates obtained the election of directors favorable to the railroad company. Through legal proceedings, which were in fact collusive, the railroad company purchased the canal property at a price which was alleged by stockholder and creditor to be grossly inadequate. On bill filed to set aside the sale the court said:—"Without attempting to decide as to the power of directors, in the absence of authority given by the stockholders, to fix a price or compensation for the property so sought to be appropriated, it is enough to say that this is not such an agreement as equity will sustain. There was not only such a gross inadequacy of price as to shock the moral sense, but there was, in effect, a sale by a trustee to himself, or to his own use and benefit. This equity will never permit, not even where there is good faith and an adequate consideration. Here there was neither. The vendor and purchaser were in the same interest. As directors of the canal company it was the duty of the president and his associates to obtain the highest price for the property; while as stockholders of the railroad company it was their interest to get it as low as possible. It was in effect, a sale by the railroad company to itself;" 18 Ohio St. 169. The same principles are supported by many authorities; 2 Black 715; 43 Wis. 433; 38 N. J. L. 505; 79 Pa. 168; 47 Ia. 641.

In some cases the question has arisen as to the effect of a minority only of the directors being interested in both companies. A contract made between two corporations through their respective boards of directors is not voidable at the discretion of one of the parties thereto from the mere circumstance that a minority of its board of directors are also directors of the other company; 34 Ohio St. 450. In that case the court said that upon the most diligent research it had been unable to find a case holding such a contract invalid or voidable from the mere circumstance that a minority of the directors of one company are also directors of the other company, and, "in our judgment, where a majority of the board are not adversely interested and have no adverse employment, the right to avoid the contract or transaction does not exist without proof of fraud or unfairness;" id.; 10 Fed. Rep. 413, 433; 77 Ill. 226. With respect to the rule just stated, however, Mr. J. C. Harper, in a note on this general subject, says:—

"It may be questioned, from the authorities heretofore referred to, and the general tendency of decisions upon the relations of directors and other officers to the stockholders and creditors, whether the foregoing will be accepted as the correct view of the effect of the presence of an adversely interested minority. It is respectfully suggested that the stockholders and creditors contracted for a full board of impartial disinterested directors;" 20 Fed. Rep. 180. This view is sustained by many courts; in another case it was said: "A director whose personal interests are adverse to those of the corporation has no right to be or act as a director. As soon as he finds that he has personal interests in conflict with those of the company he ought to resign;" 18 Ohio St. 133. In considering the same subject McCrary, J., said:—"Besides, where shall we draw the line? If the presence of two interested directors in the board at the time of the ratification does not vitiate the act, would the presence of a larger number of such directors have that effect, and, if so, what number?" 2 Fed. Rep. 879; and on appeal his decision as to the voidability of the contract was affirmed and the supreme court per Miller, J., said, "We concur with the circuit judge that no such contract as this can be enforced in a court of equity where it is resisted and its immorality is brought to light. . . . Such contracts are not absolutely void, but are voidable at the election of the parties affected by the fraud. It may often occur that, notwithstanding the vice of the transaction, namely, the directors or trustees, or a majority of them, being interested in opposition to the interest of those whom they represent, and in reality parties to both sides of the contract, that it may be one which those whose confidence is abused may prefer to ratify or submit to. It is, therefore, at the option of these latter to avoid it, and, until some act of theirs indicates such a purpose, it is not a nullity;" 109 U. S. 524.

Arrangements made by directors of a railroad company to secure from it unusual advantages through the medium of a new company in which they are to be stockholders, and which is to receive valuable contracts from the railroad company in the profits of which they would share, are not to be enforced by the courts; 103 U. S. 651, affirming 4 Dill. 330; such contracts cannot be made or ratified by a board of directors including members of the construction company and are void; 109 U. S. 522; but a recovery may be had on such a contract for work actually benefitting the railroad company, on quantum meruit; id.

In dealing with third parties, directors have all the powers conferred upon them by the charter. Third parties, without notice, are not bound to know of limitations placed upon directors by by-laws or otherwise; Brice, Ultra Vires 474; L. R. 5 Ch. 288; 12 Cush. 1; 1 Woolw. 40; but see 62 N. Y. 240; 17 Mass. 1. They cannot delegate matters in which they are bound to use their discretion; Green's Brice, Ultra Vires 490; Moraw. Priv. Corp. 536; 21 N. H. 149. See 96 U. S. 341; 2 Metc. 163; 19 N. Y. 207. The powers of directors of eleemosynary corporations are much greater than those of moneyed corporations; 41 Mo. 578. As to the power of directors to transfer all the corporate property for the purpose of winding up the company, see 5 W. & S. 249.

Unless the charter provides otherwise, directors need not be chosen from among the stockholders; L. R. 5 Ch. Div. 306; 22 Ohio St. 354. Directors de facto are, presumably, directors de jure, and their contracts bind the company; L. R. 7 Ch. 587. A director who is permitted to act as such after he has sold all his stock, is a director de facto, and the proceedings of the board in which he takes part are valid as to third persons; 4 Misc. Rep. 570.

In the absence of a provision of the charter or of a special contract, a director is not entitled to compensation; 39 N. Y. 202; 71 Ill. 200; 55 Ia. 104; 39 Am. Rep. 167; and he cannot recover therefor even where a resolution to compensate him has been passed after the services were rendered; 29 Pa. 534; 49 id. 118; 40 Ind. 361; 27 Conn. 170. But it is otherwise, when the services were outside of the line of his duty as an officer, under the charter and by-laws; as obtaining a right of way, soliciting subscriptions, etc.; 87 Ill. 447; 49 Mo. 389; 3 Misc. Rep. 325; 74 Mich. 226. The supreme court of Pennsylvania, in a suit by a director elected to serve without compensation, to recover a sum allowed to him by resolution after the services were rendered said: "We regard it as contrary to all sound policy to allow the director of a corporation elected to serve without compensation, to recover payment for services performed by him in that capacity, or as incidental to his office. It would be a sad spectacle to see the managers of any corporation, ecclesiastical or lay, civil or eleemosynary, assembling together and parcelling out among themselves the obligations or other property of the corporation in payment for their past services;" 29 Pa. 536. This doctrine has, however, been disapproved by the supreme court of Kansas, which said: "We think the rule is, in the absence of positive restrictions, that, when no salary is prescribed, one appointed to an executive office, like that of cashier, is entitled to reasonable compensation for his services, and that the directors have power to fix the salary after the expiration of the term of office, and this, though such appointee is also a director, and continues to be such while holding the independent office ;" 20 Fed Rep. 183, note. There is undoubtedly no implied promise to pay such an officer either for regular or extra services, and the underlying principle has been stated by the supreme court of Massachusetts in terms quoted with approval by the supreme court of the United States : " Thus, directors of banks and of many other corporations usually receive no compensation. In such cases, however valuable the services may be, the law does not raise an implied contract to pay by the party who receives the benefit of them. To render such party liable as a debtor under an implied promise, it must be shown, not only that the services were valuable, but also that they were rendered under such circumstances as to raise the fair presumption that the parties intended and understood that they were to be paid for ; or, at least, that the circumstances were such that a reasonable man, in the same situation with the person who receives and is benefitted by them, would and ought to understand that compensation was to be paid for them ;" 130 Mass. 391 ; 137 U. S. 98. See Pierce, R. R. 31 and notes, where the cases on this point are collected.

Where five members constituted a board of directors of which three were a quorum, action taken by three directors present at a meeting, upon a majority vote, was held to be valid ; 19 N. J. Eq. 402 ; s. c. 3 Am. Corp. Cas. 592. See QUORUM.

To make a legal board of directors, they must meet at a time when and a place where every other director has the opportunity of attending to consult and be consulted with ; and there must be a sufficient number present to constitute a quorum ; 3 La. 574 ; 13 id. 527. See 11 Mass. 288 ; 5 Litt. 45 ; 12 S. & R. 256 ; 1 Pet. 46. The fact that notice of a special meeting of the board was not given as provided by the by-laws of a corporation is immaterial, if all the members of the board were in fact present and participated in the proceedings ; 53 Minn. 381. See 35 Fed. Rep. 161.

The fact that a stockholder contemplates, if elected a director, to vote for an arrangement by which another corporation will control the company, cannot, though such an arrangement be illegal, affect the validity of his election ; 49 Ohio St. 668.

Provision is usually made, in the act under which a company is incorporated, for the election of directors. Such election usually takes place once a year, and is generally by a vote of the stockholders.

DIRIMANT IMPEDIMENTS. Those bars which annul a consummated marriage.

DISABILITY. The want of legal capacity. See ABATEMENT ; DEVISE ; DEED ; INFANCY ; INSANITY ; LIMITATION ; MARRIAGE ; PARTIES.

DISABLING STATUTES (also called the Restraining Statutes). The acts of 1 Eliz. c. 19, 13 Eliz. c. 10, 14 Eliz. cc. 11, 14, 18 Eliz. c. 11, and 43 Eliz. c. 29, by which the power of ecclesiastical or eleemosynary corporations to lease their lands was restricted. 2 Bla. Com. 319, 321 ; Co. Litt. 44 a ; 2 Steph. Com. 735.

DISAFFIRMANCE. The act by which a person who has entered into a voidable contract, as, for example, an infant, disagrees to such contract and declares he will not abide by it.

Disaffirmance is expressed or implied :—the former, when the declaration that the party will not abide by the contract is made in terms ; the latter, when he does an act which plainly manifests his determination not to abide by it : as, where an infant made a deed for his land, and on coming of age he made a deed for the same land to another ; 2 D. & B. 320 ; 10 Pet. 58 ; 13 Mass. 371, 375.

DISAFFOREST. To restore to their former condition lands which have been turned into forests. To remove from the operation of the forest laws. 2 Bla. Com. 416.

DISAVOW. To deny the authority by which an agent pretends to have acted, as when he has exceeded the bounds of his authority.

It is the duty of the principal to fulfil the contracts which have been entered into by his authorized agent ; and when an agent has exceeded his authority he ought promptly to disavow such act, so that the other party may have his remedy against the agent. See AGENT ; PRINCIPAL.

DISBAR. In England, to expel a barrister from the bar. Wharton.

In the United States, to deprive a person of the right to practise as an attorney at law.

An attorney in England is said to be stricken from the rolls. As disbaring is a very extreme penalty, suspension is more frequent. See ATTORNEY. A lawyer can be disbarred only for misconduct in his professional capacity or respecting his professional character. He cannot be disbarred for theft, perjury, and the like offences, without a formal indictment, trial, and conviction. The office of an attorney is his property and he cannot be deprived of it unless by judgment of his peers and the law of the land ; 95 Pa. 220.

Courts have jurisdiction and power upon their own motion without formal complaint or petition, in a proper case, to strike the name of an attorney from the roll, provided he has had reasonable notice and an opportunity to be heard. 95 Pa. 220 ; 54 Wis. 379 ; 107 U. S. 265.

The complaint must affect the official character of the attorney ; 68 Ill. 157 ; 40 Am. Rep. 637. The offence need not be an indictable one ; but its character must be such as to show the attorney unfit to be trusted with the powers of the profession ; 30 L. J. (Q. B.) 32 ; 10 Bush. Ky. 592 ; 2 Cra. C. C. 60 ; 5 Rawle 191. But ignorance of the law is not a cause for disbarment ; 24 N. H. 149. Disrespect to the court may be a cause if it is very gross; 24 Fed. Rep. 726; and any breach of fidelity to the court is good ground; 82 N. Y. 161; 71 Me. 288. So also bringing a divorce suit without authority and acting in fraudulent collusion with the husband to procure the divorce without consent or knowledge of the wife; 6 Tex. 55; perjury or subornation of perjury; 10 M. & W. 28; or violation of confidence of client; 71 Me. 288. On being convicted of felony an attorney loses his right to practise in court without an order removing him; 5 Daly, N. Y. 465. Neither pardon for felony nor a satisfactory settlement with the injured party affects the court's power to disbar; 64 Me. 140; 93 Pa. 116; Weeks, Attys. § 83.

An unsigned advertisement that divorces could be procured for reasons unknown to the law, and without reference to the residences of the parties, is cause for disbarment; 79 Ill. 148.

See, generally, Archbold, Practice, Chitt'y's ed. 148; 1 Tidd, Pr., 9th ed. 89; 6 East 126; L. R. 3 Q. B. 543; 5 B. & Ald. 1088.

DISBURSEMENT. Money paid out by an executor, guardian, or trustee, on account of the fund in his hands. The necessary expenditures incurred in an action, and which, under the codes of procedure of some of the states, are included in the costs, are also so called. But see 41 Ala. 267; 9 Abb. Pr. o. s. 111.

DISCEPTIO CAUSÆ (Lat.). In Roman Law. The argument of a cause by the counsel on both sides. Calvinus, Lex.

DISCHARGE. In Practice. The act by which a person in confinement under some legal process, or held on an accusation of some crime or misdemeanor, is set at liberty; the writing containing the order for his being so set at liberty is also called a discharge.

The discharge of a defendant, in prison under a ca. sa., when made by the plaintiff, has the operation of satisfying the debt, the plaintiff having no other remedy; 4 Term 526.

But when the discharge is in consequence of the insolvent laws, or the defendant dies in prison, the debt is not satisfied. In the first case the plaintiff has a remedy against the property of the defendant acquired after his discharge, and in the last case against the executors or administrators of the debtor. Bacon, Abr. Execution, D; Bingham, Execution 266.

The word has still other uses. Thus, we speak of the discharge of a surety, whereby he is released from his liability; of a debt; of a contract; of lands, or money in the funds, from an incumbrance; of an order of a court of justice, when such order is vacated; 2 Steph. Com. 107, 161. We also speak of a discharge in bankruptcy; 121 U. S. 457; 142 id. 381; 48 Fed. Rep. 789.

DISCHARGE OF A JURY. See JURY.

DISCLAIMER. A disavowal; a renunciation; as, for example, the act by which a patentee renounces part of his title of invention.

Of Estates. The act by which a party refuses to accept an estate which has been conveyed to him. Thus, a trustee is said to disclaim who releases to his fellow-trustees his estate, and relieves himself of the trust; 1 Hill, R. P. 354; 13 Conn. 83; 6 Cow. 616.

Of Tenancy. The act of a person in possession, who denies holding the estate of the person who claims to be the owner. 2 Nev. & M. 672. An affirmation, by pleading or otherwise, in a court of record, that the reversion is in a stranger. It works a forfeiture of the lease at common law; Co. Litt. 251; 1 Cruise, Dig. 109; Woodf. Landl. & T. 360; but not, it is said, in the United States; 1 Washb. R. P. 93. Equity will not aid a tenant in denying his landlord's title; 1 Pet. 486.

In Patent Law. A declaration in writing, filed under the patent laws, by an inventor whose claim as filed covers more than that of which he was the original inventor, renouncing such parts as he does not claim to hold. See PATENT.

In Pleading. A renunciation by the defendant of all claim to the subject of the demand made by the plaintiff.

IN EQUITY. It must, in general, be accompanied by an answer; 10 Paige, Ch. 105; 2 Russ. 458; 2 Y. & C. 546; 9 Sim. 102; 2 Bland, Ch. 678; and always when the defendant has so connected himself with the matter that justice cannot be done otherwise; 9 Sim. 102. It must renounce all claim in any capacity and to any extent; 6 G. & J. 152. It may be to part of a bill only, but it must be clearly a separate and distinct part of the bill; Story, Eq. Pl. § 839; Beach, Mod. Eq. Pr. 282. A disclaimer may, in general, be abandoned, and a claim put in upon subsequent discovery of a right; Cooper, Eq. Pl. 310.

AT LAW. In real actions, a disclaimer of tenancy or estate is frequently added to the plea of non-tenure; Littleton § 391; 10 Mass. 64. The plea may be either in abatement or in bar; 13 Mass. 439; 7 Pick. 31; as to the whole or any part of the demanded premises; Stearns, Real Act. 193.

At common law it is not pleaded as a bar to the action, nor is it strictly a plea in abatement, as it does not give the plaintiff a better writ. It contains no prayer for judgment, and is not concluded with a verification. It is in effect an offer by the plaintiff to yield to the claim of the demandant and admit his title to the land; Stearns, Real Act. 193. It cannot, in general, be made by a person incapable of conveying the land. It is equivalent to a judgment in favor of the demandant, except when costs are demanded; 13 Mass. 439; in which case there must be a replication by the demandant; 6 Pick. 5; but no formal replication is requisite in Pennsylvania; 5 Watts 70; 3 Pa. 367. And see 1 Washb. R. P. 93.

DISCONTINUANCE OF ESTATES. An alienation made or suffered by the tenant in tail, or other tenant seised in autre droit, by which the issue in tail, or heir, or successor, or those in reversion or remainder, are driven to their action, and cannot enter.

The term discontinuance is used to distinguish those cases where the party whose freehold is ousted can restore it only by action, from those in which he may restore it by entry; Co. Litt. 325 a; 3 Bla. Com. 171; Ad. Ej. 35; Bac. Abr.; Viner, Abr.

Discontinuances of estates, prior to their express abolition, had long become obsolete, and they are now abolished by 3 & 4 Will. IV. c. 27, and 8 & 9 Vict. c. 106; Moz. & W. Dic.; 1 Steph. Com. 510, n.

DISCONTINUANCE. In Pleading. The chasm or interruption which occurs when no answer is given to some material matter in the preceding pleading, and the opposite party neglects to take advantage of such omission. See Com. Dig. Pleader, W.; Bac. Abr. Pleas, P. It is distinguished from insufficient pleading by the fact that the pleading does not profess to answer all the preceding pleading in a case of discontinuance; 1 Wms. Saund. 28, n. It constitutes error, but may be cured after verdict, by 32 Hen. VIII. c. 80, and after judgment by nil dicit, confession, or non sum informatus under 4 Anne, c. 16. See, generally, 1 Saund. 28; 4 Rep. 62 a; 56 N. H. 414.

In Practice. The chasm or interruption in proceedings occasioned by the failure of the plaintiff to continue the suit regularly from time to time, as he ought; 3 Bla. Com. 296; 52 Miss. 467; 56 N. H. 416; 71 Ala. 215. The entry upon record of a discontinuance has the same effect. The plaintiff cannot discontinue after demurrer joined and entered, or after verdict or writ of inquiry, without leave of court; Cro. Jac. 35; 1 Lilly, Abr. 473; 8 C. C. App. 437; but see 7 Wash. 407; although he can notwithstanding the interposition of a counterclaim; 17 N. Y. Sup. 844; and is generally liable for costs when he discontinues, though not in all cases. See 1 Johns. 143; 18 id. 252; 1 Cai. 116; 48 Mo. 235; 12 Wend. 402; Com. Dig. Pleader (W 5); Bac. Abr. Plea (5 P).

DISCONTINUOUS SERVITUDE. An easement made up of repeated acts instead of one continuous act, such as right of way, drawing water, etc. See EASEMENT.

DISCOUNT. In Contracts. Interest reserved from the amount loaned at the time of making a loan. An allowance sometimes made for prompt payment. As a verb, it is used to denote the act of giving money for a bill of exchange or promissory note, deducting the interest; 6 Ohio St. 527; 15 id. 87; 13 Conn. 248; 48 Mo. 189; 8 Wheat. 338; 14 Ala. 677; 42 Md. 592. In an ordinary commercial document, discount means rebate of interest and not "true" or mathematical discount; [1896] 2 Ch. 320.

A discount by a bank means ex vi termini a deduction or drawback made upon its advances or loans of money upon negotiable paper or other evidences of debt, payable at a future day, which are transferred to the bank. It is the difference between the price and the amount of the debt, the evidence of which is transferred; 104 U. S. 276; 8 Wheat. 350.

The taking of legal interest in advance is not usurious; but it is only allowed for the benefit of trade and where the bill or note discounted is meant for circulation and is for a short term; 2 Cow. 678, 712; 3 Wend. 408.

There is a difference between buying a bill and discounting it. The former word is used when the seller does not indorse the bill and is not accountable for its payment. See Pothier, De l'Usure, n. 128; 3 Pet. 40; Blydenburgh, Usury; Sewell, Banking; 14 Ala. 668; 7 How. Pr. 144. The true discount for a given sum, for a given time, is such a sum as will in that time amount to the interest of the sum to be discounted. Wharton.

In Practice. A set-off or defalcation in an action. Viner, Abr. Discount. But see 1 Metc. Ky. 597.

DISCOVERT. Not covert; unmarried. The term is applied to a woman unmarried, or widow,—one not within the bonds of matrimony.

DISCOVERY. (Fr. découvrir, to uncover, to discover). The act of finding an unknown country.

The nations of Europe adopted the principle that the discovery of any part of America gave title to the government by whose subjects or by whose authority it was made, as against all European governments. This title was to be consummated by possession; 8 Wheat. 543; 16 Pet. 367; 2 Washb. R. P. 518.

By the law of nations, dominion of new territory may be acquired by discovery and occupation as well as by cession or conquest; 137 U. S. 202.

An invention or improvement. See PATENT. Also used of the disclosure by a bankrupt of his property for the benefit of creditors.

In Practice. The disclosure of facts resting in the knowledge of the defendant, or the production of deeds, writings, or things in his possession or power, in order to maintain the right or title of the party asking it, in some other suit or proceeding.

It was originally an equitable form of procedure, and a bill of discovery, strictly so called, was brought to assist parties to suits in other courts. Every bill in equity is in some sense a bill of discovery, since it seeks a disclosure from the defendant, on his oath of the truth of the circumstances constituting the plaintiff's case as propounded in his bill; Story, Eq. Jur. § 1483; but the term is technically applied as defined above. See 4 R. I. 450; 2 Stockt. Ch. 273. Many important questions have arisen out of the exercise of this power by equity; but these are of comparatively little practical importance in England and many of the states of the United States, where parties may be made witnesses and compelled to produce books and papers in courts of law; 8 Steph. Com. 598; 17 & 18 Vict. c. 125.

Such bills are greatly favored in equity, and are sustained in all cases where some well-founded objection does not exist against the exercise of the jurisdiction; Story, Eq. Jur. § 1488; 8 Conn. 528; 2 H. & G. 382. See 17 Mass. 117; 22 Me. 207; 4 Hen. & M. 478; 3 Md. Ch. Dec. 418; 40 Ill. App. 616. Some of the more important of the objections are, —first, that the subject is not cognizable in any municipal court of justice; Story, Eq. Jur. § 1489; second, that the court will not lend its aid to obtain a discovery for the particular court for which it is wanted, as where the court can itself compel a discovery; 2 Ves. 451; 2 Edw. Ch. 605; 37 N. H. 55; third, that the plaintiff is not entitled by reason of personal disability; fourth, that the plaintiff has no title to the character in which he sues; 4 Paige, Ch. 639; fifth, that the value of the suit is beneath the dignity of the court; sixth, that the plaintiff has no interest in the subject-matter or title to the discovery required; 2 Bro. Ch. 321; 4 Madd. 193; Cooper, Eq. Pl. c. 1, § 4; 2 Metc. Mass. 127; 17 Me. 404; 10 Ky. L. Rep. 980; or that an action for which it is wanted will not lie; 3 Bro. Ch. 155; 1 Bligh. N. S. 120; 3 Y. & C. 255; see 1 Phill. Ch. 209; seventh, that the defendant is not answerable to the plaintiff, but that some other person has a right to call for the discovery; eighth, that the policy of the law exempts the defendant from the discovery, as on account of the peculiar relations of the parties; 2 Y. & C. 107; 8 E. L. & Eq. 89; 35 id. 283; 3 Paige, Ch. 36; in case of arbitrators; 2 Vern. 380; 3 Atk. 529; ninth, that the defendant is not bound to discover his own title; Bisph. Eq. 561; 1 Vern. 105; 6 Whart. 141; see 61 Conn. 593; or that he is a bona fide purchaser without notice of the plaintiff's claim; 2 Edw. Ch. 81; 3 M. & K. 531; 8 Sim. 153; 5 Mas. 269; 1 Sumn. 506; 7 Pet. 252; 7 Cra. 2; 6 Paige, Ch. 323; and see 33 Vt. 252; 1 Stockt. 82; tenth, that the discovery is not material in the suit; 2 Ves. 491; 1 Johns. Ch. 548; eleventh, that the defendant is a mere witness; 2 Bro. Ch. 332; 3 Edw. Ch. 129; but see 2 Ves. 451; 1 Sch. & L. 227; 11 Sim. 305; 1 Paige, Ch. 37; twelfth, that the discovery called for would criminate the defendant.

The suit must be of a purely civil nature, and may not be a criminal prosecution; Lofft 1; 19 How. St. Tr. 1154; 7 Md. 416; a penal action; 1 Keen 329; 2 Blatchf. 39; a suit partaking of this character; 1 Pet. 100; 6 Conn. 36; 14 Ga. 255; or a case involving moral turpitude. See 1 Bligh, N. S. 96; 2 E. L. & Eq. 117; 5 Madd. 229; 11 Beav. 380; 1 Sim. 404; 24 Miss. 17.

Workmen pledged to secrecy and employed in a factory in which the business is conducted in private, to secure secrecy as to the method of manufacture, will not be compelled, in a suit against their employer, to disclose such secrets; 49 Fed. Rep. 17.

A corporation not a party to a suit will not be compelled to open its records which it is claimed will disclose something of importance to the litigation; 35 Fed. Rep. 15; nor is an adverse examination of a defendant before trial allowable for the purpose of discovering a cause of action; 3 Misc. Rep. 514; 67 Hun 398.

An infant party to an action cannot be compelled to make discovery of documents; [1892] 2 Q. B. 178.

The court has power to allow a party to an action to take photographs of documents in the possession of the other party; [1893] 2 Q. B. 191.

It seems to be settled that a bill will lie against a corporation and its officers to compel a discovery from the officers, to aid a plaintiff or a defendant in maintaining or defending a suit brought against or by the corporation alone; 19 Blatchf. 69; 1 Ch. D. 71; 144 Mass. 347.

In the sense in which the word is used with respect to equity suits generally, there was, until a comparatively recent period, a failure to recognize the distinction between the two functions of an answer in chancery, viz.: discovery and defence. These two were in the civil law entirely separated, while in chancery they were indiscriminately commingled. The distinction is very clearly put in Langdell's Equity Pleadings, 2d ed. § 68, where the author attributes to Wigram (Disc., 2d ed. § 17) and Hare (Disc. 223) the simultaneous notice of what he terms "the unnatural union." The distinction is important because, when it is borne in mind, the "rule for determining what discovery the defendant must give in his answer becomes simple and uniform. He must answer categorically every material allegation and charge in the bill, unless he has some objection which would be good in the mouth of a witness." In a note to his second edition, Professor Langdell characterizes this rule as too narrow, and sets forth cases in which a defendant may object to answer as to matters which as a witness he could not. Among these are the cases of a defendant against whom no case is made and no relief prayed; one joined because he has a conflicting claim against another defendant, which must be set up by cross-bill; or where a defendant may refuse to answer parts of the bill relating wholly to other defendants. With respect to particular cases the rule must be deduced from the decisions most nearly applicable, and the cases will be found to be collected and examined with discrimination in the work cited. See also Ad. Eq. b. 1, ch. 1.

Courts of equity which have once obtained jurisdiction for purposes of discovery will dispose of a cause finally, if proper for the consideration of equity, though the remedy at law is fully adequate; 1 Story, Eq. Jur. 64k; 1 Munf. 98; 1 A. K. Marsh. 463, 468; 15 Me. 82; 2 Johns. Ch. 424; 1 Dessaus. 208; 2 Ov. 71; 96 Ala. 469. Consult Adams; Story; Bispham; Pomeroy; Beach, Eq. Jur.; Greenleaf; Phillips, Evidence; Wigram; Hare, Discovery; Joy, Confessions; Langdell, Equity Pleading.

DISCREDIT. To deprive one of credit or confidence.

In general, a party may discredit a witness called by the opposite party, who testifies against him, by proving that his character is such as not to entitle him to credit or confidence, or any other fact which shows he is not entitled to belief. It is clearly settled, also, that the party voluntarily calling a witness cannot afterwards impeach his character for truth and veracity: 1 Mood. & R. 414; 3 B. & C. 746; 70 Miss. 742; 32 Tex. Cr. R. 519. See 5 Ind. App. 243; 42 Ill. App. 178; 52 Kan. 531. If a party call a witness who turns out unfavorable, he may call another to prove the same point; Tayl. Ev. 1247; 2 Campb. 556; 2 Stark. 334; 1 Nev. & M. 34; 4 B. & A. 193; 50 Mo. App. 18; 1 Phill. Ev. 229. The rule that a party cannot discredit his own witness is not violated by proving facts contrary to the testimony of such witness; 111 N. C. 314.

Where the evidence of a witness is a surprise to the party calling him, the trial judge, in the exercise of discretion, may permit him to be cross-examined by such party to show that his previous statements and conduct were at variance with his testimony; 150 Pa. 611; 54 Minn. 434. Proof of contradictory statements by one's own witness, voluntarily called and not a party, is in general not admissible, although the party calling him may have been surprised by them; but he may show that the facts were not as stated, although these may tend incidentally to discredit the witness; 151 U. S. 303.

DISCREPANCY. A difference between one thing and another, between one writing and another; a variance.

A material discrepancy exists when there is such a difference between a thing alleged and a thing offered in evidence as to show they are not substantially the same: as, when the plaintiff in his declaration for a malicious arrest averred that "the plaintiff, in that action, did not prosecute his said suit, but therein made default," and the record was that he obtained a rule to discontinue.

An immaterial discrepancy is one which does not materially affect the cause: as, where a declaration stated that a deed bore date in a certain year of our Lord, and the deed was simply dated "March 30, 1701." 2 Salk. 638; 19 Johns. 49; 5 Taunt. 707; 2 B. & Ald. 301; 8 Miss. 428; 2 McLean 69; 21 Pick. 486.

DISCRETION. That part of the judicial function which decides questions arising in the trial of a cause, according to the particular circumstances of each case, and as to which the judgment of the court is uncontrolled by fixed rules of law.

The power exercised by courts to determine questions to which no strict rule of law is applicable but which, from their nature, and the circumstances of the case, are controlled by the personal judgment of the court.

Whether or not a particular question is one of discretion is in almost every case a matter of settled law, and the individual court or judge has no power to place it within or without that category. It is only when a question arises which, according to precedent, is treated as such that the judicial discretion is invoked and its exercise cannot be reviewed.

The discretion of a judge is said by Lord Camden to be the law of tyrants: it is always unknown, it is different in different men; it is casual, and depends upon constitution, temper, and passion. In the best, it is oftentimes caprice; in the worst, it is every vice, folly, and passion to which human nature is liable. Optima lex quae minimum relinquit arbitrio judicis; optimus judex qui minimum sibi. Bacon, Aph.; 1 Pow. Mortg. 247 a; 2 Bell, Suppl. to Ves. 301; Toullier, liv. 3, n. 338; 1 Lilly, Abr. 447. But the prevailing opinion is that discretion must not be arbitrary, fanciful, and capricious; it must be legal and regular, governed by rule, not by humor; 4 Burr. 25; 18 Wend. 99.

There is a species of discretion which is authorized by express law and without which justice cannot be administered: for example, if an old offender, a man of much intelligence and cunning, whose talents render him dangerous to the community, induces a young man of weak intellect to commit a larceny in company with himself, they are both liable to be punished for the offence. The law foreseeing such a case, has provided that the punishment should be proportioned so as to do justice, and it has left such apportionment to the discretion of the judge. It is evident that without such discretion justice could not be administered; for one of these parties assuredly deserves a much more severe punishment than the other.

And many matters relating to the trial such as the order of giving evidence, granting of new trials, etc., are properly left mainly or entirely to the discretion of the judge; 18 Wend. 79, 99; 34 Barb. 291; 38 S. C. 399; 92 Mich. 621; 136 N. Y. 655; 2 C. C. App. 380; 111 N. C. 145.

Decisions upon matters within the absolute discretion of a court are not reviewable in courts of appeal; 157 Mass. 579; 159 id. 200; 111 N. C. 509; 102 U. S. 120; 3 C. C. App. 663; but the discretion in granting or refusing a writ of mandamus must be exercised under legal rules, and is reviewable in an appellate court; 78 N. Y. 56. Such a writ will not be granted to regulate the exercise of a discretion on the part of an official; 15 Fla. 317; 52 Ala. 87.

A testator may leave it to his executor to construe the provisions of his will, and to decide doubtful questions concerning his intentions; 15 Fed. Rep. 696; and the donor of a power may leave its execution to the discretion of the donee; 4 D. J. & S. 614.

In Criminal Law. The ability to know and distinguish between good and evil,—between what is lawful and what is unlawful.

The age at which children are said to have discretion is not very accurately ascertained. Under seven years, it seems that no circumstances of mischievous discretion can be admitted to overthrow the strong presumption of innocence which is raised by an age so tender; 1 Hale, Pl. Cr. 27, 28; 4 Bla. Com. 23. Between the ages of seven and fourteen the infant is, prima facie, destitute of criminal design; but this presumption diminishes as the age increases, and even during this interval of youth may be repelled by positive evidence of vicious intention; for tenderness of years will not excuse a maturity in crime, the maxim in these cases being malitia supplet aetatem. At fourteen, children are said to have acquired legal discretion; 1 Hale, Pl. Cr. 25. See 88 Pa. 35; DOLI CAPAX; AGE.

DISCRETIONARY TRUSTS. Those which cannot be duly administered without the application of a certain degree of prudence and judgment: as, when a fund is given to trustees to be distributed in certain charities to be selected by the trustees.

DISCRIMINATION. This word is now generally applied in law to a breach of the statutory or common-law duty of a carrier to treat all customers alike. It is applied to inequality in both rates of fare and rates of freight, and may also be practised by inequality in the facilities afforded to different consignors. In regard to freight rates, discrimination means the charging shippers unequal sums for carrying the same quantity of goods equal distances; 95 N. C. 434. The fact that the higher charge is not unreasonable will not affect the case; 31 Fed. Rep. 57. The mere allowance of a rebate will not prove discrimination; for others may obtain the same advantage; but to contract to deny others the benefit of a rebate is discrimination; 22 Mo. App. 224; 38 N. J. L. 505; 32 A. & E. R. R. Cas. 413; 56 Ill. 513; 118 Ill. 250.

Mere inequality in charges is not discrimination; it is such only when the shippers stand on the same footing in all respects. The reasonableness of unequal rates may be proved by the difference in the character of the goods, or the part of the line over which they are shipped, having due regard to the expense of carriage; 67 Ill. 11; 12 Gray 393; 74 Pa. 181; 9 Lea 684; 58 Tex. 98.

It is held in England that it is not an unlawful discrimination for a carrier to convey a large quantity of merchandise at a less rate than that charged for smaller quantities; for transportation in large and small quantities does not involve the same amount of trouble and expense; 4 Nev. & M. 7; 4 C. B. N. s. 366; but a contrary view prevails in the United States; 12 Fed. Rep. 309; 31 Fed. Rep. 652; 43 Ohio St. 379; 1 Interst. Com. Rep. 107; and in any case it is not lawful to charge a less rate to all the inhabitants of one town, irrespective of their individual shipments, than to those of another, though the aggregate of freight shipped by the former is greater than that shipped by the latter; 4 Eng. R. R. & Canal Traffic Cases 291.

The rule requiring equal charges for equal distances does not require that the rates for a specified distance should be increased for every greater distance by the corresponding multiple of the specified distance; 111 E. C. L. 248; 1 Interst. Com. Rep. 480; 74 Pa. 190.

Under the Interstate Commerce Act.—This question of discrimination arises in the United States most frequently under the provisions of the Interstate Commerce Act of 1887, Feb. 24; U. S. Rev. Stat. 1 Supp. 529, which provides: (§ 2) That if any common carrier subject to the provisions of this act shall, directly or indirectly, by any special rate, rebate, drawback, or other device, charge, demand, collect, or receive from any person or persons a greater or less compensation for any service rendered, or to be rendered, in the transportation of passengers or property, subject to the provisions of this act, than it charges, demands, collects, or receives from any other person or persons for doing for him or them a like and contemporaneous service in the transportation of a like kind of traffic under substantially similar circumstances and conditions, such common carrier shall be deemed guilty of unjust discrimination; (§ 3) That it shall be unlawful for any such common carrier to give any undue or unreasonable preference or advantage to any particular person, company, firm, corporation, or locality, or description of traffic, or subject such to any undue or unreasonable prejudice or disadvantage; and (§ 4) That it shall be unlawful for any such common carrier to charge or receive any greater compensation in the aggregate for the transportation of passengers or of like kind of property, under substantially similar circumstances and conditions, for a shorter than for a longer distance, within the same line in the same direction, the shorter being included in the longer distance.

The fact that one railroad is long and circuitous, and therefore obliged to charge a less rate per mile to a competitive point than its shorter rivals, will not establish dissimilar conditions, nor does the fact that there is possible water competition; 1 Interst. Com. Rep. 160; but differences in grade compelling the use of shorter trains, is to be considered in deciding the question of discriminations; 4 Nev. & M. 192. So, it would seem that an increase in the speed of trains will justify an increase in the rate of freight charged; 4 Eng. R. R. & Canal Traffic Cases 291; as may the fact that cars are of a peculiar construction, and only fit for hauling a certain class of freight, so that they must be returned empty; but not the fact that cars are of an improved construction, so that more valuable freight is transported in them; 1 Interst. Com. Rep. 132. On the other hand, it is not discrimination for a carrier to refuse to transport cattle in cars of a special construction furnished by the shipper, when it supplies cars for the same purpose, which it can use more conveniently and profitably by reason of their being likewise so adapted for other freight when not used for carrying cattle; 6 Ry. & Corp. L. J. 364.

DISCUSSION. In Civil Law. A proceeding on the part of a surety by which the property of the principal debtor is made liable before resort can be had to the sureties: this is called the benefit of discussion. This is the law in Louisiana. See Domat, 3, 4, 1-4; Burge, Suretyship 329, 343, 348; 5 Toullier 544; 7 id. 93.

In Scotch Law. The ranking of the proper order in which heirs are liable to satisfy the debts of the deceased. Bell.

DISENTAILING ASSURANCE. A deed executed under stat. 3 & 4 Will. 4, c. 74, whereby the tenant in tail is enabled to alienate the land for an estate in fee-simple or any less estate, and thus destroy the entail. The deed must be duly enrolled in the court of chancery within six months of its execution; 1 Steph. Com. 250, 575.

DISFRANCHISEMENT. The act of depriving a member of a corporation of his right as such, by expulsion.

It differs from amotion (q. v.), which is applicable to the removal of an officer from office, leaving him his rights as a member; Willc. Corp. n. 708; Ang. & A. Corp. 237; 10 H. L. Cas. 404; 44 Mo. 570; 2 Daly 329. The power of disfranchisement extends only to societies not owning property or organized for gain; unless the power be given by the charter; 50 Pa. 107; Green's Brice, Ultra Vires 45; 41 L. T. N. S. 490; 80 Ill. 134; 8 Hun 216; Ang. & A. Corp. § 410. It extends to the expulsion of members who have proved guilty of the more heinous crimes, as to which there must first be a conviction by a jury; 2 Binn. 448; 52 Pa. 125. It is said that the power exists where members do not observe certain duties to the corporation, especially where the breach tends directly or indirectly to the forfeiture of the corporate rights, and franchises, and the destruction of the corporation; Green's Brice, Ultra Vires 45; 45 Ill. 112; 61 Ga. 86; 62 Ia. 26. A member is entitled to notice of the charges against him, and to an opportunity to be heard; 20 Pa. 435; 50 id. 107; 54 Barb. 532; 40 N. J. L. 295; 24 How. Pr. 216; 44 Mo. 570; 111 Mass. 185. See EXPULSION.

Except in cases authorized by constitutional provisions, a citizen entitled to vote cannot be disfranchised, or deprived of his right by any action of the public authorities, and a law having such effect is void; Cooley, Const. Lim. 776; as an act creating a new county and leaving part of its territory unorganized so that the voters of that portion could not participate in the election; 15 Mich. 471; 20 N. Y. 477.

The present use of the word in England is the depriving an individual of his right of voting, or a constituency of their right of returning a member to parliament; May's Parl. Pr.

DISGRACE. Ignominy; shame; dishonor. No witness is required to disgrace himself. 13 How. St. Tr. 17, 334; 16 id. 161. See CRIMINATE.

DISGUISE.

A person lying in ambush is not in disguise within the meaning of a statute declaring a county liable in damages to the next of kin of any one murdered by persons in disguise; 46 Ala. 118, 142.

DISHERISON. Disinheritance; depriving one of an inheritance. Obsolete. See DISINHERISON.

DISHERITOR. One who disinherits, or puts another out of his freehold. Obsolete.

DISHONOR. A term applied to the non-fulfilment of commercial engagements. To dishonor a bill of exchange, or a promissory note, is to refuse or neglect to pay it at maturity.

The holder is bound to give notice to the parties to such instruments of its dishonor; and his laches will discharge the indorsers; Chit. Bills 256, 394; 1 Pars. N. & B. 506, 520.

DISINHERISON. In Civil Law. The act of depriving a forced heir of the inheritance which the law gives him.

In Louisiana, forced heirs may be deprived of their legitime, or legal portion, and of the seisin granted them by law, for just cause. The disinheriton must be made in proper form, by name and expressly, and for a just cause; otherwise it is null. See FORCED HEIRS; LEGITIME.

DISINHERITANCE. The act by which a person deprives his heir of an inheritance, who, without such act, would inherit.

By the common law, any one may give his estate to a stranger, and thereby disinherit his heir apparent. Cooper, Justin. 495; 7 East 106.

An heir cannot be disinherited by mere words of exclusion, but the entire property of the testator must be given to some one else by express words or by necessary implication; 93 Ky. 498; 105 N. Y. 185; s. c. 5 Am. Prob. Rep. 510; 132 N. Y. 338; 112 Pa. 532; and where a will provides that a gift therein is to be the entire share of an heir, he is not excluded from a share of property not disposed of by the will; 84 Va. 880; even though the will shows that the testator believed he was disposing of all his property; id. A testamentary writing which revokes all other wills, and excludes a son from any share of the estate, for reasons given, but does not dispose of the property, does not affect the rights of such son; 85 Va. 459.

In a case of doubt the law leans to a distribution as nearly conforming to the rules of inheritance as possible.

DISINTERESTED WITNESS. One who has no interest in the cause or matter in issue, and who is lawfully competent to testify.

In North Carolina and Tennessee, wills to pass lands must be attested by disinterested witnesses. The word "disinterested" is also applied to arbitrators and magistrates; 48 Ill. 31; 50 Me. 334. See INTEREST.

DISJUNCTIVE ALLEGATIONS. In Pleading. Allegations which charge a party disjunctively, so as to leave it uncertain what is relied on as the accusation against him.

An indictment, information, or complaint which charges the defendant with one or other of two offences, in the disjunctive, as that he murdered or caused to be murdered, forged or caused to be forged, wrote and published or caused to be written and published, is bad for uncertainty; 1 Salk. 342, 371; 2 Stra. 900; 5 B. & C. 251; 1 C. & K. 243; 1 Y. & J. 22. An indictment which averred that S. made a forcible entry into two closes of meadow or pasture was held to be bad; 2 Rolle, Abr. 81. A complaint which alleges an unlawful sale of "spirited or intoxicating liquor" is bad for uncertainty; 2 Gray 501. So is an information which alleges that N. sold beer or ale without an excise license; 6 Dowl. & R. 143. And the same rule applies if the defendant is charged in two different characters in the disjunctive: as, quod A existens servus sive deputatus, took, etc.; 2 Rolle, Abr. 263.

DISJUNCTIVE TERM. One which is placed between two contraries, by the affirming of one of which the other is taken away; it is usually expressed by the word or. See 3 Ves. 450; 1 P. Wms. 433; 2 Cox, Ch. 213; 2 Atk. 643; 2 Ves. Sen. 67; Cro. Eliz. 525; 1 Bingh. 500; Ayliffe, Pand. 56. In the civil law, when a legacy is given to Caius or Titius, the word or is considered and, and both Caius and Titius are entitled to the legacy in equal parts. 6 Toullier, n. 704. See COPULATIVE TERM; CONSTRUCTION.

DISME. Dime, which see.

DISMISS. To remove. To send out of court. Formerly used in chancery of the removal of a cause out of court without any farther hearing. The term is now used in courts of law also.

It signifies a final ending of a suit, not a final judgment on the controversy, but an end of that proceeding; 56 N. H. 417; 24 Ga. 33; 1 Ohio St. 170. It is well settled that the judgment of a court dismissing a suit for want of jurisdiction does not conclude the plaintiff's right of action; 109 U. S. 429.

After a decree, whether final or interlocutory, has been made by which the rights of a party defendant have been adjudicated, or such proceedings have been taken as entitle the defendant to a decree, the complainant will not be allowed to dismiss his bill without the consent of the defendant; 109 U. S. 713.

The effect of dismissals under the codes of some of the United States, has been much discussed. Thus in New York, "a final judgment dismissing the complaint, either before or after a trial, rendered in an action hereafter commenced," does not prevent a new action for the same cause of action, unless it expressly declares that it is rendered upon the merits.

DISORDERLY HOUSE. In Criminal Law. A house the inmates of which behave so badly as to become a nuisance to the neighborhood. It has a wide meaning, and includes bawdy houses, common gaming houses, and places of a like character; 1 Bish. Cr. L. § 1106; 2 Cra. 675; 120 Mass. 356. In order to constitute it such it is not necessary that there be acts violative of the peace of the neighborhood, or boisterous disturbance and open acts of lewdness; 71 Md. 275; 96 Ala. 1; but a single act of lewdness of a man and woman in a house, does not constitute the offence of keeping a house of prostitution; 75 Mich. 127.

The keeper of such house may be indicted for keeping a public nuisance; Hardr. 344; 1 Wheel. Cr. Cas. 290; 1 S. & R. 342; Bacon, Abr. Nuisances, A; 4 Sharsw. Bla. Com. 167, 168, note; 83 N. Y. 587; 52 Ala. 377. The husband must be joined with the wife in an indictment to suppress a disorderly house; 1 Show. 146.

DISORDERLY PERSONS. A class of offenders described in the statutes which punish them. See 4 Bla. Com. 169.

DISPARAGEMENT. In Old English Law. An injury by union or comparison with some person or thing of inferior rank or excellence.

Marriage without disparagement was marriage to one of suitable rank and character. 2 Bla. Com. 70; Co. Litt. 82 b. The guardian in chivalry had the right of disposing of his infant ward in matrimony; and provided he tendered a marriage without disparagement or inequality, if the infant refused, he was obliged to pay a valor maritagii to the guardian.

Disparagare, to connect in an unequal marriage. Spelman, Gloss. Disparagatio, disparagement. Used in Magna Charta (9 Hen. III.), c. 6. Disparagation, disparagement. Kelham. Disparage, to marry unequally. Used of a marriage proposed by a guardian between those of unequal rank and injurious to the ward.

DISPAUPER. In English Law. To deprive a person of the privilege of suing in forma pauperis.

When a person has been admitted to sue in forma pauperis, and before the suit is ended it appears that the party has become the owner of a sufficient estate real, or personal, or has been guilty of some wrong, he may be dispaupered.

DISPENSATION. A relaxation of law for the benefit or advantage of an individual. In the United States, no power exists, except in the legislature, to dispense with law: and then it is not so much a dispensation as a change of the law.

DISPLACE. Used in shipping articles, and, when applied to an officer, meaning properly to disrate, not to discharge. 103 Mass. 68.

DISPONE. In Scotch Law. A technical word essential to the conveyance of heritable property, and for which no equivalent is accepted however clear may be the meaning of the party. Paterson, Comp.

DISPOSE. To alienate or direct the ownership of property, as, disposition by will. 43 N. Y. 79; see 40 N. H. 219; 101 U. S. 380. Used also of the determination of suits; 13 Wall. 664. Called a word of large extent; Freem. 177.

DISPOSSESSION. Ouster; a wrong that carries with it the amotion of possession. An act whereby the wrong-doer gets the actual occupation of the land or hereditament. It includes abatement, intrusion, disseisin, discontinuance, deforcement. 3 Bla. Com. 167.

DISPUTATIO FORI (Lat.). Argument in court. Du Cange.

DISPUTE. A fact is properly said to be in dispute when it is alleged by one party and denied by the other, and by both with some show of reason. 19 Pa. 494.

DISQUALIFY. To incapacitate, to disable, to divest or deprive of qualifications. 57 Cal. 606.

DISSECTION. The act of cutting into pieces an animal or vegetable for the purpose of ascertaining the structure and uses of its parts; anatomy; the act of separating into constituent parts for the purpose of critical examination. Webster.

DISSEISEE. One who is wrongfully put out of possession of his lands; one who is disseised.

DISSEISIN. A privation of seisin. A usurpation of the right of seisin and possession, and an exercise of such powers and privileges of ownership as to keep out or displace him to whom these rightfully belong. 2 Washb. E. P. 283; Mitch. R. P. 259.

It takes the seisin or estate from one man and places it in another. It is an ouster of the rightful owner from the seisin or estate in the land, and the commencement of a new estate in the wrong-doer. It may be by abatement, intrusion, discontinuance, or deforcement, as well as by disseisin properly so called. Every dispossession is not a disseisin. A disseisin, properly so called, requires an ouster of the freehold. A disseisin at election is not a disseisin in fact; 2 Pres. Abstr. T. 279; but by admission only of the injured party, for the purpose of trying his right in a real action; Co. Litt. 277; 2 Me. 242; 4 N. H. 371; 5 Cow. 371; 5 Pet. 402; 6 Pick. 172.

Disseisin may be effected either in corporeal inheritances, or incorporeal. Disseisin of things corporeal, as of houses, lands, etc., must be by entry and actual dispossession of the freehold: as if a man enters, by force or fraud, into the house of another, and turns, or, at least, keeps, him or his servants out of possession. Disseisin of incorporeal hereditaments cannot be an actual dispossession; for the subject itself is neither capable of actual bodily possession or dispossession; 3 Bla. Com. 169, 170. See 6 Pick. 172; 6 Johns. 197; 2 Watts 23; 1 Vt. 155; 10 Pet. 414; 1 Dana 279; 11 Me. 408.

In the early law every disseisin was a breach of the peace; if perpetrated with violence it was a serious breach. The disseisor was amerced never less than the amount of the damage; if it were by force of arms he was sent to prison and fined. Besides he gave the sheriff an ox,—“the disseisin ox,”—or five shillings. If he disseised one who has already recovered possession from him by the assize, this was a still graver offence, for which he was imprisoned by a statute. The offender was a redisseisor; 2 Poll. & Maitl. Hist. of Eng. Law 45.

DISSEISOR. One who puts another out of the possession of his lands wrongfully.

DISSENT. A disagreement to something which has been done. It is express or implied.

The law presumes that every person to whom a conveyance has been made has given his assent to it, because it is supposed to be for his benefit. To rebut the presumption, his dissent must be expressed. See 4 Mas. 206; 11 Wheat. 78; 1 Binn. 502; 12 Mass. 456; 3 Johns. Ch. 261; 35 Neb. 361; 91 Tenn. 147; 114 N. Y. 307; ASSENT.

In Ecclesiastical Law. A refusal to conform to the rites and ceremonies of the established church. 2 Burn, Eccl. Law 165, 220.

DISSENTER. One who refuses to conform to the rites and ceremonies of the established churches; a non-conformist (q. v.). 2 Burn, Eccl. Law 165–220.

DISSOLUTION. In Contracts. The dissolution of a contract is the annulling its effects between the contracting parties.

The dissolution of a partnership is the putting an end to the partnership. Its dissolution does not affect contracts made between the partners and others; so that they are entitled to all their rights, and are liable on their obligations, as if the partnership had not been dissolved. See PARTNERSHIP.

Of Corporations. Dissolution of corporations takes place by act of legislature (but in America only by consent of the corporation, or where the power to dissolve has been reserved by the legislature); by the loss of all the members, or an integral part of them; by a surrender of the charter; by the expiration of the period for which it was chartered; by proceedings for the winding up of the company under the law; or by a forfeiture of the franchises, for abuse of its powers. The loss of members will not work a dissolution, so long as enough members remain to fill vacancies; 5 Ind. 77; 155 Mass. 183; nor does a failure to elect officers; 13 Pa. 133; 20 Conn. 447; 19 D. C. 575; 3 Watts 46. So of an eleemosynary corporation; 14 How. 268; nor does the resignation of all the officers of a corporation work a dissolution; 18 Ia. 469; but it is said that a municipal or charitable corporation may be dissolved by the loss of all of its members, although this mode of dissolution cannot take place in the case of business corporations which have a transferrable joint stock, because the corporate shares, being personal property, must always belong to some person, and such person must of necessity be a member of the corporation; 5 Thomp. Corp. § 6652; 24 Pick. 29. And even where all the shares of stock pass into the hands of less than the prescribed number of stockholders, there is no dissolution, even though they may have passed into the hands of two members; 14 Pick. 63; or of a single person; 42 Ga. 148; and such person could carry on the corporate business; id.

Ordinarily, a corporation may by a majority vote surrender its franchises; 44 Pa. 435; 7 C. E. Green 404; 7 Gray 393; but such a surrender must be accepted by the state; 9 R. I. 590; excepting where the stockholders are liable for the debts; 7 Cold. 420. A corporation is not dissolved or its franchises forfeited by its insolvency and assignment of its assets for the benefit of its creditors, where the state brings no proceedings to have the charter forfeited, and there is no surrender thereof by act of the shareholders; 86 Tenn. 614; 11 Colo. 97; 35 Fed. Rep. 433.

A non-user of corporate powers does not of itself work a dissolution, even though it be for twenty years; 21 N. J. Eq. 463; but see 37 Vt. 324, where there had been no corporate acts performed for 23 years and it was held there was a dissolution. The question is one of fact and intent; 5 Thomp. Corp. § 6659. The fact that a corporation has ceased to do business and has made an assignment of all its property for the payment of its debts and for several years held no annual meetings or elected directors, does not work a dissolution to the extent of preventing its maintaining an action for a debt due it; id. § 6660. The sale of the property and franchises of a corporation in foreclosure proceedings does not, ipso facto, work a dissolution. It will pass the franchise of the company to operate or enjoy the particular property foreclosed, but not its primary franchise to be a corporation; 5 Thomp. Corp. § 6662. (But that the corporation is extinguished by such a sale, see 37 Mo. 131.) The insolvency of a corporation or the appointment of a receiver therefor does not work a dissolution; 24 Pick. 49.

By the statutory consolidation of two corporations, it would seem that both are dissolved, strictly speaking, unless the statute provides for the consolidation of one of the companies into the other. Provision is always made by such statutes that the indebtedness of either of the companies shall become the indebtedness of the consolidated company. See 5 Thomp. Corp. § 6671.

The forfeiture of a charter by misuser or nonuser is complete only upon a final adjudication thereof in a competent court, upon proper proceedings at the suit of the government which created the corporation, and in the courts of such government; Moraw. Priv. Corp. 959, 1015; the existence of the charter cannot be attacked collaterally, or by an individual; 7 Pick. 344; 4 G. & J. 1. But when the legislature has reserved the right to revoke a charter for abuse of its privileges or failure to perform a condition, it may enact the repeal at the proper time; 23 Pick. 334; 26 Pa. 287; and such repealing act will be held constitutional unless the company can show by plain and satisfactory evidence that the privileges granted under the charter were not misused or abused; id. The courts will not presume that the power of repeal has been improperly exercised; 5 Thomp. Corp. § 6579. Where the legislature reserves the unqualified right of repeal upon the happening of a certain condition, it is exclusively within its power to determine whether the condition has happened, and a previous judicial determination of that fact is not necessary; id.; 26 Pa. 287; 23 Pick. 334; 33 Minn. 377. And so where there is a right of repeal in the legislature in case the corporation misuses its franchises; 26 Pa. 287. Such misuse or abuse of corporate privileges consists in any positive act in violation of the charter and in derogation of public right wilfully done or caused to be done by those appointed to manage the general concerns of the corporation; id. Where a franchise is granted with a provision that if not exercised in a specified time it shall be void, upon the expiration of the time without the performance of the condition, the charter falls without any action on the part of the state to declare its forfeiture; 110 Pa. 331; 46 N. J. Eq. 118; 81 N. Y. 69. But other cases hold that the charter is not forfeited until action by the state either legislative or judicial; 79 Mo. 632; 16 Wall. 203; 73 Ill. 541. The former view is strongly maintained by Judge Thompson; see 5 Thomp. Corp. § 6586. If the charter or the statute under which it is granted names a definite period for the life of the corporation, the corporation is dissolved, ipso facto, upon the expiration of that period without any action either on the part of the state or of the members of the corporation; 76 Cal. 190; 5 Mo. App. 337. "The incapacity to revive or resuscitate the powers of a corporation may arise from three causes: 1. The absence of the necessary officers who are required to be present when the deficiency is supplied, or their incapacity or neglect to do some act which is requisite to the validity of the appointment; 2. The want of the necessary corporators who are required to unite in the appointment; 3. The want of the proper persons from whom the appointment is to be made." 5 Thomp. Corp. § 6658.

Upon a dissolution, the assets of all kinds are a trust fund for the payment of debts, and afterwards for distribution among the stockholders; 2 Kent 307; 13 Blatch. 134; 39 N. H. 435. The title of the land of an eleemosynary corporation reverts on its dissolution, to the original owner without any act on his part; 129 Ill. 403. Actions at law against a private corporation abate upon its dissolution; 71 Tex. 90; contra, 30 W. Va. 43; 11 Colo. 97. Dissolution puts an end to all existing contracts. It works a breach of the contract; Green's Brice, Ultra Vires 803. See 12 Am. Dec. 239; 44 La. Ann. 462; Boone, Corporations § 197; 9 Lawy. Rep. Ann. 33, note; id. 273.

Since the dissolution of a corporation, either by its own limitation or by the decree of a court of competent jurisdiction, puts an end to its legal existence, it can thereafter neither prosecute nor defend an action. Accordingly, in the absence of statutory reservations (which, however, generally exist), upon the dissolution of a corporation all actions pending against it abate; 8 Pet. 281; 21 Wall. 609; 68 Ill. 348; 31 Me. 57; 123 Mass. 32; 58 N. Y. 562; 71 Tex. 90; and if the suit has been commenced by attachment, the dissolution will destroy the attachment lien; 56 Conn. 468; 8 W. & S. 207; unless ripened into a judgment at the time of the dissolution, and this, whether the attachment is original or is sued out in aid of a pending action; 5 Thomp. Corp. § 6724.

Under the statutes providing for the keeping alive of actions which would otherwise abate on the dissolution of a corporation, it is not quite settled whether the same principles apply as those which apply to the survival of actions on the death of a natural person; but the weight of authority is in favor of the affirmative; 16 N. Y. Supp. 692; 81 Wis. 207.

In Practice. The act of rendering a legal proceeding null, or changing its character; as where an attachment is dissolved so far as it is a lien on property by entering bail or security to the action; or as injunctions are dissolved by the court.

DISSUADE. In Criminal Law. To turn from any action by advice or solicitation. Worc. Dict.

To dissuade a witness from giving evidence against a person indicted is an indictable offence at common law; Hawk. Pl. Cr. b. 1, c. 21, s. 15. The mere attempt to stifle evidence is also criminal although the persuasion should not succeed, on the general principle that an incitement to commit a crime is in itself criminal; 1 Russ. Cr. 44; 2 East 5, 21; 6 id. 454; 2 Stra. 904; 2 Leach 925.

DISTANCE. The rule is that the distance between given points should be measured in a straight line; 5 E. & B. 92; 6 id. 350; 8 L. R. Exch. 32. But in a rule of court as to service the distance has been taken by the usual road; 7 Cow. 419.

DISTILLERY. A place or building where alcoholic liquors are distilled or manufactured. See Pet. C. C. 180; Act July 13, 1866, 14 Stat. L. 117; 45 N. Y. 499; 54 id. 35.

DISTRACTED PERSON. A term used in the statutes of Illinois, Rev. Laws, 1833, p. 332, and New Hampshire, Dig. Laws, 1830, p. 339, to express a state of insanity.

DISTRACTIO. In Civil Law. The sale of a pledge by a debtor. The appropriation of the property of a ward by a guardian. Calvinus, Lex.

DISTRAHERE. To withdraw; to sell. Distrahere controversias, to diminish and settle quarrels; distrahere matrimonium, to dissolve marriage; to divorce. Calvinus, Lex.

DISTRAIN. To take as a pledge property of another, and keep the same until he performs his obligation or until the property is replevied by the sheriff. It was used to secure an appearance in court, payment of rent, performance of services, etc. 3 Bla. Com. 231; Fitzh. N. B. 32 (B) (C), 223; 3 Daly 455. See DISTRESS.

DISTRESS (Fr. distraindre, to draw away from; Lat. districtio). The taking of a personal chattel out of the possession of a wrong-doer into the custody of the party injured, to procure satisfaction for the wrong done. 3 Bla. Com. 6; 44 Barb. 488. It is generally resorted to for the purpose of enforcing the payment of rent, taxes, or other duties, as well as to exact compensation for such damages as result from the trespasses of cattle.

This remedy is of great antiquity, and is said by Spelman to have prevailed among the Gothic nations of Europe from the breaking up of the Roman Empire. But in a recent work the opinion is expressed that distress before judicial proceedings had been taken is not very old. 1 Poll. & Mail. Hist. Engl. Law 334. Distress was not a means whereby the distrainer could satisfy the debt due him; ibid. After distress the lord might not sell the goods; they were not in his possession, but were in custodia legis, and he must be ready to give them up if the tenant tendered arrears or offered gage and pledge that he would contest the claim in a court of law. The lord could not take what he liked best among the chattels that he found; 2 id. 574. The English statutes since the days of Magna Charta have, from time to time, extended and modified its features to meet the exigencies of the times. Our state legislatures have generally, and with some alterations, adopted the English provisions, recognizing the old remedy as a salutary and necessary one, equally conducive to the security of the landlord and to the welfare of society. As a means of collecting rent, however, it is becoming unpopular in the United States, as giving an undue advantage to landlords over other creditors in the collection of debts. See 2 Dall. 68; 2 Halst. 29; 1 Harr. & J. 3; 1 M'Cord 299; 1 Blackf. 469; 1 Bibb 607; 2 Leigh 370; 3 Dana 209.

In the New England states the law of attachment on mesne process has superseded the law of distress; 3 Pick. 105, 960; 4 Dane, Abr. 126. The state of New York has expressly abolished it by statute. The courts of North Carolina hold it to be inconsistent with the spirit of her laws and government, and declare that the common process of distress does not exist in that state; 2 M'Cord 39; Cam. & N. 22; to the same effect are the laws of Missouri; 3 Mo. 472. In Ohio, Tennessee, and Alabama there are no statutory provisions on the subject, except in the former state to secure to the landlord a share of the crops in preference to an execution creditor, and one in the latter, confining the remedy to the city of Mobile; 6 Ala. 239. Mississippi has abolished it by statute; but property cannot be taken in execution on the premises unless a year's rent, if it be due, is first tendered to the landlord, who has also a lien on the growing crop; 50 Miss. 556; to the same effect are the statutes of Wisconsin; Wis. Laws, 1866, p. 77. In Colorado a landlord cannot distress unless in pursuance of an express agreement; 11 Colo. 393.

To authorize a distress there must be a fixed rent in money, produce or services; it may be by parol and if not certain it must be capable of being reduced to a certainty; Co. Litt. 96 a; 9 Wend. 322; 3 Pa. 31; 1 Bay 815; and hence it will not lie on an agreement to pay no rent, but make repairs of uncertain value; Add. Pa. 347; a distress for a rent of a certain quantity of grain, may name the value in case of tender of arrears or sale of the property; 13 S. & R. 52. See 3 W. & S. 531.

A distress can only be taken for rent in arrear, and not, therefore, until the day after it is due; unless by the terms of the lease it is made payable in advance; 4 Cow. 516; 3 Munf. 277; 138 Ill. 483. But no previous demand is necessary, except where the conditions of the lease require it; 83 Ga. 402. Nor will the right be extinguished either by an unsatisfied judgment for the rent or by taking a promissory note therefor, unless such note has been accepted in absolute payment of the rent; 5 Hill 651; 3 Pa. 490.

It may be taken for any kind of rent, the detention of which beyond the day of payment is injurious to him who is entitled to receive it.

At common law, the distrainer must have possessed a reversionary interest in the premises out of which the distress issued, unless he had expressly reserved a power to distress when he parted with the reversion; 2 Cow. 652; 1 Term 441; Co. Litt. 143 b. But the English statute of 4 Geo. II. c. 28, substantially abolished all distinctions between rents, and gave the remedy in all cases where rent is reserved upon a lease. The effect of the statute was to separate the right of distress from the reversion to which it had before been incident, and to place every species of rent upon the same footing as if the power of distress had been expressly reserved in each case.

A distress may be made by each one of several joint tenants for the whole rent or they may all join together; 4 Bingh. 562; 2 Ball & B. 465; by tenants in common, each for his separate share; 1 McCl. & Y. 107; Cro. Jac. 611; unless the rent be entire, as of a house, in which case they must all join;

Co. Litt. 197 a; 5 Term 246; a husband as tenant by the curtesy for rent due to his wife, although due to her as executrix or administratrix; 2 Saund. 195; 1 Ld. Raym. 369; a widow after dower has been admeasured for her third of the rent; Co. Litt. 32 a; an heir at law, or devisee, for that which becomes due to them respectively, after the death of the ancestor, in respect to their reversionary estate; 5 Cow. 501; 1 Saund. 287; see 34 Ill. App. 373; and guardians, trustees, or agents who make leases in their own names, as well as the assignee of the reversion which is subject to a lease; 2 Hill 475; 5 C. & P. 379. Payment of rent is sufficient attornment to enable the party to whom the payment is made to make a distress; 28 Ill. App. 643.

Generally all goods found upon the premises, whether of tenant, under-tenant, or stranger, may be distrained for rent in arrear; Woodf. Landl. & T. 435; 13 Wend. 256; 1 Rawle 435; 7 H. & J. 129; 4 Rand. 334; 1 Bail. 497; 91 Pa. 349; Com. Dig. Distress (B 1). Thus, a gentleman's chariot in a coach-house of a livery-stable keeper was distrainable by the landlord of the livery-stable keeper; 3 Burr. 1498; cattle put on the tenant's land by consent of the owners of the beasts, are distrainable by the landlord immediately after for rent in arrear; 3 Bla. Com. 8; and furniture leased to a tenant, and used by him on the demised premises, is subject to the landlord's right of distress for rent; 134 Pa. 177. And the necessity of this rule is justified by the consideration that the rights of the landlord would be liable to be defeated by a great variety of frauds and collusions, if his remedy should be restricted to such goods only as he could prove to be the property of the tenant.

Goods of a person who has some interest in the land jointly with the distrainer, as those of a joint tenant, although found upon the land, cannot be distrained; nor goods of executors and administrators, or of the assignee of an insolvent regularly discharged according to law, in Pennsylvania, for more than one year's rent. Nor can the goods of a former tenant, rightfully on the land, be distrained for another's rent, as emblements, or growing crops of a tenant at will quitting on notice, even after they are reaped, if they remain on the land for the purpose of husbandry; Willes 131; or in the hands of a vendee they cannot be distrained although the purchaser allow them to remain uncut after they have come to maturity; 2 Ball & B. 362; 5 J. B. Moo. 97. If a tenant seek to remove from the premises any portion of the crops before the rent is due, he is subject to distraint immediately; 84 Ga. 479.

As a distress is only of the property of the tenant, things wherein he can have no absolute property, as cats, dogs, rabbits, and animals feræ naturæ, cannot be distrained; yet deer, which are of a wild nature, kept in a private enclosure for sale or profit, may be distrained for rent; 3 Bla. Com. 7. There can be no distress of such things as cannot be restored to the owner in the same plight as when taken, as milk, fruit, and the like; 3 Bla. Com. 9; or things affixed or annexed to the freehold, as furnaces, windows, doors, and the like; Co. Litt. 47 b; or essentially part of the freehold although for a time removed therefrom, as a millstone removed to be picked; or an anvil fixed in a smith's shop; 6 Price 3; 1 Q. B. 895; 3 id. 961.

Goods are also privileged in cases where the proprietor is either compelled from necessity to place his goods upon the land, or where he does so for commercial purposes; 17 S. & R. 139; 4 Halst. 110; 1 Bay 102, 170; 2 M'Cord 39; 3 Ball & B. 75; 6 J. B. Moo. 243; 2 C. & P. 353. In the first case, the goods are exempt because the owner has no option: as goods of a traveller in an inn; 7 Hen. VII. M. 1, p. 1; 2 Keny. 439; Barnes 472; 1 W. Bla. 483; 3 Burr. 1408. In the other, the interests of the community require that commerce should be encouraged; and adventurers will not engage in speculations if the property embarked is to be made liable for the payment of debts they never contracted. Hence goods landed at a wharf, or deposited in a warehouse on storage; 17 S. & R. 138; 21 Me. 47; 23 Wend. 462; goods of a third person consigned to an agent to be sold on commission (and if the landlord knows that the goods are so owned and has them sold under distress, he is liable to the owner in trespass; 155 Pa. 582); a horse standing in a smith's shop to be shod, or in a common inn, or cloth at a tailor's house to be made into a coat, or corn sent to a mill to be ground; 3 Bla. Com. 8; Woodf. Landl. & T. 440; cannot be distrained; neither can goods of a boarder, for rent due by the keeper of a boarding-house; 5 Whart. 9; unless used by the tenant with the boarder's consent and without that of the landlord; 1 Hill, N. Y. 565.

At common law, goods delivered to a common carrier, or other person, to be conveyed for hire, or goods on the premises of an auctioneer, for the purpose of sale are privileged; 1 Cr. & M. 380.

Goods taken in execution cannot be distrained. The law in some states gives the landlord the right to claim payment out of the proceeds of an execution for rent not exceeding one year, and he is entitled to payment up to the day of seizure, though it be in the middle of a quarter; 5 Binn. 505; but he is not entitled to the day of sale; 5 Binn. 505. See 18 Johns. 1. The usual practice is to give notice to the sheriff that there is a certain sum due to the landlord as arrears of rent,—which notice ought to be given to the sheriff, or person who takes the goods in execution upon the premises; for the sheriff is not bound to find out whether rent is due, nor is he liable to an action unless there has been a demand of rent before the removal; Com. Dig. Rent (D 8); 11 Johns. 185. This notice can be given by the immediate landlord only. A ground-landlord is not entitled to his rent out of the goods of the under-tenant taken in execution; 2 Stra. 787. And where there are two executions, the landlord is not entitled to a year's rent on each. See 2 Stra. 1024. Goods distrained and replevied may be distrained by another landlord for subsequent rent; 2 Dall. 68. Where a tenant makes an assignment in the usual form, for the benefit of creditors, the assigned property is no longer his in his own right, and it cannot be seized under a distress warrant for rent; 26 S. C. 333; 36 id. 75.

By statute in some states tools of a man's trade, some designated household furniture, school-books, and the like, are exempted from distress, execution, or sale. In Pennsylvania, property to the value of three hundred dollars, exclusive of all wearing apparel of the defendant and his family, and all Bibles and school-books in use in the family, are exempted from distress for rent. Also sewing-machines in private families.

There are also goods conditionally privileged, as beasts of the plough, which are exempt if there be a sufficient distress besides on the land whence the rent issues; Co. Litt. 47 a; implements of trade, as a loom in actual use, where there is a sufficient distress besides; 4 Term 565; other things in actual use, as a horse whereon a person is riding, an axe in the hands of a person cutting wood, and the like; Co. Litt. 47 a.

At common law a distress could not be made after the expiration of the lease. This evil was corrected by statute in Pennsylvania in 1772. Similar legislative enactments exist in most of the other states. In Philadelphia, the landlord may, under certain circumstances, apportion his rent, and distrain before it becomes due.

A distress may be made either upon or off the land. It generally follows the rent, and is, consequently, confined to the land out of which it issues; Woodf. Landl. & T. 456. If two pieces of land, therefore, are let by two separate demises, although both be contained in one lease, a joint distress cannot be made for them; for this would be to make the rent of one issue out of the other; Rep. t. Hardw. 245; 2 Stra. 1040. But where lands lying in different counties are let together by one demise at one entire rent, and it does not appear that the lands are separate from each other, one distress may be made for the whole rent; 1 Ld. Raym. 55; 12 Mod. 76. And where rent is charged upon land which is afterwards held by several tenants, the grantee or landlord may distrain for the whole upon the land of any of them; because the whole rent is deemed to issue out of every part of the land; Rolle, Abr. 671. If there be a house on the land, the distress may be made in the house; if the outer door or window be open, a distress may be taken out of it; Rolle, Abr. 671. If an outer door be open, an inner door may be broken for the purpose of taking a distress, but not otherwise; Cas. t. Hard. 168. In levying a distress for rent entrance was obtained into the courtyard through a gate, and being there, the bailiff broke open the main door of the warehouse and distrained therein; the court held the distress illegal, for the reason that the door that was broken was the outer door; 68 Law T. 742. A distress was held lawful where a party climbed over the wall surrounding the yard of a house and entered the house by an open window; [1894] 1 Q. B. 119. Barges on a river, attached to the leased premises (a wharf) by ropes, cannot be distrained; 6 Bingh. 150.

By an act of 1772 in Pennsylvania copied from the act of 11 Geo. II. c. 19, where a tenant fraudulently removes his goods from the premises to prevent a distress, the landlord may distrain on them within 30 days after removal, but not on goods previously sold bona fide and for a valuable consideration to one not privy to the fraud. To bring a case within the act, the removal must take place after the rent becomes due, and must be secret, not made in open day; for such removal cannot be said to be clandestine within the meaning of the act; 12 S. & R. 217; 7 Bingh. 423; 1 Mood. & M. 535. This English statute has been re-enacted in many of the states, but the period during which the goods may be followed varies in different states. In Louisiana the landlord may follow goods removed from his premises for fifteen days after removal, provided they continue to be the property of the tenant; La. Civ. Code 2675; Tayl. Landl. & T. § 538. It has been made a question whether goods are protected that were fraudulently removed on the night before the rent had become due; 4 Campb. 135. The goods of a stranger cannot be pursued; they can be distrained only while they are on the premises; 1 Dall. 440.

A distress for rent may be made either by the person to whom it is due, or, which is the preferable mode, by a constable or bailiff, or other officer properly authorized by him. If made by a constable or bailiff, he must be properly authorized to make it; for which purpose the landlord should give him a written authority, usually called a warrant of distress; but a subsequent assent and recognition given by the party for whose use the distress has been made is sufficient; Hamm. N. P. 382.

Being thus provided with the requisite authority to make a distress, he seizes the tenant's goods, or some of them in the name of the whole, and declares that he takes them as a distress for the sum expressed in the warrant to be due by the tenant to the landlord, and that he takes them by virtue of the said warrant; which warrant he ought, if required, to show; 1 Leon. 50. When making the distress, it ought to be made for the whole rent; but if goods cannot be found at the time sufficient to satisfy the whole, or the party mistake the value of the thing distrained, he may make a second distress; Bradb. Distr. 129, 130. It must be taken in the daytime after sunrise and before sunset; except for damage feasant, which may be in the night; Co. Litt. 142 a.

As soon as a distress is made an inventory of the goods should be made, and a copy of it delivered to the tenant, together with a notice of taking such distress, with the cause of taking it, and an opportunity thus afforded the owner to replevy or redeem the goods. This notice of taking a distress is not required by the statute to be in writing; and, therefore, parol or verbal notice may be given either to the tenant on the premises, or to the owner of the goods distrained; 13 Mod. 76. And although notice is directed by the act to specify the cause of taking, it is not material whether it accurately state the period of the rent's becoming due; Dougl. 279; or even whether the true cause of taking the goods be expressed therein; 7 Term 654. If the notice be not personally given, it should be left in writing at the tenant's house, or, according to the directions of the act, at the mansion-house, or other most notorious place on the premises charged with the rent distrained for.

The distrainer may leave or impound the distress on the premises for the five days mentioned in the act, but becomes a trespasser after that time; 2 Dall. 69. As in many cases it is desirable, for the sake of the tenant, that the goods should not be sold as soon as the law permits, it is usual for him to sign an agreement or consent to their remaining on the premises for a longer time, in the custody of the distrainer, or of a person by him appointed for that purpose. While in his possession, the distrainer cannot use or work cattle distrained, unless it be for the owner's benefit, as to milk a cow, or the like; 5 Dane, Abr. 34. Goods distrained for rent may be replevied by a claimant thereof before sale; 33 W. N. C. (Pa.) 62.

Before the goods are sold, they must be appraised by two reputable freeholders, who shall take an oath or affirmation, to be administered by the sheriff, undersheriff, or coroner, in the words mentioned in the act. The next requisite is to give six days' public notice of the time and place of sale of the things distrained; see 153 Pa. 376; after which, if they have not been replevied, they may be sold by the proper officer, who may apply the proceeds to the payment and satisfaction of the rent, and the expenses of the distress, appraisal, and sale; Woodf. Landl. & T. 1322. The overplus, if any, is to be paid to the tenant. A distrainer has always been held strictly accountable for any irregularity he might commit, although accidental, as well as for the taking of anything more than was reasonably required to satisfy the demand; Bradb. Dist.; Gilbert, Rent.

See Law of Distress for Rent by R. T. Hunter, London.

DISTRESS INFINITE. In English Practice. A process commanding the sheriff to distrain a person from time to time, and continually afterwards, by taking his goods by way of pledge to enforce the performance of something due from the party distrained upon. In this case no distress can be immoderate, because, whatever its value may be, it cannot be sold, but is to be immediately restored on satisfaction being made; 3 Bla. Com. 231. It was the means anciently resorted to to compel an appearance. See ATTACHMENT; ARREST.

DISTRIBUTEES. The persons who are entitled under the statute of distribution to the personal estate of one who has died intestate. 9 Ired. 279.

DISTRIBUTION. See DESCENT AND DISTRIBUTION.

DISTRICT. A certain portion of the country, separated from the rest for some special purpose.

The United States are divided into judicial districts, in each of which is established a district court; they are also divided into election districts, collection districts, etc.

It may be construed to mean territory; 97 Pa. 305; and in the revenue laws the words "district" and "port" are often used in the same sense; 3 Mas. 155.

DISTRICT ATTORNEYS OF THE UNITED STATES. Officers appointed in each judicial district, whose duty it is to prosecute, in such district, all delinquents, for crimes and offences cognizable under the authority of the United States, and all civil actions in which the United States shall be concerned, except in the supreme court, in the district in which the court shall be holden. Rev. Stat. § 767.

The district attorney must appear upon the record for the United States as plaintiffs, in order that the United States should be recognized as such on the record; 7 Blatch. 424; 3 Ben. 132; 4 Blatch. 418.

The officer who represents the state in criminal proceedings within a particular county is also, in some of the states, called district attorney.

As a prosecuting attorney he is a quasi judicial officer and stands indifferent between the accused and any private interest; 51 Mich. 422.

DISTRICT COURTS. See UNITED STATES COURTS and the articles on the various states.

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA. A portion of the country, originally ten miles square, which was ceded to the United States by the states of Virginia and Maryland, over which the national government has exclusive jurisdiction.

Under the constitution, congress is authorized to "exercise exclusive jurisdiction in all cases whatsoever, over such district, not exceeding ten miles square, as may, by cession of particular states and the acceptance of congress, become the seat of government of the United States." In pursuance of this authority, the states of Maryland and Virginia ceded to the United States a small territory on the banks of the Potomac, and congress, by the act of July 16, 1790, accepted the same, for the permanent seat of the government of the United States.

By the act of July 11, 1840, congress retroceded the county of Alexandria, part of the District of Columbia, to the state of Virginia.

The seat of government was removed from Philadelphia to the district in December, 1800. As it exists at present, it constitutes but one county, called the county of Washington.

By act of Congress of Feb. 21, 1871, a territorial government was created for the district; 16 Stat.

L. 419; which was not a mere municipality in its restricted sense, but was held to be placed upon the same footing with that of the states or territories within the limits of the act; 7 D. C. 165. This government was, however, abolished by act of June 20, 1874, U. S. Rev. Stat. 1 Supp. 22; and a temporary government by commissioners was thereby created, which existed until by act of June 11, 1878, id. 173, provision was made for the continuance of the District "as a municipal corporation" and its control by the federal government through these commissioners, two of whom are appointed by the President and confirmed by the Senate, and the other is an engineer officer of the army to be detailed for that service by the President. It is a municipal corporation having a right to sue and be sued, and is subject to the ordinary rules that govern the law of procedure between private persons. The sovereign power is lodged in the government of the United States, and not in the corporation of the District; 132 U. S. 1. Congress is its local legislature; 116 id. 404; and exercises over it full and entire jurisdiction both of a political and municipal nature; 147 id. 282, 300; and it may legislate with respect to people and property therein as may the legislature of a state over any of its subordinate municipalities; 97 id. 687, 690.

The District of Columbia and the territorial districts of the United States are not states within the meaning of the constitution and of the Judiciary Act, so as to enable a citizen thereof to sue a citizen of one of the states in the federal courts; 2 Cra. 445; 1 Wheat. 91; R. M. T. Charl. 374. Kent says: "However extraordinary it might seem to be, that the courts of the United States, which were open to aliens, and to the citizens of every state, should be closed upon the inhabitants of those districts (territories and the District of Columbia), on the construction that they were not citizens of a state, yet as the court observed, this was a subject for legislative, and not for judicial consideration." 1 Com. 349. It might be suggested as a consideration not here adverted to, that the theory on which this right of suing in federal courts is based is possible prejudice to the rights of a citizen of another state or an alien in the state court. In the District of Columbia and territories this would not apply, as their courts are created by the federal government.

For the judiciary of the district, see UNITED STATES COURTS.

DISTRICTIO. A distraint, or distress (q. v.). Cowel.

DISTRINGAS. A writ directed to the sheriff, commanding him to distrain a person of his goods and chattels to enforce a compliance with what is required of him.

It is used to compel an appearance where the party cannot be found, and in equity may be availed of to compel the appearance of a corporation aggregate. 4 Bouvier, Inst. n. 4191; Comyns, Dig. Process (D 7); Chitty, Pr.; Sellow, Pr.

A form of execution in the actions of detinue and assize of nuisance. Brooke, Abr. pl. 26; 1 Rawle 44.

DISTRINGAS JURATORES (Lat. that you distrain jurors). A writ commanding the sheriff to have the bodies of the jurors, or to distrain them by their lands and goods, that they may appear upon the day appointed. 3 Bla. Com. 354. It issues at the same time with the venire, though in theory afterwards, founded on the supposed neglect of the juror to attend. 3 Steph. Com. 590.

DISTRINGAS NUPER VICE COMITEM (Lat. that you distrain the late sheriff). A writ to distrain the goods of a sheriff who is out of office, to compel him to bring in the body of a defendant, or to sell goods attached under a fi. fa., which he ought to have done while in office, but has failed to do. 1 Tidd, Pr. 313.

DISTURBANCE. A wrong done to an incorporeal hereditament by hindering or disquieting the owner in the enjoyment of it. 3 Bla. Com. 235; 1 S. & R. 298; 41 Me. 104. The remedy for a disturbance is an action on the case, or, in some instances in equity, by an injunction.

DISTURBANCE OF COMMON. Any act done by which the right of another to his common is incommoded or hindered. The remedy is by distress (where beasts are put on his common) or by an action on the case, provided the damages are large enough to admit of his laying an action with a per quod. Cro. Jac. 195; Co. Litt. 122; 3 Bla. Com. 237; 1 Saund. 546; 4 Term 71.

DISTURBANCE OF FRANCHISE. Any acts done whereby the owner of a franchise has his property damaged or the profits arising thence diminished. The remedy for such disturbance is a special action on the case; Cro. Eliz. 558; 2 Saund. 113 b; 3 Sharsw. Bla. Com. 236; 28 N. H. 438.

Equity will grant an injunction against disturbance of a franchise in certain cases; 6 Paige 554; 12 Pet. 91; 8 G. & J. 479.

DISTURBANCE OF PATRONAGE. The hindrance or obstruction of the patron to present his clerk to a benefice. 3 Bla. Com. 242. The principal remedy was a writ of right of advowson; and there were also writs of darrein presentment and of quare impedit. Co. 2d Inst. 355; Fitzh. N. B. 31.

DISTURBANCE OF PUBLIC WORSHIP. The interference with the good order of religious assemblies has been described as disturbance, and in some of the United States, statutes have been passed to meet the offence; 1 Bish. Crim. L. 542; 28 Ind. 364; 34 N. Y. 141; 1 Ala. Sel. Cas. 61; 7 Humph. 11; 1 W. & S. 548; 90 Ga. 459; 51 Mo. App. 293; 83 Ala. 68; 67 Miss. 358.

It is not necessary to constitute the offence that the congregation shall be actually engaged in acts of religious worship at the time of the disturbance, but it is sufficient if they are assembled for the purpose of worship; 78 N. C. 448; 68 Ind. 264.

To support a conviction for disturbing a congregation assembled for public worship, the evidence must show a wilful disturbance; 19 S. W. Rep. (Tex.) 605; 1 Gra. 476; 5 Tex. App. 470; 53 Ala. 398; 68 Ind. 264; 82 N. C. 576.

A Christmas festival is not a religious assembly; 4 Lea 199; nor is a church business meeting; 11 Tex. App. 318. A Sunday school is not divine service; 73 Pa. 39.

DISTURBANCE OF TENURE. Breaking the connection which subsists between lord and tenant. 3 Bla. Com. 242; 2 Steph. Com. 513.

DISTURBANCE OF WAYS. This happens where a person who hath a right of way over another's ground by grant or prescription is obstructed by enclosures or other obstacles, or by ploughing across it, by which means he cannot enjoy his right of way, or at least in so commodious a manner as he might have done: 3 Bla. Com. 242; 5 Gray 409; 7 Md. 352; 23 Pa. 348; 29 id. 22.

DITCH. The words "ditch" and "drain" have no technical or exact meaning. They both may mean a hollow place in the ground, natural or artificial, where water is collected or passes off. 5 Gray 64.

DITTAY. In Scotch Law. A technical term in civil law, signifying the matter of charge or ground of indictment against a person accused of crime. Taking up ditty is obtaining informations and presentments of crime in order to trial. Skene, de verb. sig.; Bell, Dict.

DIVERSION. A turning aside or altering the natural course of a thing. The term is chiefly applied to the unauthorized changing the course of a water-course to the prejudice of a lower proprietor. Rap. & Lawr. L. Dict. See 17 Conn. 299; 6 Price 1.

One who has a natural gas well on his place may explode nitroglycerine therein for the purpose of increasing the flow, though it has the effect of drawing the gas from the land of another; 131 Ind. 599. The owner of land through which flows a stream of water, may recover damages from one who diverts the water, for any actual injury suffered therefrom in the enjoyment of his land; 145 Pa. 438; 84 Wis. 438; 66 Hun 632. The fact that one diverts water maliciously is of no importance in determining whether a legal right of plaintiff has been violated; 134 N. Y. 385. See WATER-COURSE; GAS; OIL.

DIVERSITY OF PERSON. The plea of a prisoner in bar of execution that he is not the person convicted. 4 Steph. Com. 368; Moz. & W. Law Dict.

DIVERSO INTUITU. In a different view or point of view; with a different view, design, or purpose; by a different course or process. 1 W. Bla. 89; 9 East 311; 1 Pet. 500; Gall. 318; 4 Kent, Com. 211 (b).

DIVEST. See DEVEST.

DIVIDEND. A portion of the principal or profits divided among several owners of a thing. 13 Allen 400; 12 N. Y. 325; 8 R. I. 310; 1 Dev. & B. Eq. 545; 22 Wall. 38.

The term is usually applied to the division of the profits arising out of the business of a corporation or to the division among the creditors of the effects of an insolvent estate.

As confined to corporations it is "that portion of the profits and surplus funds of the corporation which has been actually set apart by a valid resolution of the board of directors, or by the shareholders at a corporate meeting, for distribution among the shareholders according to their respective interests, in such a sense as to become segregated from the property of the corporation, and to become the property of the shareholders distributively." 2 Thomp. Corp. § 2126.

In the commonest use of the term dividends are a sum which a corporation sets apart from its profits to be divided among its members. 31 Mich. 76; which, for the purpose of declaring a dividend, consist of the excess of its cash and other property on hand over its liabilities; 79 Ia. 678.

Dividends cannot usually be paid out of the capital but only from the profits. The former is a trust fund for the stockholders; 2 Thomp. Corp. § 2152; which each of them is entitled to have preserved intact; 25 Mo. App. 439; but this principle does not apply when the capital from its nature is liable to waste and depreciation, as in case of companies to work a mine or a patent; 41 Ch. Div. 1.

Where dividends are required to be declared out of profits merely of a railroad company, the rule for ascertaining what the profits are is to exclude from consideration all debts other than what are commonly understood by the term funded debts, but to treat as deductions debts incurred and due for engines, rails, and the like, which should and would have been paid at the time if the funds had been in hand and are necessary deductions from the property; 29 Beav. 272; and as to what are net earnings in the sense of surplus profits and therefore susceptible of definition, see 99 U. S. 420; 99 Am. Dec. 762, note; 90 Cal. 131.

In England it was held that dividends must be payable in money; L. R. 14 Eq. 517; and it has been said there that the whole of the profits of a corporation must be divided periodically; per Giffard, L. J., in L. R. 4 Ch. 494; but this is perhaps too broadly stated; Green's Brice, Ultra Vires 201. Neither of the above rules obtains in America: here stock and scrip dividends are very common; 102 Mass. 542; 115 id. 461; 52 N. H. 72; 51 Barb. 378; 8 R. I. 427; 6 Gill 363; Green's Brice, Ultra Vires 200; Moraw. Priv. Corp. 448; and in the absence of statutory restriction are lawful; 93 N. Y. 162; 115 Mass. 471; 5 Fed. Rep. 737; 74 Pa. 83; and bonds may be issued to the stockholders of a railroad corporation in place of cash as the dividends representing earnings appropriated to the construction account, and these dividends having been duly earned may be declared for four years at once instead of each year; 47 Hun 550.

The declaration of dividends is within the implied scope of the authority of the directors, and unless controlled by the action of the corporation itself they have authority, at their sole discretion, to declare dividends and to fix the time and place of payment within the limits of reason and good faith with the stockholders; 45 Barb. 510; 6 La. Ann. 745; 99 U. S. 420; 99 Mass. 101; 40 N. J. Eq. 114; 90 Cal. 131; 93 N. Y. 162; and as to time and place; 29 N. J. L. 82. See 77 Me. 445; 119 U. S. 296. And generally courts will not interfere in behalf of a common stockholder to compel the declaration of a dividend except in case of fraud or abuse of discretion; 51 Barb. 378; 33 Conn. 446; 29 Ala. 503; 4 Abb. Pr. 107; 83 Mich. 63; 31 A. & E. Corp. Cas. 349; nor will equity restrain the declaration of a dividend where the propriety of declaring one is fairly within the discretion of the directors; 41 Ch. Div. 1. Dividends may be applied by the corporation to debts due by the stockholder where the right of set-off would exist with respect to other creditors; 3 Sto. 411; but this right exists only where the dividend has been declared and therefore a stockholder cannot refuse to pay interest due to the corporation in anticipation that a dividend will be declared; 1 Clarke, Ch. 351. It has been held that unpaid dividends are assets of the corporation available for creditors in case of its insolvency; 44 Ala. 305; but this view is disapproved and declared unsound upon good reasons; 2 Thomp. Corp. § 2134. Dividends improperly declared may be recalled; id. § 2135; and even if paid, it has been held that they may be reclaimed; 17 B. Mon. 412; but this decision is doubted; 2 Thomp. Corp. § 2135; although approved in a case which did not require the court to go so far but only to hold that the dividend, not having been paid, was not collectible; 25 Mo. App. 439. There can be no discrimination among stockholders of the same class in respect to dividends, but if one stockholder is discriminated against he cannot recover his share ratably from the others, until at least he has established his right as a creditor of the company and pursued his remedy against it; 83 N. Y. 40.

A stockholder cannot recover the profits made by a corporation until a dividend has been declared; 99 Mass. 101; 57 N. Y. 196; 31 Mich. 78; 83 Pa. 269; 57 Me. 143; 112 N. Y. 1; but after a dividend has been declared, and a demand made therefor by a stockholder, he may sue in assumpsit for the amount due him; Chase, Dec. 167; 57 N. Y. 196; 49 Pa. 270; and a stockholder has been allowed to follow the amount of his dividend into the hands of the receiver of the company; 14 Hun 8; 42 Conn. 17; and the resolution declaring the dividend is an admission of indebtedness in legal money; 24 N. Y. 548; and it is no defence to show that the earnings were received in other property; id. Mandamus will not lie to compel the payment of dividends declared by a private corporation; 41 Mich. 166.

Dividends must be so declared as to give each stockholder his proportional share of profits; 45 Barb. 510; 57 N. Y. 196; 13 Ill. 516; L. R. 3 Ch. 262; 3 Brewst. 366; and if one person is excepted, he may sue for his dividends, for the reason that such exception is void; 21 S. W. Rep. (Mo.) 508. They can properly be declared only out of profits actually earned; and when improperly declared and paid, they may be recovered back; 71 N. Y. 9; 15 How. 304.

When the fact that a dividend has been voted by the directors is not made public or communicated to the stockholders, and no fund is set apart for payment, the vote may be rescinded; 158 Mass. 84.

It has been said that cash dividends are to be regarded as income, and stock dividends as capital; 115 Mass. 461; 102 id. 542; L. R. 5 Eq. 238; 1 McClel. 527; other cases hold that all dividends from earnings or profits are income and go to the life tenant; 18 Barb. 646; 30 id. 638; 4 C. E. Green 117. See 52 N. H. 72; also 24 Am. Rep. 169, n.; same note in substance in 18 Alb. L. J. 264. It is now uniformly held that cash dividends, extra dividends, or bonuses declared from earnings of a corporation are income; A. & E. Encyc.; 15 Sim. 473; [1887] L. R. 12 App. Cas. 385; 10 Lea 595; 83 Pa. 264; 99 Mass. 101; 104 N. Y. 618.

Dividends on the stock of a corporation whose only property consists of land, which dividends are paid from the proceeds of sales of the land, or from interest on the deferred payments on sales, are all income; 78 Hun 121. As between a life tenant and remainderman, a dividend representing profits is to be considered as income, though permanent improvements to an equal amount had previously been made and it is just sufficient to pay for a voted increase in the capital stock, which the stockholders might subscribe to; 152 Mass. 58. See 1 McLean 527.

In 28 Pa. 368, where accumulated profits were divided among the stockholders proportionally, in the form of full paid stock, the stock was considered to be income; in 83 Pa. 264 (s. c. 24 Am. Rep. 164), the capital stock was increased and the option to subscribe at par given to the stockholders; the original stock immediately fell in value by about the market value of the option; a trustee of shares sold his option on a part of his shares, and used the proceeds to subscribe for other shares; these latter were considered to be capital. The court based its estimate on the market value of the stock at the time of the transaction. In 64 Pa. 256, under peculiar circumstances the proceeds of the sale of a right to subscribe for additional stock were considered income. Extra dividends and bonuses declared from earnings are considered income; 15 Sim. 473; 31 Beav. 280; 2 Edw. Ch. 231; 6 Allen 174. And this is the case though the profits were earned before the purchase of the stock; 31 Beav. 280. The enhanced price for which stocks sell by reason of profits earned but not divided belongs to the corpus of the estate; 32 L. J. Ch. 627. See 36 Cent. Law J. 452; Thompson, Corporations, tit. Dividend; STOCK.

In another sense, according to some old authorities, dividend signifies one part of an indenture.

DIVINE SERVICE. The name of a feudal tenure, by which the tenants were obliged to do some special divine services in certain, as to sing so many masses, etc. 2 Bla. Com. 102; Mozl. & W. Dict.

In its modern use the term does not include Sunday schools; 73 Pa. 39.

DIVISA. In Old English. A device, award, or decree; also a devise; bounds or limits of division of a parish or farm. Also a court held on the boundary, in order to settle disputes of the tenants. Wharton.

DIVISIBLE. That which is susceptible of being divided.

A contract cannot, in general, be divided in such a manner that an action may be brought, or a right accrue, on a part of it; 2 Pa. 454. But some contracts are susceptible of division: as, when a reversioner sells a part of the reversion to one man and a part to another, each shall have an action for his share of the rent which may accrue on a contract to pay a particular rent to the reversioner; 3 Whart. 404. See APPORTIONMENT. But when it is to do several things at several times, an action will lie upon every default; 15 Pick. 409. See 1 Me. 316; 6 Mass. 344.

DIVISION. In English Law. A particular and ascertained part of a county. In Lincolnshire division means what riding does in Yorkshire.

DIVISION OF OPINION. Disagreement among those called upon to decide a matter.

When, in a company or society, the parties having a right to vote are so divided that there is not a plurality of the whole in favor of any particular proposition, or when the voters are equally divided, it is said there is division of opinion. The term is especially applied to a disagreement among the judges of a court such that no decision can be rendered upon the matter referred to them.

When the judges of a court are divided into three classes, each holding a different opinion, that class which has the greatest number shall give the judgment: for example, on a habeas corpus, when a court is composed of four judges, and one is for remanding the prisoner, another is for discharging him on his own recognizance, and the two others are for discharging him absolutely, the judgment will be that he be discharged; Rudyard's Case; Bacon, Abr. Habeas Corpus (B 10), Court, 5. See UNITED STATES COURTS. On the trial of an action at law, when the judges of the circuit court of the United States are opposed in opinion on a material question of law, the opinion of the presiding judge prevails; U. S. Rev. Stat. § 650; but in any such case the judgment rendered conformably thereto might, without regard to its amount, be reviewed on a writ of error, upon a certificate stating such question; 100 U. S. 158. The power of the supreme court to review a case on a division of opinion in a circuit court, under U. S. Rev. Stat. §§ 651 and 697, is taken away by the act of March 3, 1891, creating the circuit courts of appeals, which impliedly repeals said sections; 163 U. S. 132; U. S. v. Hewecker, Oct. 26, 1896. See 151 U. S. 577.

DIVISUM IMPERIUM. A divided jurisdiction. Applied e. g. to the jurisdiction of courts of common law and equity over the same subject. 1 Kent 366; 4 Steph. Com. 9.

DIVORCE. The dissolution or partial suspension, by law, of the marriage relation.

The dissolution is termed divorce from the bond of matrimony, or, in the Latin form of the expression, a vinculo matrimonii; the suspension, divorce from bed and board, a mensa et thoro. The former divorce puts an end to the marriage; the latter leaves it in full force. The term divorce is sometimes also applied to a sentence of nullity, which establishes that a supposed or pretended marriage either never existed at all, or at least was voidable at the election of one or both of the parties.

The more correct modern usage, however, confines the signification of divorce to the dissolution of a valid marriage. What has been known as a divorce a mensa et thoro may more properly be termed a legal separation. So also a sentence or decree which renders a marriage void ab initio, and bastardizes the issue, should be distinguished from one which is entirely prospective in its operation; and for that purpose the former may be termed a sentence of nullity. The present article will accordingly be confined to divorce in the strict acceptance of the term. For the other branches of the subject, see SEPARATION A MENSA ET THORO; NULLITY OF MARRIAGE.

Marriage, being a legal relation, and not (as sometimes supposed) a mere contract, can only be dissolved by legal authority.

The relation originates in the consent of the parties, but, once entered into, it must continue until the death of either husband or wife, unless sooner put an end to by the sovereign power. The Supreme Court of the United States, in 125 U. S. 210, say that whilst marriage is often termed by text writers and in decisions of courts a civil contract, it is something more. When the contract to marry is executed by the marriage, a relation between the parties is created which cannot change. Other contracts may be modified, restricted, or enlarged, or entirely released upon the consent of the parties, but not so with marriage. The relation once formed, the law steps in and holds the parties to various obligations and liabilities. The supreme court then approves the views laid down in 51 Me. 483, where it is said that when the contracting parties have entered into the marriage state, they have not so much entered into a contract as into a new relation, the rights, duties, and obligations of which rest not upon their agreement, but upon the general law of the state, statutory or common; they are of law, not of contract. It was of contract that the relation should be established, but being established, the power of the parties as to its extent or duration is at an end. Their rights under it are determined by the will of the sovereign as evidenced by the law. They can neither be modified nor changed by any agreement of the parties. It is a relation for life and the parties cannot terminate it at any shorter period by virtue of any contract they may make. "Marriage has been said to be something more than a mere contract, religious or civil; to be an institution"; L. R. 1 P. & D. 130. In England, until late years, no authority existed in any of the judicial courts to grant a divorce in the strict sense of the term. The subject of marriage and divorce generally belonged exclusively to the various ecclesiastical courts; and they were in the constant habit of granting what were termed divorces a mensa et thoro, for various causes, and of pronouncing sentences of nullity; but they had no power to dissolve a marriage, valid and binding in its origin, for causes arising subsequent to its solemnization. For that purpose recourse must be had to parliament; 2 Burn, Eccl. Law 202; Macq. Parl. Pr. 470. But by the statute of 20 & 21 Vict. (1857) c. 85, entitled "An act to amend the law relating to divorce and matrimonial causes in England," a new court was created, to be called "The Court for Divorce and Matrimonial Causes," upon which was conferred exclusively all jurisdiction over matrimonial matters then vested in the various ecclesiastical courts, and also the jurisdiction theretofore exercised by parliament in granting divorces. At present divorce causes are heard, in the first instance, in the "Probate and Divorce Division of the High Court of Justice," whence an appeal lies to the "Court of Appeal."

In this country the usage has been various. Formerly it was common for the various state legislatures, like the English parliament, to grant divorces by special act. Latterly, however, this practice is now much less common. In many states, also, it has been expressly prohibited by recent state constitutions; 1 Bish. Mar. & D. § 1471; Lloyd, Div. 12, 13. Such a statute is constitutional and it does not offend against the constitutional provision which forbids laws impairing the obligation of contracts, even though there was no valid ground for divorce and the wife was not notified; 125 U. S. 190, where the husband was a resident of the territory. See also 90 Wis. 272. Generally, at the present time, the jurisdiction to grant divorces is conferred by statute upon courts of equity, or courts possessing equity powers, to be exercised in accordance with the general principles of equity practice, subject to such modifications as the statute may direct. The practice of the English ecclesiastical courts, which is also the foundation of the practice of the new court for divorce and matrimonial causes in England, has never been adopted to any considerable extent in this country; but it is said that in some jurisdictions the principles and practice of the ecclesiastical courts are followed so far as they are applicable to our altered conditions and in accord with the spirit of our laws; 2 Bish. Mar. & Div. 460. See 35 Vt. 365; 33 Md. 401.

Numerous and difficult questions are constantly arising in regard to the validity in one state of divorces granted by the courts or legislature of another state. The subject is fully and ably treated in 2 Bish. Mar. Div. and Sep. § 128. The learned author there states the following propositions, which he elaborates with great care:—first, the tribunals of a country have no jurisdiction over a cause of divorce, wherever the offence may have occurred, if neither of the parties has an actual bona fide domicile within its territory; secondly, to entitle the court to take jurisdiction, it is sufficient for one of the parties to be domiciled in the country; both need not be, neither need the citation, when the domiciled party is plaintiff, be served personally on the defendant, if such personal service cannot be made, but there should be reasonable constructive notice, at least; thirdly, the place where the offence was committed, whether in the country in which the suit is brought or a foreign country, is immaterial; fourthly, the domicile of the parties at the time of the offence committed is of no consequence, the jurisdiction depending on their domicile when the proceeding is instituted and the judgment is rendered; fifthly, it is immaterial to this question of jurisdiction in what country or under what system of divorce laws the marriage was celebrated; sixthly, without a citation within the reach of process, or an appearance, the jurisdiction extends only to the status and what depends directly thereon, and not to collateral rights.

It should be observed, however, that the fourth proposition is not sustained by authority in Pennsylvania and New Hampshire, it being held in those states that the tribunal of the country alone where the parties were domiciled when the delictum occurred have jurisdiction to grant a divorce; 7 Watts 349; 8 W. & S. 251; 6 Pa. 449; 34 N. H. 518, and cases there cited; 35 id. 474; 64 id. 523. And for the law of Louisiana, see 9 La. Ann. 317. In Pennsylvania, the rule has been changed by statute of 26th April, 1850, § 6. See 30 Pa. 412.

The doctrine of the first proposition is said not to have been thoroughly established in England; 2 Bish. Mar. D. & Sep. § 43; but it is fully established in America: 13 Bush 318; 56 Ind. 263; 25 Minn. 29; 13 Hun 414; 1 Utah 112; 43 La. Ann. 1140; 1 Tex. Civ. App. 315; 120 N. Y. 485; 135 Mass. 83; 102 N. C. 491; 80 Pa. 501. But see contra, 30 Pa. 412; 135 id. 522. Mr. Bishop maintains the second proposition as fully supported on principle and authority; see especially 4 R. I. 87; 57 Miss. 200; 28 Ala. 12; 35 Ia. 238; 9 Wall. 108; 95 U. S. 714; 19 D. C. 431; but see 76 N. Y. 78; Story, Conf. Laws, Redf. ed.; 3 Am. L. Reg. N. S. 193. As to the third proposition, which is said by the same author to be universal, see 29 Ala. 719; 8 N. H. 21; 57 Barb. 305; 13 Johns. 192. The fifth proposition is universally recognized; see 7 Watts 349; 14 Pick. 181; 28 Ala. 12; 31 Ga. 223. See, however, 2 Cl. & F. 568.

When both husband and wife are domiciled in the state where the divorce is granted, the decree of divorce is without doubt valid everywhere; 39 N. H. 38; 9 Me. 140; 14 Mass. 227; 56 Md. 128; 72 N. Y. 237; 3 Wis. 664; 110 U. S. 701; 111 id. 524; 104 Ill. 35. See L. R. 6 P. D. 35.

It is contended by an able writer that, by force of the constitution, whenever a state court has jurisdiction over a cause in divorce, its sentence has the same effect in every other state which it has there; 2 Bish. Mar. Div. & Sep. §§ 153–158, 185. See Whart. Conf. of L. § 237.

If the court making the decree had jurisdiction, it will be held conclusive in other states; 99 Cal. 374; 40 Hun 611; 80 Ky. 353; 98 Mass. 158; and jurisdiction will be presumed; 155 Ill. 158; unless want of it appears upon the record; 30 Ill. App.

159; 80 N. Y. 1; 27 Minn. 263; or it may be shown as against the record; 52 Mich. 117; 154 Mass. 290. One party must be domiciled in the state; 125 Ind. 163; 78 Me. 187; 25 Minn. 29; 25 Mich. 247; 37 Ohio St. 317. See 3 Hagg. Eccl. 639.

There is much difference of opinion as to the extra-territorial effect of constructive service by publication as between states. If both parties are domiciled within the state the decree is of force in other states; 11 Allen 196; 115 Mass. 438; 72 N. Y. 217; but if only one, the decree determines his or her status; 95 U. S. 714, 734; 24 Wis. 373; 154 Mass. 290.

The view cited from Bishop concerning the extra-territorial operation of the decree under the constitution is held in 9 Me. 140; 110 Mo. 233; 29 Pac. Rep. (Kan.) 1071; 91 Ala. 591; the contrary view is taken in 86 Mich. 333; 56 Wis. 195; 42 N. J. Eq. 152; 50 Ohio St. 736; 12 Pa. Co. Ct. 334; [1893] Prob. 89. In New York it was held in an action for divorce by the wife, where the husband removed to Minnesota and there secured a divorce, the summons and complaint therein having been personally delivered to the plaintiff, but she not appearing at the trial, that the decree of the Minnesota court did not affect the status of the plaintiff in the state of New York; 130 N. Y. 193; and to the same effect are 101 id. 23; 76 id. 78. Referring to this line of decisions, Pryor, J., said: "To this conclusion I am compelled; but I am not forbidden to say that my reason revolts against it;" 2 Misc. 549; and the New York court of appeals held, that after a defendant had gone into another state and filed an answer, he was bound by the effect given to it by the statutes of that state; 108 N. Y. 415.

In England the courts have jurisdiction in case the parties are domiciled there at the commencement of the proceedings, and this is not affected by the residence of the parties, their allegiance, their domicile at the time of the marriage, the place of the marriage, or the place of the offence; Dicey, Conf. Laws 269; and where the respondent has submitted to the jurisdiction of the court; id. 276. See DOMICIL.

In several states divorces are by statute inoperative when a person goes out of the state and obtains elsewhere a divorce for a cause not valid in the state from which he goes. And in Massachusetts the courts have held invalid decrees, for causes not cognizable in that state, granted in another state, for a divorce when the party went there to procure it; 122 Mass. 156; or to annul a marriage; 157 id. 42; but where it was not shown that the party went to the other state for that purpose and the wife had executed a release to the husband, she was not permitted to impeach the decree; 129 Mass. 1; and so where an appearance was entered in the other state; 55 Cal. 384; or where there has been obtained a bona fide domicile elsewhere; 76 Me. 535.

The supreme court of the United States has no jurisdiction to re-examine the judgment of a state court, recognizing as valid the decree of a foreign court annulling a marriage; 107 U. S. 319. See 16 Am. L. Reg. 65, 193; also Whart. Conf. Laws.

It was never the practice of the English parliament to grant a divorce for any other cause than adultery; and it was the general rule to grant it for simple adultery only when committed by the wife, and upon the application of the husband. To entitle the wife, other circumstances must ordinarily concur, simple adultery committed by the husband not being sufficient; Macq. Parl. Pr. 473. The English statute of 20 & 21 Vict. c. 85, before referred to, prescribes substantially the same rule,—it being provided, § 27, that the husband may apply to have his marriage dissolved "on the ground that his wife has, since the celebration thereof, been guilty of adultery," and the wife, "on the ground that, since the celebration thereof, her husband has been guilty of incestuous bigamy, or of bigamy with adultery, or of rape, or of sodomy, or bestiality, or of adultery coupled with such cruelty as without adultery would have entitled her to a divorce a mensa et thoro, or of adultery coupled with desertion, without reasonable excuse, for two years or upwards."

In this country the question depends upon the statutes of the several states, the provisions of which are far from uniform. In some of the states, also, the matter is left wholly or in part to the discretion of the court. See Bish. Mar. D. & Sep; 16 Or. 163. For more specific information, recourse must be had to the statutes of the several states.

Some of the more important grounds for divorce are: desertion; for a statutory period; 89 Ga. 471; 44 Ill. App. 357; 65 Vt. 623; (see DESERTION;) abandonment; 45 La. Ann. 664; adultery; 37 Ill. App. 219; 48 N. J. Eq. 532; cruelty; 91 Mich. 279; 84 Ia. 221; 61 Conn. 233; 69 Law T. 152; 76 Ga. 319; 83 Va. 806; habitual drunkenness; 22 Or. 329; 45 La. Ann. 1364; conviction of crime, in most states; incurable insanity, in some states; failure to support; and impotence, relationship, incapacity to enter into the contract, fraud, duress, etc.

Cruelty usually means the infliction, or threatened infliction, of bodily harm, by personal violence, actual or threatened, or by words or conduct causing mental suffering, and thereby injuring, or tending to injure, the health. In some states falsely charging the wife with adultery is sufficient. In a few states bodily injury is not necessary; Tiffany, Dom. Rel. 174. Charges by a husband of beating and bruising by his wife, with expressions of a wish that he were dead and suggestions of poisoning him, are "such inhuman treatment as to endanger life;" 10 Ia. 133. So any course of conduct which would have the effect of impairing health would be legal cruelty; 53 Ia. 511; 84 Ia. 221. See CRUELTY.

Where the wife resides in the same house, but wilfully occupies separate apartments from the husband and refuses to recognize him or to eat or sleep with him for a long period, she was held to have deserted her husband; 89 Ga. 471; but a mere refusal to have sexual intercourse with the husband is not desertion; 138 Ill. 436; 39 Minn. 248. The confinement of the wife in the lunatic asylum is not an abandonment of the husband; 22 S. W. Rep. (Ky.) 215. When a wife is deserted she need not hunt for her husband or go to the place whither he has fled; 44 Ill. App. 357. Where by statute both parties have to be residents of the state, it means an actual and not a theoretical residence, and the rule that the domicile of the wife follows that of the husband does not apply; 61 Hun 625.

Some of the principal defences in suits for divorce are: Connivance, or the corrupt consent of a party to the conduct of the other party, whereof he afterwards complains. This bars the right of divorce, because no injury was received; for what a man has consented to he cannot say was an injury; 2 Bish. Mar. & D. § 204. See 116 Ind. 84; 77 Hun 595. And this may be passive as well as active; 3 Hagg. Eccl. 87. See 136 Mass. 310. Collusion, which is an agreement between husband and wife for one of them to commit, or appear to commit, a breach of matrimonial duty, for the purpose of enabling the other to obtain the legal remedy of divorce, as for a real injury. Where the act has not been done, collusion is a real or attempted fraud upon the court; where it has, it is also a species of connivance; in either case it is a bar to any claim for divorce; 2 Bish. Mar. & D. § 251. See 86 Mich. 600. Condonation, or the conditional forgiveness or remission by the husband or wife of a matrimonial offence which the other has committed. While the condition remains unbroken, condonation, on whatever motive it proceeded, is an absolute bar to the remedy for the particular injury condoned; 2 Bish. Mar. & D. § 268; 86 Ala. 322; 60 Law J. Prob. 73; 109 N. C. 139; 49 Ill. App. 573. For the nature of the condition, and other matters, see CONDONATION. Recrimination, which is a defence arising from the complainant's being in like guilt with the one of whom he complains. It is incompetent for one of the parties to a marriage to come into court and complain of the other's violation of matrimonial duties, if the party complaining is guilty likewise; 2 Colo. App. 8. When the defendant sets up such violation in answer to the plaintiff's suit, this is called, in the matrimonial law, recrimination; 2 Bish. Mar. & D. § 340.

The foregoing defences, though available in all divorce causes, are more frequently applicable where a divorce is sought on the ground of adultery.

The consequences of divorce are such as flow from the sentence by operation of law, or flow from either the sentence or the proceeding by reason of their being directly ordered by the court and set down of record. In regard to the former, they are chiefly such as result immediately and necessarily from the definition and nature of a divorce.

Being a dissolution of the marriage relation, the parties have no longer any of the rights, nor are subject to any of the duties, pertaining to that relation. They are henceforth single persons to all intents and purposes. It is true that the statutes of some of the states contain provisions disabling the guilty party from marrying again; but these are in the nature of penal regulations, collateral to the divorce, and which leave the latter in full force.

In regard to rights of property as between husband and wife, a sentence of divorce leaves them as it finds them. Consequently, all transfers of property which were actually executed, either in law or fact, continue undisturbed; for example, the personal estate of the wife, reduced to possession by the husband, remains his after the divorce the same as before. On the termination of a tenancy by the entirety, created by a conveyance to husband and wife, by an absolute divorce, they afterward hold the land as tenants in common without survivorship; 128 N. Y. 263. See 92 Tenn. 697. But it puts an end to all rights depending upon the marriage and not actually vested; as, dower in a wife, all rights of the husband in the real estate of the wife, and his right to reduce to possession her choses in action; 27 Miss. 630; 57 Mo. 200; 6 Ind. 229; 6 W. & S. 85, 88; 4 Harr. Del. 440; 8 Conn. 541; 2 Md. 429; 8 Mass. 99; 10 Paige, Ch. 420, 424; 5 Blackf. 309; 5 Dana 254; 102 N. C. 491; 45 N. J. Eq. 466; 125 U. S. 216; 111 id. 525; 20 Ohio St. 454. In respect to dower, however, it should be observed that a contrary doctrine has been settled in New York, it being there held that immediately upon the marriage being solemnized the wife's right to dower becomes perfect, provided only she survives her husband; 4 N. Y. 95; 6 Duer, N. Y. 102, 152. See 55 Pa. 375; 62 id. 308; 39 Cal. 157; 48 Tex. 269; DOWER.

Of those consequences which result from the direction or order of the court, the most important are: Alimony, or the allowance which a husband, by order of court, pays to his wife, living separate from him, for her maintenance. The allowance may be for her use either during the pendency of a suit,—in which case it is called alimony pendente lite,—or after its termination, called permanent alimony. As will be seen from the foregoing definition, alimony, especially permanent alimony, pertains rather to a separation from bed and board than to a divorce from the bond of matrimony. Indeed, it is generally allowed in the latter case only in pursuance of statutory provisions. See ALIMONY. It is provided by statute in several of our states that, in case of divorce, the court may order the husband to restore to the wife, when she is the innocent party, and sometimes even when she is not, a part or the whole of the property which he received by the marriage. In some cases, also, the court is authorized to divide the property between the parties, this being a substitute for the allowance of alimony. For further particulars, recourse must be had to the statutes in question.

The custody of children. In this country, the tribunal hearing a divorce cause is generally authorized by statute to direct, during its pendency and afterwards, with which of the parties, or with what other person, the children shall remain, and to make provision out of the husband's estate for their maintenance. There are few positive rules upon the subject, the matter being left to the discretion of the court, to be exercised according to the circumstances of each case. The general principle is to consult the welfare of the child, rather than any supposed rights of the parents, and as between the parents to prefer the innocent to the guilty. In the absence of a controlling necessity or very strong propriety, arising from the circumstances of the case, the father's claim is to be preferred; see Reeve, Dom. Rel. 453; Lloyd, Div. 241; 40 N. H. 272; 16 Pick. 203; 24 Barb. 521; 27 id. 9; 2 Q. B. D. 75; 2 U. C. Q. B. 370; 55 Ala. 428; 56 Miss. 418; 13 R. I. 462; [1891] Prob. 124; and 2 Bish. Mar. & Div. § 1185, where the subject is fully treated; the general rule, however, being that the welfare of the child will be consulted rather than the rights of either parent; 12 R. I. 462; 68 Ill. 17; 32 N. J. Eq. 738; 44 Ala. 670. If the child is of an age to require especially a mother's care, her right of custody is preferred; id.; 55 id. 428; 14 Cal. 512; but it is for the trial court to say upon all the evidence whether she is more worthy of their custody than the father; 92 Cal. 653. In some cases a child will be placed in the custody of a third person; 47 How. Pr. 172; 2 Russ. 1; 21 Tex. 67; 80 Ind. 547; 39 Wis. 167. See CUSTODY.

A bigamous marriage being void ab initio, the second wife cannot maintain an action for judicial separation; 5 Misc. Rep. 193.

By the civil law, the child of parents divorced is to be brought up by the innocent party at the expense of the guilty party. Ridley's View, pt. 1, c. 3, § 9, citing 8th Collation.

DO UT FACIAS. I give that you may do. See CONSIDERATION.

DOCK. The enclosed space occupied by prisoners in a criminal court.

The space between two wharves. See 17 How. 434. The owner of a dock is liable to a person who, by his invitation, and in the exercise of due care, places a vessel in the dock, for injury to the vessel caused by a defect thereon which the owner negligently allows to exist; 127 Mass. 236.

DOCKAGE. The sum charged for the use of a dock. In the case of a dry dock, it has been held in the nature of rent. 1 Newb. 69. See WHARFAGE.

DOCKMASTERS. Officers appointed to direct the mooring of ships, so as to prevent the obstruction of dock entrances.

DOCK WARRANT. A negotiable instrument, in use in England, given by the dock owners to the owner of goods imported and warehoused in the docks, as a recognition of his title to the goods, upon the production of the bills of lading, etc. Pulling on the Customs of London.

DOCKET. A formal record of judicial proceedings; a brief writing. A small piece of paper or parchment having the effect of a larger. Blount. An abstract. Cowel.

To docket is said to be by Blackstone to abstract and enter into a book; 3 Bla. Com. 307. The essential idea of a modern docket, then, is an entry in brief in a proper book of all the important acts done in court in the conduct of each case from its commencement to its conclusion. See Colby, Pr. 154.

In common use, it is the name given to the book containing these abstracts. The name of trial-docket is given to the book containing the cases which are liable to be tried at a specified term of court. The docket should contain the names of the parties and a minute of every proceeding in the case. It is kept by the clerk or prothonotary of the court. The docket entries form the record until the technical record is made up in proper form; 38 Conn. 449; 2 Allen 443; 49 Me. 337; 105 Mass. 90; and this is true of the entries in the docket of a justice of the peace; 18 Pick. 464; 21 Vt. 535. A sheriff's docket is not a record; 9 S. & R. 91; 1 Bradf. 343.

DOCTOR. Means commonly a practitioner of medicine, of whatever system or school. 4 E. D. Smith 1.

DOCTORS COMMONS. An institution near St. Paul's Cathedral in London, where the ecclesiastical and admiralty courts were held until the year 1857. 3 Steph. Com. 306, n.

In 1768 a royal charter was obtained by virtue of which the members of the society and their successors were incorporated under the name and title of "The College of Doctors of Laws exercent in the Ecclesiastical and Admiralty Courts." The college consists of a president (the dean of the arches for the time-being) and of those doctors of laws who, having regularly taken that degree in either of the universities of Oxford and Cambridge, and having been admitted advocates in pursuance of the rescript of the archbishop of Canterbury, shall have been elected fellows of the college in the manner prescribed by the charter.

DOCUMENT OF TITLE. By the Factors' Act 56, Vict. c. 39, § 4, it is stated to mean any bill of lading, India warrant, dock warrant, warehouse-keeper's certificate warrant, or order for the delivery of goods, or any other document used in the ordinary course of business, as proof of the possession or control of goods, or authorizing, or purporting to authorize, either by endorsement or by delivery, the possessor of such document to transfer or receive goods thereby represented. Benj. Sales 788.

DOCUMENTS. The deeds, agreements, title-papers, letters, receipts, and other written instruments used to prove a fact. See 12 R. I. 99.

If a document is lost, secondary evidence of its contents may be given, after laying a proper foundation therefor, by proving its former existence, and its due execution, and satisfactorily accounting for the failure to produce it. The burden of proving all these facts rests on the party who seeks to introduce secondary evidence of the document claimed to have been lost; 101 N. Y. 427; 102 Pa. 338; 74 Me. 127; 66 Tex. 13; 20 Vt. 455. See 77 Pa. 507.

In Civil Law. Evidence delivered in the forms established by law, of whatever nature such evidence may be. The term is, however, applied principally to the testimony of witnesses. Savigny, Dr. Rom. § 165. See EVIDENCE.

DOE, JOHN. The name of the fictitious plaintiff in the action of ejectment. 3 Steph. Com. 618.

DOG. A domestic animal.

In almost all languages this word is used as a term or name of contumely or reproach. See 3 Bulstr. 226; 2 Mod. 260; 1 Leon. 148; and the title Action on the Case for Defamation in the Digests.

A dog is said at common law to have no intrinsic value, and he cannot, therefore, be the subject of larceny; 4 Bla. Com. 236; 8 S. & R. 571; 81 N. C. 527; Bell, Cr. Cas. 36. (But it is otherwise in England, by statute, and in Pennsylvania, by a statute passed in 1878, dogs are made personal property, subject to larceny, upon being duly registered. In Texas they may become the subject of theft; 30 Tex. App. 333; while they are held to be property within the meaning of Amend. V. of the Constitution; 8 Utah 245.) But the owner has such property in him that he may maintain trespass for an injury to his dog, or trover for a conversion; 1 Metc. Mass. 555; 10 Ired. 259; "for a man may have property in some things which are of so base nature that no felony can be committed of them: as, of a bloodhound or mastiff;" 13 Hen. VIII. 3; 18 id. 2; 7 Co. 18 a; 2 Bla. Com. 397; Fitzh. N. B. 86; Brooke, Abr. Trespas, pl. 407; Hob. 283; Cro. Eliz. 125; Cro. Jac. 463; 2 W. Bla. 1117.

Dogs, if dangerous animals, may lawfully be killed when their ferocity is known to their owner, or in self-defence; 10 Johns. 365; 13 id. 312; 35 Neb. 638; and when bitten by a rabid animal a dog may be lawfully killed by any one; 13 Johns. 312; 60 Ill. 211; but one is not justified in killing a dog without notice to the owner, merely because it barks around his house at night; 93 Mich. 420.

When a dog, in consequence of his vicious habits, becomes a common nuisance, the owner may be indicted. And when he commits an injury, if the owner had a knowledge of his mischievous propensity he is liable to an action on the case; Bull. N. P. 77; 1 B. & Ald. 620; 4 Campb. 198; 4 Cow. 351; 6 S. & R. 36; 1 Ill. 492; 17 Wend. 496; 23 id. 354; 4 Dev. & B. 146; 10 Cush. 509; 64 Hun 636; 161 Pa. 98; 41 La. Ann. 1029; 49 N. J. L. 163; 27 Ill. App. 531. See 1 Ky. L. Rep. 90; 159 Mass. 497; ANIMAL.

A man has a right to keep a dog to guard his premises, but not to put him at the entrance of his house; because a person coming there on lawful business may be injured by him; and this, though there may be another entrance to the house; 4 C. & P. 297; 6 id. 1. See also 155 Pa. 225. But if a dog is chained, and a visitor so incautiously go near him that he is bitten, he has no right of action against the owner; 3 Bla. Com. 154.

tax, the dog may be killed; 100 Mass. 136; 82 N. C. 175; contra, 8 Ohio Cir. Ct. R. 12; 8 Utah 245. A proceeding of the most stringent character for the destruction of dogs kept contrary to municipal regulations is constitutional; 69 Miss. 34. See EXPEDITATION.

DOGMA. In Civil Law The word is used in the first chapter, first section, of the second Novel, and signifies an ordinance of the senate. See, also, Dig. 27. 1. 6.

DOLE. A part or portion. Dole-meadow, that which is shared by several. Spelman, Gloss.; Cowel.

DOLI CAPAX. Capable of mischief; having knowledge of right and wrong. 4 Bla. Com. 22, 23; 1 Hale, Pl. Cr. 26, 27.

DOLI INCAPAX (Lat.). Incapable of distinguishing good from evil. A child under seven is absolutely presumed to be doli incapax; between seven and fourteen is, prima facie, incapax doli, but may be shown to be capax doli. 4 Bla. DOLLAR (Germ. Thaler). The money unit of the United States.

It was established under the confederation by resolution of congress, July 6, 1785. This was originally represented by a silver piece only; the coinage of which was authorized by the act of congress of Aug. 8, 1786. The same act also established a decimal system of coinage and accounts. But the coinage was not effected until after the passage of the act of April 2, 1792, establishing a mint, 1 U. S. Stat. L. 246; and the first coinage of dollars commenced in 1794. The law last cited provided for the coinage of "dollars or units, each to be of the value of a Spanish milled dollar, as the same was then current, and to contain three hundred and seventy-one grains and four-sixteenth parts of a grain of pure silver, or four hundred and sixteen grains of standard silver."

The Spanish dollar known to our legislation was the dollar coined in Spanish America, North and South, which was abundant in our currency, in contradistinction to the dollar coined in Spain, which was rarely seen in the United States. The intrinsic value of the two coins was the same; but, as a general (not invariable) distinction, the American coinage bore pillars, and the Spanish an escutcheon or shield; all kinds bore the royal effigy.

The milled dollar, so called, is in contradistinction to the irregular, misshapen coinage nicknamed cob, which a century ago was executed in the Spanish-American provinces,—chiefly Mexican. By the use of a milling machine the pieces were figured on the edge, and assumed a true circular form. The pillar dollar and the milled dollar were in effect the same in value, and, in general terms, the same coin; though there are pillar dollars ("cobs") which are not milled, and there are milled dollars (of Spain proper) which have no pillars.

The weight and fineness of the Spanish milled and pillar dollars is eight and one-half pieces to a Castilian mark, or four hundred and seventeen and fifteen-sevenths grains Troy. The limitation of four hundred and fifteen grains in our law of 1806, April 10, 2 U. S. Stat. L. 374, was to meet the loss by wear. The legal fineness of these dollars was ten dineros, twenty granos, equal to nine hundred and two and seven-ninths thousandths; the actual fineness was somewhat variable, and always below. The Spanish dollar and all other foreign coins are ruled out by the act of congress of Feb. 21, 1857, 13 U. S. Stat. 1856-57, 163, they being no longer a legal tender. But the statements herein given are useful for the sake of comparison: moreover, many contracts still in existence provide for payment (of ground-rents, for example) in Spanish milled or pillar dollars. The following terms, or their equivalent, are frequently used in agreements made about the close of the last and the beginning of the present century:

"silver milled dollars, each dollar weighing seven-pennyweights and six grains at least." This was equal to four hundred and fourteen grains. The standard fineness of United States silver coin from 1792 to 1836 was fourteen hundred and eighty-five parts fine silver in sixteen hundred and sixty-four. Consequently, a piece of coin of four hundred and fourteen grains should contain three hundred and sixty-nine and forty-six hundredths grains pure silver.

By the act of Jan. 18, 1837, § 8, 5 U. S. Stat. 187, the standard weight and fineness of the dollar of the United States was fixed as follows: "of one thousand parts by weight, nine hundred shall be of pure metal, and one hundred of alloy," the alloy to consist of copper; and it was further provided that the weight of the silver dollar should be four hundred and twelve and one-half grains (412 1-2).

The weight of the silver dollar has not been changed by subsequent legislation; but the proportionate weight of the lower denomination of silver coins has been diminished by the act of Feb. 21, 1853, 11 U. S. Stat. L. 160. By this act the half-dollar (and the lower coins in proportion) is reduced in weight fourteen and one-quarter grains below the previous coinage: so that the silver dollar which was embraced in this act weighs twenty-eight and one-half grains more than two half-dollars. The silver dollar then, consequently, ceased to be current in the United States; but it continued to be coined to supply the demands of the West India trade and a local demand for cabinets, etc.

But the act of Feb. 28, 1873, 20 U. S. Stat. L. c. 20, restored the standard silver dollar of the act of Jan. 18, 1837, as a legal tender for all debts except where otherwise stipulated in the contract, and required the monthly purchase of not less than two million and not more than four million dollars worth of silver bullion and the coinage of the same into standard silver dollars, but this latter clause was repealed by act of July 14, 1890. The act of Feb. 12, 1873, introduced the trade-dollar, of the weight of four hundred and twenty grains Troy, intended chiefly, if not wholly, to supplant the Mexican dollar in trade with China and the East. It has found its way, however, all over the United States, and, as it has been declared by a joint resolution of congress of July 22, 1876, 19 Stat. L. p. 215, not to be a legal tender, has led to great inconvenience. See 10 Am. L. Reg. n. s. 87; 1 W. N. C. Pa. 223. The coinage of the trade-dollar was terminated and its redemption and recoinage in standard dollars was directed by the act of March 3, 1887, 24 Stat. L. 643. See also U. S. R. S. 1 Supp. 563, 774.

By the act of November 1, 1893, it is declared to be the policy of the United States to continue the use of both gold and silver as standard money, and to coin both gold and silver into money of equal intrinsic and exchangeable value, such equality to be secured through international agreement, or by such safeguards of legislation as will insure the maintenance of the parity in value of the coins of the two metals, and the equal power of every dollar at all times in the markets and in the payment of debts. It is further declared that the efforts of the Government should be steadily directed to the establishment of such a safe system of bimetalism as will maintain at all times the equal power of every dollar coined or issued by the United States, in the markets and in the payment of debts.

By the act of March 3, 1849, a gold dollar was authorized to be coined at the mint of the United States and the several branches thereof, conformably in all respects to the standard of gold coins now established by law, except that on the reverse of the piece the figure of the eagle shall be omitted. It is of the weight of 25.8 grains, and of the fineness of nine hundred thousandths. This dollar was made the unit of value by act of congress Feb. 12, 1873, and it was further provided that such dollar, when worn by natural abrasion, and so reduced in weight after twenty years of circulation (as evidenced by date on the face of such coin), will be redeemed by the United States Treasury or its offices, subject to such regulations as the Secretary of the Treasury may prescribe for the protection of the Government against fraudulent abrasions and other practices; U. S. Rev. Stat. §§ 3505, 3511.

A charge of one-fifth per centum was formerly made for converting gold bullion into coin, but by act of Jan. 14, 1875, this law was repealed.

The one dollar and the three dollar gold pieces are no longer coined. See 26 Stat. L. 485.

When the word dollars is used in a bequest or in any instrument for the payment of money, the amount is payable in whatever the United States declares to be legal tender, whether coin or paper money, but not in real or personal property in which money has been invested; 18 N. J. Eq. 130; 85 id. 306; 27 Ind. 426; 33 Texas 351; 8 Dana 100; 1 W. N. C. Pa. 223; 24 Ark. 100.

DOLO. The Spanish form of dolus.

DOLUS (Lat.). In Civil Law. A fraudulent address or trick used to deceive some one; a fraud. Dig. 4. 3. 1. Any subtle contrivance by words or acts with a design to circumvent. 2 Kent 560; Code 2. 21.

Dolus differs from culpa in this, that the latter proceeds from an error of the understanding, while to constitute the former there must be a will or intention to do wrong. Wolfius, Inst. § 17. See CULPA.

It seems doubtful, however, whether the general use of the word dolus in the civil law is not rather that of very great negligence, than of fraud, as used in the common law. A distinction was also made between dolus and fraus, the essence of the former being the intention to deceive, while that of the latter was actual damage resulting from the deceit.

Such acts or omissions as operate as a deception upon the other party, or violate the just confidence reposed by him, whether there be a deceitful intent (malus animus) or not. Pothier, Traité de Dépôt, nn. 23, 27; Story, Bailm. § 20 a; Webb's Poll. Torts 18; 2 Kent 506, n.

DOLUS MALUS (Lat.). Fraud. Deceit with an evil intention. Distinguished from dolus bonus, justifiable or allowable deceit. Calvinus, Lex.; Broom, Max. 349; 1 Kaufmann, Mackeld. Civ. Law 165. Misconduct. Magna negligentia culpa est, magna culpa dolus est (great negligence is a fault, a great fault is fraud). 2 Kent 560, n.

DOM PROC. (Domus Procerum.) The house of lords. Wharton, Lex.

DOMAIN. Dominion; territory governed. Possession; estate. Land about the mansion-house of a lord. The right to dispose at our pleasure of what belongs to us.

A distinction has been made between property and domain. The former is said to be that quality which is conceived to be in the thing itself, considered as belonging to such or such person, exclusively of all others. By the latter is understood that right which the owner has of disposing of the thing. Hence domain and property are said to be correlative terms; the one is the active right to dispose of, the other a passive quality which follows the thing and places it at the disposition of the owner. 3 Toullier, n. 83. But this distinction is too subtle for practical use. Puffendorff, Droit de la Nat. l. 4. c. 4, 106 § 2. See 1 Bla. Com. 105; Clef des Lois Rom.; Domat; 1 Hill, Abr. 24; 2 id. 237; EMINENT DOMAIN.

DOMBOC (spelled, also, often, dombec. Sax.). The name of codes of laws among the Saxons. Of these King Alfred's was the most famous. 1 Bla. Com. 46; 4 id. 411.

The domboc of king Alfred is not to be confounded with the domesday-book of William the Conqueror.

DOME (Sax.). Doom; sentence; judgment. An oath. The homager's oath in the black book of Hereford. Blount.

DOMESDAY, DOMESDAY-BOOK (Sax.). An ancient record made in the time of William the Conqueror, and now remaining in the English exchequer, consisting of two volumes of unequal size, containing minute and accurate surveys of the lands in England. It was printed by the English Government, in 1783. 2 Bla. Com. 49, 50. The work was begun by five justices in each county in 1081 and finished in 1086.

The great inquest survey, or "Description of all England," which we call Domesday Book, is one of the most precious documents that any nation possesses. For variety of information, for excellence of plan, for the breadth of land, and for the space it covers it is probably unrivalled. It is at once a terrier, a rent roll, an assessment register, as well as a book of settlements and a legal record. 1 Social England 236.

A variety of ingenious accounts are given of the origin of this term by the old writers. The commoner opinion seems to be that it was so called from the fulness and completeness of the survey making it a day of judgment for the value, extent, and qualities of every piece of land. See Spelman, Gloss.; Blount; Termes de la Ley.

It was practically a careful census taken and recorded in the exchequer of the kingdom of England.

DOMESMEN (Sax.). An inferior kind of judges. Men appointed to doom (judge) in matters in controversy. Cowel. Suitors in a court of a manor in ancient demesne, who are judges there. Blount; Whishaw; Termes de la Ley. See JURY.

DOMESTICS. Those who reside in the same house with the master they serve. The term does not extend to workmen or laborers employed out-of-doors. 5 Binn. 167; 6 La. Ann. 276; 43 Tex. 456; Merlin, Répert. The act of congress of April 30, 1790, s. 25, used the word domestic in this sense. This term does not extend to a servant whose employment is out of doors and not in the house; 41 Tex. 556.

Formerly this word was used to designate those who resided in the house of another, however exalted their station, who performed services for him. Voltaire, in writing to the French queen, in 1748, says, "Deign to consider, madam, that I am one of the domestics of the king, and consequently yours, my companions, the gentlemen of the king," etc.; but librarians, secretaries, and persons in such honorable employments would not probably be considered domestics, although they might reside in the houses of their respective employers.

Pothier, to point out the distinction between a domestic and a servant, gives the following example:—A literary man who lives and lodges with you, solely to be your companion, that you may profit by his conversation and learning, is your domestic; for all who live in the same house and eat at the same table with the owner of the house are his domestics; but they are not servants. On the contrary, your valet-de-chambre, to whom you pay wages, and who sleeps out of your house, is not, properly speaking, your domestic, but your servant. Pothier, Proc. Cr. sect. 2, art. 5, § 5; Pothier, Obl. 710, 828; 9 Toullier, n. 314; H. de Pansey, Des Justices de Paix, c. 30, n. 1.

DOMESTIC ATTACHMENT. See ATTACHMENT.

DOMESTIC MANUFACTURES. This term in a state statute is used, generally, of manufactures within its jurisdiction. 64 Pa. 100.

DOMICIL. That place where a man has his true, fixed, and permanent home and principal establishment, and to which whenever he is absent he has the intention of returning. 10 Mass. 188; 11 La. 175; 5 Metc. 187; 4 Barb. 505; Wall. Jr. 217; 9

Ired. 99; 1 Tex. 673; 13 Me. 255; 27 Miss. 704; 1 Bosw. 673; 74 Ill. 312.

The domicile of a person is that place or country in which his habitation is fixed, without any present intention of removing therefrom; [1892] 3 Ch. 180.

Dicey defines domicile as, in general, the place or country which is in fact his permanent home, but is in some cases the place or country which, whether it be in fact his home or not, is determined to be his home by a rule of law; Dicey, Dom. 42; and again as "that place or country either (1) in which he in fact resides with the intention of residence (animus manendi); or (2) in which, having so resided, he continues actually to reside, though no longer retaining the intention of residence (animus manendi); or (3) with regard to which, having so resided there, he retains the intention of residence (animus manendi), though he, in fact, no longer resides there;" id. 44. The same definition substantially is given in Dicey, Conf. Laws (Moore's ed.) 727. It is there said not to include cases of domicile created by operation of law.

Other definitions are quoted in the same words with modification:

Domicil is "a habitation fixed in some place with the intention of remaining there alway." Vattel, Droit des Gens, liv. i, c. xix, s. 218, Du Domicile.

"The place where a person has established the principal seat of his residence and of his business." Pothier, Introd. Gen. Cout. d'Orleans, ch. 1, s. 1, art. 8.

"That place is to be regarded as a man's domicile which he has freely chosen for his permanent abode [and thus for the centre at once of his legal relations and his business]." Savigny, s. 353.

"That place is properly the domicile of a person in which his habitation is fixed, without any present intention of removing therefrom." Story, Conf. Laws § 43.

"A residence at a particular place, accompanied with [positive or presumptive proof of] an intention to remain there for an unlimited time." Phillimore, Int. Law 49.

"That place is properly the domicile of a person in which he has voluntarily fixed the habitation of himself and his family, not for a mere special and temporary purpose, but with a present intention of making it his permanent home, unless and until something (which is unexpected or uncertain) shall occur to induce him to adopt some other permanent home." 28 L. J. Ch. 361, 366, per Kindersley, V. C.

It has been said that there is no precise definition of the word; 25 L. J. Ch. 730; but Dicey (Domicil, App. and in his Conf. Laws 731) dissents from this statement. In the latter work the learned writer says that "the attempts which have been made to define domicile, and of the criticisms upon such attempts, lead to results which may be summed up as follows:—

"First. Domicil, being a complex term, must, from the nature of things, be capable of definition. In other words, it is a term which has a meaning, and that meaning can be explained by analyzing it into its elements.

"Secondly. All the best definitions agree in making the elements of domicile 'residence' and 'animus manendi.'

"Thirdly. Several of these definitions—such, for example, as Story's, Phillimore's, or Vice-Chancellor Kindersley's—have succeeded in giving an explanation of the meaning of domicile, which, even if not expressed in the most precise language, is substantially accurate.

"Fourthly. The reason why English courts have been inclined to hold that no definition of domicile is satisfactory is, that they have found it impossible to reconcile any definition with three sets of judicial decisions or dicta (an officer in the service of the East India Company; an Englishman acquiring a domicile in another country; and a person residing in another country for his health). When, however, these sets are examined, it is found that two of them consist of cases embodying views of domicile now admitted to be erroneous, whilst the third set can be reconciled with all the best definitions of domicile." Dicey, Confl. Laws 735.

A person must have a domicile for purposes of taxation; 1 Metc. 242; 132 Mass. 89; 42 Wis. 476; 49 Me. 367; for jurisdiction; 65 N. H. 248; for succession; 52 Me. 165; 76 Ala. 433; 53 N. Y. 556; for administration; 85 Pa. 466; for pauper settlement; 23 Pick. 177; for loyal character; 93 U. S. 605; for homestead exemption; 20 Tex. 24; for attachment; 54 Miss. 308; 72 N. C. 1. A person can, however, have but one domicile at a time; 93 U. S. 605; 98 Mass. 158; 30 La. Ann. 502; 23 Pick. 170; but Cockburn (Nationality) says that it is quite possible for a person to have two domicils. See Morse, Citizenship 100. And a person may have both a civil and a commercial domicile; Dicey, Confl. Laws 740.

Domicile may be either national or domestic. In deciding the question of national domicile, the point to be determined will be in which of two or more distinct nationalities a man has his domicile. In deciding the matter of domestic domicile, the question is in which subdivision of the nation does the person have his domicile. Thus, whether a person is domiciled in England or France would be a question of national domicile, whether in Norfolk or Suffolk county, a question of domestic domicile. The distinction is to be kept in mind, since the rules for determining the two domicils, though frequently, are not necessarily, the same; see 2 Kent 449; Story, Confl. Laws § 39; Westl. Priv. Int. Law 15; Wheat. Int. Law 123; Jac. Dom. 77.

The Romanists and civilians seem to attach about equal importance to the place of business and of residence as fixing the place of domicile; Pothier, Introd. Gen. Cout. d'Orleans, c. 1, art. 1, § 8; Denizart; Story, Confl. Laws § 42. This may go far towards reconciling the discrepancies of the common law and civil law as to what law is to govern in regard to contracts. But at common law the main question in deciding where a person has a domicile is to decide where he has his home and where he exercises his political rights.

Legal residence, inhabitancy, and domicile are generally used as synonymous; 1 Bradf. Surr. 70; 1 Harr. Del. 383; 1 Spenc. 328; 2 Rich. 489; 10 N. H. 452; 3 Wash. C. C. 555; 15 M. & W. 433; 4 Barb. 505; 7 Gray 299; 49 Ia. 447; but much depends on the connection and purpose; 1 Wend. 43; 5 Pick. 231; 17 id. 231; 15 Me. 58; as "residence" has a more restricted meaning than "domicil"; 59 Mo. 238; 4 Humph. 346; 132 Mass. 89. So also in insolvency statutes; 130 Mass. 231; those relating to administration and distribution; 31 West Va. 790; testamentary matters; 20 N. Y. Sup. 417; eligibility for public office; 3 N. Y. Sup. 367; attachment statutes; 12 C. C. R. Pa. 255; and matters of jurisdiction; 120 N. Y. 485; 54 Ia. 289; 29 Fed. Rep. 494. The term citizenship ordinarily conveys a distinct idea from that of domicile; 45 Ia. 99; but it is often construed in the sense of domicile; 129 U. S. 315; 56 Fed. Rep. 556.

Two things must concur to establish domicile,—the fact of residence and the intention of remaining. These two must exist or must have existed in combination; 8 Ala. N. S. 159; 4 Barb. 504; 6 How. 163; Story, Confl. Laws § 44; 17 Pick. 231; 27 Miss. 704; 15 N. H. 137; 58 Conn. 268. There must have been an actual residence; 11 La. 175; 5 Metc. Mass. 587; 20 Johns. 208; 12 La. 190; 1 Binn. 349. The character of the residence is of no importance; 8 Me. 203; 1 Spears, Eq. 3; 5 E. L. & Eq. 52; 33 La. Ann. 1304; and if it has once existed, mere temporary absence will not destroy it, however long continued; 7 Cl. & F. 842; 43 Me. 426; 3 Bradf. Surr. 267; 29 Ala. N. S. 703; 4 Tex. 187; 3 Me. 455; 10 Pick. 79; 3 N. H. 123; 3 Wash. C. C. 555; 91 Ga. 30; 59 Mo. 238; 32 La. Ann. 606; 103 Mass. 576; as in the case of a soldier in the army; 36 Me. 428; 4 Barb. 522. And the law favors the presumption of a continuance of domicile; 5 Ves. 750; 5 Pick. 370; 1 Wall. Jr. 217; 1 Bosw. 673; 21 Pa. 106; 113 N. C. 537. The original domicile continues till it is fairly changed for another; 5 Madd. 232, 370; 10 Pick. 77; 8 Ala. N. S. 169; 2 Swan 232; 1 Tex. 673; 1 Woodb. & M. 8; 15 Me. 58; 3 Wall. Jr. 11; 10 N. H. 156; and revives on an intention to return; 1 Curt. Eccl. 856; 19 Wend. 11; 8 Cra. 278; 3 C. Rob. 12; 3 Wheat. 14; 8 Ala. N. S. 159; 3 Rawle 312; 1 Gall. 275; 4 Mas. 308; 8 Wend. 134. This principle of revival, however, is said not to apply where both domicils are domestic; 5 Madd. 379; Am. Lead. Cas. 714.

Mere taking up residence is not sufficient, unless there be an intention to abandon a former domicile; 7 Jac. Dom. 125; 1 Spear 1; 6 M. & W. 511; 21 Me. 357; 10 Mass. 488; 1 Curt. Eccl. 856; 4 Cal. 175; 2 Ohio 232; 5 Sandf. 44; 156 Pa. 617; 77 Mo. 678; nor is it even prima facie evidence of domicile when the nature of the residence either is inconsistent with, or rebuts the presumption of the existence of an animus manendi; Dicey, Dom. Rule 19; 34 L. J. Ch. 212. Nor is intention of constituting domicile alone, unless accompanied by some acts in furtherance of such intention; 5 Pick. 370; 1 Bosw. 673; 5 Md. 186; 126 Mass. 161; 75 Pa. 201; 129 U. S. 328. A subsequent intent may be grafted on a temporary residence; 2 C. Rob. 322. Removal to a place with an intention of remaining there for an indefinite period and as a place of fixed present domicile, constitutes domicile, though there be a floating intention to return; 2 B. & P. 228; 3 Hagg. Eccl. 374. Both inhabitancy and intention are to a great extent matters of fact, and may be gathered from slight indications; 1 Sneed 63; 30 Pac. Rep. (N. M.) 936; 126 Mass. 219. A statute as to acquiring a residence will be strictly construed, and where a person spends part of his time in one state and the other part at his home in another, and where he has no business in the former but appears to be gaining a residence for the purpose of divorce only, he is not a bona fide resident; 43 Ill. App. 370. The place where a person lives is presumed to be the place of domicile until facts establish the contrary; 2 B. & P. 228, n.; 2 Kent 532; 113 N. Y. 582. A decedent is presumed to have been domiciled at the place where he died; 27 Ct. Cls. 529. See 5 Ves. Jr. 750; but where he was a non-resident of the state for many years and until within two months prior to his death, the presumption is that he was a non-resident at the time of his death; 156 Pa. 617.

Proof of domicile does not depend upon any particular fact but upon whether all the facts and circumstances taken together tend to establish the fact; 23 Pick. 170; 85 Pa. 466. Engaging in business and voting in a particular place are evidence of domicile there; Myr. Prob. Cal. 237; voting in a place is evidence, though not conclusive; 74 Ill. 312; 74 Me. 154; also payment of taxes; 25 Atl. Rep. (N. H.) 553; 61 Mich. 575; the execution of one's will in accordance with the laws of a particular place; 53 N. Y. 556; attending a particular church; 62 Vt. 386. But the ownership of real estate in a place not coupled with residence therein is of no value; 156 Pa. 617; 1 Tex. 673. Declaring an intent to become a citizen is not sufficient to prove an intention to adopt a domicile in the place where the declaration is made; 13 C. C. R. Pa. 177. Declarations made at the time of change of residence are evidence of a permanent change of domicile, but a person cannot, by his own declarations, make out a case for himself; 1 Flipp. 536; 157 Mass. 542; 65 N. H. 248; but see as to the latter, L. R. 2 P. & M. 435. Declarations of the party are admissible to prove domicile; 6 Misc. Rep. 620; 10 Biss. 128; but acts are said to be more important than words; 50 N. J. Eq. 137.

Domicil is said to be of three kinds,—domicil of origin, or by birth, domicile by choice, and domicile by operation of law. The place of birth is the domicil by birth if at that time it is the domicile of the parents; 2 Hagg. Eccl. 405; 5 Tex. 211. See 10 Rich.

38. If the parents are on a journey, the actual domicile of the parents will generally be the place of domicile; 5 Ves. 750; Westl. Priv. Int. Law 17. Children of ambassadors; 14 Beav. 441; 31 L. J. 24, 391; and consuls; L. R. 1 Sc. App. 441; 4 P. D. 1; and children born on seas, take the domicile of their parents; Story, Conf. Laws § 48.

The domicile of an illegitimate child is that of the mother; 23 L. J. Ch. 724; 35 Me. 411; 8 Cush. 75; but it has been thought better to "regard the father who acknowledges his illegitimate children, or who is adjudged to be such by the law, as imparting his domicile to such children;" Whart. Conf. L. 37; L. R. 1 Sc. App. 441; see Westl. Priv. Int. Law 272; where it is said that the place of birth of a child whose parents are unknown, is its domicile; if that is unknown, the place where it is found. The domicile of a legitimate child is that of its father; L. R. 1 P. & D. 611; 2 Hagg. Eccl. 405; 31 N. J. Eq. 194; 1 Binn. 349; 5 Ves. 786; see 45 Mo. App. 415. Westlake (Int. Law) maintains that a posthumous child takes its mother's domicile; but see Whart. Conf. Laws § 35. The domicile by birth of a minor continues to be his domicile till changed; 1 Binn. 349; 3 Zab. 394; 8 Blackf. 34. See 49 Fed. Rep. 257. It changes with that of the father; 92 Ala. 551; 112 U. S. 452; 67 N. Y. 367.

A student does not change his domicile by residence at college; 7 Mass. 1; 5 Metc. Mass. 587; 71 Pa. 302; 35 Ia. 246; 76 Me. 158; 17 N. H. 235; and a prisoner removed from his domicile for temporary imprisonment does not acquire a new domicile; 74 Ga. 761; 85 Ala. 439; 74 Me. 237; or a convict for a long term; 74 Me. 237; or a fugitive from justice though intending never to return; 130 Mass. 231; but see 85 Ala. 439. A change of residence for purposes of health does not generally establish a new domicile; 27 Tex. 734; 38 Miss. 646. Absence in the service of the government does not necessarily affect the domicile; 89 N. C. 115; 17 Fla. 389; 22 N. Y. Supp. 137; depending, of course, on the intention of the party; 3 Ore. 229, 568; 128 Mass. 219. A diplomatic representative residing abroad does not change his domicile; 12 Pa. 365; or a consul; 4 How. Miss. 360; or one in the military or naval service; 36 Me. 428; 128 Mass. 219; nor a sailor absent on duty; 100 Mass. 167.

The domicile of origin always remains in abeyance, as it were, to be resorted to the moment the domicile of choice is given up. If one leaves a domicile of choice, with the intention of acquiring a new one, his domicile of origin attaches the moment he leaves the former, and persists until he acquires the latter; L. R. 1 Sc. App. 441; 75 Fed. Rep. 321; Dicey, Dom. 92. This, however, can only be true of national, as distinguished from local domicile; when a local domicile of choice is acquired, it certainly persists until a new one is adopted.

Domicil by choice is that domicile which a person of capacity of his free will selects to be such. Residence by constraint, which is involuntary, by banishment, arrest, or imprisonment, will not work a change of domicile: Story, Conf. Laws § 47; 3 Ves. 198, 202; 11 Conn. 234; 5 Tex. 211; 1 Milw. 191; 1 Curt. Eccl. 856; 1 Sw. & Tr. 253; 41 Ill. 495; 74 Me. 236.

Domicil is conferred in many cases by operation of law, either expressly or consequentially.

The domicile of the husband is that of the wife: 29 Ala. N. s. 719; 7 Bush 135; 26 Tex. 663; 77 Ga. 84; 69 Ill. 277; 105 Mass. 116; 43 N. J. L. 495; 7 H. L. C. 390; L. R. 4 P. D. 1; 138 U. S. 694. A woman on marriage takes the domicile of her husband, and a husband, if entitled to a divorce, may obtain it though the wife be actually resident in a foreign state; 2 Cl. & F. 488; 1 Dow. 117; 2 Curt. Eccl. 351; 35 N. E. Rep. (Ind.) 713; 45 La. Ann. 457; 44 Ala. 437; 122 Mass. 162; 56 Wis. 195. See, also, 15 Johns. 121; 1 Dev. & B. Eq. 588; 2 Strobl. Eq. 174. But, where it is necessary for her to do so, the wife may acquire a separate domicile, which may be in the same jurisdiction; 9 Wall. 108; 39 Wisc. 659; 57 Mo. 204; 129 Ill. 396; 21 How. 582; contra, 2 Cl. & F. 438; Dicey, Dom. 104. She may rest on her husband's domicile for the purpose of obtaining a divorce; 15 N. H. 159; 1 Johns. Ch. 339; 5 Yerg. 203; 6 Humphr. 148; 8 W. & S. 251. See 54 Ark. 172; 30 Am. L. Rev. 604, 612; DIVORCE.

A wife divorced a mensa et thoro may acquire a separate domicile so as to sue her husband in the United States courts; 21 How. 582; so where the wife is deserted; 5 Cal. 280; 2 E. L. & Eq. 52; 2 Kent 573.

The domicile of a widow remains that of her deceased husband until she makes a change; Story, Conf. Laws § 46; 18 Pa. 17.

Prisoners, exiles, and refugees do not thereby change their domicile; see L. R. 1 Sc. App. 148; 11 Conn. 234; 21 Vt. 563; 85 Ala. 439. It may be otherwise in case of a life sentence; Whart. Conf. Law § 54.

Commercial domicile. There may be a commercial domicile acquired by maintenance of a commercial establishment in a country, in relation to transactions connected with such establishments; 1 Kent 82; 144 U. S. 47; 52 Fed. Rep. 203. See Dicey, Dom. 341; 2 Wheat. 76.

This is such a residence in a country for purposes of trade as makes a person's trade or business contribute to or form part of the resources of such country. The question is whether he is or is not residing in such country with the purpose of continuing to trade there; Dicey, Conf. Laws 737. The intention of remaining in the commercial domicile is the intention to continue to reside and trade there for the present; id. 738. Commercial domicile is not forfeited by temporary absence at the domicile of origin; 144 U. S. 63; but if a person go into a foreign country and engage in trade there, he is, by the law of nations, to be considered a merchant of that country, and subject for all civil purposes, whether that country be hostile or neutral; 3 B. & P. 113; 3 C. Rob. 12; 1 Hagg. 103, 104; 1

Pet. C. C. 159; 2 Cra. 64; and this whether the effect be to render him hostile or neutral in respect to his bona fide trade; 1 Kent 75; 3 B. & P. 113; 1 C. Rob. 249.

Corporations. If the term domicile can apply to corporations, they have their domicile wherever they are created; L. R. 1 Ex. 428; 5 H. L. 416; 40 Mo. 580. See 147 Ill. 234; but a permanent foreign agency of an insurance company may create an independent domicile in the place of the agency, for the purpose of enforcing legal obligation; 53 N. Y. 339. See 1 Black 256. If a railroad performs its functions within a state under a charter granted by the legislature, the fact that earlier charters were granted in other states does not render the corporation any the less a resident of the state granting the latest charter; 91 Tenn. 395; an insurance company organized under the laws of one state, but which appoints an agent in another state on whom service of process can be made, does not change the domicile of the corporation; 138 N. Y. 209. See also 107 U. S. 581; 138 N. Y. 209; 138 Mass. 461.

Change of domicile. Any person, sui juris, may make any bona fide change of domicile at any time; 5 Madd. 379; 5 Pick. 370; 35 E. L. & Eq. 532. And the object of the change does not affect the right, if it be a genuine change with real intention of permanent residence; 3 Wash. C. C. 546; 5 Mas. 70; 1 Paine 594; 3 Sumn. 251; 85 Ala. 439. Domicil is not lost by going to another state to seek a home, but continues until the home is obtained; 12 Pa. Co. Ct. R. 255. Legitimate children follow the domicile of the father, if the change be made bona fide; 2 Salk. 528; 2 Bro. Ch. 500; 16 Mass. 52; Ware 464; 27 Mo. 280; L. R. 1 P. & D. 611; 67 N. Y. 379; 45 Ia. 49; 49 Fed. Rep. 257; 23 L. J. Ch. 724; 67 Ala. 304; 23 Ind. 43; illegitimate children, that of the mother; 37 L. J. Ch. 724; Dicey, Dom. 97; 35 Me. 411; 8 Cush. 75; but there are limitations to the power to change a minor child's domicile in the case of alien parents; 10 Ves. 52; 5 East 221; 8 Paige, Ch. 47; 2 Kent 226; and of the mother, if a widow; Burge 38; 30 Ala. N. s. 613; see 2 Bradf. Surr. 214; 45 Mo. App. 415; however, if she acquires a new domicile by remarriage, the child's domicile does not change; 40 N. Y. Sup. Ct. 347; 2 Bradf. Surr. 414; 8 Cush. 528; 11 Humphr. 536. See [1893] 3 Ch. 490; 112 U. S. 452; 35 Ala. 521. If a father abandons his children, who are cared for and live with their grandmother for several years, and he subsequently removes them against her will, the residence of the children is not changed; 92 Cal. 195; 49 Fed. Rep. 257.

The guardian is said to have the same power over his ward that a parent has over his child; 5 Pick. 20; 33 Tex. 512; 8 Ohio 227; 1 Binn. 349, n.; 2 Kent 237. But see contra, 8 Blackf. 345. The point is not settled in England; Dicey, Dom. 133. See 3 Mer. 67; 9 W. N. C. Pa. 564. "It has been generally held that a guardian can change the ward's domicile from one county to another in the same state; 42 Vt. 350; L. R. 5 Q. B. 325. It is doubtful, to say the least, whether the guardian can remove the ward's domicile out of the state in which he was appointed; L. R. 12 Eq. 617; 52 Ala. 430. A guardian appointed in a state where the ward is temporarily residing cannot change the ward's domicile from one state to another; 112 U. S. 452. But see 87 Tenn. 644. The mere appointment of a guardian will not prevent the ward from changing his domicile where he has sufficient mental capacity to do so; 17 R. I. 480; 149 Mass. 57. It may be considered questionable whether the guardian can change the national domicile of his ward; 2 Kent 226; Story, Conf. Laws § 506.

The domicile of a lunatic may be changed by the direction or with the assent of his guardian; 5 Pick. 20; 42 Vt. 350; contra, 53 Me. 442. See L. R. 1 P. & M. 611; 3 Ves. Jr. 198; 9 W. R. 764.

The husband may not change his domicile after committing an offence which entitles the wife to a divorce, so as to deprive her of her remedy; 14 Pick. 181; 2 Tex. 261. And it is said the wife may not in the like case acquire a new domicile; 10 N. H. 61; 9 Me. 140; 17 Conn. 284; 5 Yerg. 203; 2 Mass. 153; 2 Litt. 337; 2 Blackf. 407. Until a new domicile is gained, the old one remains; 93 U. S. 605; 55 Me. 117. See DIVORCE.

The law of the place of domicile governs as to all acts of the parties, when not controlled by the lex loci contractus or lex rei sitæ. Personal property of the woman follows the law of the domicile upon marriage. It passes to the husband, if at all, in such cases as a legal assignment by operation of the law of domicile, but one which is recognized extra-territorially; 2 Rose 97; 20 Johns. 267; Story, Conf. Laws § 423.

The state and condition of the person according to the law of his domicile will generally, though not universally, be regarded in other countries as to acts done, rights acquired, or contracts made in the place of his native domicile; but as to acts, rights, and contracts done, acquired, or made out of his native domicile, the lex loci will generally govern in respect to his capacity and condition; 2 Kent 234. See LEX LOCI.

The disposition of, succession to, or distribution of the personal property of a decedent, wherever situated, is to be made in accordance with the law of his actual domicile at the time of his death; 8 Sim. 310; 3 Stor. 753; 11 Miss. 617; 1 Spear, Eq. 3; 4 Bradf. Surr. 127; 15 N. H. 137. See 143 Ill. 25.

The principle applies equally to cases of voluntary transfer, of intestacy, and of testaments; 5 B. & C. 451; 3 Stor. 755; 3 Hagg. 273; 3 Curt. Eccl. 468; 9 Pet. 503; 2 Harr. & J. 191; 6 Pick. 286; 9 N. H. 137; 8 Paige, Ch. 519; 1 Mas. 381; 6 T. B. Monr. 52; 29 Ala. N. s. 72; 6 Vt. 374. Stocks are considered as personal property in this respect; 1 Cr. & J. 151; Bligh, N. s. 15; 1 Jarm. Wills 3.

Movable articles are generally taxable at the place where they are actually situated, 141 U. S. 18, and domicile is the test of liability to personal taxes; 80 Ia. 470; 158 Mass. 461.

Wills are to be governed by the law of the domicile as to the capacity of parties; 1 Jarm. Wills 3; and as to their validity and effect in relation to the transfer of personal property; 4 Blackf. 53; 2 Ill. 373; 2 Bail. 436; 5 Pet. 519; 2 B. Monr. 582; 3 Curt. Eccl. 468; 11 N. H. 88; 1 M'Cord 354; 5 Gill & J. 483; 53 N. Y. 556; 35 Ala. 521; 52 Me. 165; 75 Pa. 201; but by the lex rei sitæ as to the transfer of real property; 1 Blackf. 372; 6 T. B. Monr. 527; 22 Me. 303; 8 Ohio 239; 7 Cra. 115; 31 Mo. 166; 27 Tex. 38; 14 Ves. 541; 75 Pa. 201. See LEX REI SITÆ.

The forms and solemnities of the place of domicile must be observed; 8 Sim. 279; 4 M. & C. 76; 2 H. & J. 191; 1 Binn. 336; 4 Johns. Ch. 460; 1 Mas. 381; 12 Wheat. 169; 9 Pet. 483; 52 Me. 165; 35 Ala. 521; 15 La. Ann. 137, 154.

The local law is to determine the character of property; 6 Paige, Ch. 630; Story, Conf. Laws § 447; Erskine, Inst. b, 3, tit. 9, § 4. And it is held that a state may regulate the succession to personal as well as real property within its limits, without regard to the lex domicilii; 6 Humphr. 116.

The interpretation of a will of movables is to be according to the law of the place of the last domicile of the testator; 3 Cl. & F. 544, 570; L. R. 3 H. L. 55; 68 Pa. 151; 4 Bligh 502; 3 Sim. 298; 2 Bro. Ch. 38; 9 Pet. 483. But so far as its validity is concerned, it does not matter that after the will was made in one domicile the testator went to another, where he died; Whart. Conf. Laws § 592; Beach, Wills 158; 10 Mo. 543; Story, Conf. Laws § 479 g. See 53 N. Y. 556. In England, by statute, a will does not become invalid nor is its construction altered by reason of the testator's change of domicile after making it; Dicey, Dom. 308. It has been said that the rules as to construction of wills apply whether they be of real or personal property, unless in case of real property it may be clearly gathered from the terms of the will that the testator had in view the lex rei sitæ; Story, Conf. Laws § 479 h; 2 Bligh 60; 4 M. & C. 76. But see, contra, Whart. Conf. Laws § 597. See CONFLICT OF LAWS; LEX REI SITÆ; WILL.

Distribution of the personal property of an intestate is governed exclusively by the law of his actual domicile at the time of his death; 5 B. & C. 438; 4 Bush 51; 14 How. 400; 14 Mart. La. 99; 2 H. & J. 193; 4 Johns. Ch. 460; 1 Mas. 418; 15 N. H. 137; 35 La. Ann. 19. This includes the ascertainment of the person who is to take; Story, Conf. Laws § 481; 2 Ves. 35; 2 Hagg. 455; 2 Keen 293. The descent of real estate depends upon the law of the place of the real estate; 7 Cra. 115; 52 Ala. 85; 8 L. R. Ch. 842; 32 Ind. 99; 111 N. Y. 624; 9 Wheat. 565; 14 Ves. 541; 70 Ala. 626; 38 N. J. Eq. 516; 101 Ill. 26. The question whether debts are to be paid by the administrator from the personalty or realty is to be decided by the law of his domicile; Story, Conf. Laws § 528; 9 Mod. 66; 2 Keen 293.

Insolvents and bankrupts. An assignment of property for the benefit of creditors valid by the law of the domicile is generally recognized as valid everywhere; Bish. Insolv. Debt. 385; 4 Johns. Ch. 471; 2 Rose 97; 1 Cr. M. & R. 296; 52 Conn. 330; 137 Mass. 366; 142 id. 53; 40 Barb. 465; 104 Pa. 381; 41 N. J. Eq. 403; in the absence of positive statute to the contrary; 6 Pick. 286; 14 Mart. La. 93, 100; 6 Binn. 353; but not to the injury of citizens of the foreign state in which property is situated; 5 East 131; 17 Mart. La. 596; 6 Binn. 360; 5 Cra. 289; 12 Wheat. 213; 4 Bush 149; 48 N. H. 125; 1 H. & M'H. 236; 35 Barb. 663. But a compulsory assignment by force of statute is not of extra-territorial operation; 20 Johns. 229; 6 Binn. 353; 6 Pick. 286; 27 Mich. 159. Distribution of the effects of insolvent or bankrupt debtors is to be made according to the law of the domicile, subject to the same qualifications; Story, Confl. Laws § 323, 423 a. See, generally, 13 Am. L. Rev. 261; 7 Wash. L. Rep. 487; 11 Cent. L. J. 421; 23 Alb. L. J. 86; Whart. Confl. DOMINANT. That to which a servitude or easement is due, or for the benefit of which it exists. Distinguished from servient, that from which it is due.

DOMINICUM (Lat. domain; demaine; demesne). A lordship. That of which one has the lordship or ownership. That which remains under the lord's immediate charge and control.

In this sense it is equivalent to the Saxon bordlands. Spelman, Gloss.; Blount. In regard to lands for which the lord received services and homage merely, the dominium was in the tenant.

Property; domain; anything pertaining to a lord. Cowell.

In Ecclesiastical Law. A church, or any other building consecrated to God. Du Cange.

DOMINION. Ownership or right to property. 2 Bla. Com. 1. "The holder has dominion of the bill." 8 East 579.

Sovereignty or lordship, as the dominion of theseas. Black, L. Dict. See DOMINIUM.

DOMINIUM (Lat.). Perfect and complete property or ownership in a thing.

Plenum in re dominium.—plena in re potestas. This right is composed of three principal elements, viz.: the right to use, the right to enjoy, and the right to dispose of the thing, to the exclusion of every other person. To use a thing, jus utendi tantum, consists in employing it for the purposes for which it is fit, without destroying it, and which employment can therefore be repeated; to enjoy a thing, jus fruendi tantum, consists in receiving the fruits which it yields, whether natural or civil, quidquid ex re nascitur; to dispose of a thing, jus abutendi, is to destroy it, or to transfer it to another. Thus, he who has the use of a horse may ride him, or put him in the plow to cultivate his own soil; but he has no right to hire the horse to another and receive the civil fruits which he may produce in that way.

On the other hand, he who has the enjoyment of a thing is entitled to receive all the profits or revenues which may be derived from it, either from natural or civil fruits.

And, lastly, he who has the right of disposing of a thing, jus abutendi, may sell it, or give it away, etc., subject, however, to the rights of the usufructuary or usufructuary, as the case may be.

These three elements, usus, fructus, abusus, when united in the same person, constitute the dominium; but they may be, and frequently are, separated: so that the right of disposing of a thing may belong to Primus, and the rights of using and enjoying to Secundus, or the right of enjoying alone may belong to Secundus, and the right of using to Tertius. In that case, Primus is always the owner of the thing, but he is the naked owner, inasmuch as for a certain time he is actually deprived of all the principal advantages that can be derived from it. Secundus, if he has the use and enjoyment, jus utendi et fruendi simul, is called the usufructuary, usufructuarius; if he has the enjoyment only, jus fruendi tantum, he is the fructuarius; and Tertius, who has the right of use, jus utendi tantum, is called the usufructuary. But this dismemberment of the elements of the dominium is essentially temporary; if no shorter period has been fixed for its duration, it terminates with the life of the usufructuary, or usufructuary; for which reason the rights of use and usufruct are called personal servitudes. Besides the separation of the elements of the dominium among different persons, there may also be a jus in re, or dismemberment, so far as real estates are concerned, in favor of other estates. Thus, a right of way over my land may exist in favor of your house; this right is so completely attached to the house that it can never be separated from it, except by its entire extinction. This class of jura in re is called predial or real servitudes. To constitute this servitude, there must be two estates belonging to different owners; these estates are viewed in some measure as juridical persons, capable of acquiring rights and incurring obligations. The estate in favor of which the servitude exists is the creditor-estate; and the estate by which the servitude is due, the debtor-estate. 2 Mariadé. See EMINENT DOMAIN.

DOMINIUM DIRECTUM (Lat.). Legal ownership. Ownership as distinguished from enjoyment.

DOMINIUM DIRECTUM ET UTILE (Lat.). Full ownership and possession united in one person.

DOMINIUM UTILE (Lat.). The beneficial ownership. The use of the property.

DOMINUS (Lat.). The lord or master; the owner. Ainsworth, Lat. Lex. The owner or proprietor of a thing, as distinguished from him who uses it merely. Calvinus, Lex. A master or principal, as distinguished from an agent or attorney. Story, Ag. § 3; Ferriere, Dict.

In Civil Law. A husband. A family. Vicat, Voc. Jur.

DOMINUS LITIS (Lat.). The master of suit. The client, as distinguished from an attorney.

And yet it is said, although he who has appointed an attorney is properly called dominus litis, the attorney himself, when the cause has been tried, becomes the dominus litis. Vicat.

DOMINUS NAVIS. In Civil Law. The absolute owner of a ship. Wharton.

DOMITÆ (Lat.). Tame; subdued; not wild.

Applied to domestic animals, in which a man may have an absolute property. 2 Bla. Com. 391.

DONATARIUS (L. Lat.). One to whom something is given. A donee.

DONATIO (Lat.). A gift. A transfer of the title to property to one who receives it without paying for it. Vicat. The act by which the owner of a thing voluntarily transfers the title and possession of the same from himself to another person, without any consideration. See 56 Ind. 476; 65 Ga. 499.

A donation is never perfected until it has been accepted; for an acceptance is requisite to make the donation complete. See ASSENT; Ayl. Pand. tit. 9; Clef des Lois Rom.; 2 Kent 438; 2 E. D. Sm. 305; 28 Ala. N. S. 641. In old English law and in the modern law, in several phrases, the word retains the extended sense it has in the civil law.

Its literal translation, gift, has acquired in real property law a more limited meaning, being applied to the conveyance of estates tail. 2 Bla. Com. 316; Littleton § 59; West, Symb. § 254; 4 Cruise, Dig. 51. There are several kinds of donatio: as, donatio simplex et pura (simple and pure gift without compulsion or consideration); donatio absoluta et larga (an absolute gift); donatio conditionalis (a conditional gift); donatio stricta et coarctura (a restricted gift, as, an estate tail).

DONATIO INTER VIVOS (Lat. a gift between living persons). A contract which takes place by the mutual consent of the giver, who divests himself of the thing given in order to transmit the title of it to the donee, gratuitously, and the donee who accepts and acquires the legal title to it. It operates, if at all, in the donor's lifetime, immediately and irrevocably; it is a gift executed; no further act of parties, no contingency of death or otherwise, is needed to give it effect; 3 Del. Ch. 62. "Gifts inter vivos have no reference to the future and go into immediate and absolute effect"; 2 Kent, Com. Lacy's ed. 439. Such a gift takes place when the giver is not in any immediate apprehension of death, which distinguishes it from a donatio mortis causa (q. v.).

This division of gifts is taken from the Roman law as are also the rules by which they are governed; 2 Kent, Com. 439. A donatio inter vivos, as distinguished from a donatio mortis causa, does not require actual delivery, and it is sufficient, to complete such a gift, that the conduct of the parties should show that the ownership of the chattel has been changed; 79 Ga. 119. It is true, however, that under such a gift a person "may take a benefit to accrue at a future day—it may be at the donor's death; but this can be only through the instrumentality of a trust created either in a third person or in the donor. The effect is to divest at once the former property of the donor in the thing so given. Such a gift is no less immediate than in the ordinary case;" 3 Del. Ch. 62. See GIFT.

DONATIO MORTIS CAUSA (Lat. a gift in prospect of death). A gift made by a person in sickness, or other immediate peril, who, apprehending his dissolution near, delivers, or causes to be delivered, to another, the possession of any personal goods, to keep as his own in case of donor's decease. 2 Bla. Com. 514; 51 Pa. 345.

The civil law defines it to be a gift under apprehension of death: as, when anything is given upon condition that if the donor die the donee shall possess it absolutely, or return it if the donor should survive or should repent of having made the gift, or if the donee should die before the donor. 1 Miles 109. It differs from a legacy, inasmuch as it does not require proof in the court of probate; 2 Stra. 777; see 1 Bligh, N. S. 531; and no assent is required from the executor to perfect the donee's title; 2 Ves. 120; 1 S. & S. 245. It differs from a gift inter vivos because it is ambulatory and revocable during the donor's life, because it may be made to the wife of the donor, and because it is liable for his debts, and it requires actual delivery; 79 Ga. 11. See also as to these distinctions Brett, L. Cas. Mod. Eq. 33.

To constitute a good donatio mortis causa: first, the thing given must be personal property; 3 Binn. 370; a bond; 3 Binn. 370; 2 Ves. Sen. 431; 3 Madd. 184; bank notes; 23 Pa. 59; 2 Bro. Ch. 612; 32 Barb. 250; 3 P. Wms. 356; certificates of stock; 55 Barb. 251; a policy of life insurance; 1 B. & S. 109; 51 Pa. 345; and a check offered for payment during the life of the donor; 4 Bro. Ch. 286; will be so considered; but a check not so presented, which had not passed into the hands of a bona fide holder, is revoked by the death of the decedent; L. R. 6 Eq. 198; 27 La. Ann. 465; s.c. 21 Am. Rep. 567; 13 L. R. Eq. 489; 31 Ohio St. 457; 30 Hun 632; 59 Cal. 665; aliter, as to a check given abroad; L. R. 5 Ch. Div. 730. See 154 Pa. 183. A check to a wife expressing that it was to enable her to buy mourning, was held under peculiar circumstances a valid donatio mortis causa; 1 P. Wms. 441. A note not negotiable, or if negotiable, not indorsed, but delivered, passes by such a donation; 1 Dan. Neg. Inst. § 24; Tiedm. Com. Pap. 252; 13 Gray 418; but in 5 Gill & J. 54, this is limited to bank notes and notes payable to bearer. A certificate of deposit which is delivered to a person for the use of a third party, though not indorsed, is a valid gift; 11 Colo. 183; 36 Ill. App. 525; contra, 109 Mo. 90; see 64 Cal. 346. The delivery of a savings-bank book passes the money in bank; 63 Me. 364; 124 Mass. 472; 129 id. 425; 36 Conn. 88; 8 R. I. 536; contra, 3 Ir. Eq. 668; 121 Pa. 177; see 89 Va. 1. A banker's deposit note is a good subject of gift; 44 Ch. Div. 76; but where the bank book is already in the hands of the donee, a statement by the donor that his wife may have it is not sufficient; 81 Me. 231. See 36 Cent. Law J. 354; 31 Am. Law Reg. 681; 34 id. 85, for discussions and annotations on this subject. A mortgage is a good gift; Barn. Ch. Cas. 90; 5 Madd. 351; 1 Bligh, N. S. 497; a policy of insurance; 1 Best & Sm. 109; 33 Beav. 619; a receipt for money; 4 De G. & Sm. 517; bonds; 3 Atk. 214; 1 Bligh, N. S. 497; bank notes; 2 Eden 125; Sel. Ch. Cas. 14; 3 P. Wms. 356; 2 Bro. C. C. 612.

A promissory note of the sick man made in his last illness is not a valid donation; 5 B. & C. 501; 14 Pick. 204; 3 Barb. Ch. 76; 21 Vt. 238; 77 Pa. 328. See 33 N. H. 520; 18 Conn. 410; 11 Md. 424; 4 Cush. 87; 41 Ill. App. 659. See 6 Harv. L. Rev. 36. In England, bills delivered on a deathbed but without consideration, are valid donations; 27 Beav. 303; but a gift of the donor's own cheque, if not payable until after his death, is not valid; 15 Ch. D. 651; 27 Ch. D. 631. See also 5 Ch. D. 730; 4 D. M. & G. 249. As to a gift of money, see 50 N. J. Eq. 537.

Second, the gift must be made by the donor in peril of death, and to take effect only in case the giver dies; Bisph. Eq. 70; 3 Binn. 370; 1 Bligh, N. s. 530; 43 Vt. 513; 49 N. Y. 17; 3 Misc. Rep. 277; a gift made in apprehension of death from a surgical operation is valid; 125 N. Y. 572. There is quite a conflict of authority as to whether a gift by a soldier about to join the army is a valid donatio causa mortis, with the weight of authority against sustaining them. They have been upheld, it may possibly be considered, in 42 Ill. 39; but this case is explained in Travis on Sales as a gift inter vivos on condition; a case cited as upholding them, 34 Ind. 547, is overruled if it does so hold; 38 id. 451, which holds them invalid, as do also 51 Pa. 345; 23 W. Va. 415; 47 Barb. 370; 5 Rob. N. Y. 216 (Barbour, J., dissenting). See 4 Cold. 288.

Such a gift is only good when made in relation to the death of the person by illness affecting him at the time; 2 Ves. Jr. 121; but if it appear that the donation was made when the donor was ill and only a few days or weeks before his death, it will be presumed that it was made in the last illness and in contemplation of death; 1 Wms. Ex. 845; 3 Story 755; 31 Me. 422.

When a gift was made in contemplation of death, but the donor so far recovered as to be able to attend to his business, and then died of the same disease, held not a good donatio; 17 Me. 287. That the donor lived fourteen days; 2 Whart. 17; three days; 3 Binn. 366; 85 Me. 227; six hours; 23 Pa. 63; after making the gift, does not invalidate it. There seems to be no rule limiting the time within which the gift must be made before death; 49 N. Y. 17.

Third, there must be an actual delivery of the subject to or for the donee, in cases where such delivery can be made; 2 Ves. 120; 2 Gill & J. 268; 4 Gratt. 472; 31 Me. 422; 14 Barb. 243; 7 E. L. & Eq. 134; 75 Pa. 115, 147; 49 N. Y. 17; 41 N. H. 147; 75 Cal. 548; 149 Mass. 12; L. R. 6 Eq. 474; 63 N. H. 552; 77 Mo. 166; 94 N. C. 274. The delivery must be as complete as the nature of the property will admit of; 56 Me. 324; 114 Mass. 30. In this last case taking the key of a trunk, putting goods into the trunk and returning the key to its place at the request of the owner, who expressed a desire, in his last illness, to make the trunk and its contents a donatio mortis causa, was held not to be a sufficient delivery. The gift of the keys of a box deposited in a vault of a bank containing bonds, etc., is a sufficient constructive delivery of the contents of the box; 89 Va. 1; 2 Ves. Sen. 431; Prec. Ch. 300; [1891] W. N. 201; where donor delivered the keys of a trunk to donee, and said the trunk and its contents were donee's, it was valid; 158 Mass. 592; but see 85 Me. 227. An intention to give is sufficiently manifested from the fact that a person in extremis hands a package of bonds to another saying, "These bonds are for you;" 73 Cal. 61. Delivery can be made to a third person for the use of a donee; 3 Binn. 370; 2 Bradf. Surr. 340; 5 Bush 591; but not if the third party is the agent of the giver; 2 Coll. 356. The acceptance is presumed, unless the contrary appear; 94 Mich. 11.

To make such a gift valid there must be a renunciation by the donor and an acquisition by the donee, of all interest and title to the property intended to be given; 18 N. Y. Sup. 852.

To constitute such a gift, the subject of the gift must be delivered either to the donee or to some person for his use and benefit, and the donor must part with all dominion over the property, and the title must vest in the donee, subject to the right of the donor at any time to revoke the gift; 75 Cal. 548.

It is an unsettled question whether such kind of gift appearing in writing, without delivery of the subject, can be supported; 2 Ves. 120; 3 Ired. Ch. 268; but Lord Hardwicke expressed the opinion that it could be; 2 Ves. Sen. 440; 1 id. 314; contra, 1 Wms. Ex. 855. And see 12 Tex. 327. By the Roman and civil law, a gift mortis causa might be made in writing; Dig. lib. 39, t. 6, l. 28; 2 Ves. Sen. 440; 1 id. 314.

Upon the recovery of the donor and his consequent ability to comply with the statute, the dispensation from its requirements ceases and the gift causa mortis, though valid when made, becomes of no further force. No expression to this effect is necessary; 3 Del. Ch. 63; 89 Va. 1.

The essentials are also thus stated: 1. It must be in view of donor's death. 2. With express or implied intention that it shall only take effect by reason of existing disorder. 3. Delivery by the donor to the donee or some one on his behalf; Brett, L. Cas. Mod. Eq. 33; but this is not so satisfactory as the well-settled enumeration above given.

A donatio mortis causa does not require the executor's assent; 2 Ves. Jr. 120; is revocable by the donor during his life; 2 Bradf. Surr. 339; 27 Me. 196; 3 Woodb. & M. 519; 34 N. H. 439; 99 Cal. 311; by recovery; 3 Macn. & G. 664; Wms. Ex. 651; or resumption of possession; 7 Taunt. 233; 2 Ves. Sen. 433; but not by a subsequent will; Prec. Chanc. 300; contra, 31 Ill. App. 28; but may be satisfied by a subsequent legacy; 1 Ves. Sen. 314. And see 1 Ired. Ch. 130. It may be of any amount of property; 24 Vt. 591. It is liable for the testator's debts; 1 Phill. Ch. 406; 109 Mo. 90; 63 N. H. 552; 107 U. S. 602; a gift providing for the payment of certain bills and a division of the remaining property is valid; 70 Hun 565.

A gift causa mortis is none the less valid because it embraces the entire personal estate of the donor, and the testimony of one credible witness is sufficient to establish such a gift; 89 Va. 1; 24 Vt. 591; but see 18 Pa. 326; 13 Allen 43; and a gift accompanied by the condition that part thereof is to be applied to the payment of the donor's debts is good; 18 N. Y. Sup. 852.

For a thorough discussion of this subject and examination of authorities, see 3 Del. Ch. 51. See also 1 Am. L. Reg. 1; note to Ward v. Turner, Wh. & T. L. C. Eq.; 36 Cent. Law J. 354; 32 id. 27.

DONATIO PROPTER NUPTIAS (Lat. gift on account of marriage). In Roman Law. A gift made by the husband as a security for the marriage portion. The effect of the act of making such a gift was different according to the relation of the parties at the time. Vicat, Voc. Jur. Called, also, a mutual gift.

The name was originally applied to a gift made before marriage, and was then called a donatio ante nuptias; but in process of time it was allowed to be made after marriage as well, and was then called a donatio propter nuptias.

DONATION. See DONATIO.

DONATIVE. See ADVOWSON.

DONEE. He to whom a gift is made or a bequest given; one who is invested with a power of appointment: he is sometimes called an appointee. 4 Kent 316; 4 Cruise, Dig. 51.

DONIS, STATUTE DE. See DE DONIS, THE STATUTE.

DONOR. He who makes a gift. One who gives lands in tail. Termes de la Ley.

DONUM (Lat.). A gift.

The difference between donum and munus is said to be that donum is more general, while munus is specific. Munus is said to mean donum with a cause for the giving (though not a legal consideration), as on account of marriage, etc. Donum is said to be that which is given from no necessity of law or duty, but from free will, "from the absence of which, if they are not given, no blame arises; but if they are given, praise is due." Vicat, Voc. Jur.; Calvinus, Lex.

DOOM. Judgment.

DOOR. The place of usual entrance into a house, or into a room in the house.

To authorize the breach of an outer door in order to serve process, the process must be of a criminal nature; and even then a demand of admittance must first have been refused; 5 Co. 94; 1 N. H. 346; 10 Johns. 263; 1 Root, 83, 134; 21 Pick. 156; 120 Mass. 190; 106 Ill. 621; 14 B. Monr. 395. The outer door may also be broken open for the purpose of executing a writ of habere facias; 5 Co. 93; Bac. Abr. Sheriff (N 3).

An outer door cannot, in general, be broken for the purpose of serving civil process; 13 Mass. 520; 51 Ill. 357; 19 Vt. 151; 1 M. & W. 336; 4 Hill 437; but after the defendant has been arrested, and he takes refuge in his own house, the officer may justify breaking an outer door to take him; Fost. 320; 1 Rolle 138; Cro. Jac. 555; 10 Wend. 300. When once an officer is in the house, he may break open an inner door to make an arrest; Kirb. 386; 17 Johns. 127; 13 M. & W. 52; 2 Harr. 494. See 1 Toullier, n. 214, p. 88; L. R. 2 Q. B. 593; or break the outer door to get out; 7 A. & E. 826.

DORMANT. Sleeping; silent; not known; not acting. He whose name and transactions as a partner are professedly concealed from the world; 2 H. & G. 159; 5 Cow. 534; 4 Mass. 424; 47 N. Y. 15; Coll. Partn. § 4. The term is applied, also, to titles, rights, judgments, and executions. As to the latter, see 11 Johns. 110; 2 Hill 364.

DOS (Lat.). In Roman Law. That which is received by or promised to the husband from the wife, or any one else by her influence, for sustaining the burdens of matrimony. There are three classes of dos. Dos profectitia is that which is given by the father or any male relative from his property or by his act; dos adventitia is that which is given by any other person or from the property of the wife herself; dos receptitia is where there is a stipulation connected with the gift relating to the death of the wife. Vicat; Calvinus, Lex.; Du Cange; 1 Washb. R. P. 147.

In English Law. The portion bestowed upon a wife at her marriage by her husband. 1 Reeve, Hist. Eng. Law 100; 1 Washb. R. P. 147; 1 Cruise, Dig. 152.

Dower generally. The portion which a widow has in the estate of her husband after his death. Park, Dower.

This use of the word in the English law, though, as Spelman shows, not strictly correct, has still the authority of Tacitus (de Mor. Germ. 18) for its use. And if the general meaning of marriage portion is given to it, it is strictly applicable to a gift from the husband to the wife as to one from the wife to the husband. It occurs often, in the phrase dos de dote peti non debet (dower should not be sought of dower). 1 Washb. R. P. 209.

DOS RATIONABILIS (Lat.). A reasonable marriage portion. A reasonable part of her husband's estate, to which every widow is entitled, of lands of which her husband may have endowed her on the day of marriage. Co. Litt. 336. Dower, at common law. 2 Bla. Com. 134.

DOT (a French word adopted in Louisiana). The fortune, portion, or dowry which a woman brings to her husband by the marriage. 6 Mart. La. N. S. 460.

DOTAGE. That feebleness of the mental faculties which proceeds from old age. A diminution or decay of that intellectual power which was once possessed. 1 Bland, Ch. 389. See DEMENTIA.

DOTAL PROPERTY. By the civil law in Louisiana, by this term is understood that property which the wife brings to the husband to assist him in bearing the expenses of the marriage establishment. Extradotal property, otherwise called paraphernal property, is that which forms no part of the dowry. La. Civ. Code, art. 2335.

The effect of marriage under the civil law as found in the digest was that the wife brought her dos and the husband his antidos into the marriage. In all other property belonging to them they each retained the rights of owners in their separate capacities uncontrolled by their relation of husband and wife; Ballinger, Community Property § 2. See COMMUNITY.

DOTATION. In French Law. The act by which the founder of a hospital, or other charity, endows it with property to fulfil its destination.

NOTE. In Spanish Law. The property and effects which a woman brings to her husband for the purpose of aiding him with the rents and revenues thereof to support the expenses of the marriage. Las Partidas, 4. 11. 1. "Dos," says Cujas, "est pecunia marito, nuptiarum causa, data vel promissa." The dower of the wife is inalienable, except in certain specified cases, for which see Escriche, Dic. Raz. Dote.

As an English verb it has been defined to be delirious, silly or insane. 7 Ind. 441.

NOTE ASSIGNANDA. In English Law. A writ which lay in favor of a widow, when it was found by office that the king's tenant was seized of tenements in fee or fee-tail at the time of his death, and that he held of the king in chief. Such widows were called king's widows.

NOTE UNDE NIHIL HABET. A writ which lies for a widow to whom no dower has been assigned. 3 Bla. Com. 182. By 23 and 24 Vict. c. 126, an ordinary action commenced by writ of summons has taken its place; but it remains in force in the United States, and under the designation of dower unde nihil habet, is the form in common use for the recovery of dower at law; 1 Washb. R. P. 290; 4 Kent 63; Stearns, Real Act. 302.

DOUBLE AVAIL OF MARRIAGE. See DUPLEX VALOR MARITAGII.

DOUBLE COMPLAINT. See DUPLEX QUERELA.

DOUBLE COSTS. See COSTS.

DOUBLE OR TREBLE DAMAGES. See MEASURE OF DAMAGES.

DOUBLE EAGLE. A gold coin of the United States, of the value of twenty dollars or units.

It is so called because it is twice the value of the eagle, and, consequently, weighs five hundred and sixteen grains of standard fineness, namely, nine hundred thousandths fine. It is a legal tender for twenty dollars to any amount. Act of March 3, 1849, 6 Stat. L. 397. U. S. Rev. Stat. §§ 8511, 3514. The double eagle is in value the largest coin issued in the United States. The first issue was made in 1849. See act of Feb. 12, 1873, 17 Stat. L. p. 426; EAGLE.

DOUBLE INSURANCE. Where divers insurances are made upon the same interest in the same subject against the same risks in favor of the same assured, in proportions exceeding the value. 1 Phill. Ins. §§ 359, 866.

A like excess in one policy is over-insurance. If the valuation of the whole interest in one policy is double that in another, and half of the value is insured in each policy according to the valuation in that policy, it is not a double insurance; its being so or not depends on the aggregate of the proportions, one-quarter, one-half, etc., insured by each policy, not upon the aggregate of the amounts.

Where the insurance is on the interests of different persons, though on the same goods, it is not double insurance; 9 S. & R. 107; nor is it where carrier and shipper each insure; 28 Fed. Rep. 492.

In England, each underwriter is liable for the whole amount insured by him until the assured is fully indemnified, and either on paying over his proportion pro rata is entitled to contribution from the other; but no one can be liable over the rate at which the subject is rated in his policy.

In the United States, the policies generally provide that the prior underwriters shall be liable until the assured is fully indemnified, and underwriters for the excess are exonerated; but the excess is to be ascertained by the aggregate of the proportions, as a quarter, half, etc., to make up the integer; 1 Phill. Ins. § 361; 1 W. Bla. 416; 1 Burr. 489; 15 B. Monr. 433, 452; 18 Ill. 553. This clause does not apply to double insurance by simultaneous policies; 1 Phill. Ins. § 362; 5 S. & R. 475.

In case of double insurance, the assured may sue upon all the policies and is entitled to judgment upon all, but he is entitled to but one satisfaction; therefore, if during the pendency of suits on several policies concerning the same risk and interest, the loss is paid in full by one company, the actions against the others must fail, and the insurer paying the loss has a remedy against the other insurers for a proportionate share of the loss. If there be any doubt as to whether the policies cover the same property or interest, evidence is admissible to show the fact; Wood, Fire Ins. 621; 18 Pick. 145; 16 Wend. 385; 39 Barb. 302; 45 Ill. 85; 18 id. 553; 49 Pa. 14; 54 id. 277; May, Ins. § 13.

The question of double insurance does not generally arise in life insurance, as there is no fixed value to the life, and the person in each case is to pay a fixed sum without regard to other insurance. But where the insurable interest has an ascertainable value the question may arise, as where two policies are taken out in different offices, by a creditor, on the life of a debtor, and for the same debt. Then only the value of the interest can be recovered and the amount recovered on the first policy is to be deducted from the amount payable on the second; May, Ins. § 440. See INSURANCE.

DOUBLE PLEA. The alleging, for one single purpose, two or more distinct grounds of defence, when one of them would be as effectual in law as both or all. See DUPLICITY.

By the statute 4 Anne, c. 16, in England, and by similar statutes in most if not all of the states of the United States, any defendant in any action or suit, and any plaintiff in replevin in any court of record, may plead as many several matters as may be necessary for a defence with leave of court. This statute allows double pleading; but each plea must be single, as at common law; Lawes, Pl. 131; 1 Chit. Pl. 512; Andr. Steph. Pl. 320; and the statute does not extend to the subsequent pleadings; Com. Dig. Pleader (E 2); Story, Pl. § 72; Gould, Pl. c. 8; Doctrina Plac. 222. And in criminal cases a defendant cannot plead a special plea in addition to the general issue; 7 Cox, Cr. Cas. 85.

DOUBLE POSSIBILITY. A possibility upon a possibility. 2 Bla. Com. 170. See CONTINGENT REMAINDER.

DOUBLE RENT. In English Law. Rent payable by a tenant who continues in possession after the time for which he has given notice to quit, until the time of his quitting possession. Stat. 11 Geo. II. c. 19; Fawcett, L. & T. 304; Moz. & W. Dict. The provisions of these statutes have been re-enacted in New York, and some other states, though they are not generally adopted in this country.

DOUBLE USE. A term used in patent law to indicate that a later device is merely a new application of an older device, not involving the exercise of the inventive faculty.

In construing letters patent for new applications of old devices, if the new use be so nearly analogous to the former one that it would occur to a person of ordinary mechanical skill, it is only a case of double use; but if the relations between them are remote, and especially if the use of the old device produce a new result, it may involve an exercise of the inventive faculty—much depending upon the nature of the changes required to adapt the device to its new use; 155 U. S. 597. See PATENT.

DOUBLE VOUCHER. A voucher which occurs when the person first vouched to warranty comes in and vouches over a third person. See a precedent, 2 Bla. Com. App. V. p. xvii.; VOUCHER.

The necessity for double voucher arises when the tenant in tail is not the tenant in the writ, but is tenant by warranty; that is, where he is vouched, and comes in and confesses the warranty. Generally speaking, to accomplish this result a previous conveyance is necessary, by the tenant in tail, to a third person, in order to make such third person tenant to a writ of entry. Pres. Conv. 125, 126.

DOUBLE WASTE. When a tenant bound to repair suffers a house to be wasted, and then unlawfully fells timber to repair it, he is said to commit double waste. Co. Litt. 53. See WASTE.

DOUBT. The uncertainty which exists in relation to a fact, a proposition, or other thing; an equipoise of the mind arising from an equality of contrary reasons. Ayliffe, Pand. 121.

The most embarrassing position of a judge is that of being in doubt; and it is frequently the lot of the wisest and most enlightened to be in this condition: those who have little or no experience usually find no difficulty in deciding the most problematical questions.

Some rules, not always infallible, have been adopted in doubtful cases, in order to arrive at the truth. 1. In civil cases, the doubt ought to operate against him who, having it in his power to prove facts to remove the doubt, has neglected to do so. In cases of fraud, when there is a doubt, the presumption of innocence ought usually to remove it. 2. In criminal cases, whenever a reasonable doubt exists as to the guilt of the accused, that doubt ought to operate in his favor. In such cases, particularly when the liberty, honor, or life of an individual is at stake, the evidence to convict ought to be clear and devoid of all reasonable doubt.

The term reasonable doubt is often used, but not easily defined. "It is not mere possible doubt; because everything relating to human affairs and depending on moral evidence is open to some possible or imaginary doubt. It is that state of the case which, after the entire comparison and consideration of all the evidence, leaves the minds of jurors in such a condition that they cannot say they feel an abiding conviction, to a moral certainty, of the truth of the charge. The burden of proof is upon the prosecutor. All the presumptions of law independent of evidence are in favor of innocence; and every person is presumed to be innocent until he is proved guilty. If upon such proof there is reasonable doubt remaining, the accused is entitled to the benefit of it by an acquittal. For it is not sufficient to establish a probability, though a strong one arising from the doctrine of chances, that the fact charged is more likely to be true than the contrary; but the evidence must establish the truth of the fact to a reasonable and moral certainty,—a certainty that convinces and directs the understanding and satisfies the reason and judgment of those who are bound to act conscientiously upon it. This is proof beyond reasonable doubt; because if the law, which mostly depends upon considerations of a moral nature, should go further than this and require absolute certainty, it would exclude circumstantial evidence altogether." Per Shaw, C. J., in 5 Cush. 320; 1 Gray 534; 2 Dev. & B. L. 311; 1 Houst. Cr. Rep. 316. In approving the opinion of Shaw, C. J., the court, in 59 Cal. 385, says: "There can be no 'reasonable doubt' of a fact after it has been clearly established by satisfactory proof." No man should be deprived of life under the form of law unless the jury can say upon their conscience that the evidence is sufficient to show beyond a reasonable doubt the existence of every fact necessary to constitute the crime charged; 160 U. S. 469. It must be an actual, substantial doubt, arising from the evidence or want of evidence in the case; 32 Neb. 782.

If the evidence produced in a criminal action be of such a convincing character that the jurors would unhesitatingly be governed by it in the weighty and important matters of life, they may be said to have no reasonable doubt respecting the guilt or innocence of the accused, notwithstanding the uncertainty which attends all human evidence. Therefore, a charge to the jury that if after an impartial comparison and consideration of all the evidence, they can truthfully say that they have an abiding conviction of the defendant's guilt, such as they would be willing to act upon in the more weighty and important matters relating to their own affairs, they have no reasonable doubt, is not erroneous; 120 U. S. 431.

Proof 'beyond a reasonable doubt' is not beyond all possible or imaginary doubt, but such proof as precludes every reasonable hypothesis except that which it tends to support. It is proof 'to a moral certainty,' as distinguished from an absolute certainty. As applied to a judicial trial for crime, the two phrases are synonymous and equivalent; and each signifies such proof as satisfies the judgment and consciences of the jury, as reasonable men, and applying their reason to the evidence before them, that the crime charged has been committed by the defendant, and so satisfies them as to leave no other reasonable conclusion possible; 118 Mass. 24.

See Best, Pres. § 195; Will, Cir. Ev. 325; 33 How. St. Tr. 506; Burn. Cr. Law of Scotl. 522; 1 Greenl. Ev. § 1; D'Aguesseau, Œuvres, xiii. 242; 103 U. S. 812; 26 N. J. L. 615; 76 Me. 125; 100 N. DOVE. A bird; a species of pigeon.

Doves are considered as feræ naturæ, and not the subject of larceny unless they are in the owner's custody; as, for example, in a dove-house, or when in the nest before they can fly; 9 Pick. 15.

It has been held that larceny may be committed of pigeons which, though they have access to the open air, are tame and unreclaimed and return to their house or box; 2 Den. Cr. Cas. 361. See 2 id. 362, note; 4 C. & P. 131.

DOWAGER. A widow endowed; one who has a jointure.

In England, this is a title or addition given to the widow of a prince, duke, earl, or other nobleman, to distinguish her from the wife of the heir, who has the right to bear the title; 1 Bla. Com. 224.

DOWER (from Fr. douer, to endow). The provision which the law makes for a widow out of the lands or tenements of her husband, for her support and the nurture of her children. Co. Litt. 30 a; 2 Bla. Com. 130; 4 Kent 35; Washb. R. P. 146.

There were five species of dower in England:—

Dower by custom, where a widow became entitled to a specified portion of her husband's lands in consequence of some local or particular custom.

Dower ad ostium ecclesiæ, where a man of full age, on coming to the church-door to be married, endowed his wife of a certain portion of his lands.

Dower ex assensu patris, which differed from dower ad ostium ecclesiæ only in being made out of the lands of the husband's father and with his consent.

Dower de la plus belle, where the widow, on suing the guardian in chivalry for dower, was required by him to endow herself of the fairest portion of any lands she might hold as guardian in socage, and thus release from dower the lands of her husband held in chivalry. This was abolished along with the military tenures, of which it was a consequence; 2 Bla. Com. 132, n.

Dower by common law, where the widow was entitled during her life to a third part of all the lands and tenements of which her husband was seised in law or in fact of an inheritable estate, at any time during the coverture, and which any issue she might have had might by possibility have inherited.

Since the passage of the Dower Act in England, 3 & 4 Will. IV. c. 105, all these species of dower, except that by custom and by the common law, have ceased to exist; 2 Sharsw. Bla. Com. 135, n. Dower in the United States, although regulated by statutes differing from each other in many respects, conforms substantially to that at the common law; 1 Washb. R. P. 149; see Schoul. Hus. & W. 455.

Where a statute provided that no estate in dower be allotted to the wife on the death of her husband, it took away a wife's inchoate right of dower in lands previously alienated by her husband without joining her in the deed; 47 Fed. Rep. 854; the inchoate right of the wife is not such a vested right or interest as cannot be taken away by legislative action; 4 C. C. A. 290.

Of what estates the wife is dowable. Her right to dower is always determined by the laws of the place where the property is situated; 1 Miss. 281; 4 Ia. 381; 3 Strobb. 562.

She is entitled to one-third of all lands, tenements, or hereditaments, corporeal and incorporeal, of which her husband may have been seized during the coverture, in fee or in tail; 2 Bla. Com. 131; 23 Vt. 611.

She was not dowable of a term for years, however long; Park, Dow. 47; 1 Md. Ch. Dec. 36.

The inheritance must be an entire one, and one of which the husband may have corporeal seisin or the right of immediate corporeal seisin; Plowd. 506; 1 Sm. & M. 107.

Dower does not attach in an estate held in joint tenancy; but the widow of the survivor has dower; Co. Litt. § 45; 15 Pet. 21. But where the principle of survivorship is abolished, this disability does not exist; 9 Dana 185; 2 Strobb. 67.

An estate in common is subject to dower; 3 Paige, Ch. 653; 3 Edw. Ch. 500; 6 Gray 314; 87 Tenn. 17; 88 Va. 529; 1 Md. 172. But the dower in land owned by the husband in common with others is divested by partition thereof in a suit to which the husband is a party, though the wife is not joined; 36 S. C. 404. See 2 Can. L. T. 15.

In the case of an exchange of lands, the widow may claim dower in either, but not in both; Co. Litt. 31 b; if the interests are unequal, then in both; 7 Barb. 633; 32 Me. 412; 1 N. H. 65.

She is entitled to dower in mines belonging to her husband, if opened by him in his lifetime on his own or another's land; 1 Taunt. 402; 1 Cow. 460; 73 Ill. 405; 45 Me. 493. See 92 Mich. 186, where she was held to be entitled whether the mines were opened before or after her husband's death; 49 Fed. Rep. 549; 3 C. C. A. 312. See also 16 L. R. A. 247.

She had right of dower in various species of incorporeal hereditaments: as, rights of fishing, and rents; Co. Litt. 32 a; 2 Bla. Com. 132; 1 Bland, Ch. 227; but the rents should be estates of inheritance; 2 Cruise, Dig. 291.

In most of the states she is dowable of wild lands; 2 Dougl. Mich. 141; 10 Ga. 321; 2 Rob. Va. 507; 3 Dana 121; 8 Ohio 418; 24 Ark. 124; 17 N. J. Eq. 32; 68 N. C. 236; contra, 15 Mass. 157; 14 Me. 409; 2 N. H. 56.

She has no right of dower in a pre-emption claim; 16 Mo. 478; 2 Ill. 314.

At law there was nothing to prevent her from having dower in lands which her husband held as trustee. But, as she would take it subject to the trust, courts of equity were in the habit of restraining her from claiming her dower in lands which she would be compelled to hold entirely to another's use, till it was finally established, and it remains the same both in England and the United States, that she is not entitled to dower in anything her husband may hold as a mere trustee; 2 Ohio St. 415; 5 B. Monr. 152; Park, Dow. 105.

At common law she was not dowable of the estate of a cestui que trust; 2 Sch. & L. 387; 4 Kent 43; Hempst. 251. See 139 Pa. 461. But by the Dower Act this restriction was removed in England; 3 & 4 Will. IV. c. 105; 1 Spence, Eq. Jur. 501. The common-law rule that a widow could only have dower in the legal estates of the husband has been either expressly or impliedly changed by statute in the majority of states, and she now has a right of dower in his equitable estates as well, but only in those of which he died seised; 17 Fed. Rep. 333; 78 Ill. 604; and if the husband has aliened an equitable estate, although his wife may not have consented, the dower is defeated; 63 Ill. 341; 3 Gill 304. In Delaware a widow is not dowerable out of an equitable estate of her deceased husband, except in intestate lands; 3 Del. Ch. 407, but in the United States the law upon this subject is not uniform; 12 Pet. 201; 19 Me. 141; 2 S. & R. 554; 7 Ala. 447; 1 Hen. & M. 92. In some, dower in equitable estates is given by statutes; while in others the severe common-law rule has not been strictly followed by the courts; 1 Md. Ch. Dec. 452; 5 Paige, Ch. 318; 6 Dana 471; 8 Humphr. 537; 1 Jones, N. C. 430; 3 Gill 304.

A mortgagee's wife, although her husband has the technical seisin, had no dowerable interest till the estate becomes irredeemable; 4 Dane, Abr. 671; 13 Ark. 44; 4 Kent 42; 49 Me. 53; 2 Ves. Jr. 631; 33 Gratt. 83.

A widow was not dowerable of an equity of redemption under the common law; 17 Fed. Rep. 331; L. R. 6 Ch. D. 218; 105 Ill. 342; 53 Md. 607; 45 Miss. 243; 42 N. H. 296; 13 R. I. 105; 6 Mack. 536; nor did the English courts admit the doctrine until the statute of 1833; Ld. Ch. Redesdale in 2 S. & L. 388; but, as was said by Chancellor Bates in 3 Del. Ch. 407, the American courts, being free to carry the equitable view of mortgaged estates to its logical results, have uniformly allowed dower in an equity of redemption; Jones, Mort. 666; 15 Pet. 38; 34 Me. 50; 4 Gray 46; 5 Johns. Ch. 452; 2 Blackf. 262; 1 Rand. 344; 1 Conn. 559; 29 N. H. 564; 1 Stockt. Ch. 361; but after the surplus proceeds of sale have been applied by the sheriff to a judgment against the husband, it is too late to assert the widow's claim to equitable dower; 4 Del. Ch. 599. See on this subject 11 Can. L. T. 281.

In reference to her husband's contracts for the purchase of lands, the rule seems to be, in those states where dower is allowed in equitable estates, that her right attaches to her husband's interest in the contract, if at his death he was in a condition to enforce specific performance; 5 Paige, Ch. 318; 5 Blackf. 406; 1 Hen. & M. 92; 1 B. Monr. 93; 2 Ill. 314; 2 Ohio St. 512; 7 Gray 533; 19 Ill. 545; 1 Jones, N. C. 430. If his interest has been assigned before his death, or forfeited, or taken on execution, her dower-right is defeated; 29 Pa. 71; 6 Rich. Eq. 72; 4 J. J. Marsh. 451; 16 Ala. 522; 16 B. Monr. 114; 1 Hen. & M. 91.

She is entitled to dower in lands actually purchased by her husband and upon which the vendor retains a lien for the unpaid purchase-money, subject to that lien; 12 B. Monr. 261; 8 Blackf. 120; 2 Bland, Ch. 242; 1 Humphr. 408; see 51 Ill. 302; 40 Ala. 538; 44 Ga. 319; 119 Mass. 519; 53 Me. 138; or upon which her husband has given a mortgage to secure the purchase-money, subject to that mortgage; 10 Rich. Eq. 285. See 4 L. R. A. 606.

She is not entitled to dower in partnership lands purchased by partnership funds and for partnership purposes, until the partnership debts have been paid; 4 Metc. 537; 4 Miss. 372; 10 Leigh 406; 5 Fla. 350;

20 Mo. 174; 88 Va. 529; 28 Ark. 259; 65 Mo. 148; 30 N. J. Eq. 417. See 92 Ky. 190; 95 Mich. 426. She has been denied dower in land purchased by several for the purposes of sale and speculation; 3 Edw. Ch. 428; it has been treated as personalty so far as was necessary to settle the partnership affairs, the right of dower being subject to the debts of the firm; 115 Mo. 222; 71 Ia. 63; 12 Leigh 405.

Sometimes she is allowed dower out of money, the proceeds of real estate sold by order of court, or by the wrongful act of an agent or trustee; 14 Pick. 345; 11 Ala. N. S. 33; 3 Sandf. Ch. 434; 12 B. Monr. 173; 7 Humphr. 72.

Her claim for dower has been held not subject to mechanics' liens; 7 Metc. 157; 8 Ill. 511; 8 Blackf. 252; 1 B. Monr. 257.

The principle of equitable contribution applies equally to dower, as to other incumbrances; 3 Del. Ch. 260.

She is not entitled to dower in an estate pur autre vie; 5 Cow. 388; or in a vested remainder; 5 N. H. 240, 469; 2 Leigh 29; 5 Paige, Ch. 161; or in reversion of the husband, where he dies before the termination of the life estate; 139 Ill. 433.

In some states she has dower only in what the husband died seised of; 6 McLean 442; 1 Root 53; 2 N. C. 253; 4 Kent 41.

The wife's dower will be protected against the voluntary conveyance of the husband made pending a marriage engagement, under the same circumstances in which the husband is relieved against an antenuptial settlement by the wife; 3 Del. Ch. 99; s. c. 17 Am. Law Reg. N. S. 319. This case is considered by Washburn and Bishop as the leading case and approved by each of them; 3 Washb. R. P. 359; 2 Bish. M. W. § 343, note 2, quoting the greater portion of the opinion of Bates, Ch.

Requisites of. Three things are usually said to be requisite to the consummation of a title to dower, viz.: marriage, seisin of the husband, and his death; 4 Kent 36; 1 Washb. R. P. 169; 61 Ala. 481; 4 N. Y. 99.

The marriage must be a legal one; though, if voidable and not void, she will have her dower unless it is dissolved in his lifetime; 14 Miss. 308; Co. Litt. 33 a; 1 Cruise, Dig. 164; 9 Mo. 501; 28 Ark. 21.

The husband must have been seised in the premises of an estate of inheritance at some time during the coverture. It may not be an actual seisin: a seisin in law with the right of immediate corporeal seisin is sufficient; 7 Mass. 253; 39 Me. 25; 1 Paige, Ch. 635; 2 S. & R. 554; 1 Cruise, Dig. 166; 45 N. J. Eq. 27; 88 N. C. 312; 9 Ohio St. 371. Possession by a widow of the mansion house of her husband, and her unassigned right of dower, do not prevent the heir from being seised thereof so that his widow may acquire dower therein; 111 Mo. 273. It is not necessary that the seisin of the husband should be a rightful one. The widow of a disseisor may have dower against all who have not the rightful seisin; Park, Dow. 37; Scribn. Dow. 702; 4 Dane, Abr. 668. See 125 Mass. 122.

So, although the estate is a defeasible one, provided it is one of inheritance, she may claim her dower until it is defeated; Co. Litt. 241; 3 Halst. 241; 10 Co. 95.

The seisin is not required to remain in the husband any particular length of time. It is sufficient if he is seised but an instant to his own benefit and use; 11 Rich. Eq. 417; 37 Me. 508; 2 Bla. Com. 132; 48 How. Pr. 382; but a mere instantaneous seisin for some other purpose than proprietorship will not give the wife dower; 14 Me. 290; 4 Miss. 369; 1 Johns. Cas. 95; 27 Ala. N. S. 578; 15 Vt. 39; 2 G. & J. 318; 6 Metc. 475.

Where he purchases land and gives a mortgage at the same time to secure the purchase-money, such incumbrance takes precedence of his wife's dower; 15 Johns. 458; 12 S. & R. 18; 4 Mass. 566; 5 N. H. 479; 7 Halst. 52; 1 Bay 312; 37 Me. 11.

The death of the husband. 1 Cruise, Dig. 168. What was known as civil death in England did not give the wife right of dower; 2 Crabb, R. P. 130; 7 B. Monr. 51; 6 Johns. Ch. 129. Imprisonment for life is declared civil death in some of the states.

How dower may be prevented or defeated. At common law, alienage on the part of the husband or wife prevented dower from attaching; 2 Bla. Com. 131; 16 Wend. 617; 2 Mo. 32. This disability is partially done away with in England, 7 & 8 Vict. c. 66, and is almost wholly abolished in the United States. See ALIEN.

It is well established that the wife's dower is defeated whenever the seisin of her husband is defeated by a paramount title; Co. Litt. 240 b; 4 Kent 48.

The foreclosure of a mortgage given by the husband before marriage, or by the wife and husband after marriage, will defeat her right of dower; 15 Johns. 458; 12 S. & R. 18; 1 Ind. 527; 19 Miss. 164; 2 Rob. Va. 384; 8 Blackf. 174; 4 Harr. Del. 111; 140 Ill. 470; 51 N. J. Eq. 135. And in Pennsylvania, whether the wife joined or not. Like force would be given to a vendor's lien or mortgage for the purchase-money, or to a judgment lien outstanding at the time of marriage.

Her right to dower in the estate which she has joined with her husband in mortgaging is good against every one but the mortgagee; 3 Miss. 692; 18 Ohio St. 567; 14 Pick. 98; 29 N. H. 564; 37 Me. 509. The same is true in regard to an estate mortgaged by her husband before coverture; 14 Pick. 98. In neither case would the husband have the right to cut off her claim for dower by a release to the mortgagee, or an assignment of his equity of redemption; 5 Johns. Ch. 452, 482; 14 Pick. 98; 8 Humphr. 713; 1 Rand. 344; 34 Me. 50; 2 Halst. 392. As to a purchase and mortgage for the purchase-money before marriage, in which the husband releases the equity of redemption after marriage, see 6 Cow. 316.

An agreement on the part of the husband to convey before dower attaches, if enforced, will extinguish her claim; 2 Ind. 197; 3 Md. Ch. 359.

Dower will not be defeated by the determination of the estate by natural limitation; as, if the tenant in fee die without heirs, or the tenant in tail; 8 Co. 34; 4 Kent 49; 12 B. Monr. 73. Whether it will be defeated by a conditional limitation by way of executory devise or shifting use, is not yet fully settled; Co. Litt. 241 a, Butler's note 170; Sugd. Pow. 333; 3 B. & P. 652; 2 Atk. 47; 1 Leon. 167. But it seems that the weight of American authority is in favor of sustaining dower out of such estates; 9 Pa. 190; 4 Desaus. 617. See 1 Washb. R. P. 216.

Dower will be defeated by operation of a collateral limitation; as, in the case of an estate to a man and his heirs so long as a tree shall stand, and the tree dies; 3 Prest. Abstr. 373; 4 Kent 49.

In some states it will be defeated by a sale on execution for the debts of the husband; 5 Gill 94; 8 Pa. 120; 1 Humphr. 1; 11 Mo. 204; 3 Dev. 3; but see 73 Ia. 657. In Missouri it is defeated by a sale in partition; 22 Mo. 202. See 22 Wend. 498; 2 Edw. Ch. 577. See 25 Alb. L. J. 387.

It is defeated by a sale for the payment of taxes; 8 Ohio St. 430.

It is also defeated by exercise of the right of eminent domain during the life of the husband. Nor has the widow the right of compensation for such taking. The same is true of land dedicated by her husband to public use; 3 Ohio St. 24; 9 N. Y. 110.

How dower may be barred. A divorce from the bonds of matrimony was at common law a bar to dower; 2 Bla. Com. 130; 4 Barb. 192; 84 Ala. 368; 28 Atl. Rep. (N. J.) 719; but the woman's right to dower, or something equivalent to it, is reserved by statutes in most of the states, if she be the innocent party; 6 Duer, N. Y. 102. A judgment of divorce in another state, for cause other than adultery, which has the effect to deprive the wife of dower in the state where rendered, will not have such effect in New York; the United States constitution makes a judgment in another state conclusive as to the fact of divorce, but gives no extra-territorial effect on land of the husband; 133 N. Y. 540. See 15 L. R. A. 542.

By the common law neither adultery alone nor with elopement was a bar to dower; 2 Scrib. Dow. 531; but by the statute of Westminster 2d, a wife who eloped and lived in adultery forfeited her dower-right. This provision has been re-enacted in several of the states and recognized as common law in others; 9 Mo. 555; 2 Brock. 256; 3 N. H. 41; 13 Ired. 361; 4 Dane, Abr. 676; 1 Bailey 312; contra, 24 Wend. 193; 64 N. Y. 47; 2 Allen 45; 69 Me. 527; 6 R. I. 543. Dower is not barred even if the wife commit adultery, if she be abandoned by her husband and he be profligate and intemperate and an adulterer; 1 Houst. Del. 224; nor if she be deserted by her husband will her subsequent seduction and adultery operate as a bar; 62 Pa. 308; 126 id. 341; 6 U. C. C. P. 310; 27 Ind. 122. For the analysis of decisions and reference to state statutes on this subject, see 2 Scrib. Dow. 531.

In North Carolina, a widow who had been convicted as accessory before the fact to her husband's murder, and was imprisoned under sentence therefor, was held entitled to dower in his lands; 100 N. C. 240.

The widow of a convicted traitor could not recover dower; 2 Bla. Com. 130; but this principle is not recognized in this country; Wms. R. P. 103, n.

Nor does she in this country, as at common law, forfeit her dower by conveying in fee the estate assigned to her; 4 Kent 82; Wms. R. P. 121, 125, n.; 1 B. Monr. 88.

The most common mode formerly of barring dower was by jointure; Scrib. Dow. 339; 14 Gratt. 518; 8 Mo. 22; 14 Ohio St. 610; 77 Wis. 557. Marriage is a sufficient consideration to support an ante-nuptial contract for release of dower; 121 Pa. 302; 141 Ill. 22. Now it is usually done by joining with her husband in conveying the estate. Formerly this was done by levying a fine, or suffering a recovery; 4 Kent 51; 2 Bla. Com. 137; now it is by deed executed in concurrence with her husband and acknowledged in the form required by statute; Wms. R. P. 189; 114 Ill. 104; Mitch. R. P. 156; which is the mode prevailing in the United States. The husband must usually join in the act; 5 B. Monr. 352; 19 Pa. 361; 6 Cush. 196; 14 Me. 432.

Words of grant will be sufficient although no reference is made in the deed to dower eo nomine; 12 How. 256; 16 Ohio 236.

In most of the states her deed must be acknowledged, and that, too, in the form pointed out by statute; 6 Ohio St. 510; 2 Binn. 341; 1 Bail. 421; 1 Blackf. 379; which must appear in the certificate; 13 Barb. 50.

She should be of age at the time; 2 J. J. Marsh. 359; 6 Leigh 9; 1 Barb. 399; 8 Miss. 437; 10 Ohio St. 127.

She cannot release her dower by parol; see 5 T. B. Monr. 57; 3 Zab. 62. A parol sale of lands in which the husband delivers possession does not exclude dower; 3 Sneed 316. But it has been held that she may bar her claim for dower by her own acts operating by way of estoppel; 1 Rand. 344; 2 Ohio St. 511; 4 Paige, Ch. 94; 12 S. & R. 18; 1 Ind. 354; 5 Gill 94. See 22 Ala. n. s. 104; 1 Rich. Eq. 222; 112 Mo. 1.

A release of dower by a wife direct to her husband will not enable him by his sole deed to convey the land free of dower right, for, if the release is at all effectual, the husband becomes vested with a fee simple and the dower-right immediately reattaches by operation of law; 63 Hun 633; 22 Or. 303; but where the wife has power to release her dower by an attorney in fact, she may constitute her husband attorney for the purpose; 133 N. Y. 505.

A release of dower has been presumed after a long lapse of time; 4 N. H. 321; 3 Yeates 507.

At common law there was no limitation to the claim for dower; 4 Kent 70. As to the statutes in the different states, see id. note; 1 Washb. R. P. 217. Adverse possession for seven years with claim and color of title and payment of taxes will bar a claim of dower; 125 Ill. 647; 111 Mo. 275; but see 83 Ia. 481.

The right to dower does not depend on the existence of the family relation at the death of the husband and is not barred by desertion; 126 Pa. 341.

Upon the doctrine of dos de dote, see 1 Washb. R. P. 209.

In some states the wife may elect to take half of the husband's estate in lieu of dower under certain contingencies; 28 Mo. 293; or she may accept a devise in lieu of dower; 66 Hun 311; 146 Ill. 312; 37 S. C. 529; 56 Ark. 532.

It seems that a contract to marry on condition that the wife should receive no portion of the husband's lands may be valid; 9 Rich. Eq. 434.

As to how dower may be barred, see 32 Cent. Law J. 166.

How and by whom dower may be assigned. Her right to have dower set out to her accrues immediately upon the death of her husband; but until it is assigned she has no right to any specific part of the estate; 2 Bla. Com. 139. She was allowed by Magna Charta to occupy the principal mansion of her husband for forty days after his death, if it were on dowable lands. This right is variously recognized in the states; 2 Mo. 163; 16 Ala. n. s. 148; 7 T. B. Monr. 337; 5 Conn. 462. In Missouri and several other states, she may remain in possession of and enjoy the principal mansion-house and messuages thereto belonging until dower has been assigned; 5 T. B. Monr. 561; 4 Blackf. 331. This makes her tenant in common with the heir to the extent of her right of dower; and an assignment only works a severance of the tenancy; 4 Kent 62; 2 Mo. 163.

There were two modes of assigning dower; one by "common right," where the assignment was by legal process, the other "against common right," which rested upon the widow's assent and agreement.

Dower of "common right" must be assigned by metes and bounds, where this is possible, unless the parties agree to a different form; 2 Penning. 521; 1 Rolle, Abr. 683; Style 276; Perkins 407.

If assigned "against common right," it must be by indenture to which she is a party; Co. Litt. 34 b; 1 Pick. 189, 314.

Where assigned of common right, it must be unconditional and absolute; Co. Litt. 34 b, n. 217; 1 Rolle, Abr. 682; and for her life; 1 Bright, Husb. & W. 379.

Where it is assigned not by legal process, it must be by the tenant of the freehold; Co. Litt. 35 a. It may be done by an infant; 2 Bla. Com. 136; 1 Pick. 314; 2 Ind. 336; or by the guardian of the heir; 2 Bla. Com. 136; 37 Me. 509. Dower may be assigned in partition; 73 Ia. 657.

As between the widow and heir, she takes her dower according to the value of the property at the time of the assignment; 5 S. & R. 290; 4 Miss. 360; 15 Me. 371; 2 Harr. Del. 336; 13 Ill. 483; 9 Mo. 237.

As between the widow and the husband's alienee, she takes her dower according to the value at the time of the alienation; 6 Johns. Ch. 258; 4 Leigh 498. This was the ancient and well-established rule; 2 Johns. 484; 9 Mass. 218; 3 Mas. 347. But in this country the rule in respect to the alienee seems now to be that if the land had been enhanced in value by his labor and improvements, the widow shall not share in these; Scrib. Dow. 612; 5 S. & R. 289; 9 Mass. 218; 3 Mas. 347; 4 Leigh 498; 2 Blackf. 223; 10 Ohio St. 498; 9 Ala. N. S. 901; 10 Md. 746; 13 Ill. 483; 89 id. 40; 85 Ky. 539; 96 Mo. 226; 7 Mackey 268; 52 Ia. 563; 69 Me. 200; 42 Miss. 747; if it has been enhanced by extraneous circumstances, such as the rise and improvement of property in the neighborhood, she is to have the full benefit of this; 5 Blackf. 406; 3 Mas. 375; 6 McLean 422; 5 Call 433; 1 Md. Ch. Dec. 453; Wms. R. P. 191, n.

There seems to be no remedy for her now in either country where the land has deteriorated in value by the waste and mismanagement of the alienee or by extraneous circumstances; 10 Mo. 746; 5 S. & R. 290; 3 Mas. 368; 5 Blackf. 406; 1 Md. Ch. Dec. 452; see 11 R. I. 378; but she must be content to take her dower in the property as it was at the time of her husband's death, when her right first became consummate; 1 Washb. R. P. 239. See 18 L. R. A. 425. Where the widow dies without asserting her claim, neither her personal representatives, nor those of her assignee of such dower right, can maintain an action to have dower admeasured or for a gross sum in lieu thereof; 59 Hun 538; 49 N. J. Eq. 66.

Dower may also be recovered in equity, the jurisdiction of which, as Chancellor Kent says, "has been thoroughly examined, clearly asserted, and definitively established;" 4 Kent 71; and nearly half a century later this language is repeated as correctly expressing the result of the authorities; Bisph. Eq. § 495. The jurisdiction was asserted in the United States at an early period; 1 Leigh 449; 5 Monr. 284; 4 J. J. Marsh. 64; 5 Johns. Ch. 482; 4 Paige 98; and although in New Jersey in the time of Kent the equitable jurisdiction was denied; 4 Kent 72; 2 Halst. 392; it was afterwards asserted and sustained; 1 Gr. Ch. 349. The jurisdiction is concurrent with that of courts of law, which must settle the legal title when that is in controversy, "but if that be admitted or settled, full and effectual relief can be granted to the widow in equity both as to the assignment of dower and the damages;" 4 Kent 71; and in many respects the remedy in equity possesses great advantages over that at law; Bisph. Eq. § 496. As to the remedies afforded both by law and equity for the enforcement of dower, see 1 Washb. R. P. 226; 4 W. R. 459.

Nature of the estate in dower. Until the death of her husband, the wife's right of dower is not an interest in real estate of which value can be predicated; 9 N. Y. 110. And although on the death of her husband this right becomes consummate, it remains a chose in action until assignment; 4 Kent 61; 1 Barb. 500; 32 Me. 424; 5 J. J. Marsh. 12; 10 Mo. 746; 26 Md. 289; 12 R. I. 357.

During coverture a wife has such an interest in her husband's lands which have been conveyed by him without her joining in the deed, as will make a release by her a valuable consideration; 4 Ind. App. 23. See 37 S. C. 285.

Until assignment, she has no estate which she can convey or which can be taken on execution for her debts; 2 Keen 527; 4 Paige, Ch. 448; 9 Miss. 489; 1 Dev. & B. 437; 14 Mass. 378; 13 Ill. 483; 48 Ia. 611; 63 N. C. 271; contra, 10 Ala. N. S. 900.

But where she does sell or assign this right of action, equity will protect the rights of the assignee and sustain an action in the widow's name for his benefit; 4 Rich. 516; 10 Ala. N. S. 900; 7 Ired. Eq. 152; 109 N. C. 674. She may mortgage her undivided dower interest, which is valid in equity; 58 N. W. Rep. (Ia.) 897.

She can release her claim to one who is in possession of the lands, or to whom she stands in privity of estate; 11 Ill. 384; 17 Johns. 167; 32 Me. 424; 32 Ala. N. S. 404; 112 Mo. 1; 8 L. R. Q. B. D. 31; 12 R. I. 537.

But as soon as the premises have been set out and assigned to her, and she has entered upon them, the freehold vests in her by virtue of her husband's seisin; Co. Litt. 239 a; 4 Mass. 384; 6 N. Y. 394; 4 Dev. & B. 442. Her estate is a continuation of her husband's by appointment of the law; 1 Pick. 189; 4 Me. 67; 99 N. C. 290. As to the nature of the estate, see 6 Cent. L. J. 63, 143, 163. As to dower generally, see Scribner, Dower; Dembitz, Land Titles; Tudor; Washburn; Cruise; Tiedman, Real Property; DIVORCE; ELECTION OF RIGHTS.

DOWRESS. A woman entitled to dower. See DOWER.

DOWRY. Formerly applied to mean that which a woman brings to her husband in marriage: this is now called a portion. This word is sometimes confounded with dower. See Co. Litt. 31; La. Civ. Code; Dig. 23. 3. 76; Code 5. 12. 20; 6 Rob. (La.) 111; 10 id. 74; 6 La. Ann. 786; 22 Mo. 254.

DRAFT. An order for the payment of money, drawn by one person on another. 1 Story 30. It is said to be a nomen generalissimum, and to include all such orders; ibid., per Story, J. It is frequently used in corporations where one agent draws on another; in such case it may be treated either as an accepted bill or a promissory note; 1 Dan. Neg. Inst. 350; Tiedman, Com. Pap. § 128. Drafts come within a statutory provision respecting "bills and notes for the direct payment of money;" 50 Mo. 491. They are frequently given for mere convenience in keeping accounts, and providing concurrent vouchers, and it is not necessary to present such a draft to the drawee or to give notice of non-payment before suing the corporation; 1 Dan. Neg. Inst. 350; 10 Cal. 369; 40 Ind. 361; 28 Barb. 391; 1 Cush. 256. A draft by directors of an assurance company on its cashier was said to contain all that is essential to constitute a promissory note; 9 C. B. 574. Drafts are frequently used between municipal officers, and are not usually negotiable instruments; 1 Dan. Neg. Inst. 352. But it has been held that municipal warrants or orders for the payment of debts, if authorized and drawn in negotiable language, may be sued on by the transferee; id. 353; 4 Hill, N. Y. 265. They must be presented for payment before suit; 26 Vt. 346; 19 Me. 193; contra, 2 Greene (Ia.) 469.

Draft, in a commercial sense, is an allowance to the merchant where the duty is ascertained by weight, to insure good weight to him; it is a small allowance in weighable goods, made by the king to the importer; it is to compensate for any loss that may occur from the handling of the scales, in the weighing, so that, when weighed the second time, the article will hold out good weight. 5 Blatchf. 192.

Also the rough copy of a legal document before engrossing.

DRAGOMAN. An interpreter employed in the east, and particularly at the Turkish court.

DRAIN. To conduct water from one place to another, for the purpose of drying the former.

The right of draining water through another man's land. This is an easement or servitude acquired by grant or prescription. See 3 Kent 436; 7 M. & G. 354.

In 5 Gray 63, it was said that the word drain has no technical or exact meaning, and in 53 Cal. 639, Myrick, J., quotes definitions from Webster's Dictionary thus: "1. To draw off by degrees; to cause to flow gradually out or off; hence, to cause the exhaustion of. 2. To exhaust off liquid contents by draining them off; to make gradually dry or empty, to deprive of moisture; hence, to exhaust. 3. To cause to pass through some porous mass or substance for the purpose of clarifying; to filter. And Drainage (Engin.), the system of drains and their operation, by which water is removed from towns, railway beds, and other works." Then he adds: "The definition of the word 'drain' given in Worcester's Dictionary is somewhat different from Webster's, in that the idea expressed in the third definition as above is entirely omitted; thus showing that lexicographers differ." In the same case, McKee, J., said: "The storage of debris and the promotion of the drainage of a district of country are things essentially different. The one has no necessary connection with the other. To drain land is to rid it of its superfluous moisture. This is generally done by deepening, straightening, or embanking the natural water-courses which run through it, and by supplementing them when necessary by artificial ditches and canals; but it is not within the art of the drainer to promote drainage by building reservoirs for the storage of debris from 'mining and other operations,' unless the word is to be wrenched from its geological or ordinary signification and meaning, and changed so as to mean water, at any mining or other locality where water may have accumulated." See WATER-COURSE.

DRAM. A liquid containing alcohol; something that can intoxicate. 32 Tex. 228. See 101 Ill. 134.

DRAW. To drag (on a hurdle) to the place of execution. Anciently no hurdle was allowed, but the criminal was actually dragged along the road to the place of execution. A part of the ancient punishment of traitors was the being thus drawn. 4 Bla. Com. 92, 377.

DRAWBACK. An allowance made by the government to merchants on the re-exportation of certain imported goods liable to duties, which in some cases consists of the whole, in others of a part, of the duties which had been paid upon the importation. Goods can thus be sold in a foreign market at their natural cost in the home market. For the various acts of congress which regulate drawbacks, see U. S. Rev. Stat. tit. 34, c. 9.

DRAWEE. A person to whom a bill of exchange is addressed, and who is requested to pay the amount of money therein mentioned. See BILL OF EXCHANGE.

DRAWER. The party who makes a bill of exchange.

DRAWING. Every person who applies for a patent for an invention is required to furnish a drawing or drawings illustrative of that invention: provided from the nature of the case the invention can be so illustrated. Drawings are also required on application for a patent for a design. See PATENT.

DRAWLATCHES. Thieves; robbers. Cowel.

DRAYAGE. In a case arising under a statute providing that certain tolls should be charged on coal landed on wharves and thence shipped or "warehoused without drayage," it appeared that the coal, after being taken out of the vessel and put on the wharf, was taken away on tram-cars, of which the railway was supported by pillars resting on the wharf, and by this process was put in the warehouse without any actual hauling on drays. The court held that this amounted to drayage and said: "The difference between the two rates was evidently intended to cover the wear and tear of wharves by the passing of loaded means of conveyance. It makes no difference, as far as the question before us is concerned, whether the conveyance was by wagons, drays, or cars; or whether on a tramway resting on pillars ten feet high, on timbers six inches above the wharf, or on rails resting immediately on the wharf;" 54 Cal. 241.

DREDGE. Formerly applied to a net or drag for taking oysters; now a machine for cleansing canals and rivers. To dredge is to gather or take with a dredge, to remove sand, mud, and filth from the beds of rivers, harbors, and canals, with a dredging machine. 15 Can. L. T. 268.

DREIT DREIT. Droit droit. Double right. A union of the right of possession and the right of property. 2 Bla. Com. 199.

DRIFTWAY. A road or way over which cattle are driven. 1 Taunt. 279; Selw. N. P. 1037; Woolr. Ways 1. The term is in use in Rhode Island. 2 Hilliard, Abr. Prop. 33.

DRINK. In the case of spirits a "drink" was held to be not more than a quart. 67 Ill. 482.

DRIP. The right of drip is an easement by which the water which falls on one house is allowed to fall upon the land of another.

Unless the owner has acquired the right by grant or prescription, he has no right so to construct his house as to let the water drip over his neighbor's land; 1 Rolle, Abr. 107. See 3 Kent 436; Dig. 43. 23. 4. 6; 11 Ad. & E. 40.

DRIVER. One employed in conducting a coach, carriage, wagon, or other vehicle with horses, mules, or other animals.

Frequent accidents occur in consequence of the neglect or want of skill of drivers of public stage coaches, for which the employers are responsible.

The law requires that a driver should possess reasonable skill and be of good habits for the journey; if, therefore, he is not acquainted with the road he undertakes to drive; 3 Bing. 314, 321; drives with reins so loose that he cannot govern his horse; 2 Esp. 533; does not give notice of any serious danger on the road; 1 Campb. 67; takes the wrong side of the road; 4 Esp. 273; incautiously comes in collision with another carriage; 1 Stark. 423; 1 Campb. 167; or does not exercise a sound and reasonable discretion in travelling on the road to avoid dangers and difficulties, and any accident happens by which any passenger is injured, both the driver and his employers will be responsible; 11 Mass. 57; 6 Term 659; 1 East 106; 4 B. & Ald. 590; 2 McLean 157.

It has been held that the conductor of a street railway is not a driver; 47 N. Y. 124; and one who drove a wagon loaded with calves and drawn by horses was held not to be "driving or conducting" cattle; L. R. 1 Q. B. 259. The New York Court of Appeals refuses to say "whether one who drives a horse to harness comes under this statute, which does not name a driver but does name a rider." See COMMON CARRIERS OF PASSENGERS.

DROF-LAND (Drift-land). A yearly payment made by some to their landlords for driving their cattle through the manor to fairs and markets. Cowel.

DROIT (Fr.). In French Law. Law. The whole body of law, written and unwritten.

A right. No law exists without a duty. Toullier, n. 96; Pothier, Droit.

In English Law. Right. Co. Litt. 158.

A person was said to have droit droit, plurimum juris, and plurimum possessionis, when he had the freehold, the fee, and the property in him. Crabb, Hist. Eng. Law 406.

DROIT D'ACCESSION. In French Law. That property which is acquired by making a new species out of the material of another. Modus acquirandi quo quis ex aliena materia suo nomine novam speciem faciens bona fide ejus speciei dominium consequitur. It is a rule of the civil law that if the thing can be reduced to the former matter it belongs to the owner of the matter, e. g. a statue made of gold; but if it cannot so be reduced it belongs to the person who made it, e. g. a statue made of marble. This subject is treated of in the Code Civil de Napoléon, art. 565, 577; Merlin, Répert. Accession; Malleville's Discussion, art. 565. See ACCESSION.

DROITS OF ADMIRALTY. Rights claimed by the government over the property of an enemy. In England, it has been usual in maritime wars for the government to seize and condemn, as droits of admiralty, the property of an enemy found in her ports at the breaking out of hostilities. 1 C. Rob. 196; 13 Ves. 71; 1 Edw. 60; 3 Bos. & P. 191. The power to exercise such a right has not been delegated to, nor has it ever been claimed by, the United States government; Benedict, Adm.; § 33; 6 Wheat. 264; 8 Cra. 110.

DROIT D'AUBAINE. A rule by which all the property of a deceased foreigner, whether movable or immovable, was confiscated to the use of the state, to the exclusion of his heirs, whether claiming ab intestato or under a will of the deceased. Finally abolished in 1819. Boyd's Wheat. Int. Laws § 82.

The word aubaine signifies hospes loci, peregrinus advena, a stranger. It is derived, according to some, from alibi, elsewhere, natus, born, from which the word albinus is said to be formed. Others, as Cujas, derive the word directly from advena, by which word aubains or strangers are designated in the capitularies of Charlemagne. See Du Cange; Trévoux, Dict.

DROITS CIVILS. In French Law.

Private rights, the exercise of which is independent of the status (qualité) of citizen. Foreigners enjoy them, and the extent of that enjoyment is determined by the principle of reciprocity. Conversely, foreigners, although not resident in France, may be sued on contracts made by them in France, and (unless possessed of sufficient real property in France) are obliged to give security; 12 C. B. 801; Brown, Law Dict.

DROIT-CLOSE. The name of an ancient writ directed to the lord of ancient demesne, and which lies for those tenants in ancient demesne who hold their lands and tenements by charter in fee-simple, in fee-tail, for life, or in dower. Fitzh. N. B. 23.

DROITURAL. What belongs of right; relating to right: as, real actions are either droitural or possessory,—droitural when the plaintiff seeks to recover the property. Finch, Law 257. See WRIT OF RIGHT.

DROPP LETTER. A letter addressed for delivery and mailed in the same district in which it is posted.

DROVE-ROAD. A road for driving cattle. A right of way for carriages does not involve necessarily a right to drive cattle, or an easement of drove-road.

DRUGGIST. One who deals in medicinal substances, vegetable, animal, or mineral, uncompounded. 28 La. Ann. 765. In a Kentucky case on an indictment for selling liquor without license, the defendant sold dry goods on one side of his shop and drugs on the other. As a merchant he needed a license, but as a druggist he could sell in any quantity less than a quart without. The charge of the court was that if he was an unlicensed merchant and sold less than a quart he was guilty, unless he was "a druggist in good faith, and his business was compounding and selling drugs." This was reversed for error as confining the business of a retail druggist or apothecary to one who actually compounds his medicines. For the definition of apothecary under United States statutes, see APOTHECARY.

In America the term druggist is used synonymously with apothecary, although, strictly speaking, a druggist is one who deals in medicinal substances, vegetable, animal, or mineral, before being compounded, while composition and combination are really the business of the apothecary. The term is here used in its double sense, and throughout this article is to be read as if druggist or apothecary. In England an apothecary is a sub-physician, or privileged practitioner. He is the ordinary medical man, or family medical attendant, in that country. Under the revived Pharmacy Acts of 32 and 33 Vict. c. 117, any one selling or compounding poisons, or unlawfully using the name of chemist or druggist, or compounding medicines otherwise than according to the formulæ of the British Pharmacopœia, is liable to a penalty of £5; Oke's Mag. Syn. 561.

Druggists are subject to the general rule of law that persons who hold themselves out to the world as possessing skill and qualification for a particular trade or profession are bound to reasonable skill and diligence in the performance of their duties. Accordingly the law implies an undertaking on the part of apothecaries and surgeons that they shall use a reasonable degree of care and skill in the treatment of their patients; Chit. Contr. 553; 66 Ia. 708; 34 La. Ann. 913; 43 Hun 265. This rule is probably more strict in the United States than in England; Webb's Poll. Torts 26, note. One who practises as a druggist, whether under a license or not, holds himself out as competent to do this, but not to prescribe as a physician; and for any lack of capacity or for negligence, he is answerable in damages to the person injured, the same principles of law applying to him as to a medical practitioner; Bish. Non-Contr. L. § 716.

The utmost care is required of those who prepare medicines or sell drugs, as the least carelessness may prove injurious to health or fatal in its results. Hence druggists are held responsible for injuries resulting from a want of usual care and skill. The highest degree of skill is not to be expected nor can it reasonably be required of all; 39 Me. 156.

Perhaps a higher degree of skill than is the usual rule was required in 13 B. Monr. 219; in that case it was held that any mistake made by the druggist, if the result of ignorance or carelessness, renders him liable to the injured party; 7 N. Y. 397. Where one, whether an apothecary or not, negligently gave a customer poison and the customer swallowed it and was injured, he who negligently gave the poison was guilty of a tort, and liable for the injury to the customer unless the latter was also guilty of negligence which contributed to the injury; 61 Ia. 64. If a druggist negligently sells a deadly poison as a harmless medicine to A, who administers it to B and B takes it as a medicine and dies in a few hours by reason thereof, a right of action against the druggist survives to B's administrator; 106 Mass. 143. The sale of an article in itself harmless, which becomes dangerous only by being used in combination with some other article, without any knowledge on the part of the vendor that it was to be used in such combination, does not render him liable to an action by one who purchased the article from the original vendee and is injured while using it in a dangerous combination, although by mistake the article sold was different from that which was intended to be sold; 11 Allen 514.

A druggist who sells to one person for the use of another a hair wash made by himself and represented not to be injurious, is liable to the person for whom it was purchased when used as directed, for injuries arising from such use, the intended use by the third person being known to the vendor; L. R. 5 Ex. 1. The maker of a proprietary medicine recommended for the cure of a certain disease, the bottle having on it directions for use, who sells the medicine, so put up, to a druggist, is liable to one who buys it from the druggist and is injured by its use according to the directions on the bottle; 83 Ga. 457.

Where a druggist selling a poisonous medicine, fully and clearly warned the person of its nature and gave him accurate directions as to the quantity which he could safely take, and the person was injured or killed by taking an overdose in disregard of the directions, the druggist is not liable for negligence simply because he failed to put a label marked "Poison" on the package as directed by statute. The customer disregarding the warning and direction of the vendor was guilty of negligence; 92 N. Y. 490.

A druggist who delivers one medicine when another is asked for is responsible for the consequences, on the ground of negligence only. If the error occurred without fault on the part of himself or his servant, the case is like one of inscrutable accident, and the druggist is not liable though injurious consequences follow.

An unlicensed druggist who conducts a drug store cannot escape the penalty of the law for the unlawful sale of intoxicating liquors by showing that the sales were made for medicinal purposes by his clerk, who was a licensed pharmacist; 67 Ia. 641. A druggist is not liable if he compounds carefully another's prescription; 61 Ga. 505. But if he sell one medicine for another and an injury result therefrom, it is no defence for him to show that the case was negligently treated; 47 Mich. 576. An apothecary, if guilty of criminal negligence, and fatal results follow, may be convicted of manslaughter; 1 Lew. Cr. Cas. 169.

DRUGS. Substances used in the composition of medicines or in dyeing and in chemical operations. Webst. Dict.

"Drugs and Medicines," when used in insurance policies, include saltpetre; 79 N. C. 279; s.c. 28 Am. Rep. 322. It is a question of fact whether benzine is a drug; 53 Vt. 418; s.c. 38 Am. Rep. 687.

Where a druggist was charged with selling peppermint lozenges on Sunday, it appeared that the statute permitted the selling of "drugs and medicines" on that day. They were held prima facie within the statute; 33 U. C. Q. B. 543. So a mixture of rosewater and prussic acid to be used as a lotion is within the same terms; L. R. 4 Q. B. 296.

DRUMMER. A travelling salesman. One who solicits custom; 34 Ark. 553; s.c. 36 Am. Rep. 84. "Commercial agents who are travelling for wholesale merchants and supplying the retail trade with goods, or rather, taking orders for goods to be shipped to the retail merchant;" 4 Lea 93.

DRUNKENNESS. In Medical Jurisprudence. The condition of a man whose mind is affected by the immediate use of intoxicating drinks.

This condition presents various degrees of intensity, ranging from a simple exhilaration to a state of utter unconsciousness and insensibility. In the popular phrase, the term drunkenness is applied only to those degrees of it in which the mind is manifestly disturbed in its operations. In the earlier stages it frequently happens that the mind is not only not disturbed, but acts with extraordinary clearness, promptitude, and vigor. In the latter the thoughts obviously succeed one another without much relevance or coherence, the perceptive faculties are active, but the impressions are misconceived, as if they passed through a distorting medium, and the reflective powers cease to act with any degree of efficiency. Some of the intermediate stages may be easily recognized; but it is not always possible to fix upon the exact moment when they succeed one another. In some persons peculiarly constituted, a fit of intoxication presents few if any of these successive stages, and the mind rapidly loses its self-control, and for the time is actually frenzied, as if in a maniacal paroxysm, though the amount of the drink may be comparatively small. The same phenomenon is observed sometimes in persons who have had some injury of the head, who are deprived of their reason by the slightest indulgence.

The habitual abuse of intoxicating drinks is usually followed by a pathological condition of the brain, which is manifested by a degree of intellectual obtuseness, and some insensibility to moral distinctions once readily discerned. The mind is more exposed to the force of foreign influences, and more readily induced to regard things in the light to which others have directed them. In others it produces a permanent mental derangement, which, if the person continue to indulge, is easily mistaken by common observers for the immediate effects of hard drinking. These two results—the mediate and the immediate effects of drinking—may coexist; but it is no less necessary to distinguish them from each other, because their legal consequences may be very different. Moved by the latter, a person goes into the street and abuses or assaults his neighbors; moved by the former, the same person makes his will, and cuts off with a shilling those who have the strongest claims upon his bounty. In a judicial investigation, one class of witnesses will attribute all his extravagances to drink, while another will see nothing in them but the effect of insanity. The medical jurist should not be misled by either party, but be able to refer each particular act to its proper source.

Drunkenness may be the result of dipsomania. Rather suddenly, and perhaps without much preliminary indulgence, a person manifests an insatiable thirst for strong drink, which no considerations of propriety or prudence can induce him to control. He generally retires to some secluded place, and there, during a period of a few days or weeks, he swallows enormous quantities of liquor, until his stomach refuses to bear any more. Vomiting succeeds, followed by sickness, depression, and disgust for all intoxicating drinks. This affection is often periodical, the paroxysms recurring at periods varying from three months to several years. Sometimes the indulgence is more continuous and limited, sufficient, however, to derange the mind, without producing sickness, and equally beyond control. Dipsomania may result from moral causes, such as anxiety, disappointment, grief, sense of responsibility; or physical, consisting chiefly of some anomalous condition of the stomach. Esquirol, Mal. Men. ii. 73; Marc, de la Folie, ii. 605; Ray, Med. Jur. 497; Macnish, Anatomy of Drunkenness, chap. 14.

The common law shows but little disposition to afford relief, either in civil or criminal cases, from the immediate effects of drunkenness. It has never considered mere drunkenness alone as a sufficient reason for invalidating any act; thus it has been held that drunkenness in the maker of a negotiable note is no defence against an innocent holder; 91 Pa. 17; the contract of a drunken man being not void but voidable only; 8 Am. Rep. 246, n. See also 1 Ames, Cas. on Bills and Notes 558; 61 Mich. 384; see 15 Johns. 503; 42 Ind. 565; 72 Ill. 108. If a person when sober agree to sign a contract, he cannot avail himself of intoxication at the time of signature as a defence; 63 Hun 629. When carried so far as to deprive the party of all consciousness, a strong presumption of fraud is raised; and on that ground courts may interfere; 1 Ves. 19; 18 id. 12. Drunkenness in such a degree as to render the testator unconscious of what he is about, or less capable of resisting the influence of others, avoids a will; Shelf. Lun. 274, 304; 3 D. R. Pa. 554. In actions for torts, drunkenness is not regarded as a reason for mitigating damages; Co. Litt. 247a; Webb, Poll. Torts 59, n. See 68 Ga. 612. Courts of equity, too, have declined to interfere in favor of parties pleading intoxication in the performance of some civil act; but they have not gone the length of enforcing agreements against such parties; 1 Story, Eq. § 232; 57 N. W. Rep. (Minn.) 478; 18 Ves. Jr. 12; 1 Ves. 19.

In England drunkenness has never been admitted in extenuation for any offences committed under its immediate influence; 3 Witth. & Beck. Med. Jur. 508. "A drunkard who is voluntarius daemon," says Coke, "hath no privilege thereby: whatever ill or hurt he doth, his drunkenness doth aggravate it." Lawyers have occasionally shown a disposition to distinguish between the guilt of one who commits an offence unconsciously, though in consequence of vicious indulgence, and that of another who is actuated by malice aforethought and acts deliberately and coolly. In Pennsylvania, as early as 1794, it was remarked by the courts on one occasion that, as drunkenness clouds the understanding and excites passion, it may be evidence of passion only, and of want of malice and design; Add. Pa. 257. See 83 Pa. 144. In 1819, Justice Holroyd decided that the fact of drunkenness might be taken into consideration in determining the question whether the act was premeditated or done only with sudden heat and impulse; Rex v. Grundley, 1 Russ. Cr. 8. This particular decision, however, was, a few years afterwards, pronounced to be not correct law; 7 C. & P. 145. Again, it was held that drunkenness, by rendering the party more excitable under provocation, might be taken into consideration in determining the sufficiency of the provocation; 7 C. & P. 817. More recently (1849), in Rex v. Monkhouse, 4 Cox, Cr. Cas. 55, it was declared that there might exist a state of drunkenness which takes away the power of forming any specific intention. See, also, 16 Jur. 750.

In this country, courts have gone still further in regarding drunkenness as incompatible with some of the elements of crime. It has been held, where murder was defined to be wilful, deliberate, malicious, and premeditated killing, that the existence of these attributes is not compatible with drunkenness; 13 Ala. N. S. 413; 4 Humphr. 136; 11 id. 154; 1 Spear 384; Tayl. Med. Jur. 739; and when a man's intoxication is so great as to render him unable to form a wilful, deliberate, and premeditated design to kill, or of judging of his acts and their legitimate consequences, then it reduces what would otherwise be murder in the first degree to murder in the second degree; Wright, Ohio 45; 29 Cal. 678; 1 Leigh 612; 2 Park. C. R. 233; 21 Miss. 446; 40 Conn. 136; 24 Am. L. Reg. 507; 26 S. W. Rep. (Tex.) 396; 33 Ala. 419; 41 Conn. 584; 66 Ill. 118; 75 Pa. 403. See 82 Wis. 23; 22 Or. 591; 95 Cal. 425. But where one who intends to kill another becomes voluntarily intoxicated for the purpose of carrying out the intention, the intoxication will have no effect upon the act; 28 Fla. 113; 96 Ala. 81. See 36 Pac. Rep. (Cal.) 770; 118 Mo. 7; and if one person gets another drunk and persuades him to commit a crime, he is legally responsible; 91 Ga. 740.

Intoxication does not excuse crime, but may show an absence of malice; 10 Ky. L. Rep. 656; 88 Ala. 100; and the burden of proof is on the defendant to show intoxication to such an extent as to render him incapable of malice; 46 La. Ann. 27.

If one commits robbery while so drunk as not to know what he was doing, he will not be deemed to have taken the property with a felonious intent; 92 Ky. 522.

It has been already stated that strong drink sometimes, in consequence of injury to the head, or some peculiar constitutional susceptibility, produces a paroxysm of frenzy immediately, under the influence of which the person commits a criminal act. Cases of this kind have been too seldom tried to make it quite certain how they would be regarded in law. It is probable, however, that the plea of insanity would be deprived of its validity by the fact that, sane or insane, the party was confessedly drunk. In a case where injury of the head had been followed by occasional paroxysms of insanity, in one of which the prisoner killed his wife, it appeared that he had just been drinking, and that intoxication had sometimes brought on the paroxysms, though they were not always preceded by drinking. The court ruled that if the mental disturbance were produced by intoxication it was not a valid defence; and accordingly the prisoner was convicted and executed. Trial of M'Donough, Ray, Med. Jur. 514. The principle is that if a person voluntarily deprives himself of reason, he can claim no exemption from the ordinary consequences of crime; 3 Par. & Fonbl. Med. J. 39; and the courts hold that voluntary intoxication is no justification or excuse for crime; 51 Kan. 651; 49 Cal. 485; 13 Ala. 413; 55 Ga. 31; 68 id. 612; 50 Vt. 483; 4 Tex. App. 76. Milder views have been advocated by writers of note, and have appeared in judicial decisions. Mr. Alison, referring to the class of cases just mentioned, calls it inhuman to visit them with the extreme punishment otherwise suitable. Prin. of Crim. Law of Scotland 654. See, also, 23 Am. Jur. 290. When a defendant sets up the defence of delirium tremens, and there is evidence to support the plea, the court in charging the jury is bound to set forth the law applicable to such a defence; 12 Rep. 701. This disease is a species of insanity, and one who labors under it is not responsible for his acts; 1 Wh. & Stillé, Med. Jur. § 202. While drunkenness is no excuse for crime, mania a potu is; 100 N. C. 457. See 43 Cal. 844; 64 Ind. 435; 50 Barb. 266. Where dipsomania affects the intellect and not merely the will it may be a defence; 3 Witth. & Beck. Med. Jur. 506. See 86 N. Y. 559; 105 Cal. 486. Where a person, in regard to a particular act, though knowing right from wrong, has lost his power to discriminate, in consequence of mental disease, he will be exempt from crime; 3 Witth. & Beck. 507. See 115 N. C. 807. Dipsomania would hardly be considered, in the present state of judicial opinion, a valid defence in a capital case, though there have been decisions which have allowed it, holding the question whether there is such a disease, and whether the act was committed under its influence, to be questions of fact for the jury; 49 N. H. 399; 40 Conn. 136; 1 Bish. Cr. Law § 409.

The law does recognize two kinds of culpable drunkenness, viz.: that which is produced by the "unskilfulness of the physician," and that which is produced by the "contrivance of enemies." Russ. Cr. 8. To these there may perhaps also be added that above described, where the party drinks no more liquor than he has habitually used without being intoxicated, but which exerts an unusually potent effect on the brain, in consequence of certain pathological conditions. See 5 Gray 86; 11 Cush. 479; 1 Benn. & H. Lead. Cr. Cas. 113.

DRY EXCHANGE. A term invented for disguising and covering usury,—in which something was pretended to pass on both sides, when in truth nothing passed on one side; whence it was called dry. Stat. 3 Hen. VII. c. 5; Wolfius, Ins. Nat. § 657.

DRY RENT. Rent-seck; a rent reserved without a clause of distress.

DRY TRUST. A passive trust; one which requires no action on the part of the trustee beyond turning over the money or property to the cestui que trust. Black, L. Dict. See TRUST.

DUBITANTE. Doubting. Affixed in law reports to a judge's name, to signify that he doubts the correctness of a decision.

DUCAT. The name of a foreign coin.

The ducat, or sequin, was originally a gold coin of the middle ages, apparently a descendant from the bezant of the Greek-Roman Empire. For many centuries it constituted the principal international currency, being intended, or supposed, to be made of pure gold, though subsequently settled at a basis a little below. It is now nearly obsolete in every part of the world. Its average value is about $2.26 of our money. It is said they appeared earliest in Venice, and that they bore the following motto: Sit tibi, Christe, datus, quem tu regis, iste Ducatus,—whence the name ducat.

The silver ducat was formerly a coin of Naples, weighing three hundred and forty-eight grains, eight hundred and forty-two thousandths fine; consequent value, in our money, about eighty-one cents; but it now exists only as a money of account.

DUCE TECUM LICET LANGUIDUS. A writ directing the sheriff to bring a person whom he returned as so sick that he could not be brought without endangering his life. Blount; Cowel. The writ is now obsolete. See SUBPENA DUCES TECUM.

DUCKING-STOOL. A stool or chair in which common scolds were formerly tied and plunged into water. The ducking-stool is mentioned in the Domesday Book; it was extensively in use throughout Great Britain from the fifteenth till the beginning of the eighteenth century. Cent. Dict. See CASTIGATORY.

DUE. Just and proper, as due care, due rights. 8 N. J. Eq. 701; 10 Allen 18, 532. A due presentment and demand of payment must be made. See 4 Rawle 307; 3 Leigh 389; 3 Cra. 300.

What ought to be paid; what may be demanded.

It differs from owing in this, that sometimes what is owing is not due: a note payable thirty days after date is owing immediately after it is delivered to the payee, but it is not due until the thirty days have elapsed. But see 7 N. Y. 476; 10 N. J. L. 340; 6 Pet. 36.

The word "due," unlike "arrears," has more than one signification, and expresses two distinct ideas. At times it signifies a simple indebtedness without reference to the time of payment; at others it shows that the day of payment has passed; 31 Fed. Rep. 125; 5 N. J. L. 345.

Bills of exchange and promissory notes are not due until the end of the three days of grace, unless the last of these days happen to fall on a Sunday or other holiday, when it becomes due on the Saturday or day before, and not on the Monday or day following. Story, P. Notes, § 440; 14 Me. 264; 25 Barb. 326; 24 N. Y. 283; 17 Wis. 181; 19 Pick. 381; 31 Mich. 215; unless changed by statute.

DUE-BILL. An acknowledgment of a debt in writing is so called. This instrument differs from a promissory note in many particulars: it is not payable to order, nor is it assignable by mere indorsement. Byles, Bills *11, n. (t.). See I. O. U.; PROMISSORY NOTES.

Where the terms of a due-bill are unambiguous, an erroneous interpretation thereof by the maker is no defence to an action on such due-bill; 33 Ill. App. 58. In an action on a due-bill, the defendant can show, under a plea of want of consideration, that the indebtedness for which it had been given had been paid before the bill was made; 34 Ill. App. 571. The maker of a written acknowledgment of a sum due is not estopped by it as to any one who may purchase the supposed debt; 42 Minn. 498.

DUE CARE. Reasonable care adapted to the circumstances of the case. 10 Allen 532; 54 Md. 656.

DUE COURSE OF LAW. This phrase is synonymous with "due process of law," or "the law of the land," and means law in its regular course of administration through courts of justice. 19 Kan. 542.

DUE PROCESS OF LAW. Law in its regular course of administration through courts of justice. 3 Story, Const. 264, 661; Miller, Const. 664; 18 How. 272; 13 N. Y. 378.

Any legal proceeding enforced by public authority, whether sanctioned by age or custom, or newly devised in the discretion of the legislative power, in furtherance of the general public good, which regards and preserves these principles of liberty and justice. 110 U. S. 516.

This term is considered by Coke as equivalent to the phrase "law of the land" (used in Magna Charta, c. 29), and is said by him to denote "indictment or presentment of good and lawful men." Co. 2d Inst. 50. Amendment V. of the constitution of the United States provides: "No person shall . . . be deprived of life, liberty, or property, without due process of law." Amendment XV. prohibits a state from depriving a person of life, liberty, or property, without due process of law. A similar provision exists in all the state constitutions; the phrases "due course of law" and "the law of the land" are sometimes used; but all three of these phrases have the same meaning; 96 U. S. 97; Cooley, Const. Lin. 437, where the provisions in the various state constitutions are set forth. Miller, J., says, in Davidson v. New Orleans, 96 U. S. 103, that a general definition of the phrases which would cover every case would be most desirable, but that, apart from the risk of failure to make the definition perspicuous and comprehensive, there is a wisdom in ascertaining the extent and application of the phrase by the judicial process of exclusion and inclusion as the cases arise. In that case, however, he says also, that it must be confessed that the constitutional meaning or value of the phrase remains without that satisfactory precision of definition which judicial decisions have given to nearly all the other guaranties of personal rights found in the constitutions of the several states and of the United States. As contributory to the discussion, he proceeds, for the court, to lay down the following proposition: "That whenever by the laws of a state, or by state authority, a tax, assessment, servitude, or other burden is imposed upon property for the public use, whether it be for the whole state or of some more limited portion of the community, and those laws provide for a mode of confirming or contesting the charge thus imposed, in the ordinary courts of justice, with such notice to the person, or such proceeding in regard to the property as is appropriate to the nature of the case, the judgment in such proceedings cannot be said to deprive the owner of his property without due process of law, however obnoxious it may be to other objections." In the case just cited it is remarked that during nearly a century while this provision was in the constitution of the United States, as a restraint upon the authority of the federal government, and during that time the powers of that government were watched with jealousy, this special limitation on its powers was seldom invoked; but after it became, as part of the Fourteenth Amendment, a limitation upon the powers of the states, in a very few years, the docket of the supreme court was crowded with cases in which it was invoked. See 140 U. S. 316; 133 id. 660; 154 id. 421. The full significance of the clause "law of the land" is said by Ruffin, C. J., to be that statutes which would deprive a citizen of the rights of person or property without a regular trial according to the course and usage of the common law would not be the law of the land; 4 Dev. 15. Mr. Webster's explanation of the meaning of these phrases in the Dartmouth College Case (4 Wheat. 518) is: "By the law of the land is more clearly intended the general law, a law which hears before it condemns; which proceeds upon inquiry, and renders judgment only after trial. The meaning is that every citizen shall hold his life, liberty, property, and immunities, under the protection of the general rules which govern society. Everything which may pass under the form of an enactment is not, therefore, to be considered the law of the land."

The privileges and immunities of citizens of the United States, protected by the Fourteenth Amendment, are privileges and immunities arising out of the nature and essential character of the federal government, and granted or secured by the constitution; and due process of law and the equal protection of the laws are secured if the laws operate on all alike, and do not subject the individual to an arbitrary exercise of the powers of government; 152 U. S. 382; 148 id. 662; 110 id. 535.

In 4 Wheat. 235, Johnson, J., says: "As to the words from Magna Charta incorporated in the constitution of Maryland, after volumes spoken and written with a view to their exposition, the good sense of mankind has at length settled down to this,—that they were intended to secure the individual from the arbitrary exercise of the power of government, unrestrained by the established principles of private rights and distributive justice."

"Due process of law undoubtedly means, in the due course of legal proceedings, according to those rules and forms which have been established for the protection of private rights;" 12 N. Y. 209. Law in its regular course of administration through courts of justice is due process; and when secured by the law of the state, the constitutional requirement is satisfied; 139 U. S. 462. The phrase as used in the constitution does not "mean a statute passed for the purpose of working the wrong. That construction would render the restriction absolutely nugatory, and turn this part of the constitution into mere nonsense. The people would be made to say to the two houses: 'You shall be vested with the legislative power of the state, but no one shall be disfranchised or deprived of any of the rights or privileges of a citizen, unless you pass a statute for that purpose. In other words, you shall not do the wrong unless you choose to do it;'" per Bronson, J., in 4 Hill, N. Y. 140. "The meaning of these words is that no man shall be deprived of his property without being heard in his own defence;" Tucker, J., in 1 Hen. & M. 531. See, also, 6 W. & S. 171.

Judge Cooley (Const. Lim. 441) says: "Due process of law in each particular case means, such an exercise of the powers of the government as the settled maxims of law permit and sanction, and under such safeguards for the protection of individual rights as those maxims prescribe for the class of cases to which the one in question belongs."

Taking property under the taxing power is taking it by due process of law; 22 Cal. 363; 102 U. S. 586. In this connection, it is said in 2 McCord 56: "We think that any legal process which was originally founded in necessity, has been consecrated by time, and approved and acquiesced in by universal consent, . . . is embraced in the alternative 'law of the land.'" In 50 Miss. 479, it is said that these constitutional provisions do not mean the general body of the law as it was at the time the constitution took effect; but they refer to certain fundamental rights which that system of jurisprudence of which ours is derivative has always recognized; if any of these are disregarded in the proceedings by which a person is condemned to the loss of property, etc., then the deprivation has not been by due process of law. And it has been held that the state cannot deprive a person of his property without due process of law through the medium of a constitutional convention any more than it can through an act of the legislature; 69 Mo. 637. Exaction of tolls under a state statute for the use of an improved waterway, is not a deprivation of property within the federal constitution; 123 U. S. 288.

The subject was exhaustively considered in Murray's Lessees v. Hoboken, etc., Co., 18 How. 272, where it was held that a collector of customs, from whom a balance of accounts has been found to be due by accounting officers of the treasury of the United States, designated for that purpose by law, could be deprived of his liberty or property, in order to enforce the payment of that balance, without the exercise of the judicial power of the United States. The proceedings in that case were by way of a distress-warrant issued by the solicitor of the treasury to the marshal of the district, under which the marshal was authorized to collect the amount due by a sale of the collector's personal property. The court considered that the power exercised was executive, and not judicial; and that the writ and proceedings under it were due process of law within the meaning of that phrase as derived from our ancestors and found in the constitution.

In 95 U. S. 37, it was held that the phrase due process of law does not necessarily mean judicial proceedings, and that summary proceedings for the collection of taxes, which were not arbitrary or unequal, were not within the prohibition of this provision. So, also, in 5 Nev. 281. This provision does not imply that all trials in state courts affecting the property of persons must be by jury; it is enough if they were had according to the settled course of judicial proceedings; 92 U. S. 90; 5 Nev. 281; 2 Tex. 250. The question is independent of the question whether the proceeding was by motion or action if it be sanctioned by state law and affords an opportunity to be heard; 160 U. S. 389; and it does not imply a hearing according to established practice in the courts, but by appropriate judicial proceedings; 66 N. W. Rep. (Neb.) 624. As to the right of foreigners to enter our country, the decisions of executive or administrative officers acting within powers expressly conferred by congress are due process of law; 142 U. S. 651.

A statute which provides that real-estate owners shall be liable for damages arising out of the illegal use of their property by a tenant is valid; 18 Am. Law Reg. N. s. 124. A commitment for contempt of court is not obnoxious to this constitutional provision; 23 Minn. 411; 134 U. S. 31; nor is a commitment for failure to pay a tax, not resorted to until other means of collection have failed, and then only upon a showing of property possessed, not accessible to levy, but enabling the owner to pay if he chooses; 13 U. S. 660. A statute providing for assessment on property owners, for street improvements, is not invalid as taking property without due process of law; 4 N. Y. 419; 128 U. S. 578. A provision in the constitution and laws of Missouri by which a litigant, in certain courts of St. Louis, has a right of appeal to the St. Louis court of appeals, but not to the supreme court of the state, is not repugnant to the XIV. amendment. A state may establish one system of law in one portion of its territory and another in another, provided it does not deprive any person of his rights without due process of law; 101 U. S. 22. A review by an appellate court of the final judgment in a criminal case is not a necessary element of due process of law; 153 U. S. 684. A provision in a Wisconsin statute giving jurisdiction to courts to try prosecutions upon informations for all crimes is not repugnant to that amendment; such trial is by due process of law; 30 Wis. 129. The entry of judgment on a bond when the bond is forfeited is not obnoxious to this constitutional provision; 2 Tex. 250. The mere entry of a judgment for money, which is void for want of proper service, does not deprive the defendant of liberty or property; 137 U. S. 15. A law which provides that in case of refusal to pay certain taxes, the treasurer shall levy the same by distress and sale of the goods of the person refusing or of any goods in his possession, and that no claim of property by any other person shall prevent a sale, but giving the owner of the goods a remedy against the person taxed, is constitutional; 5 Mich. 251, where the subject is fully treated. It has been held in California (49 Cal. 402), that a statute which directs the commissioner of immigration to visit vessels arriving from a foreign state, and to ascertain whether there are any lewd women on board, and if such be found, to prevent them from landing unless bonds be given to the state, is not repugnant to the XIV. amendment. An act to allow animals running at large to be taken by any person and publicly sold by a public officer, is constitutional; 39 Mich. 41. An act which makes a garnishee liable to pay a judgment against the defendant, in case the garnishee neglects to render a sworn account, does not deprive him of his property without due process of law; 12 R. I. 127. Taxation authorized for the purposes of meeting railroad aid bonds is not in violation of the constitutional provision against depriving a person of his property without due process of law. This clause has reference not to the object and purposes of a statute, but to the modes in which rights are ascertained; per Emmons, J., in 1 Flipp. 120. Legislation is not open to the charge of depriving one of his rights without due process of law, if it be general in its operation upon the subject to which it relates and is enforceable by usual methods adapted to the nature of the case; 129 U. S. 114.

Whenever a tax or other burden is imposed upon property for public use, whether for the whole state or a limited part thereof, and the law provides a mode for confirming or contesting the charge, with such notice and proceedings as are appropriate, the judgment rendered in such proceedings cannot be said to deprive the owner of his property without due process of law; 4 Fed. Rep. 366. The tax here was for the reclamation of swamp lands. See 140 U. S. 316; 128 id. 578; 154 id. 421.

A person imprisoned under a valid law, although there was error in the proceeding resulting in the commitment, is not imprisoned without due process of law; 5 Fed. Rep. 899, per Deady, J. An error in a charge to a jury in a criminal case is not a denial of due process of law; 139 U. S. 651. To compel an attorney to render services gratuitously to defend a person accused of crime, is not the taking of his time and labor, which is his property, without compensation and without process of law; 5 Wash. St. 329.

A statute which authorized the president of the police commissioners of St. Louis, upon satisfactory information that there are any prohibited gaming tables in that city, to issue his warrant for their seizure and to destroy the same publicly, is void; 10 Cent. L. J. 29. The sale of land to satisfy void street assessments which the legislature has unconstitutionally attempted to validate, would be taking property without due process of law; 53 Cal. 44. The commitment to the workhouse of an alleged pauper, upon an ex parte hearing, by two overseers, without opportunity to the pauper to be heard, is repugnant to the XIV. amendment, and void; 65 Me. 120, reversing earlier cases in Maine decided before that amendment was passed. A judgment upon a suit in personam in Oregon, where there was no service of notice upon the defendant within the jurisdiction, and no appearance on his part, is void, and a sale of defendant's land thereunder passes no title; 95 U. S. 714. See 137 id. 15. No judgment of a court is due process of law if rendered without jurisdiction in the court, or without notice to the party; 154 U. S. 34; but when parties have been regularly heard in the course of judicial proceedings, an erroneous decision does not deprive the unsuccessful party of his property without due process of law; 159 id. 103.

A statute providing that the use of an easement shall not be evidence of a right thereto, is unconstitutional so far as it applies to rights acquired by user or prescription prior to the enactment; 12 R. I. 522. The legislature may make a tax deed prima facie evidence of title in the purchaser, but cannot make it conclusive evidence of his title to the land; 148 U. S. 172. An act which fixes absolute liability on a corporation to make compensation for injuries done to property in the prosecution of its lawful business, without fault on its part, when under the general law, no one else is liable under such circumstances, is void. A person has the right to be present before the tribunal which passes judgment upon the question of life, etc., to be heard by testimony, and to controvert every material fact which bears upon the question involved; if any question of fact or liability be conclusively presumed against him, this is not due process of law; 58 Ala. 594. An affirmance by an appellate court of a judgment of death for murder, although in the absence of the accused and his counsel and without notice to either, does not deprive the defendant of his right to life without due process of law; 143 U. S. 442, 452.

The punishment of death by electricity does not deprive a criminal of due process of law; 142 U. S. 155.

Persons invested with the elective franchise can be deprived of it only by due process of law; 6 Coldw. 233.

An act authorizing monument-makers to place a lien on a tombstone and sell it for non-payment, without providing for any tribunal to adjust the rights of parties, is unconstitutional, and a sale under it is without due process of law; 4 N. Y. Sup. 445.

The provisions of a bill which dispense with personal service in proceedings when it is practicable and has been usual under the general law, the defendants being residents of the county and state, and amenable to process, are void; 50 Miss. 468. A law imposing an assessment for a local improvement without notice to, and a hearing or an opportunity to be heard on the part of, the owner of property assessed, is unconstitutional. It is not enough that he may have notice and a hearing; the law must require notice and give a right to a hearing; 74 N. Y. 183; 96 Ga. 680; 41 N. E. Rep. (Ind.) 326; 23 S. E. Rep. (Va.) 909. A statute providing for the taking of private property for a railroad and for the assessment of damages by commissioners, need not, under the Delaware constitution, provide for notice to the owner of the time and place of meeting of the commissioners, nor need it secure to the owner a hearing; the United States Constitution and amendments impose no restraint upon the states in the exercise of the right of eminent domain, and the words, "due course of law," in the state constitution do not apply thereto; 5 Del. Ch. 524; in which case the authorities are collected and the construction of these words exhaustively considered by Saulsbury, Ch.

DUELLING. The fighting of two persons, one against the other, at an appointed time and place, upon a precedent quarrel. It differs from an affray in this, that the latter occurs on a sudden quarrel, while the former is always the result of design.

When one of the parties is killed, the survivor is guilty of murder; 1 Russ. Cr. 443; 1 Yerg. 228. Fighting a duel, even where there is no fatal result, is of itself a misdemeanor. See 2 Com. Dig. 252; Clark, Cr.

L. 340; Co. 3d Inst. 157; Const. 167; 2 Ala. 506; 20 Johns. 457; 1 McMull. 126. For cases of mutual combat upon a sudden quarrel, see 1 Russ. Cr. 495; 2 Bish. Cr. Law § 311. Under the constitutions of some of the states, as Alabama, California, Kentucky, Pennsylvania, Virginia, and Wisconsin, any one being directly or indirectly engaged in a duel is forever disqualified from holding public office. See 10 Bush 725; 20 Johns. 457; 4 Metc. (Ky.) 1; 2 McCord 334; 23 Gratt. 130; CHALLENGE.

DUELLUM. Trial by battle. Judicial combat. Spelman, Gloss. See WAGER OF BATTLE.

DUKE. The title given to those who are in the highest rank of nobility in England.

DUM BENE SE GESSERIT (Lat. while he shall conduct himself well). These words signify that a judge or other officer shall hold his office during good behavior, and not at the pleasure of the crown nor for a certain limited time.

DUM FUIT IN PRISONA (L. Lat.). In English Law. A writ which lay for a man who had aliened lands under duress by imprisonment, to restore to him his proper estates. Co. 2d Inst. 432. Abolished by stat. 3 & 4 Will. IV. c. 27.

DUM FUIT INFRA ÆTATEM (Lat.). The name of a writ which lay when an infant had made a feoffment in fee of his lands or for life, or a gift in tail. Abolished by stat. 3 & 4 Will. IV. c. 27.

It could be sued out by him after he came of full age, and not before; but in the meantime he could enter, and his entry remitted him to his ancestor's rights; Fitzh. N. B. 192; Co. Litt. 247, 337.

DUM NON FUIT COMPOS MENTIS (Lat.). The name of a writ which the heirs of a person who was non compos mentis, and who aliened his lands, might have sued out to restore him to his rights. Abolished by 3 & 4 Will. IV. c. 27.

DUM SOLA (Lat. while single or unmarried). A phrase to denote that something has been done, or may be done, while a woman is or was unmarried. Thus, when a judgment is rendered against a woman dum sola, and afterward she marries, the scire facias to revive the judgment must be against both husband and wife.

DUMB. Unable to speak; mute. See DEAF AND DUMB.

A dog is a dumb animal; 5 Tex. App. 475.

DUMB-BIDDING. In sales at auction, when the amount which the owner of the thing sold is willing to take for the article is written, and placed by the owner under a candlestick, or other thing, and it is agreed that no bidding shall avail unless equal to that, this is called dumb-bidding. Babington, Auct. 44.

DUN. One who duns or urges for payment; a troublesome creditor. A demand for payment, whether oral or written. Stand. Dict.

DUNGEON. A cell under ground; a place in a prison built under ground, dark, or but indifferently lighted. In the prisons of the United States there are few or no dungeons.

DUNNAGE. Pieces of wood placed against the sides and bottom of the hold of a vessel, to preserve the cargo from the effect of leakage, according to its nature and quality. Abbott, Shipp. 227.

There is considerable analogy between dunnage and ballast. The latter is used for trimming the ship and bringing it down to a draft of water proper and safe for sailing. Dunnage is placed under the cargo to keep it from being wetted by water getting into the hold, or between the different parcels to keep them from bruising and injuring each other; 13 Wall. 674.

DUODECIMA MANUS (Lat.). Twelve hands. The oaths of twelve men, including himself, by whom the defendant was allowed to make his law. 3 Bla. Com. 343.

DUPLEX QUERELA (Lat.). In Ecclesiastical Law. A complaint in the nature of an appeal from the ordinary to his next immediate superior for delaying or refusing to do justice in some ecclesiastical cause. 3 Bla. Com. 247; Cowel; Jacobs.

DUPLEX VALOR MARITAGII (Lat. double the value of a marriage). Guardians in chivalry had the privilege of proposing a marriage for their infant wards, provided it were done without disparagement, and if the wards married without the guardian's consent they were liable to forfeit double the value of marriage. Co. Litt. 82 b; 2 Sharsw. Bla. Com. 70.

DUPLICATE (Lat. duplex, double). The double of anything. A document which is essentially the same as some other instrument. 7 Mann. & G. 93; 40 N. Y. 345.

A duplicate writing has but one effect. Each duplicate is complete evidence of the intention of the parties. When a duplicate is destroyed, for example, in the case of a will, it is presumed both are intended to be destroyed; but this presumption possesses greater or less force, owing to circumstances. When only one of the duplicates is in the possession of the testator, the destruction of that is a strong presumption of any intent to revoke both; but if he possessed both, and destroys but one, it is weaker; when he alters one, and afterwards destroys it, retaining the other entire, it has been held that the intention was to revoke both; 1 P. Wms. 346; 13 Ves. 310. But that seems to be doubted; 3 Hagg. Eccl. 548. See 81 Pa. 389; 49 E. C. L. 94; 103 id. 29; 54 Ind. 29.

In English Law. The certificate of discharge given to an insolvent debtor who takes the benefit of the act for the relief of insolvent debtors.

DUPLICATIO (Lat. a doubling). The defendant's second answer; that is, the answer to the plaintiff's replication.

DUPLICATUM JUS (Lat. a twofold or double right). Words which signify the same as dreit dreit, or droit droit, and which are applied to a writ of right, patent, and such other writs of right as are of the same nature, and do as it were flow from it as the writ of right. Booth, Real Act. 87.

DUPLICITY. In Pleading. (Lat. duplex, twofold; double.) The union of more than one cause of action in one count in a writ, or more than one defence in one plea, or more than a single breach in a replication. 1 W. & M. 381.

The union of several facts constituting together but one cause of action, or one defence, or one breach, does not constitute duplicity; 1 W. & M. 381; 10 Vt. 353; 3 H. & M'H. 455; 2 Blackf. 85; 4 Zab. 333; 16 Ill. 133; 1 Dev. 397; 1 McCord 464; 10 Me. 83; 14 Pick. 156; 33 Miss. 474; 4 Ind. 109; 2 Tex. Civ. App. 115; 101 N. C. 749; 86 Wis. 142; 77 Md. 121; 87 Ky. 578. Though the joinder of two or more distinct offences in one count of an indictment is faulty, yet where the acts imputed are component parts of the same offence the pleading is not objectionable for duplicity; 54 N. J. L. 416; nor is it where one of the two offences charged is insufficiently set out; 39 Minn. 476. It must be of causes on which the party relies, and not merely matter introduced in explanation; 28 Conn. 134; 14 Mass. 157. In trespass it is not duplicity to plead to part and justify or confess as to the residue; 17 Pick. 236. If only one defence be valid, the objection of duplicity is not sustained; 2 Blackf. 385; 14 Pick. 156.

It may exist in any part of the pleadings; the declaration; 23 N. H. 415; 2 Harring. Del. 162; pleas; 4 McLean 267; 2 Miss. 160; replication; 5 Blackf. 451; 4 Ill. 74; 6 Mo. 460; or subsequent pleadings; 24 N. H. 120; 4 McLean 388; 1 Wash. C. C. 446; 8 Pick. 72; and was at common law a fatal defect; 20 Mo. 229; 23 N. H. 415; to be reached on demurrer only; 18 Vt. 363; 10 Gratt. 255; 13 Ark. 721; 1 Cush. 137; 5 Gill 94; 5 Blackf. 451; 97 Ala. 270; 35 Pac. Rep. (Cal.) 1022. The rules against duplicity did not extend to dilatory pleas so as to prevent the use of the various classes in their proper order; Co. Litt. 304 a; Steph. Pl. App. n. 56.

Owing to the statutory changes in the forms of pleading, duplicity seems to be no longer a defect in many of the states of the United States, either in declarations; 8 Ark. 378; pleas; 1 Cush. 137; 7 J. J. Marsh. 335; or replications; 8 Ind. 96; though in some cases it is allowed only in the discretion of the court, for the furtherance of justice; 32 Mo. 185.

It is too late after verdict to object to duplicity in an information for a misdemeanor; 106 Mo. 395.

DUPLY. In Scotch Law. The defendant's answer to the plaintiff's replication. The same as duplicatio. Maclaurin, Forms of Pr. 127.

DURANTE ABSENTIA. See ADMINISTRATION.

DURANTE BENE PLACITO (Lat.). During good pleasure. The ancient tenure of English judges was durante bene placito. 1 Bla. Com. 267, 342.

DURANTE MINORE ÆTATE (Lat.). During the minority. An infant can enter into no contracts during his minority, except those for his benefit. If he should be appointed an executor, administration of the estate will be granted, durante minore ætate, to another person. 2 Bouvier, Inst. n. 1555.

DURANTE VIDUITATE (Lat.). During widowhood.

DURATION. Extent, limit or time. 7 Cal. 102.

DURBAR. In India, a court, audience, or levee. Wilson's Gloss. Ind.; Moz. & W. Dict.

DURESS. Personal restraint, or fear of personal injury or imprisonment. 2 Metc. Ky. 445.

Duress of imprisonment exists where a man actually loses his liberty. If a man be illegally deprived of his liberty until he sign and seal a bond, and the like, he may allege this duress and avoid the bond; 2 Bay 211; 9 Johns. 201; 10 Pet. 137; 45 Mich. 569; 95 Ill. 583; 41 N. H. 414; 74 Me. 218; 94 N. Y. 268. But if a man be legally imprisoned, and, either to procure his discharge, or on any other fair account, seal a bond or a deed, this is not by duress of imprisonment, and he is not at liberty to avoid it; Co. 2d Inst. 482; 3 Cal. 168; 6 Mass. 511; 1 H. & M. 350; 17 Me. 338; 18 How. 307; 2 Wash. C. C. 180; 61 Conn. 50. Where the proceedings at law are a mere pretext, the instrument may be avoided; Aleyn 92. 1 Bla. Com. 136.

Duress per minas, which is either for fear of loss of life, or else for fear of mayhem or loss of limb, must be upon a sufficient reason; 1 Bla. Com. 131. In this case, a man may avoid his own act. Lord Coke enumerates four instances in which a man may avoid his own act by reason of menaces:—for fear of loss of life; of member, of mayhem; of imprisonment; Co. 2d Inst. 483; 2 Rolle, Abr. 124; Bac. Abr. Duress, Murder, A; 2 Ld. Raym. 1578; Savigny, Dr. Rom. § 114; 91 Pa. 114.

Where plaintiff executes a note in consideration that defendant will not prosecute his son for perjury and under a threat that otherwise the son will be prosecuted, the threats constitute duress; 154 Mass. 460.

It has been held that restraint of goods under circumstances of hardship will avoid a contract; 2 Bay 211; 9 Johns. 201; 10 Pet. 137; 57 Ill. 289; 114 Mass. 364; 68 Pa. 49; 68 N. C. 134; 95 U. S. 210; 11 Exch. 878. But see 2 Metc. (Ky.) 445; 2 Gall. 337; 8 Ct. Cl. 461; 50 Ala. 437.

The duress to avoid a deed is that which compels the grantor to do what he would not do voluntarily; 80 Me. 472; 45 Mich. 569; 90 Pa. 161. If a contract is made under duress and subsequently ratified, it becomes valid; 24 Fla. 390.

The violence or threats must be such as are calculated to operate on a person of ordinary firmness and inspire a just fear of great injury to person, reputation, or fortune. See 4 Wash. C. C. 402; 39 Me. 559; 169 id. 376; 18 Colo. 82; 26 Ark. 280; 36 La. Ann. 471. The age, sex, state of health, temper, and disposition of the party, and other circumstances calculated to give greater or less effect to the violence of threats, must be taken into consideration; 32 Am. Rep. 180, n.; 1 Ky. Law Rep. 137; 16 Wall. 432; 23 Am. L. Reg. o. s. 206.

Violence or threats will amount to duress not only where they are exercised on the contracting party, but when the wife, the husband, or children of the party are the object of them; 26 N. Y. 12; 131 Mass. 51; 3 Washb. R. P. 276.

If the violence used be only a legal constraint, or the threats only of doing that which the party using them had a right to do, they shall not invalidate the contract. A just and legal imprisonment, or threats of any measure authorized by law and the circumstances of the case, are of this description. See Norris, Peake's Ev. 440, and the cases cited; also, 6 Mass. 506, for the general rule at common law; 84 Me. 103; contra, 106 Mass. 291; 155 id. 233; 36 N. Y. 365; 47 N. J. L. 265; 79 N. C. 603; 50 Conn. 348.

But the mere forms of law to cover coercive proceedings for an unjust and illegal cause, if used or threatened in order to procure the assent to a contract, will invalidate it; and arrest without cause of action, or a demand of bail in an unreasonable sum, or threat of such proceeding, by this rule invalidates a contract made under their pressure.

Where a person has been refused payment of the balance due after completing his contract, unless he repair, labor free, certain damages done to the work by a stranger, he cannot recover the cost of such extra labor as he was not under duress; 133 N. Y. 372.

All the above cases relate to cases where there may be some other motive besides the violence or threats for making the contract. When, however, there is no other cause for making the contract, any threats, even of slight injury, will invalidate it.

Excessive charges paid to railroad companies refusing to carry or deliver goods, unless these payments were made voluntarily, have been recovered on the ground of duress; 27 L. J. Where the carrier refuses to transport stock until a special contract is signed limiting its liability, it does not bind the shipper; 48 Kan. 210.

DURHAM. See COUNTY PALATINE.

DURSLEY. In Old English Law. Blows without wounding or bloodshed; dry blows. Blount.

DUTIES. In its most enlarged sense, this word is nearly equivalent to taxes embracing all impositions or charges levied on persons or things; in its more restrained sense, it is often used as equivalent to customs, or imposts. Story, Const. § 949.

DUTY. A human action which is exactly conformable to the laws which require us to obey them.

That which is right or due from one to another. A moral obligation or responsibility.

It differs from a legal obligation, because a duty cannot always be enforced by the law; it is our duty, for example, to be temperate in eating, but we are under no legal obligation to be so; we ought to love our neighbors, but no law obliges us to love them.

DWELLING-HOUSE. A building inhabited by man. A house usually occupied by the person there residing, and his family. The apartment, building, or cluster of buildings in which a man with his family resides. 2 Bish. Cr. Law § 104.

The importance of an exact signification for this word is often felt in criminal cases; and yet it is very difficult to frame an exact definition which will apply to all cases. It is said to be equivalent to mansion-house; 3 S. & R. 199; 4 Strobb. 372; 7 Mann. & G. 122. See 14 M. & W. 181; 4 C. B. 105; 4 Call 109.

Judge Cooley, in 50 Mich. 219, says that in the law of burglary the dwelling-house is deemed to include whatever is within the curtilage, even though not inclosed with the dwelling, if used with it for domestic purposes; 2 Mich. 250; 16 id. 142.

It must be a permanent structure; 1 Hale, Pl. Cr. 557; 1 Russ. Cr. 798; must be inhabited at the time; 2 Leach 1018, n.; 33 Me. 30; 26 Ala. n. s. 145; 10 Cush. 479; 18 Johns. 115; 4 Call 109; 62 Miss. 782. It is sufficient if a part of the structure only be used for an abode; Russ. & R. 185; 11 Metc. 295; 9 Tex. 42; 2 B. & P. 508; 27 Ala. n. s. 31; 68 N. C. 207. How far a building may be separate is a difficult question. See Russ. & R. 495; 10 Pick. 293; 4 C. B. 105; 1 Dev. 253; 3 Humphr. 379; 1 N. & McC. 583; 5 Leigh 751; 6 Mich. 142; 24 N. J. L. 377; 33 How. Pr. 378; 98 Mich. 26; 45 N. H. 37; 20 N. Y. 52; 18 Q. B. 783; 22 Ir. L. T. Rep. 30; 89 Mo. 430; 38 Ohio St. 506; 68 N. C. 207.

A suite of rooms in a college of the University of Cambridge is a dwelling-house; L. R. 4 C. P. 539. In a rather curious case the question what is a dwelling-house divided the court. Six separate tenants occupied a house of ten rooms, each having exclusive possession of his part of the premises and the owner did not reside there. The outer and street door had no lock or bolt and was always kept open. The entry, stairway, and an ashpit and other conveniences were used in common. Two of the judges held that each of the six tenants occupied a "dwelling-house," and two held otherwise; L. R. 6 C. P. 327.

DWELLING-PLACE. See RESIDENCE; DOMICIL.

DYING DECLARATIONS. See DECLARATIONS.

DYING WITHOUT ISSUE. Not having issue living at the death of the decedent. 5 Paige, Ch. 514; 34 Me. 176; 13 N. J. Eq. 105. In England this is the signification, by statutes 7 Will. IV.; 1 Vict. c. 26, § 29. But the old English rule, that the words, when applied to real estate, import an indefinite failure of issue, has been generally adhered to in this country; 20 N. J. L. 6; 32 Barb. 328; 32 Md. 101. See 2 Washb. R. P. 362; 4 Kent 273.

DYNASTY. A succession of kings in the same line or family.

DYSNOMY. Bad legislation; the enactment of bad laws.

DYSPEPSIA. The group of symptoms resulting from alterations in the process of digestion due either to functional or organic diseases of the stomach.

Dyspepsia is not, in general, considered as a disease which tends to shorten life, so as to make a life uninsurable, unless the complaint has become organic dyspepsia, or was of such a degree at the time of the insurance as by its excess to tend to shorten life; 4 Taunt. 763.

DYVOUR. In Scotch Law. A bankrupt.

DYVOUR'S HABIT. In Scotch Law. A habit which debtors who are set free on a cessio bonorum are obliged to wear, unless in the summons and process of cessio it be labelled, sustained, and proved that the bankruptcy proceeded from misfortune. And bankrupts are condemned to submit to the habit, even where no suspicion of fraud lies against them, if they have been dealers in an illicit trade. Erskine, Pract. Scot. 4, 3, 13.

E.

E CONVERSO (Lat.). On the other hand; on the contrary. Equivalent to e contra.

EAGLE. A gold coin of the United States of the value of ten dollars.

It weighs two hundred and fifty-eight grains of standard fineness; that is to say, of one thousand parts by weight, nine hundred shall be of pure metal and one hundred of alloy, the alloy consisting of silver and copper. As the proportion of silver and copper in the gold coins of the United States is not fixed by law further than to prescribe that the silver therein shall not exceed fifty in every thousand parts, the proportion was made the subject of a special instruction by Mr. Snowden, former director of the mint, as follows:—

"As it is highly important to secure uniformity in our gold coinage, all deposits of native gold, or gold not previously refined, should be assayed for silver, without exception, and refined to from nine hundred and ninety to nine hundred and ninety-three, say averaging nine hundred and ninety-one as near as may be. When any of the deposits prove to be nine hundred and ninety, or finer, they should be reserved to be mixed with the refined gold. The gold coin of the mint and its branches will then be nearly thus: gold, nine hundred; silver, eight; copper, ninety-two; and thus a greater uniformity of color will be attained than was heretofore accomplished."

The instructions on this point were prescribed by the director in September, 1853. Mint Pamphlet, "Instructions relative to the Business of the Mint," 14.

The act of February 12, 1873, Rev. Stat. § 3514, fixes the proportion of silver at in no case more than one-tenth of the whole alloy.

For all sums whatever the eagle is a legal tender for ten dollars. U. S. Rev. Stat. § 3585.

EALDERMAN (Sax.). A Saxon title of honor. It was a mark of honor very widely applicable, the ealdermen being of various ranks. It is the same as alderman, which see.

EAR-MARK. A mark put upon a thing for the purpose of distinction. Money in a bag tied and labelled is said to have an ear-mark. 3 Maule & S. 575.

Also used in equity in respect of property or a fund in the hands of a third party, which is capable of identification as belonging to the claimant out of possession.

The doctrine that money has no ear-mark is no longer law. Property entrusted to a person in a fiduciary capacity may be followed as long as it may be traced, and where a person holding money as trustee or in a fiduciary character mixed it with his own and draws out of the mixed fund for his own purposes, the court presumes that his own drawings are to come out of his own money; 13 Ch. D. 696. And see note to this case citing leading English cases in Brett's Leading Cases in Modern Equity 179; TRUST.

EAR-WITNESS. One who attests to things he has heard himself.

EARL. In English Law. A title of nobility next below a marquis and above a viscount.

Earls were anciently called comites, because they were wont comitari regem, to wait upon the king for counsel and advice. They were also called shiremen, because each earl had the civil government of a shire. After the Norman conquest they were called counts, whence the shires obtained the names of counties. They have now nothing to do with the government of counties, their duties having devolved on the sheriff, the earl's deputy, or vicecomes. 1 Bla. Com. 398.

EARL MARSHAL. An officer who formerly was of great repute in England. He held the court of chivalry alone as a court of honor, and in connection with the lord high constable as a court having criminal jurisdiction. 3 Bla. Com. 68; 4 id. 268. The duties of the office now are restricted to the settlement of matters of form merely. It would appear, from similarity of duties and from the derivation of the title, to be a relic of the ancient office of alderman of all England. See ALDERMAN.

EARL'S PENNY. A corruption for Arles penny. See ARLES; EARNEST.

EARLDOM. The dignity or jurisdiction of an earl. The dignity only remains now, as the jurisdiction has been given over to the sheriff; 1 Bla. Com. 339.

EARNEST. The payment of a sum of money or delivery of a thing or token, upon the making of a contract for the sale of goods, to bind the bargain, the delivery and acceptance of which marks the final and conclusive assent of both parties to the contract.

It has been defined to be the payment of a part of the price of goods sold, or the delivery of part of such goods, for the purpose of binding the contract. 108 Mass. 54.

It has been stated in a general way that the effect of earnest is to bind the goods sold; and, upon their being paid for without default, the buyer is entitled to them: but, notwithstanding the earnest, the money must be paid upon taking away the goods, because no other time for payment is appointed; earnest only binds the bargain, and gives the buyer a right to demand, but a demand without payment of the money is void; after earnest given, the vendor cannot sell the goods to another without a default in the vendee, and therefore if the latter does not come and pay, and take the goods, the vendor ought to go and request him, and then, if he does not come, pay for the goods, and take them away in convenient time, the agreement is dissolved, and the vendor is at liberty to sell them to any other person; 2 Bla. Com. 447; 2 Kent, Com. 495; 2 H. Bla. 316; Ayl. Pan. 450; 3 Campb. 426; 1 Bailey 537.

There is great difference of opinion as to the exact definition of this word. It had a signification at common law sufficiently well understood to warrant its use in the statute of frauds of 29 Car. II. § xvii. which makes parol sales of goods, etc., void unless there is a delivery, or the buyer "give something in earnest to bind the bargain, or in part payment."

The Roman law included two kinds of earnest, one being a contract prior to that of sale and independent of it, which was practically the payment of a sum of money for what we should now call an option to purchase, to be forfeited by the purchaser if he did not buy, while, if the other party was unwilling to sell, he must return the earnest and pay an equal amount as a forfeit. The other kind of earnest was that afterwards found in the common law and might be a thing, usually a ring, which either party, generally the buyer, gave to the other as a token. It is important in reading the civil law on this topic to bear in mind these two classes. Benj. Sales § 195. Justinian changed the law on this subject by providing that either party might rescind the sale by forfeiting the amount of the earnest money; Inst. l. 3. 23. 1. At least the text appears to be susceptible of no other meaning, but Pothier maintains that, after earnest, neither party could avoid the obligation; in this he is not followed by the later civilians. The same controversy has arisen upon a similar provision of the French code. The conclusion above stated is that of Benjamin, who cites the authorities; Sales § 198-200.

In Scotland the word arles is used for earnest, and is usually applied to a small sum given to a servant on hiring, as earnest that the wage will be paid.

The word earnest "has been supposed to flow from a Phœnician source, through the ἀρραβών of the Greeks, the arra or arrha of the Latin, and the arrhes of the French. . . . The general rule appears to have been that expressed in the Institutes III. 23: 'Is qui recusat adimplere contractum, sequidem est emptor, perdit quod dedit: si vero venditor, duplum restituere compellitur, licet super arris nihil expressum est.' Furthermore, the earnest did not lose that character, because the same thing might also avail as part payment: 'Datur autem arrha vel simpliciter (says Vinnius, on Inst. III. 24) ut sit argumentum duntaxat et probatio emptionis contractæ: veluti si annulus detur; vel ut simul postea cedat in partum pretii, data certa pecunia.' From the Roman law the principles relating to the earnest appear to have passed to the earlier jurisprudence of England: 'Item cum arrarum nomine (says Bracton ii. 27) aliquid datum fuerit ante traditionem, si emptorem emptionis pœnituerit, et a contractu resilire voluerit, perdat quod dedit: si autem venditorem, quod arrarum nomine receperit, emptori restituat duplicatum.' Though the liability of the vendor to return to the purchaser twice the amount of the deposit has long since departed from our law, the passage in question seems an authority for the proposition that the earnest is lost by the party who fails to perform the contract. That earnest and part payment are two distinct things is apparent from the 17th section of the statute of frauds, where they are treated as separate acts, each of which is sufficient to give validity to a parol contract." Fry, L. J., in 53 L. J. Ch. 1055, 1061.

Kent says it is only one mode of binding the bargain, and giving the buyer a right to the goods on payment; 2 Com. 495; it is a token or pledge passing between the parties by way of evidence or ratification of the sale. . . . It is mentioned in the statute of frauds, and in the French code, as an efficient act; but it has fallen into very general disuse in modern times, and seems rather to be suited to the manners of simple and unlettered ages, before the introduction of writing, than to the more precise and accurate habits of dealing at the present day. It has been omitted in the New York Revised Statutes; id. (14th ed.) 495, n. (b). That it has fallen into disuse is true both as to the giving of earnest in its ancient, strict, and technical sense, and to its having fallen into disuse has been attributed the tendency to treat earnest and part payment as meaning the same thing, though the language of the statute of frauds implies that the former is something to bind the bargain while no part payment can be made until the contract has been closed; Benj. Sales § 189.

One very recent definition is: "Specifically, in law, a part of the price of goods or service bargained for, which is paid at the time of the bargain to evidence the fact that the negotiation has ended in an actual contract. Hence it is said to bind the bargain." Cent Dict. And another is: "Something given by a buyer to a seller by way of token or pledge to bind the bargain; a part or portion of goods delivered into the possession of the buyer at the time of the sale as a pledge or security for the complete fulfilment of the contract; a handsel." Encyc. Dict. And the latter authority illustrates the function of earnest as evidence of the conclusion of the contract by the Scotch law which holds a party who resiles, to fulfil the contract as well as to forfeit the earnest paid.

It is sometimes said that the question whether the earnest shall count as part of the price or wage depends on the intention of the parties, which, in the absence of direct evidence, will be inferred from the proportion which it bears to the whole sum. Int. Cyc. "If a shilling be given in the purchase of a ship or of a box of diamonds, it is presumed to be given merely in evidence of the bargain, or, in the common way of speaking, is dead earnest; but if the sum be more considerable it is reckoned up in the price." Ersk. Inst. b. iii. tit. iii. § 5.

Another writer considers "that the original view of earnest in England was, that it was a payment of a small portion of the price or wage, in token of the conclusion of the contract; and as this view seems to have been adhered to, the sum, however small, would probably then be counted as a part payment." Sto. Sales 216.

It has been a mooted question whether at common law either earnest or delivery was necessary to perfect a sale of chattels; in a case where it was objected that because there was neither, there could not be a recovery for the breach of a parol contract of sale, it was said: Earnest paid is not necessary to complete a parol contract of sale; when made, it only prevents the vendor, under any circumstances, from rescinding the contract without the assent of the vendee; and this by common law, and not by any statute; 3 Ired. 236.

It has been much discussed whether the giving of earnest has any effect to pass the title to the property sold; and in earlier cases of the sale of specific chattels it was so held; Shep. Touchst. 224; Buller, J., in 5 Term 409; 7 East 558; Noy, Max. 87-9; 2 Bla. Com. 447-9; but see the analysis of these authorities; Benj. Sales §§ 355-6. It is said by this learned writer on the subject, that there is no case in which this has been held when a completed bargain, if in writing, would not have altered the property; id. § 357; and it is concluded that the true legal effect of earnest is simply to afford conclusive evidence of a bargain actually completed with the mutual intention that it should be binding on both; and whether the property has passed in such cases is to be tested, not by the fact that earnest was given, but by the true nature of the contract concluded by the giving of earnest; id. Hence with respect to the remedy of the seller, if the buyer refuse to take the property sold, the law of earnest, properly speaking, is not concerned; but it is to be treated as in the case of contracts otherwise legally evidenced. See 2 Kent, Com. Lacey's ed. 496, note 51; SALES.

To constitute earnest to bind the bargain something must be paid or given. An instance is reported where, the buyer having drawn a shilling across the palm of the seller and returned it to his own pocket, according to a custom alleged to exist in the north of England, it was held that the statute was not satisfied; 7 Taunt. 597. This has been said to be the only reported case; Benj. Sales § 191; but it has been held in the United States that money left in the hands of a third person as a forfeiture is not sufficient; 108 Mass. 54; much less a deposit of a check; 60 Mo. App. 635; 30 Ind. 103. The three cases last cited are usually referred to in connection with the subject of earnest. In the Massachusetts case, the question was as to the recovery of money deposited as a forfeiture, which it was argued was earnest to bind the bargain in case of a refusal to take the goods, and the court said that earnest, as used in the statute of frauds, was part payment. On the strength of this case a text-writer on the law of that state adopts the statement as a definition of earnest; Usher, Sales Per. Prop. § 113. So an authoritative writer on the statute of frauds uses the terms, earnest and part payment, as interchangeable, and discusses the question of when earnest must be paid mainly upon New York cases, although in that state the exception is confined to part payment, the "giving something in earnest" being omitted; Reed, Stat. Fr. § 226. While, therefore, the clear and philosophical definitions of the nature and effect of earnest cited from Benjamin on Sales unquestionably commend themselves as better satisfying the apparent purpose of the statute to designate two distinct acts, it must be admitted that they are constantly referred to by American courts and writers as alternative expressions of the same thing. Consequently the cases cited in text-books as laying down rules as to earnest are usually found, on examination, to be in fact cases of part payment, and they must be so read. This use of the words, interchangeably, makes unavoidable a reference to the cases just referred to, especially since the word earnest, in addition to what has been indicated as its real signification, has, in this country, certainly, an acquired meaning too general to be disregarded.

In part payment something having value must pass from the buyer to the seller; 16 M. & W. 302; 12 Barb. 570; 30 id. 265; 49 id. 348; an unaccepted tender to the vendor on a call for part payment by him will not suffice to bind him, as when a remittance by mail of a check was returned to the sender; 41 Vt. 676; nor the promissory note of the buyer; 10 Barb. 573; 26 Wis. 511; 68 Ind. 278; even if there were an express agreement that the note should be received as part payment, which in this instance there was not; id.; in this case it was held that the note was not only ineffectual as part payment, but that it could not be regarded as earnest, sufficient to bind the bargain. After referring to the Massachusetts decision, supra, that, as used in the statute of frauds, earnest was regarded as part payment of the price, the court said: "But, conceding that it may be something distinct from payment, it is quite clear that it must have some value. The note has no value whatever, because it had no consideration to support it, and its payment could not, therefore, have been enforced. To say that such a note has value, is but grasping at a shadow, and losing sight of the substance. The contract for the sale of the hogs not being valid, the note given in consideration of the agreement therefor was based upon no valid consideration;" id.; 33 N. Y. 519; 12 Barb. 570. But see 13 M. & W. 53; Byles, Bills *386; Chitty, Cont. 11th. Am. ed. 865. But when the contract was partly performed by compliance with a condition, and a note was tendered for the price, it was considered that the statute was satisfied; 16 Barb. 277. A note of a third person accepted as payment is sufficient; 10 Barb. 573; or a check if paid is a payment relating back to the time when given; 17 Hun 135; a stipulation that borrowed money owing from the seller to the buyer shall be treated as part payment will avail; 33 Barb. 543; but not an agreement to credit an account due from the seller and send goods for the balance; 43 N. E. Rep. (Ind.) 575; or a promise to pay a part of the purchase money to a creditor of the vendor or credit it in the account against him; 5 Hill 204; but if such debt be actually paid it is good; 21 U. C. Q. B. 340; or if accepting the promise the creditor discharge the vendor; 10 Wis. 425; but the payment must be made at the time of the agreement; 34 id. 83; and if there was no entry in the account stating that the credit was given on account of the transactions in suit it was insufficient; 44 Barb. 96. A mere agreement that the price shall go in settlement of an existing account is not sufficient without more; 30 Barb. 265; 16 M. & W. 302; 36 Ala. 675; 16 L. J. Ex. 120; nor is an agreement to sell one article and take another in part payment; 1 Hilt. 366. Part payment may be by the actual delivery of anything of value, as a chattel; 37 Vt. 108; but a delivery of goods must be sufficient within the statute of frauds if they were in litigation; 64 Barb. 275.

With respect to the time at which part payment must be made, it is in some states required to be at the time of making the contract; 63 N. W. Rep. (Wis.) 1057. It was so held in New York; 20 Wend. 63; though in a later case the question was raised and not determined; 53 N. Y. 119; the same day is sufficient; 30 Barb. 265; and so was a payment asked and received on the following day, the contract being held to be then made for the first time; 39 N. Y. 281. See 57 id. 375. And when a check is given and paid upon presentation it is a payment at the time; 84 N. Y. 549; so also a check upon a deposit in bank; 70 Fed. Rep. 190. In some cases it has been held that payment is not so restricted; 7 U. C. C. P. 133; 12 Metc. 435; 13 Me. 424; 48 N. H. 189. It is to be observed that this question of time arises with more frequency under the New York statute which does not provide for earnest eo nomine, but only for part payment "at the time," as does also the Wisconsin statute.

See Benjamin; Blackburn; Story, Sales; Browne; Reed, Statute of Frauds; FRAUDS, STATUTE OF; PAYMENT; SALES.

EARNINGS. The word has been used to denote a larger class of credits than would be included in the term wages. 102 Mass. 235; 115 id. 165. See 131 id. 534. It also means the gains of the debtor derived from his services or labor without the aid of capital; 20 Wis. 330.

Surplus earnings, is an amount owned by a company, over and above the capital and actual liabilities. 76 N. Y. 74.

Net earnings, generally speaking, are the excess of the gross earnings over the expenditures defrayed in producing them, aside from, and exclusive of, the expenditure of capital laid out in constructing and equipping the works themselves. 99 U. S. 420. See DIVIDENDS.

EARTH. Clay, gravel, loam and the like, in distinction from the firm rock. The term also includes hard-pan, which is a hard stratum of earth. 75 N. Y. 76.

EASEMENT. A right in the owner of one parcel of land, by reason of such ownership, to use the land of another for a special purpose not inconsistent with a general property in the owner. 2 Washb. R. P. 25; 60 Vt. 702.

A privilege which the owner of one adjacent tenement hath of another, existing in respect of their several tenements, by which that owner against whose tenement the privilege exists is obliged to suffer or not to do something on or in regard to his own land for the advantage of him in whose land the privilege exists. Termes de la Ley, Easements; Bell, Dict., Easements; Servitude; 1 S. & R. 298; 3 B. & C. 339; 2 M'Cord 451; 3 Pick. 408; 74 Ill. 183; 47 Md. 301; 50 Vt. 361; 71 Tex. 690; 73 Wis. 178.

Although the terms are sometimes used as if convertible, properly speaking easement refers to the right enjoyed by one and servitude the burden imposed upon the other.

An interest in land created by grant or agreement, express or implied, which confers a right upon the owner thereof to some profit, benefit, dominion, or lawful use out of or over the estate of another. 113 N. Y. 81.

In the civil law, the land against which the privilege exists is called the servient tenement; its proprietor, the servient owner; he in whose favor it exists, the dominant owner; his land, the dominant tenement. And, as these rights are not personal and do not change with the persons who may own the respective estates, it is very common to personify the estates as themselves owning or enjoying the easements; 4 Sandf. Ch. 72; 3 Paige, Ch. 254; 16 Pick. 522.

Easements are of two kinds—appurtenant or appendant, and in gross. The former run with the land, and pass by a deed of conveyance; but the latter are personal, are not assignable, and will not pass by a deed of conveyance; Washb. Easem. 12; 61 Pa. 38; Ld. Raym. 407; 110 Ill. 268. See 14 L. R. A. 333, n., as to the right to assign or transmit easements in gross. A way is never presumed to be in gross when it can be construed to be appurtenant to the land; 83 Va. 462.

Easements are also classified as continuous and discontinuous, the precise distinction between them being thus stated: "Continuous are those of which the enjoyment is, or may be, continual, without the necessity of any actual interference by man. Discontinuous are those, the enjoyment of which can be had only by the interference of man, as rights of way, or a right to draw water." 21 N. Y. 505. Of the former the right to light and air would be an example, of the latter, the right to use a pump; Chase's Bla. Com. 232, note, which see as to Easements generally.

Easements have these essential qualities. There must be two tenements owned by distinct proprietors: the dominant, to which the privilege is attached; the servient, upon which it is imposed. Tudor, Lead. Cas. 108; 17 Mass. 443; 29 Ohio St. 642.

Easements, strictly considered, exist only in favor of, and are imposed only on, corporeal property; 2 Washb. R. P. 25. They confer no right to any profits arising from the servient tenement; 4 Pick. 145; 30 E. L. & Eq. 189; 70 N. Y. 419. They are incorporeal. Like other incorporeal hereditaments they have been held not to pass without a grant; 3 Kent, Com. 434; 2 Mart. 214. By the common law, they may be temporary; by the civil law, the cause must be perpetual. They impose no duty on the servient owner, except not to change his tenement to the prejudice or destruction of the privilege; Gale, Easem. 3d ed. 1; Washb. Easem. 5.

Easements are as various as the exigencies of domestic convenience or the purposes to which buildings and lands may be applied.

The following attach to land as incidents or appurtenances, viz.: the right—

Of pasture on other land; of fishing in other waters; of taking game on other land; of way over other land; of taking wood, minerals, or other produce of the soil from other land; of receiving air, light, or heat from or over other land; of receiving or discharging water over, or having support to buildings from, other land; 3 E. B. & E. 655; of a right to take ice on a pond; 93 Mich. 450; of going on other land to clear a mill-stream, or repair its banks, or draw water from a spring there, or to do some other act not involving ownership; of carrying on an offensive trade; 2 Bingham, N. C. 134; 5 Metc. 8; of burying in a church, or a particular vault; 8 Hou. L. Cas. 362; 11 Q. B. 666; 29 Gratt. 347; 123 Mass. 155, 562; 71 N. Y. 194; 134 id. 435. Projection of a cornice on a house over an adjoining lot, apparent and continuous for over 20 years, raises a conclusive presumption of right to maintain it; 153 Pa. 291.

The right to maintain a building or other permanent structure upon the land of another cannot be acquired by custom; 148 Mass. 309.

Where the owner of a tract of land fronting upon a public highway sells a portion thereof which is entirely surrounded by the land of the grantor and of strangers with no outlet, except over the lands of the grantor, the grantee is entitled to a right of way over the grantor's land, unless the situation of the land or the object for which it is used and conveyed shows that no grant of such right was intended; 40 Kan. 203. See 65 Vt. 333.

Some of these are affirmative or positive, —i.e., authorizing the commission of acts on the lands of another actually injurious to it; as, a right of way,—or negative, being only consequentially injurious; as, forbidding the owner from building to the obstruction of light to the dominant tenement. Tudor, Lead. Cas. 107; 2 Washb. R. P. 26.

All easements must originate in a grant or agreement, express or implied, of the owner of the servient tenement; 113 N. Y. 81. The evidence of their existence, by the common law, may be by proof of the agreement itself, or by prescription, requiring an uninterrupted enjoyment immemorially, or for upwards of twenty years, to the extent of the easement claimed, from which a grant is implied. A negative easement does not admit of possession; and, by the civil law, it cannot be acquired by prescription, and can only be proved by grant. Use, therefore, is not essential to its existence; Gale, Easem. 23, 81, 128; 2 Bla. Com. 263; Bell, Law Dict. Servitudes. An easement can only be created by a conveyance under seal or by long user, from which such conveyance is presumed; 97 N. C. 271; see 100 N. C. 161; or by necessity; 46 N. Y. 379; 117 Ill. 643; and the burden is on one claiming that it was by virtue of a license, to prove that fact; 68 Hun 269. As to the creation of easements by deed, see 8 L. R. A. 617, n.; and by implication; 13 id. 126.

In case of a division of an estate consisting of two or more heritages, the question whether an easement or convenience, which may have been used in favor of one in or over the other by the common owner of both, shall become attached to the one or charged upon the other in the hands of separate owners, by a grant of one or both of those parts, or upon a partition thereof, must depend, where there are no words limiting or defining what is intended to be embraced in the deed or partition, upon whether the easement is necessary for the reasonable enjoyment of the part of the heritage claimed as an appurtenance.

Where it is not necessary, it requires descriptive words of grant or reservation in the deed to create it: Washb. Easem. 95; 36 Am. Rep. 415. The common-law rule requiring the word "heirs" in the creation of an estate of inheritance by deed is inapplicable in creating a permanent easement; 62 Conn. 195; 93 Mich. 599. See 157 Mass. 489. The use of the word appurtenances is not sufficient to create an easement where none existed before; 66 Miss. 136.

An easement in land held in common cannot be acquired by one of the tenants in common in favor of land held by him in severalty, as a right of flowage over common property by a tenant owning a dam; 15 N. H. 412; or a right of way over the common land by the tenant to a lot in the rear owned by him; 65 Ga. 468.

Easements are extinguished: by release; by merger, when the two tenements in respect of which they exist are united under the same title and to the same person; 68 N. Y. 62; by necessity, or abandonment, as by a license to the servient owner to do some act inconsistent with its existence; 53 N. Y. 622; by cessation of enjoyment, when acquired by prescription,—the non-user being evidence of a release where the abandonment has continued at least as long as the user from which the right arose. In some cases a shorter time will suffice; 2 Washb. R. P. 56, 82, 453. See 3 Kent 550; Cruise, Dig. tit. 31. c. 1. 9. 17; Gale, Easem.; 63 Me. 334; 26 Pa. 438; 73 id. 179; 69 Tex. 449; 120 Ill. 200. An easement acquired by grant cannot be lost by mere non-user, though it may be by non-user coupled with an intention of abandonment; 110 N. Y. 595; 134 id. 450.

Prescription does not run against the exercise of a servitude in favor of one who resisted and prevented its exercise; 40 La. Ann. 425. Mere non-user must be accompanied by adverse use of the servient estate; 18 L. R. A. 535, with note on the effect of non-user generally. One cannot acquire a prescriptive right over his own lands or the lands of another which he occupies as tenant; 116 Mo. 379.

An easement in favor of land held in common will be extinguished by a partition, if nothing is said about it; 1 Barb. 592. As to the loss or extinguishment of easements, see 1 L. R. A. 214, n.

The remedy at common law for interference with a right of easement is an action of trespass, or where it is for consequential damages and for an act not done on plaintiff's own land, of case; 8 Blackf. 317; 14 Allen 40. Where the act complained of is done in one county, but the injurious consequences thereof are felt in another, the action may be brought in the latter; 9 Pick. 59; 5 Fost. 525. Redress may also, as a general proposition, be obtained through a court of equity, for the infringement of an easement and an injunction will be granted to prevent the same; Washb. Easem. 747.

See Washburn, Easements; BACKWATER; AIR; ANCIENT LIGHTS; COMMON; DAM; HIGHWAY; PARTY-WALL; PROFIT A PRENDRE; SERVITUDE; STREET; SUPPORT; WAY.

EASTERLY. When this word is used alone it will be construed to mean due east; but this is a rule of necessity, growing out of the indefiniteness of the term and has no application where other words are used for the purpose of qualifying its meaning. Where such is the case it means precisely what the qualifying word makes it mean; 32 Cal. 227.

EASTER TERM. In English Law. Formerly one of the four movable terms of the courts, but afterwards a fixed term, beginning on the 15th of April and ending on the 8th of May in every year, though sometimes prolonged so late as the 13th of May, under stat. 11 Geo. IV. and 1 Will. IV. c. 70. See TERM.

EAT INDE SINE DIE. Words used on an acquittal, or when a prisoner is to be discharged, that he may go without day; that is that he be dismissed. Dane, Abr. Index.

EAVES-DROPPERS. In Criminal Law. Such persons as wait under walls or windows or the eaves of a house, to listen to discourses and thereupon to frame mischievous tales.

The common-law punishment for this offence is fine and finding sureties for good behavior; 4 Bla. Com. 167; 1 Rus. Cr. 302; 2 Ov. Tenn. 108. See 4 Clark Pa. 5; 1 Bish. Cr. L. § 112; 3 Head 299; 8 Haz. Pa. Reg. 305.

EBB AND FLOW. An expression used formerly in this country to denote the limits of admiralty jurisdiction. This jurisdiction is discussed in 3 Mas. 127; 2 Story 176; 2 Gall. 398; 4 Wall. 562; 8 id. 15. In the last case, the jurisdiction was extended not merely to the high seas and the ebb and flow of the tide, but to all the navigable waters of the United States, including the great lakes and rivers. See Curt. Jurisd. of Courts of U. S.

EBEREMURDER. See ABEREMURDER.

ECCHYMOSIS. In Medical Jurisprudence. Blackness. An extravasation of blood by rupture of capillary vessels, and hence it follows contusion; but it may exist, as in cases of scurvy and other morbid conditions, without the latter. Ryan Med. Jur. 172. Ecchymoses produced by blows upon a body but a few hours dead cannot be distinguished from those produced during life. 1 Witth. & Beck. Med. Jur. 485; 2 Beck. Med. Jur. 22.

ECCLESIA (Lat.). An assembly. A Christian assembly; a church. A place of religious worship. Spelman, Gloss.

In the civil law this word retains its classical meaning of an assembly of whatever character. Du Cange; Calvinus, Lex.; Vicat. Voc. Jur.; Acts

xix. 39. Ordinarily in the New Testament the word denotes a Christian assembly, and is rendered into English by the word church. It occurs twice in the gospels, Matt. xvi. 18, xviii. 17, but frequently in the other parts of the New Testament, beginning with Acts ii. 47. Ecclesia there never denotes the building, however, as its English equivalent church does. In the law, generally, the word is used to denote a place of religious worship, and sometimes a parsonage. Spelman, Gloss. See CHURCH.

ECCLESIASTIC. A clergyman; one destined to the divine ministry: as, a bishop, a priest, a deacon.

ECCLESIASTICAL COMMISSIONERS. In English Law. A body appointed to consider the state of the revenues, and the more equal distribution of episcopal duties, in the several dioceses. They were first appointed as royal commissioners in 1835; were incorporated in 1836, and now comprise the bishops and chief justices, and other persons of distinction. 2 Steph. Com. 748.

ECCLESIASTICAL CORPORATIONS. Such corporations as are composed of persons who take a lively interest in the advancement of religion, and who are associated and incorporated for that purpose. Ang. & A. Corp. § 36.

Corporations whose members are spiritual persons are distinguished from lay corporations; 1 Bla. Com. 470.

They are generally called religious corporations in the United States. 2 Kent 274; Ang. & A. Corp. § 37.

ECCLESIASTICAL COURTS (called, also, Courts Christian). In English Ecclesiastical Law. The generic name for certain courts in England having cognizance mainly of spiritual matters.

The jurisdiction which they formerly exercised in testamentary and matrimonial causes has been taken away. Stat. 20 & 21 Vict. c. 77, § 3, c. 85, § 2; 21 & 22 Vict. c. 95. See 3 Bla. Com. 67.

They consist of the archdeacon's court, the consistory courts, the court of arches, the court of peculiars, the prerogative courts of the two archbishops, the faculty court, and, on appeal, the privy council.

ECCLESIASTICAL LAW. The law of the church.

The existence in England of a separate order of ecclesiastical courts, and a separate system of law by them administered, may be traced back to the time of William the Conqueror, who separated the civil and the ecclesiastical jurisdictions, and forbade tribunals of either class from assuming cognizance of cases pertaining to the other. The elements of the English ecclesiastical law are the canon law, the civil law, the common law of England, and the statutes of the realm. The jurisdiction of the ecclesiastical tribunals extended to matters concerning the order of clergy and their discipline, and also to such affairs of the laity as "concern the health of the soul;" and under this latter theory it grasped also cases of marriage and divorce, and testamentary causes. But in more recent times, 1830-1858, these latter subjects have been taken from these courts, and they are now substantially confined to administering the judicial authority and discipline incident to a national ecclesiastical establishment. See, also, CANON LAW.

ECHOUEMENT. In French Marine Law. Stranding. Black, L. Dict.

ECLAMPSIA PARTURIENTIIUM. In Medical Jurisprudence. Puerperal convulsions. Convulsive movements, loss of consciousness, and coma occurring during pregnancy, parturition or the puerperium. The attack closely resembles the convulsions of epilepsy. The disease is often fatal, causing the death of the patient in about one-fourth of all the cases, and foetal death in about one-half. Mental defects may result from eclampsia, and are occasionally permanent. American Text-book of Obstetrics.

The word eclampsia is of Greek origin Significat splendorem, fulgorem, effulgentiam, et emicationem quales ex oculis aliquando prodeunt. Metaphorice sumitur de emicatione flammæ vitalis in pubertate et ætatis vigore. Castelli, Lex. Medic.

An ordinary person, it is said, would scarcely observe it, and it requires the practised and skilled eye of a physician to discover that the patient is acting in total unconsciousness of the nature and effect of her acts. There can be but little doubt that many of the tragical cases of infanticide proceed from this cause. The criminal judge and lawyer cannot inquire with too much care into the symptoms of this disease, in order to discover the guilt of the mother, where it exists, and to ascertain her innocence, where it does not. See two well-reported cases of this kind in the Boston Medical Journal, vol. 27, no. 10, p. 161.

ECUADOR. A republic of South America, founded in 1830. It has a president elected for four years by the people. It has a congress consisting of a senate with two members elected by each province for four years and a chamber of deputies elected by the people for two years. It has one supreme court, six superior courts, alcaldes in each canton, who have jurisdiction of criminal cases, and two civil justices in each parish. It has also consular courts in Guayaquil and Quito.

EDICT (Lat. edictum). A law ordained by the sovereign, by which he forbids or commands something: it extends either to the whole country or only to some particular provinces.

Edicts are somewhat similar to public proclamations. Their difference consists in this,—that the former have authority and form of law in themselves, whereas the latter are, at most, declarations of a law before enacted.

Among the Romans this word sometimes signified a citation to appear before a judge. The edicts of the emperors, also called constitutiones principum, were new laws which they made of their own motion, either to decide cases which they had foreseen, or to abolish or change some ancient laws. They were different from rescripts or decrees, which were answers given in deciding questions brought before them. These edicts contributed to the formation of the Georgian, Hermogenian, Theodosian, and Justinian codes. See Dig. l. 4. 1. 1; Inst. l. 2. 7; Code l. 1; Nov. 139.

EDICTAL CITATION. In Scotch Law. A citation against a "foreigner" who is not in Scotland, but who has a landed estate there, or against a native of Scotland who is not in Scotland.

EDICTS OF JUSTINIAN. Thirteen constitutions or laws of this prince, found in most editions of the Corpus Juris Civilis after the Novels. Being confined to matters of police in the provinces of the empire, they are of little use.

EDICTUM PERPETUUM (Lat.). The title of a compilation of all the edicts. The collection is in fifty books, and was made by Salvius Julianus, a jurist acting by command of the emperor Adrian. Parts of this collection are cited in the Digest.

EDITUS. In old English Law. Put forth or promulgated when speaking of the passage of a statute; and brought forth or born, when speaking of the birth of a child. Black, L. Dict.

EDUCATE. Includes proper moral, as well as intellectual and physical instruction. 6 Heisk. 395. See 39 Cal. 80; 10 Pick. 507; 105 Mass. 420; 29 N. J. Eq. 36.

EDUCATION. The result of educating in knowledge, skill, or discipline of character, acquired; also the act or process of training by a prescribed or customary course of study or discipline. Webster. See 7 H. L. Cas. 713.

It may be directed particularly to either the mental, moral, or physical powers and faculties, but in its broadest and best sense it refers to them all; 145 Mass. 146.

Legal Education. This subject has been for several years receiving earnest and extended attention in England and the United States. It has been elaborately treated at various times by committees of the American Bar Association, in which a report was made in 1879 by Carleton Hunt, chairman, and subsequent reports in 1881, 1890, 1891, and 1892. See the annual reports of those years. In 1893 the association formed a section of legal education, which has held yearly conferences for the reading of papers and discussion on the subject, which has been ably and elaborately treated. See the annual reports from 1893 to 1896. Its work in 1894 was published by the United States in the reports of the Commissioner of Education.

The subject has also been much discussed by various State Bar Associations, as will appear by reference to their published reports. See Pennsylvania State Bar Association, 1895 and 1896; Georgia, 1894, 1895; Virginia, 1895.

An interesting address by Lord Russell of Killowen, Lord Chief Justice of England, was delivered before the Benchers of Lincoln's Inn, October, 1895. See also a paper by Austen G. Fox on the work of the New York State Board of Examiners; Am. Bar Assn. Report, 1896, and 10 Harv. L. Rev. 199. The following is a partial list of books and papers on the subject:

See numerous other references in Jones's Index of Legal Periodicals.

EFFECT. The operation of a law, of an agreement, or an act, is called its effect. 4 Ind. 342.

By the laws of the United States, a patent cannot be granted for an effect only, but it may be for a new mode or application of machinery to produce effects; 1 Gall. 478. See 4 Mas. 1; 1 Pet. C. C. 394; 1 Robinson, Pat. §§ 147, 148.

EFFECTS. Property, or worldly substance. As thus used, it denotes property in a more extensive sense than goods. 2 Bla. Com. 284. See 7 Fed. Rep. 361. Indeed the word may be used to embrace every kind of property, real and personal, including things in action; as, a ship at sea; 1 Hill, S. C. 155; a bond; 3 Minn. 389; 16 East 222.

In a will, "effects" may carry the whole personal estate; 5 Madd. 72; 15 Ves. 507; but not real estate; unless the word "real" be added; 2 Pow. Dev. 167; 15 M. & W. 450; 3 Cranch 206; Schouler, Wills § 509. When preceded or followed in a will by words of narrower import, if the bequest is not residuary, it will be confined to species of property of the same kind (ejusdem generis) with those previously described; 13 Ves. 39; Rop. Leg. 210. See 2 Sharsw. Bla. Com. 384, n. Generally speaking the word "effects" in a will, is equivalent to "property" or "worldly substance"; but the interpretation may be restricted to articles ejusdem generis with those previously enumerated or specified; 1 Ves. Jr. 143; 15 Ves. 500.

When "the effects" passes realty, and when personalty, in a will, see 1 Jarm. Wills 585, 590; Beach, Wills 457, 470; 14 How. 400, 420; 1 Cowp. 307; L. R. 8 Ch. Div. 561; WILL.

EFFIGY. The figure or representation of a person.

To make the effigy of a person with an intent to make him the object of ridicule, is libel (q. v.). Hawk. Pl. Cr. b. 1, c. 73, s. 2; 14 East 227; 2 Chitty, Cr. Law 866.

In France an execution by effigy or in effigy is adopted in the case of a criminal who has fled from justice. By the public exposure or exhibition of a picture or representation of him on a scaffold, on which his name and the decree condemning him are written, he is deemed to undergo the punishment to which he has been sentenced. Since the adoption of the Code Civil, the practice has been to affix the names, qualities, or addition, and the residence, of the condemned person, together with an extract from the sentence of condemnation, to a post set upright in the ground, instead of exhibiting a portrait of him on the scaffold. Répert. de Villargues; Biret, Vocab.

EFFRACTION. A breach made by the use of force.

EFFRACTOR. One who breaks through; one who commits a burglary.

EGO. I, myself. This term is used in forming genealogical tables, to represent the person who is the object of inquiry.

EGYPT. This is nominally a province of the Ottoman Empire in the northern part of Africa, whose affairs are administered by the khedive under the supervision of England, which intervened in 1882. It has a legislative council composed of thirty members. Since the British intervention new native tribunals have been established. Litigation between foreigners and natives is carried on by mixed tribunals. Eight of the judges in the Native Court of Appeals are Europeans. The country is divided into districts to which judges from the tribunals are delegated, and from which there is no appeal.

EIGHT HOUR LAWS. Statutes making eight hours a day's labor for workmen, laborers, and mechanics.

Eight hours shall constitute a day's work for all laborers, workmen, and mechanics who may be employed by or on behalf of the United States. R. S. § 3738. This act is not a contract between the government and its laborers that eight hours shall constitute a day's work. It neither prevents the government from making agreements with them, by which their labor may be more or less than eight hours a day, nor does it prescribe the amount of compensation for that or any other number of hours' labor; 94 U. S. 400.

On May 24, 1888, a law was passed directing that eight hours should constitute a day's work for letter-carriers in the United States, and for time worked in excess of that number of hours they should be paid extra (25 Stat. L. 157). Under this statute the supreme court held that a letter-carrier was entitled to eight hours' work each day, and that over time on one day could not be set off against a deficiency on another; 148 U. S. 134. See FACTORY ACT.

EIGNE. A corruption of the French word ainé. Eldest or first-born.

It is frequently used in our old law-books; bastard eigne signifies an elder bastard when spoken of two children, one of whom was born before the marriage of his parents and the other after: the latter is called mulier puisne. Littleton, sect. 399.

EIK. In Scotch Law. An addition; as eik to a reversion, eik to a confirmation. Bell, Dict.

EINETIUS. In English Law. The oldest; the first-born. Spelman, Gloss.

EIRE, or EYRE. In English Law. A journey. See EYRE.

EISNE. The senior; the oldest son. Spelled, also, eigne, einsne, aisne, eign. Termes de la Ley; 1 Kelham.

EISNETIA, EINETIA (Lat.). The share of the oldest son. The portion acquired by primogeniture. Termes de la Ley; Co. Litt. 166 b; Cowel.

EITHER. May be used in the sense of each. 59 Ill. 87.

EJECTION. Turning out of possession. 3 Bla. Com. 199.

The term is in general use with reference to the removal of an obnoxious person from the conveyance of a common carrier.

It must be conceded that the carrier, as an incident to its public employment, not only has the power, but is bound to take all reasonable and proper means to insure the safety and provide for the comfort and convenience of its passengers, and it follows that it has the right, in the exercise of this authority and duty, to repress and prohibit all disorderly conduct in its vehicles, and to expel or exclude therefrom any person whose conduct or condition is such as to render acts of impropriety, rudeness, indecency, or disturbance either inevitable or reasonably probable; Ray, Pas. Carriers 165.

A person who steps upon a car after he has once been put off is a trespasser, regardless of his right to be on the car in the first instance; 40 Ill. App. 421. In ejecting a passenger from a car no more force than is necessary should be used; 35 Neb. 74.

An action on the case in tort is proper against a carrier for wrongfully ejecting from its train a passenger who has paid his fare, though no force is used; 36 W. Va. 318.

As to ejection of passengers for refusal to pay fare, see 12 Lawy. Rep. Ann. 823; PASSENGERS; COMMON CARRIERS OF PASSENGERS; TICKET.

EJECTIONE CUSTODIÆ (Lat.). A writ of which lay for a guardian to recover the land or person of his ward, or both, where he had been deprived of the possession of them. Fitzh. N. B. 139, L.; Co. Litt. 199.

EJECTIONE FIRMÆ (Lat. ejectment from a farm). This writ lay where lands or tenements were let for a term of years, and afterwards the lessor, reversioner, remainderman, or a stranger ejected or ousted the lessee of his term. The plaintiff, if he prevailed, recovered the term with damages. Hence Blackstone calls this a mixed action, somewhat between real and personal; for therein are two things recovered, as well restitution of the "term of years," as damages for the ouster or wrong. This writ is the original foundation of the action of ejectment. 3 Sharsw. Bla. Com. 199; Fitzh. N. B. 220, F. G; Gibson, Eject. 3; Stearn, Real Act. 53, 400.

EJECTMENT (Lat. e, out of, jacere, to throw, cast; ejicere, to cast out, to eject).

In Practice. A form of action by which possessory titles to corporeal hereditaments may be tried and possession obtained.

A form of action which lies to regain the possession of real property, with damages for the unlawful detention.

In its origin, during the reign of Edw. III., this action was an action of trespass which lay for a tenant for years, to recover damages against a person who had ousted him of his possession without right. To the judgment for damages the courts soon added a judgment for possession, upon which the plaintiff became entitled to a writ of possession. The action of de ejectione firmæ (q. v.), was framed to meet the case of the termor, and just at the close of the middle ages it was held that under it he could recover his term. As to its history see 2 Poll. & Maitl. 105. As the disadvantages of real actions as a means of recovering land for the benefit of the real owner from the possession of one who held them without title became a serious obstacle to their use, this form of action was taken advantage of by Ch. J. Rolle to accomplish the same result.

In the original action, the plaintiff had been obliged to prove a lease from the person shown to have title, an entry under the lease, and an ouster by some third person. The modified action as sanctioned by Rolle was brought by a fictitious person as lessee against another fictitious person (the casual ejector) alleged to have committed the ouster. Service was made upon the tenant in possession, with a notice annexed from the casual ejector to appear and defend. If the tenant failed to do this, judgment was given by default and the claimant put in possession. If he did appear, he was allowed to defend only by entering into the consent rule, by which he confessed the fictitious lease, entry, and ouster to have been made, leaving only the title in question. The tenant by a subsequent statute was obliged, under heavy penalties, to give notice to his lessor of the pendency of the action.

The action has been superseded in England under the Common Law Procedure Act (1832, §§ 170-220) by a writ, in a prescribed form, addressed, on the claimant's part, to the person or persons in possession, by name, and generally "to all persons entitled to defend the possession" of the premises therein described; commanding such of them as deny the claimant's title to appear in court and defend the possession of the property. Not only the person to whom the writ is directed, but any other person (on filing an affidavit that he or his tenant is in possession, and obtaining the leave of the court or a judge), is allowed to appear and defend.

Ejectment has been materially modified in many of the states of the United States, though still retaining the name; but is retained in its original form in others, and in the United States courts for those states in which it existed when the circuit courts were organized. In some of the United States it has never been in use. See 3 Bla. Com. 198.

The action lies for the recovery of corporeal hereditaments only; 7 Watts 318; 5 Denio 389; including a room in a house; 1 Harris, N. J. 202; upon which there may have been an entry and of which the sheriff can deliver possession to the plaintiff; 9 Johns. 298; 15 Conn. 137; and not for incorporeal hereditaments; 2 Yeates 331; 3 Green, N. J. 191; 17 Or. 510; or, rights of dower; 17 Johns. 167; 10 S. & R. 326; or a right of way; 1 N. Chipm. 204; 40 Mich. 232; or a rent reserved; 5 Denio 477. See 20 Miss. 373. One is liable in ejectment for the projection of his roof over another's land; 60 Vt. 723.

The recording of a tax-deed of wild and unoccupied lands is such an assertion of title by the grantee as to authorize ejectment by the original owner; 80 Wis. 387.

It may be brought upon a right to an estate in fee-simple, fee-tail, for life, or for years, if only there be a right of entry and possession in the plaintiff; 5 Ohio 28; 10 Mo. 229; 10 Gill & J. 443; 1 Wash. A railroad company which has condemned lands for railroad purposes has a sufficient title to sustain an action; 152 Pa. 488.

Plaintiff in ejectment may recover as against a mere trespasser, on proof of his former possession only, without regard to his title; 83 Ala. 220; 38 Fed. Rep. 789; 77 Ga. 262; 87 Ky. 559; 71 Tex. 132.

The real plaintiff must recover on the strength of his own title, and cannot rely on the weakness of the defendant's; 1 East 246; 2 S. & R. 65; 6 Vt. 631; 4 Halst. 149; 2 Ov. 185; 3 Humphr. 614; 2 H. & J. 112; 1 Blackf. 341; 19 Miss. 249; 6 Ired. 159; 1 Cal. 295; 27 Ala. It may be maintained by one joint tenant or tenants in common against another who has dispossessed him; 2 Ohio 110; 7 Cra. 456; 3 Conn. 191; 17 Miss. 111; Spenc. 394; 4 N. Y. 61; 24 Mo. 541; 50 Vt. 11; 70 Tex. 139; 122 Pa. 613. Co-tenants need not join as against a mere disseisor; 5 Day 207; 3 Blackf. 82; 6 B. Monr. 457; 10 Ired. 146; but mere tenants in common may; 4 Cra. 165; 4 Bibb 241; 11 Ired. 211; not in Missouri. In Indiana it may be maintained by the wife against the husband to recover her separate real estate; 118 Ind. 521.

A court of law will not uphold or enforce an equitable title to land as a defence to an action of ejectment; 128 U. S. 374; 97 Mo. 263; 31 Fed. Rep. 393; contra, 61 Pa. 186; but see 111 N. C. 542; 90 Ga. 210; 74 Cal. 154. Where a defendant has entered a disclaimer of title and possession, he cannot defend his possession as agent of his wife without first showing a title in her; 121 Pa. 520.

Where a defendant in ejectment repudiates a tenancy and claims a title in fee, he dispenses with the necessity of notice to quit; 126 Ill. 228; 75 Cal. 342.

Plaintiff in ejectment in proving title need not go further back than the common source of title, where the defendant claims under the same person; 29 S. C. 372; 85 Ky. 503; 30 W. Va. 505; 37 id. 130; 78 Ga. 245; 17 Wash. L. Rep. 373; 92 Mich. 580.

The plea of not guilty raises the general issue; 3 Pa. 365; 29 Ala. N. s. 542.

The judgment is that the plaintiff recover his term and damages; Pet. C. C. 452; 18 Vt. 600; 12 Barb. 481; 16 How. 275; or damages merely where the term expires during suit; 18 Johns. 295.

Where the fictitious form is abolished, however, the possession of the land generally is recovered, and the recovery may be of part of what the demandant claims; 1 N. Chipm. 41; 6 Ohio 391; 1 H. & M'H. 158; 2 Barb. 330; 1 Ind. 242; 10 Ired. 237; 9 B. Monr. 240; 26 Mo. 591; 4 Sneed 566; 84 Va. 891.

The damages are, regularly, nominal merely; and in such case an action of trespass for mesne profits lies to recover the actual damages; 3 Johns. 481; 3 H. & J. 84; 13 Ired. 439; 25 Miss. 445; 101 N. C. 3; 110 Mo. 419; 65 Vt. 485. See TRESPASS FOR MESNE PROFITS.

In some states, however, full damages may be assessed by the jury in the original action; 18 Vt. 600; 12 Barb. 481; 59 Ga. 55; 55 Miss. 390; 78 N. C. 361; and the verdict is conclusive as to the damages; 100 Cal. 142.

Consult Adams; Archbold; Cole; Gilbert; Remington; Newell; Tyler, Ejectment.

EJECTUM. That which is thrown up by the sea. 1 Pet. Adm. App. 43. See JETSAM.

EJERCITORIA. In Spanish Law. The action which lies against the owner of a vessel for debts contracted by the master, or contracts entered into by him, for the purpose of repairing, rigging, and victualing the same.

EJIDOS. In Spanish Law. Lands used in common by the inhabitants of the place for a pasture, wood, threshing-ground, etc. 15 Cal. 554.

EJUSDEM GENERIS (Lat.). Of the same kind.

In the construction of laws, wills, and other instruments, when certain things are enumerated, and then a phrase is used which might be construed to include other things, it is generally confined to things ejusdem generis; as, where an act (9 Anne, c. 20) provided that a writ of quo warranto might issue against persons who should usurp "the offices of mayors, bailiffs, port-reeves, and other offices, within the cities, towns, corporate boroughs, and places, within Great Britain," etc., it was held that "other offices" meant offices ejusdem generis, and that the word "places" signified places of the same kind; that is, that the offices must be corporate offices, and the places must be corporate places. 5 Term 375; Bac. Abr. Information (D); 8 Dowl. & R. 393.

So, in the construction of wills, when certain articles are enumerated, the term goods is to be restricted to those ejusdem generis. Bacon, Abr. Legacies, B; 8 Rand. 191; 2 Atk. 113; 3 id. 61.

ELDER BRETHREN. A distinguished body of men, elected as masters of Trinity House, an institution incorporated in the reign of Henry VIII., charged with numerous important duties relating to the marine, such as the superintendence of lighthouses. Mozl. & W. Dict.; 2 Steph. Com. 502. The full title of the corporation is Elder Brethren of the Holy and Undivided Trinity. It consists of a master, deputy master, a certain number of acting elder brethren, and of honorary elder brethren, with an unlimited number of younger brethren, the master and honorary elder brethren being chosen on account of eminent social position, and are elected by the court of elder brethren. The deputy master and elder brethren are chosen from such of the younger brethren as have been commanders in the navy four years previously, or have served as master in the merchant service on foreign voyages for at least four years. The younger brethren are chosen from officers of the navy or the merchant shipping service who possess certain qualifications. Their action is subject to an appeal to the Board of Trade. Two of the elder brethren assist the court of admiralty at the hearing of every suit for collision, and occasionally in suits for salvage. Their duty is to guide the court by advice only; though influential, their opinion is not legally binding on the judges.

ELDEST. He or she who has the greatest age.

The eldest son of a man is his first-born, the primo-genitus; L. R. 2 App. Cas. 698; L. R. 12 Ch. Div. 171.

The laws of primogeniture are not in force in the United States; the eldest child of a family cannot, therefore, claim any right in consequence of being the eldest.

ELECTED. In its ordinary signification this word carries with it the idea of a vote, generally popular, sometimes more restricted, and cannot be held the synonym of any other mode of filling a position. 5 Nev. 121; 25 Md. 214.

ELECTION. Choice; selection. The selection of one person from a specified class to discharge certain duties in a state, corporation, or society.

The word, in its ordinary signification, carries the idea of a vote, and cannot be held the synonym of any other mode of filling a position; 5 Nev. 111. See 23 Mich. 341; APPOINTMENT. Election has often been construed to mean the act of casting and receiving the ballots,—the actual time of voting, not the date of the certificate of election; 54 Ala. 205.

Both houses of congress, and parliamentary bodies in general, claim to be the sole judges of the election of their own members. This right seems to be derived from the declaration of rights, delivered by the commons to the king in 1604. Brown, Law Dict.

In the United States this power is vested in congress and the state legislatures by the federal and state constitutions, and chancellor Kent considers that "there is no other body known to the constitution to which such power might safely be trusted. It is requisite to preserve a pure and genuine representation, and to control the evils of irregular, corrupt, and tumultuous elections; and as each house acts in these cases in a judicial character, its decisions, like the decisions of any other court of justice, ought to be regulated by known principles of law, and strictly adhered to for the sake of uniformity and certainty." 1 Com. 235. On the other hand, experience of the temptation to defeated members, which makes contests, in reliance (unfortunately too often well-founded) upon the irresponsibility of party majorities, leads Mr. Justice Miller to remark that: "This provision . . . seems, from the experience of the past, to have been one of those principles adopted from the English house of commons which has not worked well with our institutions, and which the house of commons itself has been obliged to abandon. Contested elections are now, by the law of England, tried before the judiciary, and the judgment of the court is conclusive upon the subject. It is conceded on all hands that justice is in this way more nearly administered with accuracy than it was under the former system. Both in that country and in this, under the former method, the result of a contested election has been very generally forecast by a knowledge of the relations of the parties contesting to the political majority or minority of the house in which the contest is carried on. As this is a constitutional provision, however, there exists no power in the legislature, without an amendment of that instrument, to refer these contested cases to the judiciary. The increasing number of contested election cases arising out of frauds supposed to be perpetrated at the elections themselves, the investigation of which is always difficult, and the uncertainty of a fair and impartial decision . . . render it doubtful whether the entire provision on this subject is of any value." Miller, Const. 193.

Much may be said in support of the views of each of these learned commentators, and there is a possible middle ground practicable under existing constitutional conditions, which might be suggested. That would be to provide for a judicial determination of the contest in the first instance, reserving to the legislative body the final decision only on exception or appeal under such limitations as would preserve and emphasize the judicial character of the proceeding. This would, on the one hand, preserve the absolute independence of the legislature as one of three co-ordinate branches of the government,—a basic principle, it may be remarked, of American and not of English governmental policy,—and at the same time add to the difficulty and probably lessen the frequency of partisan decisions, contrived in the comparative secrecy of committee rooms and consummated by the mere brute force of a majority.

Election of Public Officers. The right to vote is not a natural one but is derived from constitutions and statutes. Each state determines for itself the qualifications of its voters, and the United States adopts the state law upon the subject as the rule in federal elections in accordance with Section 2, Article 1 of the Constitution of the United States, which provides that "the house of representatives shall be composed of members chosen every second year by the people of the several states, and the electors in each state shall have the qualifications required for electors of the most numerous branch of the state legislature."

The power of the state governments, however, to prescribe the qualifications of electors is limited by the Fifteenth Amendment of the Constitution which provides "that the right of citizens of the United States to vote shall not be denied or abridged by the United States or by any state, on account of race, color, or previous condition of servitude." This provision renders void all provisions of a state constitution or a state law which come in conflict with it or with any act of congress passed to enforce it; McCrary, Elections 2; 110 U. S. 663. In the territories the right to vote is regulated by congress.

The right to vote, if once given by a state constitution, cannot be impaired or taken away by legislation. But the legislature can regulate the right to vote in a reasonable way by prescribing questions to be propounded to voters to test their qualifications; 9 Wis. 279; or by requiring them to swear to support the Constitution of the United States, or by requiring registration. But regulations must not in any way impair the right to vote, and hence it has been held that an act prohibiting from voting those who, having been drafted into the military service and duly notified, had failed to report for duty, was void; 59 Pa. 109. An act requiring the voter to declare under oath that he is not guilty of any crime and has not voluntarily borne arms against the United States has also been held void; 24 Ark. 161. But see 3 W. Va. 551. The right to vote can, however, be limited to male citizens or extended to females, but only upon the same terms and conditions as are applied to males; 11 Blatch. 200; 53 Mo. 58; 15 Kan. 26; 2 Utah 136.

The qualifications of voters in the different states are usually citizenship, residence for a given period, age (21 years), sometimes payment of taxes, ownership of land, and education, and mental capacity. See CITIZEN; RESIDENCE; NATURALIZATION; DOMICIL.

The disqualification of voters is imposed as a punishment for crime, usually an infamous one.

Elections must be held at the time and place required by law. Legislative or constitutional provisions on this question are mandatory; 41 Pa. 403; 30 Conn. 591; 44 N. H. 643; see 110 N. C. 232; and votes cast by soldiers in the field, outside of the state, under a statute permitting it, are not valid, when the constitution requires a citizen to vote at his place of residence. In the absence of any constitutional provision a statute providing that soldiers in service may vote is valid; 15 Iowa 304.

If polls are moved to a place not authorized, the election becomes void; 68 Pa. 333; if the polls are not kept open as required by law, the election will be set aside, if enough votes were thereby excluded to change or render doubtful the result; 31 Cal. 82; 68 Pa. 333; but see 4 Wash. St. 661; but it is doubtful whether a few minutes' delay in opening the polls will avoid an election; McCrary, Elect. 85; 5 Eng. El. Cas. 387; 4 id. 378. Closing polls too soon; 74 Ill. 76; or during the dinner hour will not vitiate the election; 19 Ohio St. 25. But the casting of enough votes after the proper hour for closing to change the result will; 4 Pa. L. J. 341. See 3 Cong. El. Cas. 564.

Generally speaking, notice is essential to the validity of an election; McCrary, Elect. 87; and all qualified voters who absent themselves from an election duly called are presumed to assent to the expressed will of the majority of those voting, even though only a minority of those entitled to vote really do vote; 68 Md. 146; but formalities or even the absence of notice may be dispensed with, where there has been an actual election by the people; 10 Ia. 212. See 6 Wash. 427; 99 Cal. 554; but it would seem that, if by a default of notice, enough voters were deprived of a chance to vote, to change the result, the election would be void; McCrary, Elect. 88. The fact that an order providing for an election of the board of education was passed by less than a quorum of the board, does not affect the validity of the election, where it is held at the time provided by statute and there is no statute provision requiring the order to be made; 147 Ill. 514. In California, in a much considered case, it was held that voters must take notice of general elections prescribed by law, and in such cases provisions of the laws as to notice are merely directory; but that in elections to fill vacancies, the requirements as to notice must be fully complied with; 11 Cal. 49. In this case it was further held that, without statutory regulations, no election can be held. See also 12 Cal. 409; 132 Mass. 289; 69 Ind. 218; 20 Kan. 584; 41 N. J. L. 296; 91 N. Y. 616. An election to fill a vacancy cannot be held where such vacancy did not occur long enough before the election to enable due notice to be given; 17 Ind. 554; 12 Cal. 409. A failure to give more than three days' notice may not be fatal to the election, if there was full knowledge thereof and a full vote; 17 R. I. 591.

Slight irregularities in the manner of conducting elections, if not fraudulent, will not avoid an election; Paine, Elect. 502. For instance, the presence of one of the candidates in the room where the election was held, and the fact that he intermeddled with the ballots, was held not to vitiate the poll, there not appearing to have been any actual fraud; Bright, Elect. Cas. 268. Irregularities which do not tend to affect results, will not defeat the will of the majority; 20 Pa. 493. Where a special election was not called by legal authority, the fact that the people voted for the several candidates, will not render the election valid; 91 Mich. 283.

A majority of voters is necessary to pass a constitutional amendment, by a popular vote, but it will be presumed that the number of those who voted is the number of the qualified voters; 22 Alb. L. J. 147; see as to the latter point, 48 Ill. 263; 16 Wall. 644; 68 Md. 146. But there may be a constitutional or statutory method prescribed for ascertaining a majority, in which case the presumption stated does not apply. Thus, in Delaware, a majority to determine whether a constitutional convention shall be called is to be ascertained by the highest vote cast at any one of the last three preceding elections; Const. 1831.

As to whether, when the person receiving the highest number of votes is ineligible, the person receiving the next highest number of votes is thereby elected: In England it is held that the second highest is elected only when it is affirmatively shown that the voters for the candidate highest in votes had such actual knowledge of his ineligibility that they must be taken to have thrown away their votes wilfully; L. R. 3 Q. B. 629; so in 50 N. Y. 451. But in other cases this distinction has not been regarded, and it has been held that the election is void; 13 Cal. 145; 56 Pa. 270; 47 Miss. 266; 38 Me. 597; 53 Mo. 97; 23 Mich. 341. The better opinion is stated by Cooley (Const. Lim.) and Dillon (Mun. Corp.) to be in accordance with this view. This rule was followed in Rhode Island in the presidential election of 1876; 16 Am. L. Reg. 15, with a note by Judge Mitchell. It was therein also held that the ineligibility at the time of election cannot be removed by a subsequent resignation of the office which constituted the ineligibility.

The legislative precedents as to the effect of ineligibility are not uniform. See 56 Pa. 270; 47 Miss. 266; 50 N. Y. 451.

An act providing for the registration of voters, either local or general in its operation, is within the legislative power and constitutional; 93 Ky. 156.

The election laws of the United States of 1870 and 1871, for supervising the election of representatives, now repealed, were constitutional; 100 U. S. 371.

A wager upon the result of an election, being contrary to public policy, is void; 4 Johns. 426; 37 Cal. 670; 4 Kan. 94. All contracts tending to corrupt elections are also void; 13 Am. L. Reg. N. S. 607; 22 Vt. 546. In Pennsylvania and other states one betting on the result of an election is disfranchised as a voter thereat.

Election Officers. Canvassing officers and return judges are ministerial officers only; they exercise no judicial or discretionary function; Cooley, Const. Lim. 783; 44 Mo. 223; 22 Barb. 72; 126 Mass. 282. It is said they may judge whether the returns are in due form; 25 Ill. 328. The acts of such officer, within the scope of his authority, are presumed to be correct; 1 Bartl. 138. In some states, canvassing officers have the power to revise the returns, hear testimony, and reject illegal votes; it is so in Texas, Alabama, Louisiana, and Florida; McCrary, Elect. 67. Where election officers have adopted and enforced an erroneous view as to the qualifications of voters, whereby legal voters are not permitted to vote, an election may be set aside, especially if it appear that such votes would have changed or rendered doubtful the result of the election; Bright, Elect. Cas. 455; McCrary, Elect. 68. A canvassing board which has counted a vote and declared the result, is functus officio. It cannot make a recount; 45 Mo. 350; 33 N. Y. 603; 21 Ohio St. 216.

It is a general rule that the errors of a returning officer shall not prejudice the rights of innocent voters; Cl. & H. 329; (see 135 Ill. 591; 147 id. 514); as where it was the duty of the officer to return the votes sealed and he returned them unsealed, it was held that in the absence of any suspicion of fraud the return was good. Also where a state prescribed a certain form of certificate to be executed by the election officer, it is sufficient if the certificate is substantially in that form, and if an election officer insert by accident the wrong name in his return of the persons voted for, the mistake may be corrected; Cl. & H. Elect. Cas. 229, 369.

But it has also been held that where a statute requires the election officer to place on each ballot the number corresponding with the number of the voter, the failure so to number will deprive the voter of his rights; 62 Mo. 422; 53 Mo. 350. All regulations intended to secure the purity of elections are of vital importance and must be enforced to the letter; 1 Kan. 273, 279; 9 Kan. 569. Regulations which affect the time and place of the election and the legal qualifications of the voters are usually matters of substance, while those relating to the recording and return of the votes received and the mode and manner of conducting the details of the election are directory.

A statute requiring an official act, for public purposes, to be done by a given day, is directory only; 6 Wend. 486. A representative in the legislature cannot be deprived of his seat by the failure of mere election officers to make the return required by law to the secretary of state; see opinion of the judges in Maine; Me. Laws, 1880, p. 225, where many election questions are considered fully. Mere irregularity on the part of election officers, or their omission to observe some merely directory provision of the law, will not vitiate the poll; 85 Ky. 597; nor is an election invalid because the election officers de facto were disqualified; 37 Minn. 439; 69 Tex. 55; so also irregularities which do not tend to affect results are not allowed to defeat the will of the majority, which must be respected, even when irregularly expressed; 19 Barb. 540; 20 Pa. 493; 11 Kan. 269; 29 Ill. 454; 20 Mo. 107; 11 Mich. 362; 26 Tex. 5; 31 Cal. 173; 34 Cal. 635; Bright. Elect. Cas. 448, 449, 450.

By the laws of some states separate boxes are kept at the voting polls for the reception of ballots for different officers, and the question has arisen whether a ballot dropped into the wrong box can be counted. There is some conflict of authority on this point, but it has been held by the supreme court of Michigan that a voter cannot be deprived of his vote by the mistake or fraud of an officer in depositing it in the wrong box, if the intention of a voter can be ascertained with reasonable certainty; and for the same reason a ballot should not be rejected because put in the wrong box by the honest mistake of the voter himself; 11 Mich. 362; Cl. & H. Elect. Cas. 679; 1 Bart. 5; McCrary on Elections, sec. 195.

An election officer who wilfully and corruptly refuses to any qualified citizen the right to vote or to register is liable in damages to the person injured; Ashby v. White, Sm. L. Cas.; 2 Ld. Raym. 958; 98 Ill. 60. In England and in most of the American states proof of a malicious or a corrupt purpose on the part of the officer is necessary; 11 S. & R. 35; 44 N. H. 383; 5 Blackf. 138; 1 Bush 135; but in Massachusetts it is not necessary to show malice, and this rule has been followed in Ohio and Wisconsin. But even in Massachusetts the officer is not liable if he acted under a mistake into which he was led by the conduct of the plaintiff; 5 Metc. 162; 2 Mass. 236; 11 Mass. 350; 11 Ohio 372; 20 Wis. 544. See 11 Johns. 114; 18 N. H. 91; 17 Ind. 536.

Exemplary damages may be recovered if the refusal was wilful, corrupt, and fraudulent; 33 Md. 135.

The jurisdiction to hear and determine election cases, though by common law in courts having ordinary common-law jurisdiction, is generally regulated by special statutes in most of the states.

Where a court can reach a conclusion as to the actual legal vote cast at a precinct, on a contest of an election, it can give effect to it notwithstanding the election officers may have been guilty of misconduct; 15 So. Rep. (La.) 89.

Ballots. Voting by ballots is by a ticket or ball and secrecy is an essential part of this manner of voting; 9 S. C. 94; 27 N. Y. 45; 4 Vt. 535; 26 Minn. 107; L. R. 10 C. P. 753; therefore a statute which provides for numbering ballots is repugnant to a constitutional provision that elections shall be by ballot; 38 Ind. 89; contra, 86 Tex. 133; 69 Hun 596. Ballots are frequently deposited which do not clearly indicate the voter's intention; for instance, by misspelling the name of a candidate, etc. The rule in such cases is thus stated in Cooley, Const. Lim. 611:—"We think evidence of such facts as may be called the circumstances surrounding the election,—such as, who were the candidates brought forward by the nominating conventions; whether other persons of the same name resided in the district from which the officer was to be chosen; and if so, whether they were eligible or had been named for the office; if the ballot was printed imperfectly, how it came to be so printed, and the like,—is admissible for the purpose of showing that an imperfect ballot was intended for a particular candidate, unless the name is so different that to thus apply it would be to contradict the ballot itself, or unless the ballot is so defective that it fails to show any intention whatever, in which case it is inadmissible." See on this point, 4 Wis. 430; 8 Cow. 102; 27 N. Y. 64. The case in 1 Dougl. Mich. 65, which is contra, was overruled in 16 Mich. 283, and the rule above laid down by Judge Cooley approved and followed. Thus votes for "E. M. Braxton," "Elliot Braxton," and "Braxton" have been counted for Elliot M. Braxton in the 42d Congress. See McCrary, Elect. 296. Ballots cast for "D. M. Carpenter," "M. D. Carpenter," "M. I. Carpenter," and "Carpenter" were counted for Mathew H. Carpenter; 4 Wis. 430. Ballots for "Judge Ferguson" were counted for Fenner Ferguson; 1 Bartl. 267. Ballots cast for "E. Clark" and "Clark" were counted for E. E. Clark; those cast for "W. E. Robso," "Robertson," "Robers," and "Robin—" were counted for W. E. Robinson. Where the only candidates for an office were Caleb Gumm and Joel D. Hubbard, votes for "J. D. Huba," "J. D. Hubba," "J. D. Hub," and also one for "Huber," and one for "D. Huber," are properly counted for Hubbard; 97 Mo. 311. See opinion of judges of supreme court of Maine, printed in Maine Laws, 1880, App. p. 225.

A ballot containing the names of two candidates for the same office is bad as to both, but is not thereby vitiated as to other names of candidates on the same ballot; 4 Wis. 420; S. C. Bright. Elect. Cas. 258; 29 Neb. 341; where a ballot contains the names of three persons for the same office, and there is only one vacancy to be filled, it should be rejected; 67 Hun 169.

Where there are statutory provisions as to the marking of ballots, the paper on which they are printed, etc., a ballot not complying with the law should not be received; the direction is mandatory; 3 S. & R. 29; 130 Ind. 561; but see 15 Ill. 492, where the law required white paper without any marks, and blue-tinted paper, ruled, was used, and the ballot declared legal; and where the law required the marking of the ballots with ink, if otherwise regular and marked with a pencil, they were counted; 34 Neb. 116. In 46 Cal. 398, the court held, in this connection, that as to those things over which the voter has control, provisions as to the appearance of ballots are mandatory; and as to those things that are not under his control, such provisions are directory. Ballots on which a printed name is erased and another name written in its place are valid; 22 N. Y. 309; 17 Oreg. 189; but see 44 La. Ann. 796.

Where a law provides that the voter may insert in the blank space provided therefor any name not already on the ballot, it was held that such insertion might be made by the use of a "sticker" as well as by writing the name of the candidate; 146 Pa. 529.

The fact that some of the ballots cast at an election were marked, and thereby rendered void by the election law, does not invalidate the ballots that were regular; 69 Hun 596.

Australian Ballot. This system, the leading features of which have now been adopted in many of the states, is the first important gift to civilization from the continent of Australasia. It originated in South Australia soon after the beginning of the present century as the result of the efforts of Mr. Francis S. Dutton, and thence passed from state to state in Australasia, then to the mother country in Europe, afterward to Canada, and eastward to continental countries, and finally westward again to the United States within the last few years. It has been said that a somewhat similar system had been in vogue in England in Maryport for many years before the modern system was introduced in Australasia. But the Australasian system seems to have been purely indigenous, and was developed without any copying or even knowledge of the system at Maryport.

The cardinal features of the system, as everywhere adopted, are an arrangement for polling by which compulsory secrecy of voting is secured and an official ballot printed and distributed by government authority containing the names of all candidates. The details of the system include methods by which candidates may be nominated, prescribing the number of persons necessary to nominate a candidate, forms in which the various party nominations and information for the voters shall be printed on the ballots, arrangements for small closets or rooms into which the voter can retire and mark his ballot in secret, regulations for allowing him to take into the closet with him when he so desires a person to assist him in marking his ballot, and regulations for the numbering and counting of the ballots. See Wigmore, Australian Ballot System.

The system now generally in vogue in the United States is in most cases not the Australian ballot pure and simple. One feature of that system is the enumeration of candidates for a particular office alphabetically and without designation of party name or emblem. This was adopted in Massachusetts. But in most states the plan, better adapted for the American states, is to use an official ballot, but, when many officers are voted for on a single ballot, to have the column of each party indicated by name or sign or both, and permit the voter to vote a "straight" ticket by a single mark for all officers voted for. This, in various forms, may be termed the American modification of the Australian ballot.

The novel features of this system of voting have given rise to much litigation, and a considerable body of law has already accumulated, which involves not so much new principles as the application of old ones to new conditions. It is, nevertheless, desirable to consider these decisions separately from those under the old system, as thereby a clearer impression is received, both of the system and the method of its enforcement, which is necessarily committed very largely to the courts, and, like cases of railroad receiverships, devolves upon the courts the exercise of functions often to some extent administrative as well as judicial.

It may be said without reserve that the courts have, as a rule, been true to the fundamental doctrines of the law of elections: to give effect to the intention of the voter, where it can be done without defeating the purpose of the legislation,—to enforce party rules with respect to nominations and test the integrity and fairness of those made by petition,—to disregard mere technical irregularities and hold valid elections carried on in good faith rather than to permit them to be defeated by the carelessness, ignorance, or fraud of officials,—to enforce rigidly the safeguards against bribery and intimidation, and the provisions to secure the secrecy of the ballot which lie at the foundation of the system.

For an extended discussion of the Australian ballot laws of England and some of the American states, see Bowers v. Smith, 111 Mo. 45, in which it is held that the system should be construed in subordination to the constitution and laws of the state wherein it is adopted.

Such laws have been held constitutional; id.; 146 Pa. 529; 99 Mich. 538; 54 N. J. L. 446; 108 Mo. 153; 159 Mass. 487; 164 id. 486; 41 N. E. Rep. (Mass.) 681; 42 Pac. Rep. (Wyo.) 1049; 21 S. E. Rep. (Va.) 483. The objections taken will be found to include general ones and also features of particular statutes. The statute forbidding the counting of a ballot not officially stamped and marked with the initials of a judge of election is in conflict with the constitutional provision that all persons duly qualified are entitled to vote and that all elections shall be by ballot; 12 Wash. St. 377. In Illinois the new ballot law is held to have repealed all other laws respecting voting on municipal affairs and ballots; 147 Ill. 204; but it is held to apply only to the election of officers and not to special elections to determine other matters, in Wisconsin; 62 N. W. Rep. (Wis.) 933; and Pennsylvania; 3 Pa. Dist. Rep. 395.

Questions as to the regularity of nomination papers under the Australian ballot system are usually settled by the courts either under express statutory provisions or under their general jurisdiction when applicable. A number of such questions decided in reference to the then pending election are reported in 5 Dist. Rep. Pa. 660-665, 677-681.

Where conflicting nominations have each certain claims to superiority, if technical rules only are applied, the court will give weight to the fact that one candidate carried the district by a decisive majority. The desire of the court in such cases is to reach what is substantial; id. 660. If, under the rules of the party, the county committee has power to fill vacancies and did not act, but only certain members of it residing within the representative district, such action is a clear violation of the party rules and the nomination by such irregular body is void; id. 660. Where congressional conferees from one county of a congressional district were appointed in violation of the party rules, the conference in which they took part was not a regular body, and the nomination made by it was void; id. 661. Nominations attended by fraud and the exercise of arbitrary power will not be upheld by the courts. A minority of delegates cannot nominate, and a faction may not arbitrarily select their meeting-place in defiance of a clear majority of the Ward Executive Committee; id. 661. Where persons who are not delegates are permitted upon the floor of a convention and the evidence justifies the conclusion that their presence was not harmless, the nomination is invalid; id. 662. A nomination paper which attempts to name presidential electors, representatives at large in congress, and other state officers, as well as candidates for separate congressional, senatorial, and representative districts, by a single paper is bad; id. 665. A court will not, however, in the exercise of its equitable powers, enjoin the printing of a certain column on the official ballot on a mere allegation that the nomination papers are defective, false, and fraudulent. Proof of such allegation must be made before the court will find it so as a fact; id. 667. Where an adequate remedy exists and a sufficient opportunity has been given to present to the court objections to a nomination paper, the court will not intervene by injunction in relief of a complainant who has failed to avail himself of such a remedy; id. 681.

Whenever an official ballot is provided for by statute the secretary of state will not decide which of two rival conventions of the same organization is the regular one, but all such nominations should be certified and left to the voters for their decision; 43 Neb. 651; 18 Colo. 26; 88 Mich. 164. See also 39 N. Y. Supp. 119; 5 Misc. Rep. 369; 6 id. 245; nominations by a bolting convention are invalid; 5 Pa. Dist. Rep. 194; in case of a tie vote in a nominating convention neither the candidates nor the election officers can determine the result by lot; 61 N. W. Rep. (Mich.) 346.

The offence of falsely making or signing a nomination certificate must be charged in the words of the statute, being unknown at common law, and the want of criminal intent is no defence, and the voter must sign in person, or be present, and request it to be done; 40 N. E. Rep. (Mass.) 862.

As to defects in statement of names of candidates in nomination papers, see L. R. 1 C. P. Div. 596; L. R. 15 Q. B. Div. 273; 12 id. 257; they are not invalidated by ordinary abbreviations of names; 10 N. S. Wales L. R. 59.

Provisions as to filling vacancies are not always mandatory, and after a fair election, an irregularity will not be permitted to invalidate it; 40 Pac. Rep. (Mont.) 80.

For the form of ballots prescribed in a number of states, see 10 Lawy. Rep. Ann. 150. For inserting names under the Australian ballot law in the official ballot, not legally entitled to insertion, see 35 Cent. Law J. 305.

Courts will not interfere with the discretion of the officer charged with the preparation of the official ballot, as to details; 63 N. W. Rep. (Neb.) 23.

Prohibiting the printing of the name of a candidate in more than one column is constitutional; 64 N. W. Rep. (Mich.) 496; 62 id. 564; but where the act provides that names shall be grouped by parties, a candidate named by more than one party is entitled to have his name appear in the column of each; 33 S. W. Rep. (Mo.) 447; contra, 42 Pac. Rep. (Wyo.) 750.

A construction which makes the error of a single official disfranchise large bodies of voters must be avoided if the language is susceptible of any other; 111 Mo. 45; and where, by the negligence of the officer, the name of a candidate and of the office is omitted from the ballot, the voter may write them, and his vote will be valid; 39 N. E. Rep. (N. Y.) 641.

The provision requiring the voter to make a cross with a stamp opposite each name voted for is mandatory; 38 Pac. Rep. (Cal.)

447; 36 N. E. Rep. (Ind.) 204; 29 Atl. Rep. (Me.) 930; 130 Ind. 561; but in other states the courts are disposed to be more liberal and permit marking outside of the square if to the right of the name; 17 R. I. 812; 13 Pa. Co. Ct. 41; id. 205; 41 Pac. Rep. (Cal.) 454; id. (Nev.) 762; 64 N. W. Rep. (S. D.) 180, 186; 41 N. E. Rep. (Ill.) 1002; 34 S. W. Rep. (Ky.) 6 (in which cases the subject of marks is fully considered). A provision for marking with ink is directory only, and pencil will answer; 34 Neb. 116; a blanket pasteur is not legal in Pennsylvania, but a single sticker may be used; 30 Atl. Rep. 955. As to what distinguishing marks on ballots will vitiate them see 41 N. E. Rep. (Ill.) 1002; id. (Ind.) 796; 91 Cal. 526; 129 N. Y. 395; 31 S. W. Rep. (Tex.) 547; and where by mistake "spoiled ballots" were counted the result was not thereby ascertained and the returns of the county clerk were prima facie evidence which should be considered by the court; 60 N. W. Rep. (Neb.) 1034; voters are not confined to the names on the official ballot but may write other names thereon; 40 N. E. Rep. (Ill.) 290; signing a ballot invalidates it; 41 N. E. Rep. (Ill.) 1002. The failure of a voter to retire to the booth to mark the ballot does not make the marking illegal if not wilful; 31 S. W. Rep. (Mo.) 97. In Michigan the supreme court have with much detail considered this subject and enumerate seven methods of marking which are defective by reason of their being in effect distinguishing marks; 61 N. W. Rep. (Mich.) 648.

The provision that an officer or person designated by law may assist a voter physically or educationally unable to vote should be liberally construed; 21 S. E. Rep. (W. Va.) 483; the voter is the sole judge of his disability; 12 Pa. Co. Ct. 227; contra, under the same statute, 2 Pa. Dist. Rep. 1; the disability must be one contemplated by the statute and not drunkenness or ignorance; id.; nor that he left his glasses at home; 60 N. W. Rep. (Minn.) 676; a ballot is good if the voter asks assistance though he can read; 42 N. E. Rep. (Ind.) 474; where the voter is required to make oath, this is mandatory, and failure to take it invalidates the vote; 99 Mich. 538; but if no form of oath is prescribed any sufficient form of words will suffice; 60 N. W. Rep. (Minn.) 676; if the statute does not restrict the voter's choice of an assistant the election officers cannot do so; 12 Pa. Co. Ct. 227; but when the statute designates a particular officer, it is mandatory; 21 S. E. Rep. (W. Va.) 483; and irregularities in the services of the voter's assistant, as having one where two were required, or if the assistant had received money from a candidate, will not invalidate the vote; 31 S. W. Rep. (Tex.) 547; if the assistant prepares a ballot contrary to the direction of the voter, if fraudulently done, it will avoid the vote, but if it does not appear whether it was fraud of the assistant or mistake of the voter it will not be rejected; id.

When an interpreter was permitted by law but not asked for, the presence of one inside the railing, conversing with voters, was held to vitiate the election; 66 N. W. Rep. (Mich.) 388.

Irregularities in taking the ballot must be gross to defeat the election; L. R. 10 C. P. 751; L. R. 16 Q. B. Div. 739; 7 Can. S. C. 247. When the statute declares a certain irregularity fatal courts will give effect to it, otherwise they will ignore such innocent irregularities as are free from fraud and have not interfered with a fair expression of the voter's will; 111 Mo. 45.

Irregularities which have been held harmless, are where two voting places in a precinct by law entitled to one; 17 Kan. 347; 111 Mo. 45; where ballots were received by officers near a house appointed whose owner refused to permit its use; 58 Cal. 198; errors or irregularities in printing; 17 Colo. 338; 31 Pac. Rep. (Or.) 830; ballots improperly prepared by the officers are not marked "ballots" and may be counted; 42 N. E. Rep. (N. Y.) 536.

When candidates and voters have participated in an election and acquiesced in the result failure to give notice may be disregarded; 84 Mich. 420; and other irregularities may be so far acquiesced in by the defeated candidate that he will be disqualified to complain; L. R. 1 Q. B. 433; 17 Colo. 338.

Contested Elections. At common law the right to an office was tried by a writ of quo warranto; in modern practice, an information in the nature of quo warranto is usual, in the absence of a statute; McCrary, Elect. 196. See 3 Bla. Com. 263; 2 Jurist N. s. 114. An act for trying contested elections without a jury is not unconstitutional; 43 Pa. 389. As to whether the declarations not under oath of illegal voters is evidence as to the votes cast by them, is doubtful, see 23 Wis. 319; 1 Bartl. 19, 230; 9 Kan. 569; 27 N. Y. 45. The ordinary rules of evidence apply to election cases; McCrary, Elect. 231; Paine, Elect. 824. A legal voter may refuse to testify for whom he voted, but he may waive this privilege; 2 Pars. 580. It is competent for witnesses to testify that they were under age at the time of voting, and that their votes were cast for the candidate receiving the largest number; 133 Ind. 11.

In all contested elections, the tribunal will look beyond the certificate of the returning board; 20 Wend. 12. See 56 Mo. 107.

In purging the poll of illegal votes, unless it be shown for whom the illegal votes were cast, they will be deducted from the total vote; 2 Brewst. 128.

Where the laws have been entirely disregarded by the election officers and the returns are utterly unworthy of credit, the entire poll will be thrown out, but legal votes, having been properly proved, may be counted; Bright, Elect. Cas. 493. "Nothing short of the impossibility of determining for whom the majority of votes were given ought to vacate an election;" Cl. & H. 504.

Where another than the person returned as elected is found to have received the highest number of legal votes given, he is entitled to the office; 86 Ky. 596.

ELECTIONS IN CORPORATIONS.

—The power of election by corporations may apply either to corporate officers generally, or to the selection of new members to fill vacancies in those corporations, whose nature and composition require them to consist of members and not of holders of capital stock, as eleemosynary corporations. The election of members of a corporation of the former class is, in general, regulated by the charter, or other constituent law of the corporation, or by its by-laws, and their provisions must be strictly followed. In the absence of express regulations it is a general principle that the power of election of new members, or when the number is limited, of supplying vacancies, is an inherent power necessarily implied in every corporation aggregate. It is said to result from the principle of self-preservation; 2 Kent 293; 1 Rolle. Abr. 513; 8 East 272.

If the right and power of election is not adequately prescribed by the charter, a corporation has power to make by-laws consistent with the charter, and not contrary to law, regulating the time and manner of elections and the qualifications of electors, and manner of proving the same; 3 Term 189; 3 S. & R. 29; 131 Pa. 614; and if there be no by-law, established usage will be resorted to; 20 Pa. 481. In many states there are general statutes on this subject, and in such case they must be strictly followed; 1 Thomp. Corp. § 745.

Unless under express provision as to special meetings, or filling vacancies, elections of officers are held at regular meetings of the corporation. The time is nearly, if not always, regulated by statute, charter, or by-laws, and such cases as are found on the subject are not as to any general principle; 1 Thomp. Corp. § 701; the date cannot be changed by directors so as, by postponement of an annual election, to lengthen their terms; 23 Md. 482; a business meeting of a benevolent corporation may be held on Sunday; 65 Barb. 357; and a charter provision requiring the choice of directors at an annual meeting was held to be directory and not exclusive; 20 N. H. 58.

The place of meeting for elections is also usually regulated by the law of the corporation itself, and if there be none, it should unquestionably be done at its usual and principal place of business, or where it exercises its corporate functions. This is for corporate purposes its domicile, (q. v.) and the term residence is also applied to corporations, as the place where its business is done; 15 Ill. 436; 82 id. 493; while it is a citizen only of the state by which it was created; id. In the latter state only may constituent acts be done; 13 Pet. 519, 588; 11 Wall. 459, 476; 14 N. J. Eq. 380. See also 36 Vt. 750; 35 Mo. 13. Accordingly it has been held that votes and similar acts outside of the state creating it are void; 27 Me. 509; even under a provision authorizing the calling of a first meeting at such a time or place as they think proper; id.; but the appointment in one state of a secretary, by the directors of a manufacturing corporation of another state, has been held valid; 6 Conn. 428; and a corporation created by a concurrent legislation of two states may hold meetings for elections in either; 31 Ohio St. 317. In some states, as Minnesota, the Dakotas, and Colorado, the holding of such meetings is permitted outside of the state; and in the latter state it is held that the fact that the annual meeting was held outside of the state cannot be raised in a collateral proceeding; 5 Colo. 282. Under an authority to call special meetings on notice of time and place, they may be called by the president at a place other than the regular place of business; 5 Sawy. 403; and at such a meeting an election may be held if otherwise legal. Where no place is named in the charter, the directors may designate it, and officers elected at such meeting will be such de facto; 45 Pa. 59.

Meetings for the election of officers following the law of the corporation must be called by the person or persons designated for that purpose; 10 Conn. 200; 25 W. Va. 36; though it has been held that it need not always be by formal action or with strictness of procedure if it is done by their direction; 3 N. J. Eq. 68; 8 Allen 217; contra; 25 W. Va. 36; 34 N. H. 148; 12 Metc. 105; they must be duly assembled; 14 La. Ann. 799; whether of stockholders; 9 La. 397; or directors; 12 N. H. 205, 549; 47 Ia. 11; upon due notice; 5 Burr. 2681; in accordance with charter or by-laws; 13 Allen 90; 7 Conn. 214; 14 Vt. 300; 12 Bush 62; and when there is no provision as to method, personal notice is proper; 7 Conn. 214; or according to general statute law, if there be such; 19 Wend. 37; but, though it is safer and better practice to give notice, in case of stated meetings for regular elections, notice is not required, but the members are charged with notice of them; 36 Me. 78; 4 B. & C. 441; 36 N. H. 252; 11 Wend. 604; while of special meetings there must always be notice; 2 H. L. Cas. 789; 22 N. Y. 128; 6 S. & R. 469; and the failure to notify a single member will avoid the proceedings, 5 Burr. 2681; 4 B. & C. 441; 4 A. & E. 538; 22 N. Y. 128; 1 Thomp. Corp. § 708; unless notice is waived by attendance, as, if all are present, each of them waives the want or irregularity of notice; 7 Ind. 547; 11 Wend. 604. Such waiver will not operate as against a positive direction of the charter; 1 Dill. Mun. Corp. § 264; and when there is no provision as to notice it must be personal; 8 Conn. 191; 8 Metc. 301; 40 Cal. 77; 31 N. J. L. 107.

As to what constitutes a quorum at elections, see MEETINGS; QUORUM.

As to all the details of the conduct of elections, the provisions of state statutes, charters, or by-laws, must be strictly pursued and will generally be found to cover the subject. Where a statute provided for three inspectors, it was held that two could act; 16 Abb. Pr. N. s. 8. The method of appointment prescribed must be strictly followed; 11 Wend. 604; though in certain emergencies the corporators may appoint; 2 Abb. Pr. N. S. 361; and a candidate has been held not disqualified; 7 Cow. 402; but this is so contrary to well settled and judicious legal principles that it cannot be considered desirable. An election otherwise valid will not be avoided because inspectors were not sworn; 19 Wend. 635; or the oath taken not subscribed by them; 2 Abb. Pr. N. S. 361. In the absence of a statute to the contrary, their duties are ministerial, and they cannot act upon the challenge of a vote except to follow the transfer books; 19 Wend. 37; 4 Cow. 382; or put the challenged party on oath; id. note; or pass judicially upon proxies regular on their face; 44 N. J. L. 529; because not acknowledged or witnessed; 36 How. Pr. 477; but this would be otherwise if, as is often the case, the charter requires witnesses. They may not reject votes once received; 10 Abb. Pr. N. S. 331; nor go beyond the ballot to ascertain the intention of the voter; 15 id. 14. Ballots in which only the initials of a candidate were inserted have been held sufficient when it was determined by a verdict who was intended thereby; 5 Denio 409. If the statutes provide that only a certain number are to be chosen, ballots containing more names will not be counted; 27 Mo. 365; 38 N. Y. St. 217; 8 Wend. 396; 2 Burr. 1020; votes for ineligible candidates were formerly held to be "thrown away;" 2 Burr. 1021 note; but it has been held in a later case that such votes will not give the election to a minority candidate unless the voters knew of the ineligibility; 44 N. J. L. 529.

There is no common-law right to vote by proxy, except in England in case of peers; 1 Bla. Com. 168; 131 Pa. 623; and in public or municipal corporations, voting can only be done in person; 2 Kent 294; in private corporations, the right of voting by proxy is usually conferred by charter and the weight of authority is that, if not so conferred, it may be done by by-law; id. 295; 5 Day 329; 131 Pa. 614; 69 Ill. 195; Moraw. Corp. § 486; Cook, Stockh. § 610; contra; 18 Hun 427; 14 N. J. L. 222. See 3 Grant, Pa. 209; 103 Pa. 134; 1 Paige 598; 2 Pa. Co. Ct. 280; 1 Thomp. Corp. § 737; 4 L. R. A. 421; 3 Dessaus. 557. A proxy may be revoked, even if given for a valuable consideration, if about to be used fraudulently; 6 Paige 337; and voting by proxy in fraud or violation of the charter may be restrained by injunction; 6 Gill & J. 94. A certificate of election is not essential; 11 Wend. 604; but it is, when valid on its face, prima facie evidence of election; 10 Abb. Pr. 321; but a court on quo warranto, may go behind it; 20 Wend. 12.

It is probable that at common law each stockholder is entitled to but one vote without respect to the number of shares held. In public and municipal corporations undoubtedly each member has but one vote, and it is said in connection with the statement of this principle: "This rule has been applied to stockholders in a private corporation, and it has been held that such a shareholder has but one vote, although he be the owner of many shares of the capital stock;" Cook, Stock & Stockholders § 608. But this writer, after adverting to the almost universal practice of providing by constitution, statute, or charter for a vote to each share of stock adds, "at the present day it is probable that no court, even in the absence of such provision, would uphold a rule which disregards, in the matter of voting, the number of shares which the shareholder holds in the corporation;" id. And after a reference to the same common-law rule it is said: "But there are good reasons for holding that this rule has no application to ordinary joint stock business corporations of the present day;" Moraw. Corp. § 476. Where the charter did not regulate the voting, but declared that the by-laws may make provision for the conduct of elections, it was held that a corporation might enact a by-law giving to stockholders a vote for each share of stock, and that one providing that they should have one vote for each share up to ten and fixing the proportion which the shares should bear to the votes above that number, "is a reasonable regulation; it is uniform in its operation; it conflicts with no law, and it is binding on all the shareholders;" 131 Pa. 614.

In some states cumulative voting is authorized by statutory or constitutional provision; and such provision in a state constitution is self-executing; 104 Pa. 150. See, generally, works on corporations; Thompson, Corporations, Ch. XV.; 18 L. R. A. 582; MEETINGS; PROXY; QUORUM.

ELECTION OF RIGHTS OR REMEDIES.—The obligation imposed upon a party to choose between two inconsistent or alternative rights or claims, in cases where there is clear intention of the person from whom he derives one that he should not enjoy both. 2 Sto. Eq. Jur. § 1075.

Etymologically, election denotes choice, selection out of the number of those choosing. Thus, the election of a governor would be the choice of some individual from the body of the electors to perform the duties of governor. In common use, however, it has come to denote such a selection made by a distinctly defined body—as a board of aldermen, a corporation, or state—conducted in such a manner that each individual of the body choosing shall have an equal voice in the choice, but without regard to the question whether the person to be chosen is a member of the body or not. The word occurs in law frequently in such a sense, especially in governmental law and the law of corporations.

But the term has also acquired a more technical signification, in which it is oftener used as a legal term, which is substantially the choice of one of two rights or things, to each one of which the party choosing has equal right, but both of which he cannot have. This option occurs in fewer instances at law than in equity, and is in the former branch, in general, a question of practice.

At Law. In contracts, when a debtor is obliged in an alternative obligation to do one of two things, as to pay one hundred dollars or deliver one hundred bushels of wheat, he has the choice to do one or the other until the time of payment; he has not the choice, however, to pay a part in each. Pothier, Obl. part 2, c. 3, art. 6, no. 247; 11 Johns. 59. Or, if a man sell or agree to deliver one of two articles, as a horse or an ox, he has the election till the time of delivery,—it being a rule that, “in case an election be given of two several things, always he which is the first agent, and which ought to do the first act, shall have the election;” Co. Litt. 145 a; 7 Johns. 465; 2 Bibb 171. On the failure of the person who has the right to make his election in proper time, the right passes to the opposite party: Co. Litt. 145 a; Pothier, Obl. no. 247; 1 Des. Ch. 460; Hopk. Ch. 337; 40 Ohio St. 539; 56 Vt. 538; 66 How. Pr. 306; 21 Fed. Rep. 383.

When one party renounces a contract the other party may elect to rescind at once, except so far as to sue upon it and recover for the breach, and he may immediately bring an action, without waiting for the time of performance to arrive or elapse; (in such case he cannot treat the contract as subsisting for any other purpose); 2 E. & B. 678; L. R. 7 Exch. 114; L. R. 16 Q. B. 460; 158 Pa. 107; 111 U. S. 264; 11 Fed. Rep. 372; contra, as to a contract for the sale of land, 114 Mass. 530. See the cases collected, Ans. Cont. (8th ed., 355) n. 1. It is a maxim of law that an election once made and pleaded, the party is concluded: electio semel facta et placitum testatum non patitur regresum; Co. Litt. 146; 11 Johns. 241.

In many cases of voidable contracts there is a right of election to affirm or disavow them, after the termination of the disability, the existence of which makes this contract voidable. So all contracts of an infant, except for necessities, may be avoided by him within a reasonable time after he comes of age, but they are voidable only, and he must elect not to be bound by them; 48 N. H. 251; 18 Neb. 54. See 102 U. S. 300. And bringing suit is an election to rescind; 50 N. H. 235; 13 Daly, N. Y. 227. See INFANT.

Whenever, by law or contract, a party has laid before him a variety of steps, the taking of one of which excludes another, or the rest, he must choose between them. After his choice is made, and by words or acts expressed in a manner suited to the particular case, he cannot reverse it; he is said to have elected the one step, and waived the other; Bish. Cont. § 808.

Other cases in law arise: as in case of a person holding land by two inconsistent titles; 1 Jenk. Cent. Cas. 27; dower in a piece of land and that piece for which it was exchanged; 3 Leon 271. See Sugd. Pow. 498.

In Equity. A choice which a party is compelled to make between the acceptance of a benefit under a written instrument, and the retention of some property already his own, which is attempted to be disposed of, in favor of a third party, by virtue of the same paper. The doctrine of election presupposes a plurality of gifts or rights, with an intention, express or implied, of the party who has a right to control one or both, that one should be a substitute for the other; 1 Swanst. 394, note (b); 3 Woodd. Lect. 491; 2 Rop. Leg. 480; Snell, Pr. Eq. 237.

The doctrine of election rests upon the principle that he who seeks equity must do it, and means, as the term is ordinarily used, that where two inconsistent or alternative rights or claims are presented to the choice of a party, by a person who manifests the clear intention that he should not enjoy both, then he must accept or reject one or the other; and so, in other words, that one cannot take a benefit under an instrument and then repudiate it; 133 U. S. 695.

Where an express and positive election is required, there is no claim, either at law or in equity, to but one of the objects between which election is to be made; but in many cases there is apparent, from the whole of an instrument, the intention that the party to be benefited shall be benefited on certain conditions. In such cases, equity will require the party to elect; Bisph. Eq. sec. 295.

The question whether an election is required occurs most frequently in case of devises; “because deeds being generally matters of contract, the contract is not to be interpreted otherwise than as the consideration which is expressed requires;” L. R. 8 Ch. 578; but it extends to deeds; 1 Swanst. 400; 2 Story, Eq. Jur. § 1075, n.; and it has been held to apply to “voluntary deeds, to cases of contracts for valuable consideration resting in articles, to contracts for value completely executed by conveyance and assignments;” per Selborne, Ld. Ch., L. R. 8 Ch. 578, where the authorities are collected. The doctrine also applies to powers of appointment; 2 Ves. Jr. 367; L. R. 9 Eq. 519; 22 Ch. D. 555; 27 id. 696; 34 id. 160.

In the case, not strictly of election, but often so treated, of two distinct gifts of a testator's own property, one onerous and the other not, it is the general rule that the donee may take one and reject the other, unless it appear that it was the testator's intention that the option should not exist; 22 Ch. D. 573, 577; and where a gift is made by a deed of which the consideration is partly invalid by reason of the disability of the parties, the parts of the deed are read together and the burden is treated as the consideration for the benefit; Brett, L. Cas. Mod. Eq. 263. When a married woman made a valid appointment by will to her husband under a power, and also bequeathed personal property (not her separate estate) to another person to which the power did not extend, the husband was not put to his election, but took both under the power and jure mariti, as to the property ineffectually bequeathed; 9 Ves. 369.

There must be a clear intention by the testator to give that which is not his property; 1 Sim. 105; 18 Ves. 41; 1 Ed. Ch. 532; L. R. 7 Eq. 291. And if the testator has some interest in the thing disposed, the presumption that he intended to dispose only of his interest must be overruled in order to make a case of election; 6 Dow. 149, 179; 1 Ves. 515.

The intention of the testator to put the devisee to his election must appear from the will itself; but surrounding circumstances may be shown by parol; 41 Ark. 64; 30 Beav. 14. The time in which election may be exercised must be reasonable; 30 Beav. 235; 77 Va. 198; 19 Ves. 663; 34 Ala. 558; 30 Ia. 465; 4 McLean 99.

The doctrine applies to every species of property or interest, whether the donor does or does not know of his right to dispose of it; Wats. Comp. Eq. (2d. ed.) 177; cases of transactions involving property of the wife; 23 Beav. 457; 30 Gratt. 83; satisfaction of dower; Ambl. 466, 682; 8 Paige, Ch. 325; 2 Sch. & L. 452; 14 Sim. 258; 1 Drur. & W. 107. The doctrine does not apply to creditors; 12 Ves. 354; 1 Pow. Dev. 437.

As to the right or duty of election by persons under disability, there is much apparent confusion in the cases both as to theory and practice. Story states the rule generally that married women, infants, and lunatics are not bound by election; 2 Eq. Jur. § 1097. The statement would seem too broad even before the great changes made in all matters affecting the property rights and powers of married women by the trend of recent legislation, and before the changes characterized by a careful commentator as a "brand new invention of equity not fifty years old, and made exclusively for the benefit of married women under the old law—a breed which is rapidly becoming extinct;" Brett, L. Cas. Mod. Eq. 257. This writer considers the old and true doctrine of election to apply only to the acceptance of gifts under an instrument made by another, while the new doctrine involves the confirmation or repudiation of voidable instruments made by the person electing, who, in the cases referred to, is always a married woman. The rule, so far as there is one, has been stated thus:—Parties competent to make an election must usually be sui juris, but election may sometimes be made by a court of equity on behalf of infants and married women; Bisph. Eq. § 304; but this is really no rule and probably none can be exactly defined; the cases must be resorted to, and a large measure of judicial discretion has been exercised in dealing with them as they arose. In some it is held that a married woman may be permitted to elect; 4 Kay & J. 409; 59 Wis. 483; 65 Pa. 451; in others that she cannot; 3 Myl. & Cr. 171; Lord Cairns in L. R. 7 H. L. 67; 9 Ch. D. 363; but it may be referred to a master to inquire what is best for her; 2 Ves. 60; L. R. 7 H. L. 67 (but in this case there were also infants). It was held that she must elect by Lord Hatherly in 2 J. & H. 344 (which Brett says "led to the new departure"); followed by Kay, L. J., in 28 Ch. D. 124; contra; by Sir George Jessel in 18 Ch. D. 531; followed by Chitty, L. J., in 27 Ch. D. 606. The decisions of Lord Hatherly and Sir George Jessel were referred to without disapproval by Lord Selborne, one in L. R. 8 Ch. 578, and the other in 8 App. Cas. 420. Finally in 31 Ch. D. 275, (reversing 28 Ch. Div. 124,) it was held that the wife would not be compelled to elect, but was entitled to retain both funds, on the ground that the settled fund had a restraint on anticipation. This case reviews the conflicting decisions and considers that they leave the question to be determined on principle. It is treated as deciding that but for the fact on which the case was put it was one for election; Snell, Pr. Eq. 247; and it assumed without discussion that election applied to married women, and thereby as Brett considers "sealed the triumph of the new election"; Lead. Cas. Mod. Eq. 257.

With regard to infants, the practice has varied very much, and the cases are collected in 1 Swanst. 413, note (c). The infant has been permitted to elect after coming of age in some cases; cas. t. Talbot 176; id. 130; 2 Ves. Sr. 12; 3 Bro. P. C. 173; in others an inquiry has been directed; 2 Sch. & Lef. 266; and this may be considered the usual practice; 1 Bro. P. C. 300; 2 Eq. 481; though the court has elected for them without reference; 26 L. J. N. S. Ch. 148; 2 Bland, Ch. 606; and the same practice is adopted when the persons to elect are unborn; Brett, L. Cas. Mod. Eq. 260. See, generally, on this subject, Serrell, Equit. Doct. Elect. 184.

Persons not under disabilities are bound to elect; 79 N. Y. 478. Positive acts of acceptance or renunciation are not indispensable, but the question is to be determined from the circumstances of each case as it arises; 21 Beav. 447; 13 Price 782; 1 M'Clel. 541; 15 Pa. 430. And the election need not be made till all the circumstances are known; 1 Bro. Ch. 186, 445; 2 V. & B. 222; 1 M'Cl. & Y. 569. See, generally, 2 Story, Eq. Jur. § 1075; 1 Swanst. 402, note; 2 Rop. Leg. 480–578; Bisph. Eq. 295.

A widow has a right, regulated by statute in the several states, to declare her election between the provisions in her favor under the will of her husband and her right of dower. When bound to elect she is entitled to full information and ascertainment of the values of the two interests, and she may file a bill in equity to obtain them; 2 Scribn. Dow. 497, and cases cited at large in note 1. The right must be exercised by the widow herself, being purely personal; 6 Gray 307; 6 Ired. L. 274; and the rule is not subject to exception even if she is insane; 7 Ired. L. 72; 5 Md. 503. After the widow's death within forty days without election, her representatives could not make a renunciation of the will; 3 Har. & McH. 95; 37 Ohio St. 460; 71 Ind. 455; 90 Pa. 384. For the statutory provisions on the subject see 2 Scribn. Dow. 505, notes.

There must be an intention to elect and knowledge of her rights so as to constitute a deliberate choice; 43 Pa. 474; 2 Gr. Ch. 504; and an election made under a mistake does not conclude her; 1 Bro. C. C. 445; 12 Ves. Jr. 136; 4 Dessaus. 274; but if she is acquainted with the material facts the election will bind her even though she do not understand her legal rights; 21 Pa. 407. But see 6 Humph. 220; 11 Ohio St. 386. Nor is she concluded by an election procured by fraud; 10 Yerg. 94; 2 Dana 13. In some cases an election is implied, but so much difficulty is found to exist with respect to what constitutes an implied election that it will generally remain to be determined by the circumstances of each case. See 1 Lead. Cas. in Eq. 537, 570, and cases cited; 5 Call 481; 2 Hen. & Mun. 381; 12 Pick. 146; 43 Pa. 474; 6 Ohio St. 480; 14 Gratt. 518. In many states, if deprived of the provision given in lieu of dower, the widow is entitled to demand her dower; 2 Scribn. Dow. 525; 2 Harris. N. J. 459; if the deprivation be substantial though not total; 32 Me. 132; or if a previous application for dower has been refused; 1 Metc. 66; or the statutory period for demand has passed before she was advised of the failure of her provision; 32 Me. 132; or she had previously elected to take under the will; 20 Wend. 564, affg. 7 Paige 221. In taking a testamentary provision in lieu of dower the widow becomes a purchaser for a valuable consideration; 1 Lead. Cas. in Eq. 511, 570; 2 Scribn. Dow. 527, and cases cited in note; 4 Del. Ch. 289.

In cases not covered by statute a widow may be required to elect upon general equitable principles. In the case last cited, she being also a legatee of one-third of the estate "according to law," was held to be put to her election, not under the statute but under the general doctrine of equity which is thus stated by Bates, Ch.: This doctrine precludes a party taking a benefit by deed or will from asserting any title or claim clearly inconsistent with the provisions of the instrument under which he takes—putting him to his election between the two. In its application to dower it is nowhere better stated than by our court of appeals in 3 Harring. 474. "In regard to dower it seems from all the cases to be an established rule that a court of equity will not compel the widow to make her election, unless it be shown by the express words of the testator, that the devise or bequest was given in lieu or satisfaction of dower; or unless it appears that such was the testator's intention, by clear and manifest implication arising from the fact that the dower is plainly inconsistent with the devise or bequest, and so repugnant to the will as to defeat its provisions. If both claims can stand consistently together, the widow is entitled to both, although the claim under the will may be much greater in value than her dower." 2 S. & L. 451; 3 Ves. Jr. 249; 1 Drew. 411 (17 E. L. & Eq. 352); Dru. & War. 107; 3 Kay & J. 257; 2 John. Ch. 451.

Of Remedies. A choice between two or more means of redress for an injury or the punishment of a crime allowed by law.

The selection of one of several forms of action allowed by law.

The choice of remedies is a matter demanding practical judgment of what will, upon the whole, best secure the end to be attained. Thus, a remedy may be furnished by law or equity, and at law, in a variety of actions resembling each other in some particulars. Actually, however, the choice is greatly narrowed by statutory regulations in modern law, in most cases. See 1 Chit. Pl. 207-214.

A person may often choose whether he will sue in tort or contract. If his goods are taken from him by fraud he may sue for the price in assumpsit, or bring an action of replevin or trover; 1 Paige, N. Y. 192; 99 Mass. 255; 7 Blackf. (Ind.) 501; 29 Ala. 332; 25 Mich. 386; 25 Ark. 100; 43 Cal. 380; 30 Vt. 277; 57 Me. 441. And when two actions are pending at law or in equity between the same persons and for the same subject-matter, the plaintiff is usually compelled to elect which one he will maintain;

32 N. J. Eq. 67; 29 Minn. 252; 35 Ala. 297. But an election is not usually compelled between domestic and foreign suits; 7 Blatchf. (C. C.) 159; 13 Wis. 94; and a foreclosure of a mortgage and a suit on the bond as well as actions to enforce admiralty liens and at the same time recover on the debt are also exceptions; 53 Ill. 171; 5 Cal. 48; 10 Wall. 204.

It may be laid down as a general rule that when a statute prescribes a new remedy the plaintiff has his election either to adopt such remedy or proceed at common law. Such statutory remedy is cumulative, unless the statute expressly or by necessary implication takes away the common-law remedy; 1 S. & R. 32; 5 Johns. 175; 16 id. 220; 1 Call 243; 2 Me. 404; 6 H. & J. 383; 4 Halst. 384; 3 Chit. Pr. 130; 15 Hun 556; 74 N. Y. 437; 61 Ind. 290; 47 Ia. 602.

The commencement and trial of an action on a contract is not such an election of remedies as would estop plaintiff from suing on the notes; 39 Mich. 267; 90 id. 476.

Where a plaintiff has separate and concurrent remedies against a number of parties, he loses no rights by suing some and afterwards discontinuing his action; 82 Wis. 120. See 141 N. Y. 437. An unsatisfied judgment on a note will not bar an action on notes taken as collateral security; 59 Fed. Rep. 917.

By joining his wife in a suit for her legacy, a husband exercises his election to treat it as joint property; 4 Del. Ch. 117.

After a suit in replevin has been discontinued before judgment without obtaining any benefit, because plaintiff has paid the value of the goods to satisfy his replevin bond, this suit does not constitute such an election of remedy as to stop him from claiming payment of the purchase price out of the assets of the purchaser's estate; 83 Md. 50.

In Criminal Law. The choice or determination by a prosecuting officer, upon which of several charges, or counts, in an indictment he will proceed to trial.

No objection can be raised, either on demurrer or in arrest of judgment, though the defendant or defendants be charged in different counts of an indictment with different offences of the same kind. Indeed, on the face of the record, every count purports to be for a separate offence, and in misdemeanors it is the daily practice to receive evidence of several libels, several assaults, several acts of fraud, and the like, upon the same indictment. In cases of felony, the courts, in the exercise of a sound discretion, are accustomed to quash indictments containing several distinct charges, when it appears, before the defendant has pleaded and the jury are charged, that the inquiry is to include several crimes. When this circumstance is discovered during the progress of the trial, the prosecutor is usually called upon to select one felony, and to confine himself to that, unless the offences, though in law distinct, seem to constitute in fact but parts of one continuous transaction. Thus, if a prisoner is charged with receiving several articles, knowing them to have been stolen, and it is proved that they were received at separate times, the prosecutor may be put to his election; but if it is possible that all the goods may have been received at one time, he cannot be compelled to abandon any part of his accusation; 1 Mood. 146; 2 Mood. & R. 524. In another case, the defendant was charged in a single count with uttering twenty-two forged receipts, which were severally set out and purported to be signed by different persons, with intent to defraud the king. His counsel contended that the prosecutor ought to elect upon which of these receipts he would proceed, as amidst such a variety it would be almost impossible for the prisoner to conduct his defence. As, however, the indictment alleged that they were all uttered at one and the same time, and the proof corresponded with this allegation, the court refused to interfere; and all the judges subsequently held that a proper discretion had been exercised: 2 Leach 877; 2 East, Pl. Cr. 934. See 11 Cl. & F. 155; Dears. 427; 12 Cush. 612; 12 S. & R. 69; 2 H. & J. 426; 12 Wend. 426; 118 Mass. 443; 29 Mich. 61; 75 Mo. 355.

The state need not elect on which count of an indictment it will proceed to trial, where the several counts relate to the same transaction; 109 Mo. 654.

The artificial distinction between felonies and misdemeanors is, in most jurisdictions, obsolete, and in most states several distinct offences to which a similar punishment is attached may be joined. It usually rests with the court whether it will compel a prosecuting officer to elect which count to proceed on; 51 Me. 363; 104 Mass. 552; 89 Ill. 571; 66 Mo. 632; Whart. Crim. Pl. & Pr. § 293. The election should be made before opening the case of the defence; Bish. Cr. Proc. § 462; 65 Ga. 449; 107 Mass. 219.

ELECTION DISTRICT. A subdivision of territory, whether of state, county, or city, the boundaries of which are fixed by law, for convenience in local or general elections. 41 Pa. 403; 2 Pa. L. J. R. 82.

ELECTOR. One who has the right to make choice of public officers; one who has a right to vote. See 10 Minn. 107. See PRESIDENTIAL ELECTORS.

One who exercises the right of election in equity. The term is sometimes used in this sense. Brett, L. Cas. Mod. Eq. 257.

In the German Empire the name was given to those great princes who had the right to elect the emperor or king. The office of elector in some instances became hereditary and was connected with territorial possessions as, elector of Saxony.

ELECTORAL COLLEGE. A name given to the presidential electors, when met to vote for president and vice-president of the United States, by analogy to the college of cardinals, which elects the pope, or the body which formerly selected the German emperor. It is, according to the more general usage, applied to the electors chosen by a single state, but is also used to designate those chosen throughout the United States.

This term has no strict legal or technical meaning, and being unknown to the constitution and laws of the United States, its use is purely colloquial. Accordingly the term is not clearly defined, and it is employed by approved writers in both the senses stated, though more frequently when reference is made to the entire body of electors the plural is employed, as, "the expectations of the public . . . (have) been so completely frustrated as in the practical operation of the system, so far as relates to the independence of the electors in the electoral colleges;" 2 Sto. Const. § 1463; " . . . would be chosen as electors, and would, after mature deliberation in their respective colleges," etc.; 1 Hare, Am. Const. L. 219; "the electoral colleges have sunk so low"; id. 221. So in speaking of the electors the phrase "state colleges" is used by Stevens; Sources of the Constitution of the U. S. 153, note. Following this view is a very recent definition:—A name informally given to the electors of a single state when met to vote for president and vice-president of the United States, and sometimes to the whole body of electors. Cent. Dict.

On the other hand, the other use is well sustained by authority, and we find this equally recent definition: The body of electors chosen by the people of the United States to elect their president. Encyc. Dict. This is supported by Webster and Worcester as well as some authorities on constitutional law. "The presidential electors chosen as therein directed, constitute what is commonly called the 'electoral college';" Black, Const. L. 86; and again, "by an electoral college appointed or elected in the several states"; id. "In case the electoral college fails to choose a vice-president, the power devolves on the senate to make the selection from the two candidates having the highest number of votes." 1 Calhoun's, Works 175. See PRESIDENTIAL ELECTORS.

ELECTORAL COMMISSION. A commission created by an act of congress of January 29, 1877, to decide certain questions arising out of the presidential election of November, 1876, in which Hayes and Wheeler had been candidates of the republican party and Tilden and Hendricks of the democratic party. The election was very close, and depended on the electoral votes of South Carolina, Florida, and Louisiana. It was feared that there would be much trouble at the final counting of the votes by the president of the senate according to the plan laid down in the Constitution. The republicans had a majority in the senate and the democrats had a majority in the house of representatives. A resolution was adopted by congress for the appointment of a committee of seven members by the speaker to act in conjunction with a similar committee that might be appointed by the senate to prepare a report and plan for the creation of a tribunal to count the electoral votes whose authority no one could question and whose decision all could accept as final. The joint committee thus appointed reported a bill providing for a commission of fifteen members, to be composed of five members from each house appointed viva voce, with four associate justices of the supreme court, which latter would select another of the justices of the supreme court, the entire commission to be presided over by the associate justice longest in commission. This body has since been known as the Electoral Commission.

Justices Clifford, Miller, Field, and Strong were named in the act as members, and they chose as the fifth justice Justice Bradley. The other members were Senators Bayard, Edmunds, Frelinghuysen, Morton, and Thurman, and Representatives Abbott, Garfield, Hoar, Hunton, and Payne.

The commission began its sessions February 1, and completed its work March 2, 1877. Various questions came before it in regard to the electoral vote of South Carolina, Florida, and Louisiana, as to which of two state returns was valid, and as to the eligibility of certain of the presidential electors. The most important decision of the commission and the one which has caused most comment and criticism was to the effect that the regular returns from a state must be accepted, and that the commission had no power to go behind these returns; or, as the commission itself expressed it, "that it is not competent under the Constitution and the law as it existed at the date of the passage of said act, to go into evidence alimide the papers opened by the president of the senate in the presence of the two houses, to prove that other persons than those regularly certified to by the governor of the state of Florida in and according to the determination and declaration of their appointment by the Board of State Canvassers of said state prior to the time required for the performance of their duties, had been appointed electors, or by counter-proof to show that they had not, and that all proceedings of the courts or acts of the legislature or of the executive of Florida subsequent to the casting of the votes of the electors on the prescribed day are inadmissible for any such purpose." Curtis, Constitutional History of the United States, vol. 2, 419.

The result of the controversy over the election of 1876 was the passage, after long and earnest consideration, of the Act of Congress of Feb. 3, 1887, to regulate the counting of the electoral votes for president and vice-president. U. S. Rev. St. 1 Supp. 525. See PRESIDENTIAL ELECTORS; PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES.

ELECTRIC LIGHT. Light produced by electricity. It is furnished either by municipalities or by corporations formed for the purpose of manufacturing it for hire.

The Nature of Electric Light Companies. Such companies, although not public corporations in the sense that the term is applied to municipal corporations; Crowell Elec. § 20; and being unable without statutory authority to claim an exemption of property from the ordinary mechanic's lien; 48 Kan. 182; (see FIXTURES), are held to exercise a public use and are of a public character similar to telegraph and telephone companies; 150 Mass. 592; 153 id. 129; 160 Pa. 511; 42 Fed. Rep. 723; 130 Ind. 149; but when poles are set for this purpose by a company for furnishing light commercially as well as for lighting streets, the abutting owner of land on a street used by such companies may demand compensation for such use, as it is held to create an additional servitude; 13 Pa. Co. Ct. Rep. 369; 51 N. Y. Sup. Ct. 280; 32 Hun 96; contra; when controlled by the municipality; 65 How. Pr. 407. But this subject can scarcely be considered as finally and definitely settled on principle; see Crow. Elect. § 126.
